Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): I am also delighted that we have had this important debate, as I am part of the group of 40. Needless to say, I would not be in that group if my local education authority, West Berkshire, were not among those most poorly funded under the standard spending assessment system. I am sorry to see that and hope that something will be done about it. The Government have a wonderful opportunity to do so in the spending review this summer. I hope that we shall see more funding for education, particularly for authorities that are among those least funded.

My point about West Berkshire is not the main subject of my remarks. I should like to make a much more fundamental point about the methodology under which SSAs are calculated. There is an important lesson to be learned in considering future methodology.

As I understand it, the current system is an attempt to decide the standard spending assessment in each area according to need. Obviously, the number of pupils, both primary and secondary, is the main consideration, but SSAs are also based on the number of pupils with additional needs of one sort or another—whether they come from single-parent families, have parents who live outside the United Kingdom or whose parents are on income support—on sparsity, which affects the size of schools and the amount of school transport needed, on the number of pupils who are eligible for free school meals and on the area cost adjustment. Most of us would accept that all those indicators in some sense affect educational needs. The question, however, is how much weight is given to each indicator.

The weight is calculated through regression analysis of education spending in each area in 1990-91. The system works only if one assumes that such spending was a fair indication of each area's needs. The flaw in the logic of the methodology is that we do not know whether such spending was an accurate indicator of real need. Indeed, it is fairly clear that it was not. In 1990-91, a number of shire authorities were Conservative-controlled, and spending on education in them compared with that on other things was probably lower than in areas elsewhere. On the whole, the emphasis in those shire counties was to try to keep down local taxation.

It is not my case to argue whether that was right or wrong; it does not matter to my argument whether it is politically more sensible to try to keep down local taxation or to push up education spending. My point is that, if one assumes that education spending in that year is dependent on need, one fails to take into account the fact that some areas were keeping down their education spending for political reasons rather than because their needs were not as great.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who makes the point well. It is one that I shied away from making. It is certainly true that Cambridgeshire county council, which was a very low-spending authority in 1990, has suffered from that legacy ever since. I hope that that will be put right by the White Paper.

Mr. Rendel: I thank the hon. Lady for that intervention.

On the whole, those areas that were controlled by authorities that were trying to keep down local taxation tended to be ones with comparatively high sparsity and comparatively few pupils with special needs, whereas those areas where education spending was higher and the need to keep down local taxation was less of a priority tended to be ones with lower sparsity and more pupils with additional needs. The regression analysis may simply show which parts of the country were controlled by which party rather than the real weight that should be attached to the different need factors.

If we continue to use such regression analysis, we will always come up against that problem. To make sense of such analysis, one would have somehow to find a year in the past in which the spending of local education authorities was in proportion to each area's real needs. If it is not true that 1990-91 is such a year, it is even less true that any subsequent year is, because education spending has continued to be based on what it was in 1990-91 and the flaw has been maintained throughout. If we were to choose a year before 1990-91, we would have to find one in which every authority in the land was governed by the same party or at least had the same weight given to the area's real needs. Frankly, there is no such year.

My point is not only that West Berkshire would like some more money but that, more importantly, the use of regression analysis to discover what weight should be given to the various additional needs of different education authorities has a basic logical flaw. I beg the Government, when they come up with their new system, not to use such analysis but to try to come to an objective view of what extra money should be given to each area because of sparsity or special needs.

In practice, the Government have already accepted that regression analysis does not work, because the value that would be given to the sparsity factor according to such analysis is lower than the value that is currently given. It has become clear from the level of funding that is given to local education authorities with a high sparsity factor that the regression analysis has failed to come up with an adequate value. The Government have had to intervene and give an artificially high value.

Having accepted that such analysis does not work, I hope that the Government will abandon a false methodology that inevitably leads to a formula that is not fair and does not provide for the real needs of an area. I hope that they will look for a more sensible way of calculating the weight to be given to each value in future.

Mr. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire): I want to highlight the Leicestershire position and to endorse the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell), whom I congratulate on securing this debate at precisely the right time. We may be having a Dutch auction concerning who has the lowest SSA per capita, but Leicestershire is at the bottom of the league tables for county, not unitary, authorities. We are 6 per cent. adrift of the county average for primary and secondary pupils and about 12 per cent. adrift of the best-funded county, Hertfordshire.

We are pressing my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that a more equitable system results from the review, which is at such an advanced stage. Yes, we want a national pupil funding rate and a minimum education funding level, but we must not fail to recognise the key measures of social deprivation—London weighting and rural weighting—and squeeze out those attempts to create a fairer system. We all know that there is no absolutely fair system, no holy grail in some cellar of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions that, when opened, will reveal the perfect SSA formula, but we want to alter the mechanisms at the fringes in a way that will improve matters significantly for our own authorities.

I strongly welcome the recent initiatives, especially in the last Budget, for some direct funding of schools. I chaired the governing body of one of the largest schools in Leicestershire, Ashby Grammar school—despite its name, a comprehensive—until the general election. The last governors' meeting that I attended was heartened and encouraged by the announcement that we were to receive £50,000 for our standards fund, and that is most welcome.

This may seem perverse, but I would caution against going too far down the path that leads to very high levels of funding going directly to schools, because that way lies the inevitable demise of local education authorities. I am troubled by the language that I hear, sometimes from Ministers but more often from Opposition Members, about local education authorities top-slicing and siphoning off funding that is intended for schools. If we are not careful, we will starve and accelerate the end of some well-regarded education authorities, with Leicestershire among them.

Leicestershire was one of the very first authorities to introduce an effective system of comprehensive education when the 11-plus was widespread and to introduce high-quality community education. We are highly regarded not only in the United Kingdom but in Europe for the musical, literary and cultural dimension in our schools.

I hope that there is no hidden agenda to let local education authorities wither on the vine. If there is, I cannot subscribe to it. Poorly funded though Leicestershire is, we are immensely grateful for the huge strides that have been made since 1 May 1997. The improvements in our overall grant and other forms of finance outstrip the gaps that we still have.

Let us put the matter in context. There are still one or two steps that my hon. Friend the Minister can take to ensure that the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions responds effectively and provides an adequate formula, but let us not overstate the case or have a secret agenda to end LEAs, particularly in areas with a record like Leicestershire's.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I congratulate the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) on securing a debate that I have been trying to get for the past two months. She obviously has some secret that I do not share. I also congratulate the many hon. Members who have spoken today. There is an element of repertory company about this debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) and I have certainly had many debates on the subject with the Minister, and it is good to see that some of the old arguments are being rehearsed yet again. They are arguments that we have been urging both at Westminster and elsewhere for many years.

One of the problems is that there was a real expectation, or at least aspiration, that the new Government would introduce changes in this area, and many of us whose education authorities are losers have not seen the changes that we had hoped for. Indeed, to some extent, the distortion in the SSA distribution is increasing, which means that the disparities between the authorities with the highest funding per pupil and those with the lowest are increasing all the time. That is difficult to accept for the education of children in our areas.

I shall start with some basic premises. We cannot get away from the need for a distribution system, and whatever system is chosen will inevitably have its complexities. We should also accept the fact that there will be differences in the total amount of funding available to pupils in different situations in different parts of the country, because there are differences in needs. A simple flat rate would not achieve the sort of education system that we want to see.

[Mr. David Heath]

We should also accept the fact that some variation is acceptable, but it could reach a level that is unacceptable and that is the difficulty that many of us perceive in the system at the moment. The variation has grown to such an extent that it is clear that some children in some schools are not getting the entitlement that they should expect from a state education system in comparison with their better funded peers elsewhere.

Many components contribute to that, and we have already discussed some of them. For example, the area cost adjustment is significant. We have discussed that over the years, and we have asked what possible justification there can be for a system that gives additional funds to London and the home counties to meet so-called additional employment costs that simply do not exist, because we have a national wage rate for the major labour areas of teaching, the police and other services. Indeed, the argument could be made the other way that in some parts of the country—the west country, the midlands and the north—teachers tend to stay longer in their schools and reach the higher end of the scales, so that they cost more than teachers in London schools. That is why the area cost adjustment has been described in my part of the country for many years as a tax on the west. It is equally a tax on the midlands, the north and East Anglia, but not the home counties, which do very well out of it.

Ministers have adduced the argument that stability itself provides a value. My argument—and the Minister has heard it before—is that stability of injustice is not stability but perseverance with an unfair system. Although I acknowledge the fact that we seek stability of funding throughout the education system, we want stability of fair funding, not stability of an unfair system.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northavon and the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) have made the point about the effect on other services of an inadequate education SSA, and it applies within the education service and outside. If a local authority does not have sufficient funding for education, it still has to channel what it has into the statutory education service, because that is a principal responsibility. The effect is that the non-statutory sector loses out. Other essential services have to be robbed to maintain the education service. The social services do not receive the money that they should and highway maintenance is affected.

In Somerset—I was trying not to mention Somerset too often, but I have failed—we have, for many years, moved massive amounts of money out of the highways budget into education to fund our schools and that has the obvious knock-on effect that the roads do not get mended. People eventually wonder why they are paying higher council taxes but getting a lower service for their roads, and they are right to do so. It is a political decision that we are happy to take, but it is based on a basic injustice in the national system of distribution.

We have already touched on the impossibility of reaching a consensus on the issue, and I urge Ministers not to retreat again behind the facade of waiting for consensus from the Local Government Association. That would be like waiting for Godot. It is not possible to achieve consensus, because that would mean that some members of the LGA were failing in their duty to represent their areas properly. Consensus cannot be achieved, because any system would create winners and losers—and the losers cannot be expected wholeheartedly to support that system. For many years, I represented the Association of County Councils in its negotiations with Government, and every time the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), the then Secretary of State, would say, "Well, you do not agree about the matter, therefore, we cannot do anything." That is not acceptable, because it is the Government's responsibility to make the system fairer.

The Elliott review has been mentioned, but I hope that the Government do not go back to it. It was a disastrous review that made matters worse rather than better in many parts of the country. It was based on false premises and arrived at the wrong conclusions. I hope that we hear no more about Professor Elliott and his review.

The Government have, in previous answers on this issue, laid stress on the other funding mechanisms that are available and the extent to which they have been used to mitigate the unfairnesses in the SSA. It is true that, up to a point, standards funds and other funds have been used for that purpose, but, first, they are no replacement for basic, stable funding. Secondly, they put too much power in the hands of Ministers to decide what is appropriate, rather than the schools themselves—which is where we would like to see it. Thirdly, they involve new thresholds. In my constituency recently, we had the ridiculous situation in which a primary school lost £3,000 from the Government's welcome initiative to provide more money simply because its roll, which had been at 102 for the past six years, dipped to 99 because one family moved in the crucial month. A new family has moved in, so the school roll is back over the hundred mark, but the school has still lost the £3,000. That is an illustration of the blunt instrument of the thresholds for funds. The bidding system itself consumes huge resources.

Adjustments in the distribution formula will be made effectively only in the context of rising overall budgets. If there are real-terms losers across the system, people will object—and rightly—if their schools lose money because of a change in the system. If budgets are rising, a differential can be introduced that enables the poorest authorities to catch up a bit. That is what we ask Ministers to do.

We seek a system based on fairness and an entitlement on the part of children and schools to a basic level of funding. The proposals from the all-party group form one way of achieving that. I do not claim that that is the best way, or that the proposals accord with any party's policy position. The mechanism that has been put forward would not create effective losers, because it does not address the issue of the London boroughs: instead, it proposes that the least well funded authorities should have an increase to bring them up to the level of the median. I hope that the Government will take that seriously. The Government profess an interest in education and social justice, and this is a clear illustration of how they can put that into effect.

Ministers in the Department for Education and Employment understand the arguments very well, but the question is whether they are able to put them sufficiently forcefully to their colleagues to achieve real change in the system. What is the timetable for that change? Those are the questions that we would like the Minister to answer today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. The hon. Member for South–East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) has indicated that he would like to make an extremely brief contribution. He has listened to the whole debate, and I intend to call him.

12.10 pm

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): I shall start my very brief contribution with an apology for the fact that I missed the first minute of the speech by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell). I congratulate her on securing this debate.

The central issue is clear cut. My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) has already spoken about the Prime Minister's broken promise of April 1997. It is nonsense to say that the matter was reviewed. Any fool can hold a review if all it amounts to is looking at the books and then closing them again. A review needs to be comprehensive, and the Prime Minister's promise will not be fulfilled if no changes are made.

The hon. Member for Cambridge criticised Cambridgeshire county council for not spending more than £4.7 million above the education SSA. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire noted, the Government said, in their first 18 months in office at least, that SSAs were designed to provide a standard level of provision. Therefore, if Cambridgeshire were to spend at the level that the Government consider to be the standard level of provision, £4.7 million would be cut from the education budget.

Finally, the hon. Member for Cambridge spoke about transferring other resources as what she called an "add-on" to the education SSA. However, that money would have to come from other services. The hon. Lady criticised the county council for taking £3 million out of education for use in other services a year or so ago, but she failed dismally to suggest which of those services should have borne a budget cut. In the year to which the hon. Lady referred, the social services budget was given a zero rise and so could not possibly have absorbed a cut. That means that roads, public safety, or some other service would suffer.

Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to contribute to the debate. Cambridgeshire people feel very angry about this matter. They see what happens over the county border and they believe that the April 1997 promise made in Cambridge to the Cambridge Evening News has been broken. Come the next general election, they will remember that broken promise.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) on securing this debate. We have heard good and well-informed speeches from my hon. Friends the Members for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) and for South–East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice), as well as from the hon. Members for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), for Northavon (Mr. Webb), for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), for North–West Leicestershire (Mr. Taylor) and for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath).

Two points of controversy arise from the speeches by the hon. Member for Cambridge and by my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire. My hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire referred to the promise made just before the general election about the area cost adjustment. There are many differences of opinion on the matter, and the hon. Member for Cambridge offered a defence of the Government's actions, but it is fair to say that nothing came of the Prime Minister's promise. People in Cambridge who relied on that promise will have been disappointed.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire underlined the extent of that disappointment, when he referred to figures contained in a written answer given by the Minister. It seems that all the hon. Members present for the debate represent authorities that are bottom of the league, but the Department for Education and Employment statistics in the written answer of 10 May show that, on the basis of standard spending assessments per head of population, Cambridgeshire education authority comes 150th out of 150.

That is slightly surprising, as the hon. Member for Cambridge said that Cambridge—and, no doubt, other parts of Cambridge—has its own particular needs. I understand that Cambridgeshire has a rising pupil population.

Mr. David Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clappison: I am afraid not, given the time constraint. I shall come to the point that the hon. Gentleman made earlier in a moment. As he knows, tables of SSAs per head of population are important, given the knock-on effects on other services. My hon. Friend the Member for South–East Cambridgeshire underlined that, as did the hon. Member for Northavon.

Why is Cambridgeshire bottom of the league? Is there a clue in the identity of the authority in 149th place, which is Oxfordshire? I began to wonder whether the residents of those authorities were being punished for the presence of elitist institutions in their midst, but I believe that more of an explanation can be found in the detailed speech from my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire. His analysis of the changes that have taken place in SSA distribution under this Government was correct. The changes have happened quietly, while the Government held the review and prepared the Green Paper.

The Government appear to have shifted away from the previous system, which took into account needs, costs and resources. The priorities have changed, and weight is now placed on different factors. That has disadvantaged shire counties such as Cambridgeshire.

Mention has been made of SSA per pupil. Cambridgeshire has slipped markedly down these rankings too during the lifetime of the Government and is now further below the average for SSA per pupil than it was in 1997.

[Mr. Clappison]

Other changes have taken place since the election. There has been a shift in resources allocation within the SSA, and there has been a very important change in the proportion of SSA funding devoted to core funding for schools. As my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire said, that amount has shrunk since the Government came to power. It has been estimated that this year the proportion of funding devoted to schools from SSAs, after local authority contributions are taken into account, will be 92.4 per cent. In 1997-98, the proportion was 98.2 per cent.

Although it is right to say that the proportion of funding for schools coming through the standards fund has grown, that has been at the expense of the proportion devoted to core funding. Many people have pointed to the consequences for schools. Dr. Keith Major of the Wiltshire Association of Governors found that the core funding for his school fell well short of what the Government promised. In an open letter to the Secretary of State, he said:

> This does not take account of the additional funds for specific purposes available to schools from the Standards Fund. It does seem ludicrous to be having to consider further redundancies in support staff only to be recruiting others, albeit on short-term appointments, supported by the Standards Fund. It should not be necessary for a school to have to rely on this fund to maintain the basic activities of a school.

The debate has to be set against the background of a system that has become ever more complex. It was never exactly straightforward, but the Government have heaped extra layers of complexity on it. They have channelled funds through many different streams of funding, to the perplexity of schools, governors and local education authorities alike. We want a more straightforward system that will bring more direct funding to schools. Money should follow schools, and heads and governors should take their own decisions.

Judging by the contributions from the hon. Member for Cambridge and others, we appear to have some support from hon. Members who want more direct funding for schools. In contrast, the Government seem to want to create a very complex system.

We shall wait and see whether the Green Paper will introduce a more straightforward and fairer system, but we doubt that it will remedy all the cries of disappointment. We believe that those who want a more direct and straightforward system will be disappointed by the Green Paper but it is possible that they will get some consolation and satisfaction in the fullness of time—which may be a shorter period than is currently envisaged by Labour and Liberal Democrat councils.

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): May I first congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) on securing the debate? She told me last night that she first requested it more than two months ago, so the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) has some time to wait yet.

I find myself in an unusual position, although it is always the same when we debate standard spending assessments. I do not disagree significantly with the comments of most hon. Members who have spoken in the debate. There is a genuine issue about authorities that are underfunded. It is perhaps opportune that we are in Westminster Hall, where we do not tend to sit in such party political groupings. In the debate on SSAs, the dividing lines of the battle are not drawn along political lines. There is no member here today who represents an inner London borough. As the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) did not say so, I will say on his behalf that we are the only two Members here whose constituencies are not massive losers because of the SSAs that relate to Hertfordshire and Birmingham.

Of course there are massive disparities. I do not for a minute defend the fact that children who go to school in Bury, Cambridge, Northavon, Somerset in Oxford or anywhere else should be worth less than those who go to school elsewhere in the country, or that their teachers should have to manage with fewer resources.

The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) summarised the position. In the past, the formula was not perfect, but it has become less perfect as we have tried to adjust it year after year. It is like trying to keep a leaking boat afloat. We plug each hole as it arises, but new initiatives cause funding problems, so we knock the balance out of the funding system elsewhere.

Hon. Members will know, because I have talked about it so often, that I am deeply unhappy at having to explain a system that is flawed. I wish it were otherwise, and I, too, wish that it could have been changed in a year. I will come on to that in a moment. However, the Government do not believe that the way in which schools are funded and the inequality in funding between children in different areas is somehow defensible for reasons of social justice or fairness. To that extent, we are all on the same side.

Since the election, there has been far more public concern about the funding system, yet it is the same as it was before the election. Opposition Members say that that is because expectations were raised and the change was not made in the first year. The Government were right to put this on the agenda. They were right to be open and say that the funding system was not fair enough. I suspect that it was not on the agenda before the election and was not such an issue of public debate across the country because not only did the previous Government do nothing about it, but they did not put it on the agenda or draw attention to it. Not only did they not try to rectify the system, but they never publicly acknowledged that it was wrong.

I do not want to be party political about this, however, because I agree with Opposition Members who have said that the only way to get this right will be to look at the country as a whole. For once—and this will be tough for all of us—we must put party political differences aside and try and secure a system that will give local politicians, whatever their party, an equal chance of running an education service that they can be judged on, without being hampered by inequalities in the system.

The issue is probably more in the public domain now because as more money is pumped into education, the formula becomes more important. If the formula is not fair to begin with, inequality is piled on inequality. Therefore, one is made angry twice, thrice, four, five and six times. Not only was the base budget not fair in 1997, but Members, local authorities and parents have seen a Government who have honoured their commitment to putting more money into education, and as long as the flawed formula is used, people feel that they are suffering even more than they did in the past.

We could have distributed the £50 million that was made available in the Budget. A number of hon. Members have mentioned this. It would have been reasonable; it might even have been expected. We could have distributed it along SSA formula lines. It would simply have meant that the constituencies of hon. Members here today and others like them would not have received as much money, while others, like me, would have seen schools in our constituencies benefit from more money. I think that what we did was right—it was a small sign, a small acknowledgement. We paid that £50 million through a special grant and, where possible, we took the opportunity to distribute it as a flat rate. There was an element of rough justice in its distribution—I feel desperately sorry for the school that lost its pupils—because it was done quickly, and we wanted to make it as simple and fair as possible.

In the time I have left, I want to concentrate on what we are going to do about it. I accept that there is an obligation to do something. I say openly that I would be deeply unhappy if the Government said in July, "Sorry, we could not get agreement, and will not do anything." Let us go back to what happened—I was there, and I know. It was not a case of opening the books in the first year and saying, "Dear, dear, we can't get agreement, let's move on." There was a more honest and detailed attempt to adjust the formula in the first year.

I take seriously what hon. Members on both sides have said—that if we wait for the Local Government Association and everyone to agree, we will never get anywhere. The Government are responsible for making the decision. We have to accept what the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) said—that is why we were elected, and we will have to carry the can whether we get it right or wrong.

The Government need to know that they have explored, as thoroughly as possible, all the different viewpoints. Any decision they make will, inevitably, not suit some local authorities, parents or schools, but the Government need to be able to say, "We listened and explored the solution that you came up with, but at the end of the day, we could not agree with you."

I will be honest—within the first year that the Government were in office, it was not possible to come to that conclusion. We could have said that we had opened the books, seen the figures, looked at the options and now we are making the decision. I would have felt ill at ease doing that. We need to go through the necessary consultation process and explore the range of options in a way that makes such a significant decision defensible for a long time, because I do not want to have to go through this again. What we come up with in the Green Paper will have to be a system of funding that serves us well for years to come. Otherwise, is not fair to Members of Parliament and pupils—it is not even fair to Ministers, because more time is spent, research done and work undertaken to get this right than can be imagined.

Where do we go from here? I did not see it in the first year, but one of the advantages of having gained some extra time was referred to in a very interesting point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) and by the hon. Member for Newbury. Everyone wants a minimum entitlement, but they want a system that acknowledges different needs in local authority communities. Nobody supports the idea of a minimum entitlement with no added extras. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North threw out, for instances, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions indices of deprivation. That is an interesting idea that I had not thought about particularly before. Perhaps the advantage of having bought ourselves three months is that we do not have to build on a system that was flawed because it looks back to 1990. Perhaps we will be able to do something more radical so that we do not adjust the weightings to the values that dictate the SSAs, but change the way in which we measure minimum entitlement and added benefit on top.

Nobody would expect me to say what is likely to be in the Green Paper. I can simply give assurances that the hon. Members of all parties who have, on this issue, been excellent representatives of their constituents and have spoken vociferously will have their voices heard in Government. I will, as I have on many previous occasions, give an undertaking to feed their views back to the Government and make sure that they are a proper part of the decisions and discussions that we will eventually hold.

Steelworkers (Pensions)

12.30 pm

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): I declare two interests—as I do in any debate on steel. The first is my ownership of 25 shares in Corus, formerly British Steel. The second is a close collaboration with all the steelworkers unions, because steel is the dominant employer in my constituency.

The issue touches some of the poorest members of the community, whose life's work was devoted to making the steel that helped Britain grow during the previous century. It is a story about the age-old struggle between justice and greed. It is an unreported contest between, on the one hand, men and women who felt that a life's honest and honourable work should be sufficient to provide them with a decent retirement and, on the other, the controllers of our nation's financial resources, who have other priorities.

Many pensioners feel that they deserve a better deal—a view that I share for the whole pensioner community. However, in addition to Government, it is time for pension funds to accept their responsibilities. That is not currently happening in the case of retired steelworkers.

Pension funds are so swollen that their size now overshadows modern market economies. They need to be examined properly and made accountable to the men and women whose earnings have contributed to the creation of those new financial behemoths.

The debate is about the most important question in a society in which the rules of the market and the needs of capital are perceived by many to have a higher priority than the decency of human existence and obligations owed by one generation to another. Government must answer the question: who is responsible for the oversight of those huge sums?

According to 1998 figures, UK pension funds currently manage more than £700 billion. The House of Commons Library informs me that, taken with pensions managed by insurance companies, the total amount of pension funds comes to more than £1 trillion. That is more than the gross domestic product of the United Kingdom. Ministers and civil servants manage a total budget of about one third of the sum for which a large number of anonymous, mostly unaccountable, men and women are responsible.

I want to look more closely at the pensions paid to British steelworkers and the use of the pension fund that their past and present labour has created. Does my right hon. Friend the Minister think that the role of the pensions ombudsman should be reconsidered? Do we need to modernise and reform our pension law so that the concept of fairness is added to the fiduciary responsibilities of trustees and managers?

Like Britain's other great industries, our steel industry gave birth to a mixture of pension funds which were amalgamated when the industry was nationalised. When the fund was launched for manual workers in 1973, there were three times as many steelworkers in work—the number was 197,000 in 1975—as pensioners claiming from the fund. There were only 65,000 such pensioners 25 years ago.

The picture has changed. At present, 30,000 steelworkers pay into the fund; 109,000 receive benefits; and 57,000 are waiting for the years to tick to 65—the victims of the anti-manufacturing and anti-industry policies of the previous Conservative Government. They are not helped by the current discrepancy between the pound sterling and the euro; or by high electricity prices and other leftovers from the Conservative era.

Over the past 25 years, the British Steel pension fund has grown from being worth £338 million to its current value of nearly £10 billion. There is a different pension fund for British Steel Engineering Steels employees—many of whom are my constituents in South Yorkshire. My remarks will address the main British Steel pension fund, but my general observations also apply to the Engineering Steels pension fund.

The British Steel 1990 pension fund is extremely well managed; it invests wisely and, thanks to the miracle of compound interest and a judicious mixture of bond and equity investments, it has more than adequately maintained its value to meet all its current and future obligations—and then some. With about half its £10 billion in bonds, the income from those Government-guaranteed securities alone is sufficient to meet all current and future demands.

The question remains as to the rest of the money in the fund. As an American senator once said:

> If you add a million here and a million there, sooner or later you start talking about real money.

In the case of the billions in the steelworkers pension funds and the billions in other pension funds, we have sums that are almost unimaginably large—greater than the GDP of most countries. How should those giant sums be used?

At present, all the cards are stacked in favour of the companies. Of course, they discharge their legal and contractual obligations, but thereafter, those billions of pounds are for their benefit as companies, rather than for the benefit of the pensioners or of the communities that gave rise to that source of wealth.

Let us not forget the origin of that colossal wealth. It was created by steelworkers themselves; either directly, through deductions from their pay packet, or via the contribution put in by the companies. However, that contribution was not company money; it reflects value added, research, good management and the hard, dirty and often dangerous work inside the steel plants of Britain over the past decades.

Until privatisation in 1988, the Government provided a generous pension fund contribution of up to 12 per cent. to match the employee's 5 per cent. That enabled the British Steel pension fund to grow more than tenfold during its first 15 years and ensured that the newly privatised British Steel had a pot of gold, courtesy of the British taxpayer and of a compliant Tory Government who stacked the financial cards in favour of their privatised offspring.

Under a dozen years of private ownership, the fund has increased, but only by a little more than twice as much, in contrast to its much faster growth under public control. Why is that? I do not have time to go into the arguments made by those who are expert in tracing the movements of money inside the British Steel pension fund. However, I stress that, at every stage, the company, the pension fund management and the trustees have acted with full legality. They have not tried to duck questions put by the trade unions or by the national British Steel pensioners association, whose chairman, Mr. John Batstone, has been most diligent in keeping an eye on the fund and in asking tough questions.

The core problem remains. Under the Conservatives, pension law was so organised that power remained in the hands of the companies, which were able to use that £1 trillion pension fund to bolster their own financial strength, rather than being more generous to pensioners—especially those such as the manual grades in Britain's steel industry, whose enforced early retirement during the great demannings of the 1980s and the steady attrition of the 1990s has often meant that they do not have enough contribution years to secure more than a meagre supplement to the state pension.

There are many examples of major FTSE 100 companies taking what are described as "pension holidays". That means that either the employer or the employees do not pay into the pension fund at all. According to a survey carried out two years ago by the National Association of Pension Funds, more than half of private sector pension funds were taking a contributions holiday. Of course, that is excellent news for a company's cash flow and also for employees. However, the price of such generosity to the firm or to its existing employees is that there is less money—over and above the contractual obligations—to pay the men and women whose previous contributions helped grow the pension funds that can currently be used to oil a firm's financial operations.

The practice may also distort the real financial worth of a company. In the United States, according to The Wall Street Journal on 30 May, the Securities and Exchange Commission is concerned that the pension income is giving less sophisticated investors a distorted view of some companies' health.

Mr. Frank Roy (Motherwell and Wishaw): My hon. Friend has referred to the manual grades of steelworkers, and he is aware that pensions not only take the type of holiday that he mentioned, but that thousands of steelworkers lost their jobs in the late 1980s and 1990s. They transferred their British Steel pensions to private pensions, and I am a member of that group because I received a manual grade pension after I was made redundant when the Ravenscraig plant closed. My British Steel pension was worth £32,000, but three weeks ago, I was informed that my pension had been mis-sold—the sum concerned is £11,000.

I took the trouble to find out what would happen to my pension, but does my hon. Friend not agree that ex-steelworkers need to be made aware of what is happening and that such cases needed to be cleared up as quickly as possible? Like the people who currently work in the industry, those steelworkers built it up.

Mr. MacShane: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. As I shall say later, I believe that there is enough money in the British Steel pension fund to clear up such anomalies. Steelworkers and the pensioners of this country will never forget the crime committed by the private pensions swindle. They declared their verdict on that on 1 May 1997 and it will take a generation or two before the dishonesty is forgotten.

Thanks to taxpayers' generosity prior to privatisation, the British Steel pension fund has been consistently able to report surpluses in each year since 1990, when the new scheme was set up. Thus, when British Steel merged last year with the Royal Dutch Hoogovens firm to create Corus, it brought a handsome dowry to the marriage—a pension fund worth close to £10 billion running an actuarial surplus in 1999 of just over £1,009 million.

It is over the disposal of that surplus that great concern has arisen. At the time of the merger last autumn, the rules were suddenly changed for the pension fund and the company cut its contribution from 5 per cent. to just 2 per cent. The union trustees opposed that major reduction in the firm's contribution to the British Steel pension fund, but, as the law presently stands and given the way in which the 1990 British Steel pension scheme was set up, the company decides and the trustees have to bow down before its decision.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): As my hon. Friend will know, until recent years, at least one steel plant in my community employed 14,000 workers—it now employs 1,000. However, in one way or another, the steel industry still dominates my community. The people who built up the industry repeatedly tell me that they did the work and that the pension fund was set up for them. However, they are not receiving the benefits from the fund that employers, such as Corus, now enjoy. Those employers did not do the work and they did not build up the industry in the way that the people in my constituency did. Surely, that cannot be justified; it is like Robin Hood in reverse. Private steel owners rob the poor to maintain their rich positions in life.

Mr. MacShane: The point of the debate is very much to appeal to Corus to take a more responsible and socially just approach to the moneys in its pension fund. As my hon. Friend rightly pointed out, those moneys represent the deferred earnings of the workers—the savings appropriated from them. They have the right to be consulted, but the company's management has the power of decision. There was a take-it-or-leave-it order from the company on changing the rules of its pension fund, so will my right hon. Friend the Minister comment on whether the Government will consider making the rules rather more equitable rather than, as at present, so heavily loaded in favour of the company?

The union trustees considered appealing to the pensions ombudsman. However, on the basis of experience and legal precedent, it was not clear that this would be a fruitful approach even if it would have provided a bonanza for lawyers' fees. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the role of pensions ombudsman needs strengthening so that the trustees of pension funds can have confidence that he will support their case for full examination by an independent body in contested cases of the distribution of pension funds surpluses?

At the same time, British Steel made a one-off payment of about £800 million to shareholders as a sweetener for the merger. I know that, because my cheque for £1.25 arrived in the post. Two thirds of that £800 million went across the Atlantic because, along with many other firms in Britain and Europe, majority institutional share ownership is now in the hands of American pension and mutual funds. The coincidence of this huge payment of £800 million from a company which, thanks to the strong pound, is trading at a loss, taking place when the pension fund was rejigged to provide the new firm with a massive injection of year-on-year cash by more than halving its pension contribution has caused outrage among steel communities throughout the country.

I stress again that I am not accusing the company or the British Steel pension scheme of doing anything illegal or improper. Given the large sum in the scheme and the handsome surplus posted regularly, the scheme has been able to make improvements in payments that have benefited all pensioners. However, because something is legal and because some charity has been doled out does not remove the claim that I make on behalf of the 10,000 steelworker pensioners in my constituency and the many more who live in other constituencies that the call of justice and the appeal for generosity should now met in full.

I think of Mr. Horace Bolton in Rotherham, who worked for 44 years in the steel industry. After all that effort, his pension is just £50 a week. In fact, because of the different schemes and rules, that payment comes from two pension fund sources, but his appeals to have his years of service treated as a continuum have fallen on the deaf ears of a pension fund worth £10 billion.

I think of Mrs. Hingley in Brierly Hill, who was a supervisor in the British Steel Cookley stamping works. After 45 years labour, her pension is £22 a week—50p for each year that she worked. I think of Mr. Les Harper of Middlesbrough who after 40 years of continuous service receives £25 a week, and he is 92. Surely a company that can shape remuneration packages of up to £500,000 for its top executives can treat its retired workers with more generosity.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. I express the hope to the hon. Gentleman that he will refer, if only briefly, to the ombudsman.

Mr. MacShane: I have.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman has. Such a reference will make the debate relevant to the Minister.

Mr. MacShane: I asked whether my right hon. Friend the Minister agreed that the role of pensions ombudsman needed strengthening. That is what I said, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That question and this repetition of it will appear in Hansard tomorrow.

Instead of giving the new company Corus a major cash flow boost and a huge handout to existing shareholders, it would have been possible to reduce both employers' and employees' contributions to 2 per cent. for the next five years and then to review the situation. A £500 lump sum could have gone to all pensioners and to all widows. Those suggestions were put forward by British steel pensioners, but were turned down. They would have made a direct, immediate improvement to the quality of life of scores of thousands of retired steelworkers in Britain. They would have left the fund fully secured and thus approved of by the pensions ombudsman, but would have been a use of the surplus cash to help the many not the few. I appeal to the management of Corus, once the current actuarial review is over, to think hard about being more generous to existing pensioners.

Let us not forget that, under the present rules which are supervised by the pensions ombudsman, if the British Steel pension fund were to get into trouble, the active members—today's employees—would have to bail it out. British Steel as a company has put in only 34 per cent. of the contributions of the scheme since it was set up in 1990—the rest coming from employees. Yet all power lies with the management of British Steel, now Corus. This structure is a tribute to ripe old high Thatcherism in which partnership, equal responsibilities and equal rights were all dirty concepts.

I urge Corus, in conjunction with the unions and existing pensioners, to restructure the scheme so that the company and the trustees have an equal say in important decisions. I also urge the scheme to consider using its surplus to support existing steel communities in the UK, which remain the hardest hit in terms of loss of jobs and especially well-paid jobs for men associated with the steel industry. The winding up this summer of the European Coal and Steel Community and its linked funds take away an important source of financial support for constituencies such as mine struggling to come to terms with the end of the coal and steel jobs that once provided the backbone of the economy of South Yorkshire, south Wales, Teesside, Humberside, Lanarkshire and other industrial heartlands.

The steel and other giant pension funds now constitute a central part of the so-called new economy. If properly harnessed, those funds can help to rebuild the communities from which they draw their wealth without jeopardising their prime obligation to meet their pension requirements. Sending remittances to an area where men need new work confuses relief with the need for investment, which can create permanent hopes for a new economy. I do not expect the Minister to provide answers to all those problems, but we need to take a fresh look at the operation of pension funds. They should not only dole out small sums, but help to create new sources of wealth in the communities in which they originate.

The Minister of State, Department of Social Security (Mr. Jeff Rooker): I glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) does not expect answers to each of his points because, in nine minutes, I cannot do justice to them all. However, I congratulate him on raising the issue and the important role of the pensions ombudsman in the treatment of surpluses in pension fund schemes.

I shall begin by briefly explaining the role of the pensions ombudsman, who can investigate scheme members' complaints about maladministration in the running of their scheme. Those complaints can be against the trustees of the scheme, managers, administrators and the employer. In investigating a complaint, the pensions ombudsman considers whether the actions of the subjects of it, such as the trustees, the employer and scheme administrator, have been in accordance with the scheme rules. Failure to comply with the scheme rules can be considered as maladministration.

If the ombudsman determines that maladministration has occurred, he can direct that certain action is taken to rectify the situation. The ombudsman can consider complaints about the use of a scheme's surplus. Indeed, we have made an amendment to the rules under which the pensions ombudsman operates in the Child Support, Pensions and Social Security Bill, which is currently in the other place and which we shall consider again when we debate the Lords amendments to it. That amendment will ensure that the ombudsman's procedures allow him to continue to consider such complaints.

Cases involving surplus may affect the interests of several parties, as my hon. Friend said. Our amendment will allow the pensions ombudsman to link to a case all those whose interests may be affected by the complaint and will give them an opportunity to have their say. Without that strengthening amendment, it would be difficult for the ombudsman to accept such cases. The previous Government were not wholly to blame for the position because the Pensions Act 1995 cleaned up much of the Maxwell scandal. Indeed, it is a tribute to everyone concerned that that Act was passed. It includes requirements on the treatment of scheme surpluses, which I wish had been in force when I was supporting constituents involved in the Lucas pension scheme who were robbed blind on surpluses. I make no apology for that remark.

My hon. Friend talked about pensions holidays and spoke about a firm operating at a loss transferring funds to shareholders, implying that that money came out of the pension fund. I do not know about that. However, before a payment is made from a surplus to the employer, the rules require that several things must be done. First, all current and future pensions in payment must be increased annually in line with the retail prices index up to a maximum of 5 per cent., including pensions accrued in the past. Secondly, the trustees of the scheme must satisfy themselves that the use of the surplus is in the interest of the members. Thirdly, the scheme members must be notified of the trustees' proposals in the manner required by law, which ensures that members' benefit from the surplus and their interests are taken into account.

In schemes in which payment from the pension fund to the company is permitted by the scheme rules, members have a right to challenge the trustees' decision by appealing to the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority if they believe that statutory criteria have not been followed. Opra will investigate the case and decide whether to allow the payment. In schemes that do not permit a payment, Opra has the power to modify the scheme rules. The statutory criteria are the same as those for schemes that permit payment, and Opra can decide whether to modify the scheme rules to allow a payment to be made.

The pensions ombudsman is barred from investigating complaints about those requirements for the simple reason that non-compliance is a matter for the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority. Opra can investigate non-compliance and sanction the trustees if they do not follow those requirements. The sanction can take the form of a fine of up to £5,000 per trustee or the trustee's removal from the scheme.

To the best of my knowledge, the pension fund discussed by my hon. Friend has not applied to make a payment. Before such payment can be made, permission must be given. The merger took place last year and, now that it is June 2000, the Department and the regulatory authorities have no knowledge of the scheme or company ever applying for permission to make such payments. As I say, I am not certain about the exact nature of my hon. Friend's allegation.

Mr. MacShane: It is not a question of direct transfer. By cutting the contributions from 5 to 2 per cent., the company's cash flow is so altered that it can use other funds to make a payment to shareholders. That worry has caused outrage among steelworkers.

Mr. Rooker: That may be so. Surpluses are an emotive issue, and, as I made clear, I have experience of that. However, in considering trustees' treatment of a surplus, one must make a distinction between actuarial surplus and statutory surplus.

Actuarial surpluses are identified by the scheme actuary in the course of regular valuations. Statutory surplus, however, is calculated according to a formula prescribed by the Inland Revenue. A scheme is classed as being in statutory surplus when it holds assets in excess of 105 per cent. of its liabilities, calculated on the basis of the Inland Revenue formula. There are many tax reliefs associated with such funds, to which the public make a massive contribution. Indeed, they would not have achieved success without the contribution made by the public by means of tax relief.

It is important that the Inland Revenue should protect the public purse, so it makes certain requirements of the schemes, which are intended to make sure that pension funds do not receive undue tax relief. When the scheme holds funds in excess of 105 per cent. of its liabilities, it must reduce the excess if it is to retain full tax exemption. That can be done in may ways, including employer and employee contribution holidays, increasing the benefits to current and future pensioners, and making a taxable refund to the employer. Such a refund has been made in many cases, but permission must be obtained. Of course, the employer would have to pay 40 per cent. tax on such a transfer.

Regardless of the methods chosen, the plans for the elimination of the surplus must be approved by the Revenue. Occupational pensions are voluntary and companies are not under any legal requirement to run such schemes. I appreciate that surpluses are a contentious issue, as we must consider who owns them. However, under the rules on the minimum funding requirement brought in after 1995, which are currently being reviewed and on which we shall pronounce, no one will lose a pension.

The pension may be insufficient, but that is a matter for the trustees and those who run the scheme. Pensions already obtained in payment or accruals will be protected as a result of the security in managing the surplus. No one will lose out. However, the pension fund not being generous enough to its pensioners or its deferred payers is a matter for the trustees. The Child Support, Pensions and Social Security Bill will make fund members' involvement in trustee boards mandatory. However, that provision is not yet in place.

[Mr. Rooker]

I know nothing about the composition of the board of trustees of the fund described by my hon. Friend or about the fund members involved. However, I would be astonished if the trade unions were not heavily involved, given the nature of the industry and the unions' support.

Mr. MacShane: I welcome the Minister's comments, which tilt the balance in favour of trustees representing employees past and present. Will he join me in suggesting that Corus examines its surplus distribution and adopts a more generous approach to the poorly paid pensioners whom I mentioned?

Mr. Rooker: Corus is a blue chip company which, as my hon. Friend made clear, is operating within the law. It is, therefore, incumbent on it and all good employers who want to make a good impression on the communities that they serve, their former pensioners, their deferred pensioners and their existing work force, to make the most advantageous and generous provision for pensions that is possible within the rules. If surpluses are available, that avenue should be explored.

London Stock Exchange

1 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stone): The proposed merger of the London stock exchange and the Deutsche Börse raises important concerns about the regulatory and competitive environment of the City of London as a whole, and of United Kingdom public companies in particular. These concerns are, or should be, vital to the Government both as a matter of national interest and, as I shall show, as a matter pertaining to the Government's obligations to the City under the terms of a memorandum of understanding signed in 1997.

The issue should have been debated in the House on a Government motion. However, the Government ran away until they were forced here today. These concerns, which it is my purpose to raise, arise in large measure from the vagaries of the merger terms on offer. First, the London exchange, Europe's premier financial centre, which until now has drawn inward investment from the foremost financial institutions in the world, is under the deal valued the same as an exchange which, in terms of assets managed, is seven times its junior.

Secondly, the loss of London's position as Europe's financial capital would have a negative effect on the City's competitiveness in general, sparking an outflow of financial institutions such as market analysts, investment banks and advisory firms. Thirdly, under the deal, the UK's blue-chip firms will in Frankfurt be subject to financial regulation that is gravely inferior to that which they presently enjoy under the Financial Services Authority—regulation that in London is underwritten by the memorandum of understanding to which I have referred.

Fourthly, competition between the London and Frankfurt exchanges will be skewed by the presence, at 0.5 per cent., of stamp duty on share dealing in the former. Fifthly, the interests of the Frankfurt exchange are likely to supersede those of London given that its 50 per cent. shareholding in the new entity will be held en bloc, whereas London's 50 per cent. will be divided between its 298 shareholding companies into individual holdings of just 0.17 per cent. each.

These broad concerns are compounded by a host of questions left unanswered from the debate in the House of Lords on 24 May and under the merger terms, including the location and funding of a central counterparty for the new exchange. The matters raised in the House of Lords require answer, and they were not answered by the noble Lord who responded for the Government on that occasion. They must be answered; if they are not answered today, they must be answered soon.

I recognise that modern global companies require immense liquidity in the exchanges on which they list. Companies listing in New York already have access to such liquidity, and I see no reason why European companies should not be put on an equivalent footing. The fact that Europe's share market is overly fragmented does not speak to the question, on whose terms should it be consolidated. As I put it in my letter to The Daily Telegraph of 5 May—I pay tribute to that newspaper for its tenacious investigation of this matter—the question is, who is to call the shots? At first glance, the answer to the question is overwhelmingly self-evident—it should be London.

The London stock exchange manages 700 per cent. more assets than Frankfurt, its closest rival in Europe, and transacts 100 per cent. more by volume. There are more German banks headquartered in London than there are in Frankfurt and Berlin combined. The City's regulator, the Financial Services Authority, is world renowned for its probity, in contrast to its opaque equivalent in Frankfurt. Indeed, so attractive is the City that the American technology exchange, NASDAQ, chose recently to locate its European operations in London in preference to Frankfurt.

Despite all of these advantages, the London stock exchange is embarked upon a 50:50 merger with the Deutsche Börse in Frankfurt, causing the NASDAQ to reverse its decision to set up in London. Even this so-called merger of equals is far from equitable. It is nothing of the kind. It has all the hallmarks of a politically motivated reverse takeover. What Don Cruickshank, the merged entity's proposed chairman, describes as a 50:50 merger is in fact, owing to the distribution of shares, a 50:0.17 merger. Under the deal, the Deutsche Börse will hold its 50 per cent. of shares en bloc, but the London stock exchange holding will be split evenly between its 298 shareholding firms. It does not take a genius—I am sure that that includes the Minister—to work out that it will take only one London shareholder to vote with the Deutsche Börse, and Frankfurt will carry the day.

We are told by Gavin Casey that that is a temporary anomaly and that Frankfurt's holding will eventually be broken up. However, what assurances do we have? I urge the London stock exchange urgently to provide clarification on that point. A second and no less important defect of the proposed merger concerns shoddy financial oversight in Frankfurt. It is common knowledge that traders there conduct huge block trades in secret and that the company listing rules are complicated, to put it mildly. Even one of the supposed advantages of Frankfurt, its Xetra trading system, has broken down on more occasions than its London equivalent, SETS.

We are told that, under the merger, all high-tech or "new economy" stocks will be traded in Frankfurt, London being left with the blue-chip or "old economy" stock. Yet Mr. Cruickshank and his friends have so far failed even to address the thorny issue of how exactly a high-tech or blue-chip firm will be defined. Many companies defy or straddle such classifications. Where are their shares to be traded? There is also the danger that if blue-chip firms relocate to Frankfurt, many of the advisory and investment banking firms which depend upon them will go there too.

Of further concern is where the central counterparty for the new exchange will be located and how it will be funded. Until recently, the London stock exchange planned to create such a counterparty in collaboration with the London clearing house, yet we have heard nothing from Mr. Cruickshank on where the counterparty for the new exchange might be located. On this issue, too, we must have clarification.

In sum, while the merger is presented as one of equals, its terms are clearly quite advantageous to the smaller Frankfurt exchange. Heaven alone knows what it thinks it is playing at. Little wonder that last month Werner Seifert, the proposed chief executive of the new entity, wrote that whilst London is still centre stage, Frankfurt is waiting in the wings, ready to take a lead role.

Yet there is still hope for those who are opposed to the terms of the merger, for there is an obligation for intervention by the Government despite denials to the contrary. A memorandum of understanding between the Bank of England, the Treasury and the FSA, which was agreed in 1997, made it crystal clear that the Treasury has departmental responsibility in relation to exchanges and in maintaining confidence in the UK financial system. The memorandum states that the Treasury is responsible for the overall institutional structure of regulation, and the legislation which governs it. There are a variety of circumstances where the FSA and the Bank will need to alert the Treasury about possible problems: for example, where a serious problem arises, which could cause wider economic disruption; where there is or could be a need for a support operation; where diplomatic or foreign relations problems might arise; where a problem suggests the need for a change in the law; or where a case is likely to lead to questions to Ministers in Parliament. This list is not exhaustive, and there will be other relevant situations.

The proposed merger of the London and Frankfurt exchanges qualifies under almost all of the terms specified in the memorandum. For example, is not hitching our stock exchange, and so our country, to the crisis-prone euro a problem which could cause wider economic disruption . . . ?

Would not the merged exchange push for common European oversight and so suggest the need for a change in the law . . . ?

What about the situation that is likely to lead to questions to Ministers in Parliament . . . ?

In fact, it did.

I tabled a question, which was answered on 11 May by the Economic Secretary to the Treasury. My having tabled a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer requesting him to indicate what representations had been received, and asking him to make a statement on the matter, in a manner that can be described only as contemptuous of Parliament and of the obligations set out in the memorandum of understanding, he declined to make a statement. He left it to a junior Minister to reply, and the response was as follows. I was told that there had been no representations. The answer continued:

The terms of the proposed merger are a matter for the parties involved, subject to their securing the necessary approval of the relevant regulatory and competition authorities.—[Official Report, 11 May 2000; Vol. 349, c. 476W.]

That answer is simply outrageous. It is absurd that there have been no representations on the proposed merger. Further, according to the 1997 memorandum of understanding, it is manifestly not just a matter "for the parties involved"; the memorandum makes that clear. The Minister simply cannot get out of it.

I point out merely that Europe's pre-eminent stock exchange can secure better terms than those currently on offer. Olof Stenhammar, chairman of the Swedish stock exchange, summed up the poor terms on offer to London when he expressed surprise that London was accepting a merger of equals.

He went on to describe the deal, accurately, as having a top-down approach with bureaucratic and political undertones, favouring institutions at the expense of retail investors.

The whole issue is a disgrace.

[Mr. William Cash]

As if the criticisms identified by Mr. Stenhammar were not enough, the authorities in Frankfurt have made it clear that they will seek to extract even better terms for the Deutsche Börse, possibly preventing the new entity from being headquartered solely in London. Any such development, likely as it is, must be resisted at all costs. Indeed, the entire deal should be rejected.

I ask the Minister whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer or any other Cabinet Minister will make a statement on the whole matter to the House of Commons and thereby provide the proper, correct, constitutional and urgent clarification that is needed on the important points that I have raised. It is an outrage that he has not come to the House, or indeed to Westminster Hall today. I call on the City to see sense, to realise its own worth and to vote to reject the deal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) has the permission of the initiator of the debate to participate and has notified both me and the Minister.

1.12 pm

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) on securing a debate on an important subject. Subject to the regulatory permissions and whatever Government involvement is required, the stock exchange is a private entity now. It is up to its members to do what they want, but it is becoming increasingly apparent that an unsatisfactory deal is being proposed, which will be voted down by the members in September, with opposition from large and small members.

The Opposition are not against the concept of a pan-European stock exchange, but against the terms of the proposed deal, which seem to smack of a lack of confidence and, indeed, of long-term strategy among the management of the London stock exchange. As my hon. Friend pointed out, London is overwhelmingly the biggest market in terms of companies quoted, turnover and value. It handled some 50 per cent. of international share trading, against the 5 per cent. handled in Germany.

What seems to have happened is that the strength of character of Mr. Seifert has dominated. When mergers occur, they inevitably lead to one party taking over. It is clear that a merger on those terms will lead to a market dominated by his leadership in Frankfurt.

What is wrong with the deal? It does not cut costs. What is crucially needed is a United States-style net settlement system. At present, transaction costs are nearly 10 times as much here and in Frankfurt as they are in the United States. It will create six markets. In addition to blue chip in London, NASDAQ International in Frankfurt and AIM, or the alternative investment markets, there will be a Midcap—middle-sized capital stocks—in London, a Midcap in Frankfurt and German growth stocks on the Neuer market.

Two regulatory authorities will continue. Companies will be subject to the opaque German trading rules and, indeed, to a stock market that is controlled by two or three banks in an oligopolistic situation in Germany. A crucial point is that London has the machinery for multi-currency settlement in the CREST arrangements, which Frankfurt does not. That will be crucial for any pan-European stock exchange.

It is clearly unwise for London to surrender to Frankfurt the stocks of the future—the growth stocks. Excellent though the blue chips may be today, they are inevitably "old economy"—companies that will decline in future. Therefore, to do that is to sell out on the future.

There is no evidence that Xetra is any better than the combination of CREST and SETS. The change would cost UK brokers a fortune, raising the issue of who will pay for it. The Fund Managers Association has made it clear that it is a poor deal. It provides no cost reductions and worsens the regulatory situation. It is, if anything, less efficient than the present arrangements. A far better deal can be done. It is time that the London stock exchange started to talk to NASDAQ directly. We thought that the Chancellor had arranged that for the exchange.

1.15 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Miss Melanie Johnson): I was pleased to hear that the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) has lost none of his knack of putting his view in a controversial manner. We have had a very good example of that today on an important subject. The proposed merger between the London stock exchange and the Deutsche Börse is clearly an important subject, which has understandably attracted considerable comment since it was announced on 3 May.

The London stock exchange is by any standards a major financial institution and one of the world's leading equity exchanges, as the hon. Gentleman remarked. However, the environment in which the LSE operates is undergoing a period of dramatic change. Technological developments such as electronic trading systems mean that it is—or soon will be—possible to have access to an exchange from virtually anywhere in the world. Allied to the general process of internationalisation of financial services, the result is the breaking down of barriers between national markets.

In Europe there are increasing customer-driven pressures for integration of financial markets. Institutional investors are increasingly looking at the European market in terms of industrial sectors rather than individual countries.

Against that background, it is hardly surprising that there is pressure from market users for consolidation of the exchanges within Europe, and the attractions of creating a single trading platform for European stocks are obvious. In response, the exchanges are coming forward with initiatives for mergers and alliances. The French, Dutch and Belgian exchanges are merging to form the Euronext exchange. Various Scandinavian exchanges are combining. Tradepoint, the UK electronic equities exchange, is in discussion with the Swiss stock exchange. Against that background, it is hardly surprising that the LSE should be pursuing its own merger initiative.

There are good reasons for mergers. Investors and companies both benefit from the creation of broader and deeper equity markets. Companies are able to offer their securities to a much greater number of potential investors. Investors have the opportunity to invest in a much wider range of equities. All sides should benefit from the lower trading costs that result.

I should make clear, however, that the terms of the deal to create iX—the international exchange—are a commercial matter for the parties involved, subject, of course, to their obtaining the necessary clearances from the relevant regulatory and competition authorities. The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) recognised that point. The Government were not a party to the negotiations.

Mr. Cash: Will the Minister concede—perhaps she is coming to it—that there is an important matter that she is leaving out, namely the memorandum of understanding. It lays down the ground rules and deals with exchanges—I have already made the point. I hope that she will refer to it because it is crucial to recognising the Government's obligations.

Miss Johnson: It is a matter of how the hon. Gentleman has interpreted the MOU. I understand that a merger is not a threat to financial stability. It would be in those terms that there might be some case for pursuing the provisions under the MOU. I make it plain that the Government were not a party to the negotiations.

On the competition aspects of the merger, the merger is below the asset and turnover thresholds that would make it a matter for the Commission. It therefore falls to the national authorities to consider. In the UK, if the proposals for the merger proceed, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will make his decision on whether to refer the case to the Competition Commission in the light of the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading. It is obviously not for me to comment on a particular case.

On the regulatory issues, which are of considerable interest to hon. Members, the Government made it clear in another place during consideration of amendments to the Financial Services and Markets Bill, which some of us find it difficult to leave behind us—the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs laughs—we have no doubt that the provisions of the Bill relating to the recognition of exchanges are adequate to deal with structures such as the proposed iX. Although iX will have operations in both the UK and Germany, its component markets will need to be based in one or other of the countries for regulatory purposes. The markets based in London will fall to the Financial Services Authority to oversee, and those in Germany to the German authorities.

Both the FSA and its German counterparts will need to be satisfied about the regulatory arrangements if the merger is to proceed. They are already working together and considering the practical implications of the proposed merger. Indeed, Howard Davies visited the BAWe last week for discussions with his German opposite number.

Much of the detail of the proposed merger is still to be worked out by the exchanges, and therefore the regulatory authorities cannot at this stage say precisely what the regulatory arrangements will be. However, it is worth noting that the merger is not without precedent in terms of its implications for regulation. For example, there is already an instance of two separate exchanges with a single owner operating in two countries. The OM Group owns the OM Stockholm exchange, which is regulated by the Swedish regulator. Another subsidiary is OM London exchange, a UK recognised investment exchange regulated by the FSA.

Mr. Cash: Does the Minister recognise that legislation was required with respect to Lloyd's of London, for example? That was a highly contentious matter and has been referred to in subsequent public legislation. The reasons are those that I gave in relation to the memorandum of understanding. These are issues of seminal importance to the future of the City of London. Lloyd's of London was a good example. I ought to declare an interest, as I was involved in advising on the matter as a lawyer, before I entered Parliament. When one is dealing with the centre of gravity in stock exchanges, that must be dealt with properly, not through private deals, as is the case at present.

Miss Johnson: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's suggestion.

The FSA and its Swedish counterpart have their separate roles in the case that I was describing, and the arrangements work satisfactorily. There is a clear parallel between that and the present case.

As regards iX, the pan-European blue-chip market is expected to be run as part of a recognised investment exchange in the UK, and will therefore be regulated by the FSA. The FSA will also continue to supervise the London market for UK smaller and medium-sized companies and AIM. The derivatives market and the pan-European market for growth companies will be run from Germany and will be regulated by the German financial services authorities.

Details of the listing and admission to trading standards for the iX markets have not yet been announced. However, the stock exchange has made it clear that companies will not be required to give up their home market listings in order to be admitted to trading on the new iX pan-European markets. German companies listed in Germany will be traded on iX's pan-European markets, along with UK listed companies. This will not be a unique situation. Tradepoint intends to introduce pan-European trading in the near future and a similar situation will pertain there. To date, Tradepoint's plans have not given rise to any insurmountable problems for the FSA.

The fact that the shares of UK and German companies will be traded on the same market does not necessarily mean that investors will automatically assume that the same listing regime applies. It is already the case that foreign companies that are traded on the London stock exchange are not required to comply with all the provisions of the UK listing rules.

The iX will consider what standards it wishes to impose on companies trading on its markets—for example, in terms of disclosure requirements—in addition to those required by the company's domestic listing authority. iX will be a commercial operation and will obviously have to take into account the wishes of its users, and the companies quoted on the exchange will need to consider the standards that investors expect.

[Miss Johnson]

The arrangements for companies transferring between the various components of iX have yet to be settled, but I understand that the intention is that to be included in the new blue-chip index, a company would need to be traded on the London blue-chip exchange.

With regard to company law requirements, UK-registered companies must follow the requirements of UK company law, regardless of where they are quoted and traded. Again, it is worth noting that the customers of exchanges take the standards of regulation into account when deciding where to do business. Companies will therefore have to take account of what the market wants, as well as the legal requirements to which they are subject. That has been one of the attractions of being based in London, as the hon. Member for Stone accepted.

The merger has raised other issues, including the issue of trading in different currencies, as we heard. The stock exchange has clarified its position on that in evidence to the Select Committee on the Treasury on 17 May, and elsewhere. The stock exchange's press release on the same day stated:

> The new exchange will need to offer trading in a company's shares in the currency which best meets the needs of investors and other users of the market. In the event that the primary currency of trading was not sterling for a UK company, the Exchange would ensure that sterling prices were still available for private investors, newspapers, indices etc.

As for the implications for the UK's entry into the euro, the Government's position is unchanged. It remains as set out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in October 1997—a statement with which I am sure the hon. Member for Stone is familiar. The determining factor underpinning any Government decision on economic and monetary union is whether the economic case for the UK to join is clear and unambiguous.

In conclusion, a number of questions raised by the merger proposals cannot be answered definitively at this stage. The London stock exchange will issue its information memorandum in July, which will set out in detail the terms of the merger. As the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs commented, it will then be for members of the exchanges to judge the merits of the proposed merger, and for the regulatory authorities to satisfy themselves about the arrangements for the merger.

Mr. Cash: May I make a brief reply?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman has had his say and made his interventions, the Minister has replied, and the debate comes to an end. We move on to the next subject a few minutes early.

Domestic Violence

1.27 pm

Ms Margaret Moran (Luton, South): I begin by quoting from survivors of domestic violence. A child who was involved in domestic violence said:

> My worst moments were when my dad said he was going the throw the baby out of the window, and when he said he was going to cut my mum's ears off and poke her eyes out.

Those are the words of a child terrorised by domestic violence.

A parent said:

> After he was released from prison for stabbing me, he saw my daughter at the probation office under supervision. After a while they persuaded me to let him have her on his own. Things went OK for a long while but when she was eleven, she became very depressed and unhappy and tried to get out of seeing him. It turned out he had started hitting her on contact visits.

Another parent reported:

> On every occasion he came to the house he would force his way in. He continued to abuse me physically and verbally in front of the kids. I had to call the police to remove him after contact visits, and on several occasions he raped me. I still belonged to him, or so he thought. The thought of him coming to collect the children from the house terrifies me. At the moment his parents collect and bring back the children, but from May the court has ordered that he can come to the house. Once again I will be unsafe and at risk from this person.

All those are the words of survivors of domestic violence, as expressed in a recent online consultation initiated by the all-party parliamentary group on domestic violence. That e-consultation, Women Speak, links survivors of domestic violence with parliamentarians in order better to inform our policy, legislation and practice on the subject.

Ms Debra Shipley (Stourbridge): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way so early in her presentation. I record my great respect for her work on violence in the home, in particular the effect on children. Does she agree that the online consultation, Women Speak, was a huge eye-opener for all of us who were involved? I promoted the Protection of Children Act 1999 with the help of my hon. Friend and I thought that I knew a lot about violence against children, but the direct information that came over was appalling. It is extremely important that we have direct contact with survivors, so that we can learn how to tackle the issue.

Ms Moran: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Stourbridge (Ms Shipley) for that important intervention, which emphasised that we heard the powerful voices of women who have experienced domestic violence and its impact on their children. In a month, more than 1,000 contributions from throughout the country and almost every conceivable community were made to the online consultation. It highlighted subjects on which policy is not being implemented, and gaps in legislation. The debate results from the voices that we heard. I hope that we shall listen to them carefully because it is almost unique to hear directly the full and frank testimony of survivors in the circumstances that we are considering.

The issue that emerged from the consultation cried out for action. The survivors called for an end to the courts almost automatically granting a violent parent access to children through child contact orders. We must heed those calls and take action to protect women and children who are at further risk of violence and abuse. More than 90 per cent. of contributions from survivors that referred to child contact raised fears that they and their children were at continued risk of violence or abuse. That is a powerful statement, which we should heed. Women and children who have fled violence, ostensibly to a place of safety, continue to be subject to violence and abuse. There is evidence of women even being murdered as a result of child contact orders.

Changes to the Children Act 1989 are urgently needed. Neither the Act nor the guidance refer to domestic violence. The Act does not require the court to consider the safety of the parent or any other children in the family. The measure, which was intended to protect children, is generally good. Yet it fails to protect the children who need most protection—those who have experienced domestic violence. Consequently, judges almost always grant child contact orders as being in the children's best long-term interests, even if a parent is known to be violent within the family.

Research evidence shows that the courts do not recognise that women are at greatest risk of fatality after separation, and that when there is violence in the family, there is a higher than average likelihood of violence towards, or abuse of, children. The case of Georgina McCarthy, who was murdered almost two years ago today, illustrates the problem. Every agency tried to protect her, but she was murdered and her child was abducted as a result of a child contact order by the courts.

In 1999, a survey of 130 survivors found that 76 per cent. of 148 children ordered by courts to have contact were said to have been abused by the violent parent. Research by Hughes et al in 1989 showed that child abuse and woman abuse occurred together in 40 to 60 per cent. of cases.

Eleanor's ex-husband broke into her house in 1995 and subjected her to five hours of violence. While he was in prison, her daughter, aged four, revealed that her father had sexually abused her. That was confirmed by medical evidence and contact was stopped. However, in 1997, the court decided that there was insufficient evidence of sexual abuse by the father and restored supervised contact. The effect on the child was devastating. Contact was stopped again and social services decided to prosecute the father. The Crown Prosecution Service dropped the charges because it did not wish to put the child in the witness box. A judge ordered supervised contact in a family centre. Eleanor appealed because none of the local contact centres provide supervision. Despite that, she has received a notice, and will be sent to prison if she does not comply with the order.

Contact is refused in fewer than 2 per cent. of child contact cases. In 1997-98, contact was granted in almost 33,000 out of 36,000 cases. That figure is an underestimate because many women are advised by solicitors that there is no point in contesting a contact order and that it is in their best interests to agree informally to contact. For example, solicitors persuaded Sarah Heatley, who was worried by her husband's violent behaviour, to agree to contact without a court hearing. Her two children were murdered during a child contact visit.

For a woman and her children, the apparent safety of a hideout or women's refuge is illusory because, in a few weeks, she is likely to receive a summons that requires her to respond to her ex-partner's application for contact with the child. The nightmare begins again.

Violent partners frequently use contact orders to track down and harass the fleeing partner. A child's address is often disclosed accidentally by order of the court. There are examples of some courts giving out the addresses of refuges, thus endangering many women and children. By applying for seek-and-find orders, men can require the police, social services or the Department of Social Security to disclose a child's address to the court. Those orders were never intended for that purpose. Even if the address is kept secret, it is easy for the violent parent to locate the child and the abused woman through the source of the child contact order and the location of the court in which the hearing will be held. Pity the five-year-old who thought she could protect her mum by telling her father that they lived in Bedding rather than Reading; imagine the intolerable pressure on a child so young and desperate.

Families who flee violence are more vulnerable to being tracked down by their abusers because the courts almost invariably issue child contact orders. They have been used as a method of harassing families. A writer from Kent told us that her ex-husband's consistent attempts to find her through repeated court orders to obtain child contact over five years destroyed her life and the lives of her children. Contact was eventually prevented by a sharp-eyed community psychiatric nurse, who faxed the court a damning report on the schizophrenia of the violent ex-partner. Otherwise, the mother would have faced imprisonment if she had prevented child contact. How many other families' lives have been destroyed? How many children's formative years have been lived in fear and uncertainty because of the contact orders?

The Department of Health has accepted the impact of domestic violence and the strong link between it and child abuse. That is reflected in the Department's training pack, "Making an Impact", which is intended for professionals who work with children. Sadly, the message is not getting through to some people, even when there is every reason to believe that the child has been abused.

It is clear that many judges are unaware, when they issue child contact orders, that supervised contact becomes unsupervised in six months. Only about 1 per cent. of contact centres offer supervised contact. Even if they were safe, many are run by volunteers. Excellent though volunteers are, many are untrained and cannot offer the safety and security that women who have been abused and children need. The centres urgently need wholly safe environments and well-trained staff. Child counselling should also be provided. Sadly, such provision is lacking and underfunded. Perhaps the Lord Chancellor's Department could examine that with colleagues in other Departments, for the safety of the women and children involved.

Abido Choudhry fled to a refuge after years of violence. Her husband was granted supervised contact with the three children. After six months, those contacts became unsupervised. The oldest child complained to social services of their father's mistreatment during contact, but the court ordered overnight stays. As a result, two of the children were abducted, are now thought to be in Pakistan and are unlikely ever to see their mother again.

Women and children should not be put in such danger by our courts. Those regrettable incidents are not isolated. They were entirely predictable and could have been prevented if we had adequate legislation and court procedures to deal with domestic violence.

The Government's consultation paper, "Contact between children and violent parents", which outlines good practice guidelines, is welcome and may lead to better court procedures. They are urgently needed, but they are not mandatory. That is why we need to change the Children Act 1989. Such a change has been made in Northern Ireland and, indeed, in many other countries. It is perverse and dangerous that such changes should be delayed here. We are, in effect, condoning de facto court-approved child abuse.

The law is preventing the police, social workers and child protection agencies from doing their job of protecting the most vulnerable. The case of Georgina McCarthy—murdered by her ex-husband, despite all the attempts of every agency—had a tragic inevitability, and such cases may happen again, perhaps tomorrow.

The recent consultation by the Lord Chancellor's Department on the issue, undertaken by the advisory board on family law's Children Act sub-committee, is also welcome. It proposes guidelines to be followed in cases where domestic violence is alleged, but many of the agencies believe that legislation is still needed. Those agencies include Women's Aid, which is to be congratulated on all its work on the issue, and a wide range of women's and children's organisations under the Best Interests coalition. I understand that the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children is also involved and is due to start a campaign on the issue. Those bodies are supported by the powerful voice of the women—the survivors—whom we heard in the all-party online consultation.

If we are to introduce guidelines, as is proposed, what will be the mechanism for monitoring their impact? The sad fact is that, at the moment, little or nothing is done by the Government to monitor the impact of the Children Act in cases of domestic violence. Research has been done by academics on a small scale and by Women's Aid. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will liaise with her colleagues in other Departments to ensure that we track child contact outcomes where domestic violence is an issue. Sadly, my parliamentary questions on the subject have elicited the fact that social services reports, undertaken as part of part VIII reviews under the Children Act, are not collected, tracked or monitored, so information about the impact of child contact orders on domestic violence is not collected systematically.

I ask the Government to find out precisely how many children have been killed in recent years by parents known to be violent before and after contact visits. That information is contained in the part VIII reviews, and we need to study and learn from it if we are serious about tackling the problem. It could also be used to develop detailed risk assessments before contact orders are granted.

The domestic violence intervention project is piloting such a scheme, which crucially includes the women's views about the risks involved in granting access to children, but, sadly, no funding is available to evaluate it properly. That needs to be considered urgently. Vital evidence collected by police and social services when they advise women to leave their homes for their own safety should be provided in writing and the abused parent should be able to use it to seek a court order under section 91(14) of the Children Act, thus requiring the violent parent to seek leave from the court before applying for a contact order. That procedure is little used at present, but the relevant departments could instigate it relatively speedily.

The Department of Health urgently needs to undertake research, perhaps in conjunction with the Lord Chancellor's Department, on children's experiences of different levels of contact where there is a history of violence in the family, including the impact on children's health and development. In that way, we will achieve a sounder basis on which to develop policy to prevent further tragic cases, such as those which I have described.

Finally, but not least, we need adequate funding for refuge services and for counselling children. All of that adds up to an important package that could help to protect our children. However, it is important that we review the need to legislate and to amend the Children Act. The proposals to change future contact involving unmarried parents might be welcome in principle. However, as the Children Act stands, they could also be unwelcome because they could include unmarried parents, who might be involved in even greater incidence of child contact in the circumstances that I have described.

I am pleased to have had this opportunity to raise an issue that, among all the powerful contributions to the all-party group's online consultation with the survivors of domestic violence, is perhaps the most amazing and most appalling. We have heard the powerful voices of the women survivors and their continuing experiences. They fear for their children when child contact orders are issued if there is violence in the family. I hope that the power of the survivors' voices will help to persuade the Government that urgent action needs to be taken to amend the law and protect those women and children.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Jane Kennedy): Although we are debating a serious issue this afternoon, it is a pleasure to be under your chairmanship, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to discuss it so constructively. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Ms Moran) for the way in which she has presented her case. She has described in the most graphic terms exactly the difficulties faced by the survivors of domestic violence, and brought their cases to light. This is a rare opportunity to discuss such issues, especially those involving child contact orders and concerns about domestic violence.

I acknowledge the good work that my hon. Friend has done as chair of the all-party group on domestic violence. I am also glad to acknowledge and put on record her work in putting forward to the Prime Minister recently a petition that was signed by more than 5,000 people and presented to mark the second anniversary of the murder of Georgina McCarthy, whom she has mentioned. I have discussed that serious and appalling case with the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. George) who visited me with representatives of Women's Aid. Georgina was tracked down and murdered by her ex-husband, as my hon. Friend has said. Her case is a warning to us all that we cannot afford to be complacent. As my hon. Friend's petition points out, Georgina's case is not an isolated example.

In 1998, 75 women were killed by a current or former spouse, cohabitant or lover—more than one a week. However, the problem is not simply one of male violence. It is only fair to say that, in the same year, 37 men were killed by a current or former spouse, cohabitant or lover. To complete that gloomy roll of statistics, in 1998-99, 69 children were killed by a parent—unfortunately, the statistics do not capture whether by their mothers or fathers.

Violence between spouses, or between parents and children, does not always lead to murder, manslaughter or infanticide; but domestic violence is a serious problem, which we take seriously. I therefore welcome the opportunity to explain what is going on, and what the Government are doing. About six months ago, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary launched the zero-tolerance campaign in Liverpool, and it has proved very successful. Although today we are focusing on court decisions and court contact orders, the Government are involved in many other matters.

As my hon. Friend's petition makes clear, there is a significant fear that contact orders are sometimes made inappropriately, and, in particular, that the courts do not always take proper account of allegations of domestic violence. That is a valid concern, as both the judiciary and the Government recognise; but it relates to a difficult area, in which no solution will please everyone.

We can all agree that children and women—and, for that matter, men—ought to be protected from violent parents or former partners. We also know that, other things being equal, it is in the interests of children to maintain contact with both their parents. We know that, when contact is appropriate and is maintained, non-resident parents are more likely to pay maintenance for their children. Parents, too, have a right to their family life, unless positive evidence has shown to the satisfaction of the courts that that would put their children at risk of harm.

We could not agree to create a system in which any parent—it could be a father, as well as a mother—could automatically deny the other parent any contact with their children simply by making an unsubstantiated, and possibly unfounded, allegation of abuse. We must recognise that that could sometimes be used as a device to exclude parents from contact, or to delay that contact. We must also recognise that some blameless parents—most often fathers—have immense difficulty in enforcing contact orders that have been made in their favour, and that the system of enforcement, which is largely ineffective in these cases, lets such parents down.

I am glad to say that the Children Act sub-committee of the Lord Chancellor's advisory board on family law, to which my hon. Friend referred, has taken on these knotty problems. Last year, the sub-committee—which is chaired by Mr. Justice Wall—published a consultation paper on contact with violent parents, which my hon. Friend also mentioned. Around Easter, the sub-committee reported the results of its consultation to the Lord Chancellor, and made its final recommendations. The report has been published. Mr. Justice Wall and his sub-committee will embark on a similar exercise in relation to the enforcement of contact orders.

The report on domestic violence and child contact concluded that legislation was not necessary—a view supported by most respondents—but that there should be guidelines for the talks. The draft guidelines are several pages long, and I shall not quote from them fully, but they include the following main points.

Wherever possible, the court should make findings of fact as to whether allegations of violence are true, and as to the effect of the violence on the child and the resident parent. When allegations are found to be true, the court should consider the harm that the child has suffered and the harm that the child is at risk of suffering, and should make an order for contact only if it is satisfied that the safety of the resident parent and that of the child can be secured before, during and after contact.

When the court has made findings of violence but nevertheless considers that contact is in the best interests of the child, it should consider what additional directions may be necessary to ensure that the order is implemented safely. It should also consider whether to make a non-molestation order under part IV of the Family Law Act 1996. The court should always explain how its findings on the issue of domestic violence have affected its decision. In particular, when it has ordered that there should be contact despite having found that domestic violence has taken place, the court should explain its view that contact is in the best interests of the child.

The sub-committee recommended that the guidelines should be brought into force through a practice direction to be made by the Lord Chancellor and the president of the family division, Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss. However, at the time when the sub-committee was finishing its report, four appeals raising these issues were heard by the Court of Appeal. Judgment has been reserved on those cases. The Lord Chancellor has agreed that the sub-committee's draft report should be made available to the Court of Appeal. We look forward to its judgment, and to finding out whether it lays down any guidelines as a result. The Lord Chancellor has agreed with Dame Elizabeth that, once a judgment has been made, they will consider whether a practice direction to the judiciary would be helpful, and what further action may be necessary.

In its consultation paper, the sub-committee compared the different approaches to domestic violence and child contact in Australia, New Zealand and Northern Ireland. Some people would like the law to be amended so that, like the New Zealand legislation, it included a presumption against unsupervised contact when domestic violence has taken place. It is worth emphasising that that statutory presumption is a presumption against unsupervised contact, not a presumption against contact altogether.

[Jane Kennedy]

As I said, the suggestion was canvassed in the sub-committee's consultation. Most respondents agreed that legislation was not necessary, and that sufficient safeguards could be introduced by way of guidelines. The Government accept that view.

Ms Moran: I welcome the sub-committee's findings. The issue, obviously, is whether the guidance will be interpreted differently in different parts of the country—a disparity that would be resolved by some change to the Children Act, but not necessarily by the Australian system. May I press my hon. Friend on the question of monitoring? Might it be possible to consider legislation if the effects of the guidance are not the effects that were intended?

Jane Kennedy: I hope that what I will say shortly will reassure my hon. Friend.

As recently as yesterday, officials in my Department who are responsible for the development of family policy and the effect of the Children Act met staff who are responsible for the administration of the courts to discuss the collection of more information about domestic violence in Children Act cases. It is a live issue in the Department, and one that we are pursuing.

We would be more persuaded that legislation was required if it were the case—as my hon. Friend's petition says—that the courts operate an overriding principle that absent parents should be awarded contact with their children, and that that principle does not take account of cases in which a parent and children are in danger of experiencing violence. That is not correct. There is no overriding principle that contact should be maintained with an absent or non-resident parent. Section 1 of the Children Act says that the paramount consideration that the courts shall apply in determining any question with respect to the upbringing of a child is the welfare of that child. When considering whether to make a contact order, the courts must also have regard to the so-called welfare checklist, which includes such factors as the child's wishes and feelings, the likely effect on the child of any change in his or her circumstances, and any harm that he or she has suffered or is at risk of suffering.

Although we began the debate early, I realise that we are rapidly running out of time. I would have loved to make many more points; perhaps I can make them in a letter to my hon. Friend.

This is not the end of the story. The Georgina McCarthy case raised several questions about the way in which cases are currently handled, and the Lord Chancellor's Department and the Home Office are considering them. There is much work for the Government to do—much work that they are committed to doing. The subject is critically important, and I thank my hon. Friend for raising the profile of that crucial work.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Two o'clock.

2.30 pm

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): It is my pleasure to introduce for debate the fourth report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs of last Session. I have just been reminded by my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) that it is a year to the day since the report was published. I do not know what conclusions we can draw from that delay. We also have before us the Government response to our recommendations and various unpublished memoranda, one from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and one, dated 4 June, from the Government of Gibraltar. I know from experience that there is considerable interest in the House in the subject of Gibraltar. It is, therefore, wholly fitting that our report should be brought before this Chamber.

The Foreign Affairs Committee report was unanimous and followed a short but, I hope, comprehensive inquiry. I am grateful to my colleagues on the Committee for working together constructively and speedily to produce a document that has, I hope, been a catalyst for change in relations between this country and Gibraltar. I shall begin with our conclusions to show the spirit in which we worked. In paragraph 125 we say:

> Of all our overseas territories, Gibraltar is in the unique position of having to conform to almost all EU regulations and directives. This means that the British Government have a special duty of care towards Gibraltar in the European Union, and places extra responsibilities upon United Kingdom Ministers to uphold the interests of Gibraltar. We urge Her Majesty's Government both to recognise and to act in full accordance with these responsibilities.

That was the theme—the leitmotiv—of our report.

The report was sparked by the fact that, in January last year, the border between Gibraltar and Spain was closed to traffic in a culmination of a dispute about fishing by Spanish vessels in Gibraltar's territorial waters, and Gibraltar became even more prominent on the parliamentary agenda. Thus, the Committee decided that it should look at the situation. One of the great advantages of our Select Committee system is that we can respond flexibly to crises in that way. I have stressed our special duty of care, but we should not forget what the people of the Rock did for the allied war efforts during the second world war.

The Committee visited Gibraltar in March last year. We met the then governor, our former colleague, Richard Luce, the Chief Minister, Peter Caruana, and the leader of the Opposition, Joe Bossano, all of whom are well known to hon. Members; and Gibraltar is well served by its representative in the United Kingdom, Mr. Albert Poggio.

In London, we took evidence from my right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin), who then had responsibility for Gibraltar in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and from Peter Caruana. We are extremely grateful for the enormous help that we received. During our visit to Gibraltar, which was my first, we were received with great warmth, which made clear to me our special relationship with its people.

We did not take evidence for our report in Spain, and received only one piece of evidence from a Spanish source—although that was important, as it came from Rafael Estrella, the Socialist party's then foreign affairs spokesman. He has a special interest in relations with Gibraltar, because he represents a constituency in the adjoining region—or autonomia—of Andalucia. We would, of course, have welcomed other memoranda, had other Spanish sources responded to our invitation.

We were able to study the proposals for the future of Gibraltar that the then Spanish Foreign Minister, Mr. Abel Matutes, had made as part of the so-called Brussels process. Those proposals, with their call for joint sovereignty in Gibraltar, were clearly unacceptable to an overwhelming majority of Gibraltarians, and must, therefore, eventually be rejected.

We also saw at first hand the threats that Spain has made against Gibraltarian interests, and received much evidence about the effect that Spanish action has had on the life and economy of the Rock. We naturally took the opportunity to visit the border, in company with the Chief Minister, Mr. Peter Caruana, and saw the unacceptable delays.

In essence, our conclusion was that Spain has made many wild and unfounded allegations against Gibraltar. The territory is not the haven for smugglers, drug traffickers and tax evaders that some Spanish propagandists pretend.

On the compliance of Gibraltar with European Union obligations, there were just two remaining regulations with which the Government of Gibraltar had not complied. The recent memorandum submitted to us by the Gibraltar Government states—in response to our report's recommendation that > the Foreign and Commonwealth Office continue to press for the early adoption of legislation in Gibraltar to bring into effect the Fourth and Seventh EC Company Law Directives that

> The required legislation is now

> the statute book and operative.

I am delighted that that positive change has occurred since our visit.

We raised important questions about whether Spanish conduct against Gibraltar may not itself infringe EU law. I have in mind not just the disgraceful absence of free movement across the border—of which more later—but such issues as the then non-recognition of Gibraltarian driving licences and passports, the restrictions on Gibraltarian telephone services, and the attempts to exclude Gibraltar from the entitlement to benefit from all aspects of its EU membership. We called for more rigorous action in the EU to defend Gibraltarian interests.

Our report was published last June, since when an amendment has been moved—I am delighted to be able to use that parliamentary expression. That amendment is the very welcome, but limited, agreement between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Spain, which has been hailed by the Government of Gibraltar as a key step on the road to normalisation of relations. I am sure that I speak on behalf of the whole Committee in saying that we, too, welcome that step forward. We were delighted by the announcement on the agreement that was made on 19 April by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. Speaking with due deference, I have little doubt that our report helped to hasten the process.

It is always possible to talk up a dispute into a crisis, but, as our report says, nothing is to be gained by bombast and megaphone diplomacy.

For that reason, we devoted the last part of our report to an analysis of what we believe the British Government should do to develop relations with Spain. That is important because—I stress this—Spain is an important ally of this country, not least within the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation. There are many areas in which we work extremely amicably with our Spanish partners, and we have many common interests, including, for example, our approach to the intergovernmental conference, which will be concluded in Nice in December. Also, many Britons holiday in Spain and many others live there.

In the past, the temperature of the debate occasionally became too heated because of Gibraltar, and it should be lowered. The meeting of the two Prime Ministers in early April helped that effort. I understand that they have an extremely good relationship—their chemistry is good—which has been used constructively for the benefit of the people of Gibraltar, and we hope that they will go well beyond that first step.

The Foreign Affairs Committee does not believe that co-operation with Spain should in any way be equated with appeasement. The tendency in Gibraltar to criticise successive British Governments in that regard is regrettable. Co-operation is, in our view, the most sensible way forward. In our report, we singled out the airport as a place at which there should be practical, cross-border co-operation to the benefit of Gibraltar and of Andalucia, which is the adjoining region.

The Brussels process, which was started by the Brussels agreement of 1984, was an attempt to develop practical co-operation. However, in our judgment, the process became ensnared in fruitless discussions about sovereignty, and we believe that it is time for the agenda to move on. We therefore propose a new process of regular dialogue on all of the many areas in which agreements and co-operation could yield substantial and beneficial results. In that context, some of the views that have been expressed in Spain and Gibraltar, especially by Rafael Estrella and Peter Caruana, are constructive, helpful and enlightened.

Our report recommended putting the issue of sovereignty to one side and concentrating on co-operation and on the need to make progress where that is possible. That is surely the only sensible way forward. A banner that was displayed at La Linea last year stated: "Fewer restrictions, more solutions". That is what happened in April's agreement, when a breakthrough was achieved on European Union matters.

A new governor is now in place in Gibraltar. Peter Caruana received further endorsement in the elections that were held in February, and the Spanish elections have similarly consolidated the position of the Spanish Government of Mr. Aznar. Mr. Josep Piqué is the new Spanish Foreign Minister.

However, I do not pretend that everything is rosy. There are unwarranted delays at the border. I believe that now is a propitious time to move forward, and that we should use the limited agreement in April, however welcome it was, as a platform for further advance.

I shall not go through the helpful memorandum in detail—

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): The hon. Gentleman said that a new Government have been re-elected in Spain and that a new Foreign Minister has been appointed. Would not now be an opportune time to press the approach that the hon. Gentleman described because there is every chance that it will be favourably received?

Mr. Anderson: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman's very wise words will be well received by our Government—I look forward to the Minister's reply—and by the Spanish Government.

The report contains detailed analyses of delays at the border. Obviously, the fact that customs officials operate at the border means that some checking is necessary, but the delays are still being manipulated for political purposes. They can be turned on and off like a tap, irrespective of the amount of traffic—

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Depending on which British Minister is visiting.

Mr. Anderson: Indeed, yes. It is done for quite extraneous reasons. It is wholly unacceptable behaviour by the Spanish Government, and in the new spirit of the April 1999 agreements, something should be done about it.

The only other area in which we hope for progress relates to the delays in telephone operations mentioned on page 6 of the memorandum. In our paragraph 67, we recommended that the Government take all steps open to it under the Treaties to ensure that a determination is made by the European Commission with no further delay in the case of telephone operations.

The Gibraltar Government responded as follows:

The Gibraltar Government agrees. The situation is now very critical. Gibraltar has run out of numbers for mobile telephones (with a waiting list of 200) and has only sufficient fixed line numbers until the end of this year. This means that Gibraltar cannot comply with its obligations under the telecommunication liberalisation regulations since there are no numbers available for new operators.

The Spanish Government's refusal to recognise Gibraltar's 350 code is a breach of its obligations under Community Law...There is no indication that the European Commission is prepared to commence formal legal proceedings against the Spanish Government...The Gibraltar Government cannot agree that this issue should be dealt with in a manner which subjects the enforcement of the EU Rights of Gibraltar citizens and companies to a process of bilateral political negotiation between the UK and Spain.

I have not discussed this further matter with the Committee, but I anticipate that there will be total endorsement of the Gibraltar Government's view.

We recognise that much helpful progress has been made, that there is a new spirit of co-operation, and a new platform on which we can build. However, some of the matters that need to be dealt with, such as the telephone question, are critical and urgent while others, including the border delays, are still clearly being manipulated for political purposes.

I hope that the Minister will give the Chamber some assurances on those matters. There are still areas in which the European Commission is trying to avoid taking a decision on matters that are properly its responsibility. I hope that the Minister will also address the question of when we can expect the legislation to extend the European franchise to residents of Gibraltar. I cannot speak for colleagues from other parties, but I would hope that this would be a consensual matter in the House, and that the passage of such legislation could be facilitated in such a way as to avoid falling foul of any pre-election problems.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): May I remind the hon. Gentleman that when this matter came before the House some time ago, some of us were very keen that the franchise should be extended and amendments were tabled accordingly, only to be struck down by his Government?

Mr. Anderson: It is not my purpose to find fault with one or other Government. There has been substantial progress, but there remain many problems and this is one of them. I hope that the hon. Gentleman, who has taken a close interest in Gibraltar over the years, will try to ensure that there is no opposition or blockage from any part of the House over which he has some little control.

I hope also that the Minister will confirm the Committee's view that moves towards greater self-government under the Crown in Gibraltar—if that becomes the proposal of the House of Assembly Select Committee currently examining the Gibraltarian constitution—will not be contrary to the treaty of Utrecht. In our view, such a course will not amount to alienation of Gibraltar from the Crown referred to in article 10 of the Utrecht treaty.

The Foreign Affairs Committee report has been a constructive contribution and has helped to encourage people of good will on both sides of the Spain-Gibraltar border to work towards happy co-existence in a historic and beautiful corner of the European Union. The report has been overtaken, in part, but the moves in April are most welcome.

I have one final point. People sometimes ask, "What is the use of Select Committees? Do they have any influence?" In future, I shall answer with one word: "Gibraltar". It is not showing too much self-esteem on our part to say that the report made a constructive contribution to the debate, on behalf of Gibraltar and in the interests of promoting better relations between this country and Spain.

2.50 pm

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) in speaking to a report that was, as he said, unanimously agreed. The tone of the report was both reasonable and firm in its protection of essential Gibraltarian interests. The hon. Gentleman referred to a number of issues on which there has been progress, but I want to speak about three important issues on which practical progress to date has been zero.

First, there is the issue of frontier delays. Like other hon. Members, I was struck by the Foreign Secretary's announcement, made in a written answer on 19 April. I welcome the progress to which he referred, but, as hon. Members will know, frontier delays were not among the items covered in the announcement. Although the Foreign Secretary was singularly upbeat in his announcement, frontier delay is still a serious issue. The Foreign Secretary said that the discussions that had taken place had produced a very good outcome for the UK, for Gibraltar and for all our EU partners.

He also said that he hoped that they would help to improve the climate of dialogue and the spirit of co-operation with regard to Gibraltar between Spain, and the UK and Gibraltar—[Official Report, 19 April 2000; Vol. 348, c. 499W.]

In practical terms, there is no evidence whatever that there is an improvement in the "climate of dialogue" or the "spirit of co-operation" with regard to the frontier delays.

We can see minutely whether progress is being made in this area. The Gibraltar Government keep day-by-day records of the average length of the delays for vehicles exiting Gibraltar. The delays are deliberately contrived by Spanish officials and Spanish Ministers have ultimate responsibility for them. Table B of the Gibraltar Government document shows that the average delay time on 19 April—the day on which the Foreign Secretary made his statement about the new spirit of co-operation—was 52 minutes. On 30 May—the latest date we have—the average time was 51 minutes. I was curious about whether there had been a dramatic improvement before our debate, so I spoke to the Chief Minister's office this morning. I was given figures for the past few days, including yesterday—7 June. The delay is still 51 minutes. So, despite the talk of a new spirit of co-operation, all that has been achieved since 19 April is an improvement of one minute in the average delay time on the border. That is not good enough.

One must ask whether the Government's response is good enough. The final part of the Government's response states:

We note the Committee's recommendation that the Government take action under Article 227 of the EC Treaty should the Commission itself fail to take swift action. Ministers have already raised the issue of border delays with the incoming Commission, and will keep the situation under review.

I do not think that keeping the situation under review is anything like good enough. Something much more specific and positive must be done. The Select Committee made it clear in its report that, ultimately, if the Commission is unwilling to take action under article 226, individual EU member states have the right, under article 227, to take action themselves against an individual member state. In view of the clear evidence that the Commission has failed to take swift action, which was the benchmark that the Government used in their response, why have the Government not so far initiated proceedings under article 227? When, while these intolerable delays continue, will they do so?

[Sir John Stanley]

The second issue that I wish to raise, where again, regrettably, there has been no progress, is the use of Gibraltar for NATO defence purposes. A long-standing incongruous geographical feature of the NATO alliance is that at the eastern end of the Mediterranean two NATO allies, Greece and Turkey, treat each other as potential belligerents and at the western end, another NATO ally, Spain, treats a fellow NATO ally, Britain, in a Gibraltar context at least, as a military leper, with whom contact should be avoided. That is a serious issue.

I want to look in detail at the Government's response on this point. It is a three sentence response and I shall take each in turn. The first is:

> The Government continue to believe that the Spanish imposition of restrictions intended to hamper NATO military activity in and around Gibraltar is an inappropriate approach for a NATO ally.

I fully signed up to the Foreign Affairs Committee's view that we should avoid bombastic terminology and megaphone diplomacy, but that goes far too far in the opposite direction. One member of a serious military alliance is deliberately hampering the agreed military activities of another. Surely wording rather stronger than "an inappropriate approach" would have been justified. The Foreign Office should reflect on the impact such wording has in Madrid when the Spanish Government see that all the British Government are prepared to say in our own Parliament and to our own Foreign Affairs Select Committee is that their activities in deliberately hampering NATO operations and activities are "an inappropriate approach". That does not remotely convey the right message to them.

The second sentence is:

> The Government intend to continue bilateral discussions with Spain aimed at maintaining progress towards the lifting of all restrictions, particularly in the light of Spain's recent joining of the NATO Military Structure.

The Government missed a significant moment in permitting Spain to enter the integrated military structure of NATO on 1 March 1999 without resolving that issue or obtaining assurances from the Spanish Government that they would discontinue such hampering of NATO activities. That should have been a major issue in the negotiations, but it appears that it was let slip.

People may say that the previous Conservative Government let Spain into the political structure of NATO in 1982 and did not finally resolve the issue. That is a fair point. Although I was not in the Ministry of Defence or the Foreign Office then, I remind hon. Members that we had to take into account Spain's important strategic position and the fact that we were still involved in the cold war. It was reasonably seen as desirable to get Spain into NATO at almost any price. However, we were in a fundamentally different position in 1999. An important window of opportunity was lost when we let Spain into the integrated military structure without obtaining copper-bottomed assurances that such hampering of NATO's activities in Gibraltar would stop.

The third and final sentence of the Government's response was clearly designed to try to score brownie points with the Committee, which took a strong line on the issue. The Government said:

> A move towards normalisation of the relationship between two NATO allies was demonstrated recently when Spain took part for the first time in a NATO communications exercise in which Gibraltar also participated.

I welcome the fact that Spain participated with Gibraltar in a NATO communications exercise, but on the other side of the scale, the Gibraltar Government have said:

> Far from doing what the Committee's conclusion and recommendation would expect from her, Spain is actually actively discouraging other NATO countries from visiting Gibraltar with their military ships and airplanes.

That is a more serious downside than the small plus of the communications exercise to which the Government's response refers. My concern is that we are moving backwards and enabling Spain to hamper NATO operations and exercises involving not only British military assets, but those of our NATO allies. I shall be interested to hear the Minister's response on that.

The last recommendation on which we have not achieved practical progress concerns the right of Gibraltarians to vote in European elections, to which the hon. Member for Swansea, East referred. Although the Government have seriously failed on that issue, the previous Conservative Government failed equally seriously. Both Governments are culpable for denying Gibraltarians the ability to vote in European elections.

I was delighted that Denise Matthews won her case in the European Court of Human Rights last year, although it is a sad day for the mother of Parliaments when a British citizen must go to that court to establish her right to vote in our democracy. The Government's response makes all the right noises, but does not make a clear binding commitment that Gibraltarians will have their right to vote in the 2004 European elections.

I have just two questions. The Secretary of State's response says:

> The Government are working hard to ensure that this extension of the franchise to Gibraltar is achieved before the 2004 elections.

However, the evidence of years and years shows that hard work is not sufficient to achieve success when the Spanish Government dig their toes in on an issue. The Foreign Affairs Committee anticipated that there might be difficulties in implementing the decision that has been made in the European Court and in getting that through the European Union bureaucratic thicket in Brussels. Therefore, in paragraph 92 of its report, the Committee put to the Government a fallback position, in the event of continuing Spanish obstruction:

> If there is evidence of Spanish obstruction, we believe that it will be possible—and desirable—for the United Kingdom to act unilaterally, at least as a stop-gap. This could be done by amending British law to allow British citizens resident in Gibraltar to register to vote in European constituencies in a similar manner to the extension of the franchise in domestic and EP elections to British citizens resident abroad under the Representation of the People Act 1985.

The Government's response is silent on the use of that unilateral legislative power. Will the Minister tell us whether the Government, if they cannot have their way in Brussels, will discharge their democratic obligations to the people of Gibraltar and implement the unilateral legislative solution that the Foreign Affairs Committee recommended?

The last question arises from the Gibraltarian Government's paper, which says:

> Spain has recently informed the EC General Council that it will not agree to Gibraltarians voting in Gibraltar and offering them the opportunity to vote in Spain.

I hope that the Minister will dispose of all the diplomatic language with which his brief and the Government's response are stuffed, and make it absolutely clear that the British Government are adamant that the people of Gibraltar voting in the European elections for the first time in 2004 will vote in one place only—Gibraltar.

3.9 pm

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): I welcome this debate and I am pleased to see so many colleagues from across the political spectrum who, like me, have enjoyed the Gibraltar national day and the hospitality and friendship of the Government and people of Gibraltar and their House of Assembly. I hope that we can replicate this debate annually, at least. Ideally, we ought to have a debate each part-Session. We are focusing on the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee, but we need to take account of many other issues, including the Government's stewardship, the role of the governor, chief constable and chief justice, all of whom are appointed by Whitehall. Westminster has a duty and an obligation to deal with those issues, but perhaps we can do so on another occasion.

I should like to comment on the Select Committee report. It is fair to acknowledge that much has been achieved since it was published. We should recognise, for example, the purchase of a fast patrol boat, which resulted from financial collaboration between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Gibraltar. The fourth and seventh Euro-directives have been placed on the statute book and problems relating to driving licences have been resolved. The competent financial authorities of Gibraltar have been facilitated by a "post box" system via London. We are also pleased to know that there are currently no fisheries disputes.

What is the kernel of the debate, and why is the Minister in the dock? I hesitate to use that phrase, but I shall justify it in a few moments. Paragraph 125 of the report states:

> We conclude that there have been occasions in the past when the British defence of Gibraltarian interests has not been as robust as it should have been. Of all our overseas territories, Gibraltar is in the unique position of having to conform to almost all EU regulations and directives. This means that the British Government have a special duty of care towards Gibraltar in the European Union, and places extra responsibilities upon United Kingdom Ministers to uphold the interests of Gibraltar. We urge Her Majesty's Government both to recognise and to act in full accordance with these responsibilities.

The Government responded by saying:

> The Committee does not cite any occasions when the defence of Gibraltar's interest has not been robust... This Government would reject the claim that it has ever been less than robust in its defence of the interests of the people of Gibraltar, and is encouraged that a full and diligent inquiry by the Committee does not produce any such example.

Whoever penned that has not addressed himself to the contents of the report. Colleagues have already cited examples such as problems at the border. As we sit here this afternoon, the people of Gibraltar and other UK citizens face indefensible frustrations at the border. In extremis, flights headed for Gibraltar were recently unable to use the Spanish airport and were diverted to north Africa. Telephone facilities are another problem, and because of the tardiness of the European Commission and the Spanish Government in resolving it, the Gibraltar Government have been embarrassed commercially and are unable to fulfil other obligations. The franchise to the European Parliament is another major issue.

Will the Minister amplify on his discussions with Madrid? It was reported that he was somewhat pleased about the reduction of the waiting time at the border. He clearly understands that hon. Members regard the existing average waiting time as wholly unacceptable, and I want to know if there is a disagreement between him and us on that matter. If the Minister shares our view that it remains unacceptable, what is he going to do about it? Parliament is entitled to know.

In parliamentary replies, the Minister and the Foreign Secretary have said that they are continuing to pursue the matter in Europe. Yet the Gibraltar Chronicle reported on 29 November last year that the European Commissioner had said that it was not a matter for him, but should be sorted out bilaterally. The Minister must tell us whether it is a bilateral matter or should be dealt with by the European Commissioner. Can he give us an assurance that the European Commissioner is pursuing the matter with vigour?

On aviation, I should like the Minister to respond to paragraph 2 on pages 3 and 4 of the unpublished memorandum submitted by the Gibraltar Government. It states:

> On 3 May this year, a scheduled civilian flight carrying 90 passengers was unable to land at Gibraltar due to poor visibility and after circling for 20 minutes requested on three occasions to divert to Malaga airport. This was refused on grounds that the aircraft had made no attempt to land at Gibraltar. The aircraft was therefore forced to divert to Tangier.

I do not want to sound like a long-playing gramophone record, but what are the Government doing about that?

My colleagues have dealt with the issues of NATO and telephones, but there is one other item on our list that has yet to be covered. We recommended that, as a matter of common sense and courtesy, the Chief Minister should have access to the Prime Minister. However, the Government's response has been rather mean, which simply is not good enough. We should remember that the people of Gibraltar are not represented in this place. We trespassed on that issue in our report and suggested that reform of the other place might facilitate representation. The Government said that we should await Wakeham, but Wakeham failed to comment, so we need to revisit the issue.

Because the people of Gibraltar are not represented in this place, their representatives in the House of Assembly should have greater access to the Prime Minister who, ultimately, is their Prime Minister. We should remember that if the United Kingdom were to go to war, Gibraltar and the other overseas territories would not be able to pass a resolution stating, "If you don't mind awfully, we'll sit this one out." They are locked in to our decisions here, and we must recognise that this place is also their legislature.

[Mr. Andrew Mackinlay]

I am extremely angered by the issue of the franchise for European elections. Originally, Her Majesty's Government were peddling the story that it is not possible to extend the franchise. The Committee stage of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill was taken on the Floor of the House, and amendments were tabled not only by me but the Conservative Opposition. The Opposition experienced a Pauline conversion on the matter. Nevertheless, they sought to ensure that there were votes for Gibraltarians in European elections. During the debate, I said:

Reference has been made to arguments advanced in another place by Baroness Symons—

the former Minister of State for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office—that, somehow, there is an impediment to altering the law without unanimity among EU member states. That is simply wrong in law. It is nonsense, but it is indicative of the kind of stuff that is peddled at an official level in the Foreign Office. Even if I am wrong, it is up to the British Government to challenge such a premise. I am quite confident—I say this with as much humility as I can muster—

that I happen to be right, and that the Foreign Office is wrong.—[Official Report, 24 February 1998; Vol. 307, c. 196.]

The Foreign Office was wrong, and I was vindicated. The European Court concluded that the Foreign Office's expensive lawyers had got it wrong and that the hon. Member for Thurrock had got it right.

There is a lesson to be learned here. The same people are still advising Ministers. They have now altered the story and tried to rewrite history. The Minister will say, "Hon. Members and Madam Deputy Speaker, we want to extend the franchise, but we need the agreement of Spain and the European Union." I shall tell the Minister—and I shall quote this on future occasions—that he and his advisers are once again wrong. However, I cannot help but feel that the Foreign Office has displayed a wilful ignorance in this matter. It is unacceptable that it is even deemed to be a matter of competence for the European Union or a foreign Government to decide who or what should be our franchise.

The hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill)—who I know hopes to catch your eye later on, Madam Deputy Speaker—and I are at different poles on the question of the European Union, but on this matter I wholeheartedly agree with him: it is our exclusive competence to decide who is on our electoral register. We should at least put enabling legislation on the statute book now, so that we do not have to come to Parliament after an agreement, perhaps at the 11th hour.

To underline the poverty of legal advice given to Ministers on this matter I shall quote my hon. Friend the then Minister of State's words in responding to me on 24 February 1998. She said:

As I have said, there are differences between the status of Gibraltar in the European Union and, for example, the status of the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. However, for the purposes of the EU parliamentary elections, it is clear that they have the same status. That is the legal position. If that position were to be changed, it would require a proposal from the European Parliament, and a unanimous decision in Council followed by ratification by all member states. I am sure that the formidable political obstacles that would be encountered by that course of action are more than evident to the Committee.—[Official Report, 24 February 1998; Vol. 307, c. 608.]

My hon. Friend was proved to be wrong, and I hope that the Government will now have the humility to recognise that, particularly as the Labour Government have an obligation to ensure that the franchise is extended to these people. After all, the people of Martinique and Réunion in the Indian Ocean can vote in the European elections, but our own folk in Gibraltar, to whom we owe so much, are denied that opportunity.

I am sorry to have laboured the point, but it demonstrates that the humility should not be with me but with those on the Government Front Bench, who have repeatedly taken advice given by Home Office officials that, time and time again, has been shown to be flawed and morally wrong.

3.22 pm

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): I should say at the outset that I am not a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, but I have read its report with great interest and I congratulate the Chairman and all members of the Committee. The report was interesting and frank. Members of the Committee put clearly to the then Minister of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin), their views on a wide range of issues, which were also evident in their discussions with the Chief Minister of Gibraltar, Peter Caruana.

Like many other hon. Members I have visited Gibraltar on numerous occasions. Some years ago, my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) and I went to national day in Gibraltar. It was a moving occasion. I was last there last year, when I led a delegation to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association conference, which was being held there. While there, we heard the views of the Chief Minister, of politicians and of business people, but, above all, we heard the views of the men and women of Gibraltar, and there was no doubt about what is and is not acceptable to them and their country.

I must tell my hon. Friend the Minister of State that, as other hon. Members have said—and this emerged clearly in the Select Committee report—the views of the Government are not those of the people of Gibraltar. In the elegant presentation of his views, my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock made it clear that the Government to whom many of us in this Room are proud to belong, sadly, often get it wrong. They get it wrong in Gibraltar and they get it wrong in many other parts of the world that have close links to us through their membership of the Commonwealth. They get it wrong repeatedly. I hope that, as my hon. Friend has said, we will make known to Spain the views not of the British Government, who often put their views forward, but of the people of Gibraltar and the Chief Minister of Gibraltar.

The on-going problems that, sadly, Gibraltar faces at the border, where there are many delays in traffic movement, were mentioned earlier. When the CPA delegation was there for a week, we watched, day by day, what was happening. Spain deliberately caused the delays to inconvenience Gibraltar and to disrupt its economy and tourism trade. The Spanish have not suggested that they have other reasons for causing the delays.

My hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) dismissed out of hand some of the accusations that the Spanish Government make against Gibraltar, and our Government should do the same. Neither I nor any other hon. Member is in any doubt about the fact that the Spanish Government's accusations are totally unacceptable to the people of Gibraltar.

There was a vote on the sovereignty of Gibraltar in the 1967 referendum and it is worth spelling out the result. A total of 12,138 people voted to remain linked to the United Kingdom and 44 voted for Spanish control of Gibraltar.

The British Government might say to the Chief Minister, "The 1967 vote took place a long time ago, and the matter should be retested. Let's have another referendum to test the views of the people of Gibraltar by December this year." If they said that, does any hon. Member believe that there would be any change from the 1967 voting figures? I do not, and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister does not either.

Many hon. Members have many political interests in Parliament, and I happen to chair the all-party group on the Argentine. The Argentines are hell-bent on trying to take over the Falkland Islands. What do the Government, and what did the previous Government, say repeatedly to the Government of Argentina? They said, "There are things that we will talk to you about, and we want co-operation between our two countries, but we will not enter into a discussion about the sovereignty of the Falkland Islands."

I recently hosted a visit that was made by the newly elected Vice President of Argentina. He met various Members of Parliament, and we discussed many things, but there was one matter that we did not discuss—the British Government had made it very clear to the Government of Argentina that sovereignty was not for discussion. I hope that something as forceful as what was repeatedly said to the Government of Argentina will be said to Spain—it is, I believe, our duty to do so.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): Does the hon. Gentleman think that, in view of the Government's propensity to consult the people about many aspects of political life, it is somewhat strange that they are reluctant to consult the people of Gibraltar? Would he recommend that such a consultation should now take place?

Mr. Cox: I note what the hon. Lady has said, and shall deal with that point in a moment.

Paragraph 104 of the report contains two key aspects, one of which I fully support and of one of which I am deeply critical. I support the proposal for the representation of Gibraltar in the House of Lords, which deserves serious consideration. I hope that the Minister will not say, "We are sympathetic to that, but we would have to consult the Spanish Government before we could put it in place." Sadly, that is often the tenor of the Government's actions in any dealings concerning Gibraltar. As my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock said, if it is the wish of hon. Members that there should be a Gibraltarian representative in the reformed second Chamber, that decision should be taken by the British Parliament.

The aspect of which I am highly critical—this may answer the intervention by the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing)—is the fact that no meetings between the Chief Minister of Gibraltar and the Prime Minister take place prior to meetings between the Spanish Prime Minister and the Prime Minister. According to the report, the then Minister of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West, said that she > spoke regularly with the Chief Minister, and reported on these discussions to the Prime Minister.

That is totally unacceptable. It is an utter discourtesy to the people and to the elected Government of Gibraltar that the British Prime Minister—any Prime Minister, not just the present one—does not meet the elected Chief Minister of Gibraltar before he meets the Spanish Prime Minister for discussions about Gibraltar. Those meetings do not happen often so it would not place enormous pressure on the Prime Minister to do so. When a meeting of such great importance is to take place, and we know that issues concerning Gibraltar will be on the agenda, Gibraltar has a right to ensure that its Chief Minister meets the Prime Minister to discuss those issues.

The next European elections have been mentioned. Comment 13 of the Government response states:

> The Government are working hard to ensure that this extension of the franchise to Gibraltar is achieved before the 2004 European elections.

The language should be much tougher than that. Those elections are in June 2004—some four years hence. Are we being told that, between now and June 2004, we are not capable of ensuring—as the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) said in his forceful speech—that those people will have a right to vote where they want to vote? We know where they want to vote, and the Government should take the necessary action.

My final point concerns the airport. The report and the Government's response discuss the airport's potential for future development, which none of us disputes. However, the action that Spain takes towards flights into Gibraltar is totally unacceptable. I can give an example. I chair the CPA sub-committee that is now preparing for the CPA 2000 conference, which will take place in London and Edinburgh in September. The CPA executive committee held its meeting in Gibraltar on 9-15 April this year to discuss the agenda for this year's conference. Several members of the executive planned to fly into Gibraltar airport, but high winds meant that the aircraft could not land there. They sought permission to land at a Spanish airfield, but it was refused, so they had to fly to Morocco. That is unacceptable. Can the Minister give an assurance that any discussion about the airport will not be a matter solely for the Spanish and

British Governments? Any changes regarding the airport must take place only with the full and total consent of the people and Government of Gibraltar. We have a duty to make such points in our debate. If we did not, we would fail in our duty, in the light of the Select Committee report.

The Select Committee did a first-class job. The report shows the commitment of many Members of Parliament, irrespective of party, to Gibraltar and its people. That is how it should be. None of us should forget the role that Gibraltar played in the last war. Gibraltar is a Commonwealth country, and I and other hon. Members who are deeply committed to the Commonwealth see us as all being equal. It does not matter whether we live in a big Commonwealth country or a small one. The people of Gibraltar have a right to our support when they need it, and there are many current issues on which they need it. It is the British Government's duty to give them that support and to enter into proper consultation with them. Above all, they should make known to the Spanish Government the views of the Gibraltarian people, which, I regret to say, the British Government often fail to reflect.

3.37 pm

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): It is somewhat disconcerting to take part in a debate where all hon. Members are united in their views on the subject. Everyone who has spoken so far has referred to the issue of votes for Gibraltarians.

The hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) rightly drew our attention to the debates that we had in the House. At that time, many of us were anxious that Gibraltarians be given the vote for the previous European elections, not just the next ones. We felt that there was no impediment to that, and I remember putting to Ministers the same evidence that Michael Llamas, a barrister in Gibraltar, put to the European Court of Human Rights on behalf of Denise Matthews. I considered that evidence to be entirely coherent and sensible, and hon. Members know that it carried the day, for the court found in favour of Denise Matthews. The Government must do something to correct the situation.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) said, when the Government say that they are working hard on a solution, we begin to wonder who is running the show. It should not be a problem for the Government. They can do anything that they want, provided they have the determination. What is lacking is the political will to get on and do it quickly and give Gibraltarians the satisfaction of knowing that their views are represented properly and seriously in Parliament.

Hon. Members have referred to visits to Gibraltar on national day and I, too, have visited Gibraltar on national day. It is a most extraordinary experience. Where else in the world would we, as Members of Parliament, stand in front of 10,000 people who apparently hang on our every word? I was left in no doubt about their feelings about their country's future, which were expressed in a dramatic way and with obvious enthusiasm and with no apparent dissenting voices. The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) referred to the referendum in 1967, in which only 44 people voted against Gibraltar remaining British and it is true that Gibraltarians want to remain British.

The other theme that has run through today's debate is border delays. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling rightly said, the delays are contrived; a point that was reinforced by the comments of the hon. Member for Tooting. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for reminding us that delays are consistently of the order of 50 minutes. We have been reassured that the situation is under review, but I ask the Minister to confirm or deny that, when recently addressing an audience in Spain—it might have been in discussions with Ministers—he expressed the view that delays of an hour are acceptable. If the Minister did not say that, I am sure that he will tell us.

To my mind, such a delay is totally unacceptable, as are delays of 50 minutes. Those of us who know Gibraltar—I would imagine that we all do—see no reason for delays of more than a few moments, particularly given that, at certain times of the day, no one is waiting to cross the frontier. Nevertheless, delays are consistently contrived in an unreasonable way, regardless of the time and the press of people who want to cross the frontier.

Reference has been made to the part that Gibraltar has played in our history, not least during the second world war. We must consider the importance to this country of Gibraltar's strategic position and its potential as a strategic staging post for peacekeeping forces. The western community takes our forces to many parts of the world and many naval forces and air forces call in at Gibraltar, which is often 1,000 miles closer to the threat than the home bases. Our aircraft carrier force is now significantly reduced, and Gibraltar constitutes a static aircraft carrier at the entrance to the Mediterranean. In the light of the threats that we are now encountering, it also represents an important staging post for all warships and warplanes. There is no doubt that, when a naval task force was sent to the Adriatic or, more recently, to west Africa, Gibraltar proved a very important asset. That must never be forgotten.

When the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) introduced the debate, he said that the Matutes proposals must eventually be rejected. I question the use of the word "eventually". Many of us here this afternoon feel that the Matutes proposals should be rejected out of hand now. It is not acceptable for the proposals to hang like a sword of Damocles over Gibraltar when they should be struck out and we should proceed on a sounder basis.

One point that has not been raised in the debate is the question of cruise ships calling at Gibraltar. Perhaps the Minister can give us some up-to-date information on that. Cruise ships are becoming an important source of revenue to Gibraltar, which has been extremely successful in diversifying its economy since the time, not so long ago, when it was almost entirely dependent on the armed forces. Their contribution is comparatively tiny now.

In the meantime, the Gibraltarians, to their great credit, have diversified into financial services, and other areas. The same problems apply to cruise ships as apply to naval forces. Spain puts restrictions on where they can have called before calling at Gibraltar and where they may call when they leave. That makes it much more difficult for Gibraltar to attract cruise liners to their harbour. The cruise line agents will choose ports on either side of the straits of Gibraltar. This is a serious problem. The Gibraltarians have been successful so far in generating a reasonable amount of cruise business, but just think how much more that could be if these restrictions did not exist.

In relation to another limitation on the diversification that is so important to Gibraltar's economic prosperity, I must repeat the plea made by other right hon. and hon. Members; there must be an early resolution of the question of telephones. Businesses cannot operate today without adequate communications. The stranglehold that Spain is apparently imposing is totally unacceptable. Spain is our ally in NATO and our partner in the EU. It is time that we told Spain in no uncertain fashion how many beans make five. We should not be prepared to take no for an answer, as we have appeared to be in the past.

Finally, Madam Deputy Speaker, I come back to the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling. What did we get from Spain in exchange for allowing it to join the integrated command structure in NATO? We appear to have received absolutely nothing. Spain undoubtedly wanted to join the command structure and as we all know, as a consequence, the NATO flag has been hauled down in Gibraltar. That must have pleased Spain, for reasons that the Spanish understand better than I do. I am sure that it gave them some satisfaction. But what did we achieve in return for granting them membership of the integrated command structure? Will the Minister assure the House that Britain will not be such a soft touch in any future negotiations?

3.49 pm

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I have been to Gibraltar only once and that was as a member of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. I came to the matters covered in the report totally green and without preconceptions. I should like to offer to colleagues and to people outside the Chamber a few brief observations.

The first is the powerful sense of community identity in Gibraltar. People there truly feel a sense of community and that must be fundamental to our thinking and consideration at either ministerial or parliamentary level. The second is a robust internal democracy, which has allowed full debate on the whole panoply of democratic issues in a small community.

I do not want to go over ground covered by my hon. Friends the Members for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) and for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) and by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley), who made a typically forceful contribution in analysing the changes of the past 12 months and the absence of progress on key issues. I shall therefore not cover European election or NATO issues.

The report is not simplistic, populist or instinctive, but well reasoned. Furthermore, a consensus on issues such as this is precious, so Ministers should take it seriously. Not all contributions so far have sufficiently recognised the Government's success and achievements over the past 12 months in key respects that were a serious source of concern 12 months ago. I recall getting bogged down in the detail of issues such as the functioning of Gibraltar within the single market, postboxing, justice and home affairs in the context of the Schengen agreement and so forth. Those are meaty parts of our report.

To make a gentle criticism of the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling, who concentrated on key points where progress had not been made, we should properly acknowledge that the Government's patient diplomacy and the creation of political relationships with their Spanish opposite numbers has achieved considerable progress. Many concerns—about financial services and Gibraltar suffering from the negative elements of belonging to the European Union without reaping the benefits—have begun to be worked through and resolved. Real progress has been made, particularly regarding Schengen and issues of justice and home affairs.

The work done by my hon. Friend the Minister of State and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary in developing contacts and warm relationships with Spanish opposite numbers is an important contribution to British-Spanish relationships and to relationships in Europe. However, that must never occur at the expense of Gibraltar's interests. We are right to remain vigilant about that and to act as a democratic watchdog over the development of British-Spanish relationships, which must never sacrifice key Gibraltar interests. I supported the report's use of the term "special duty of care" regarding Gibraltar, particularly in the context of the European Union but, in any case, because it remains a dependent territory. It is not an independent state, so we have a special and particular responsibility for it.

Before I move on to border issues, will my hon. Friend explain another change that has occurred over the past 12 months and which has not been mentioned in any speech today? I refer to the interesting change of appointment of the governor. I make no criticisms of the new governor, though it is a change not just of personnel, but of policy or approach. The previous governor was a high-profile political appointment. Richard Luce and I had some great debates and arguments over the years, but it was nevertheless a clear decision of the Government of the day to make a political appointment because they considered that the status of the governor in that context was a matter of high politics. I do not impugn in any way the ability of the new governor, who I am sure is very competent, but the decision to change the character of the post requires explanation. Perhaps when my hon. Friend the Minister winds up he will explain the thinking behind the change.

I do not come to this debate with any hostile views about British-Spanish relationships, or with any gung-ho or chauvinistic instincts about Gibraltar, Britain and Spain. I make my final observations more in sorrow than in anger. The way in which the Spanish authorities treat people at the border is a disgrace and is utterly unacceptable. Sadly, the problem is not just the inconvenience or the frustration for people, but the abuse of administrative power and bureaucracy for a political purpose. That is the serious point.

[Mr. Ted Rowlands]

I shall choose my words carefully here. You and I, Madam Deputy Speaker, were in the House when Greece, Spain and Portugal were military dictatorships. The wonderful transformation of three autocratic societies into powerful modern democracies has taken place in our parliamentary lifetime. It is therefore extremely worrying to see such behaviour that is more about the old autocracy than the new democracy. Administrative and bureaucratic procedures are being used, about which citizens have no apparent rights of redress. Imagine if our Customs and Excise behaved in that way. The matter would immediately go before the parliamentary ombudsman. There would be questions in the House. There would be that instinctive, natural response in a representative democracy to deal with an abuse of citizens.

Along with other members of the Select Committee, I witnessed that petty bureaucratic behaviour. It was obviously being condoned. It was not being stopped. These were not the arbitrary actions of a couple of overzealous officers who were feeling liverish that day. It was a consistent approach. The evidence provided by the Gibraltar Government shows that it is clearly and methodically organised.

The adjustments in the time delays are a sad indication that this is not a local initiative but a considered administrative decision that is undemocratic and anti-democratic. One of the saddest aspects is that in Spain—a now-thriving democracy—no representatives stand up in the Cortez to condemn the nonsense that is taking place on the border. Many Spanish citizens suffer this bureaucratic abuse.

We cannot allow these issues to go on and on. The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling reminded us of the Select Committee's proposal concerning article 277. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock asked whether the Commission had responsibility. Of course it has; it has a fundamental responsibility. The centrepiece of the European Union is the freedom of movement. The obstruction of that freedom of movement is a blatant administrative and bureaucratic issue. The Commission certainly has responsibility, but so do Ministers.

It was with some concern, therefore, that I read the memorandum from the FCO, dated 22 May. Paragraph 12 states:

> Unwarranted delays at the border between Gibraltar and Spain continue. though waiting times for cars have fallen slightly since the Government's last report to the Committee—

4.1 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.16 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Rowlands: I have to put it on record, assuming that the suspension is now over, that I think it is discourteous of the Minister not to be present. My last few remarks were to have been personally directed to him, and I wanted him to reply specifically to the points that I am about to raise. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody): Order. I hope that the Minister will resume his seat.

Mr. Rowlands: I was about to make my final observations just before the Division bell rang. They were to be directed to my hon. Friend the Minister of State. I was about to draw to his attention the memorandum sent to the Select Committee on 22 May in his name. It stated:

> Unwarranted delays at the border between Gibraltar and Spain continue. though waiting times for cars have fallen slightly since the Government's last report to the Committee.

There is a difference of one Spanish minute, apparently. The memorandum went on to say:

> The Government remain in close touch with the Commission on the issue, and continue to press their concerns on Spain.

That language is wholly inappropriate to the situation that too many citizens of Gibraltar and others are facing. The final sentence states:

> Commissioner Vitorino has assured Mr. Vaz that the issue is under active consideration by the Commission.

I draw to my hon. Friend's attention the fact that those words have had the dust blown off them and, apart perhaps from a change in the name of the Commissioner, are identical to those put to us 12 months ago and, no doubt, 12 months before that. They are, therefore, an insufficient response to the situation. Will the Minister tell us what the Commissioner has done? Has he sent formal notes to the Spanish Government, asking for replies within a meaningful time scale? What have Ministers and our people in Madrid done? Have they formally submitted appropriate notes of the kind and character befitting the circumstances that still exist at the border?

I am perhaps rather more tolerant than some other hon. Members. A specific time scale should now be applied to the Commissioner's efforts. If, for example, within a month, there has been no meaningful response from the Spanish authorities to the Commissioner's work, it is the responsibility of Ministers and the Government to activate the article to which our report refers, which was put to my hon. Friend by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling. In other words, if the Commission and Her Majesty's Government cannot take appropriate action and receive a proper response from the Spanish authorities in a specific and narrow time scale, the powers available to us under the treaty should be exercised urgently.

I remind my hon. Friend the Minister again of what all those who served on the Select Committee agreed to—that Ministers and the House owe a special duty of care to the citizens of Gibraltar.

4.20 pm

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): I welcome the Foreign Affairs Committee's report on Gibraltar, which is important and timely, but there are concerns about whether Her Majesty's Government will stand firm in their discussions with the Spanish Government over the sovereignty issue. As we know, the Matutes proposals, which would have led to sovereignty of Gibraltar being transferred from Britain to Spain, have still not been withdrawn. That should be a major consideration. They should be withdrawn now if Spain wants to prove its worth as a good European partner. That would be a good starting point.

We want to know that the Government will recognise Gibraltar's continued right to self-determination. That is also important, and we need to hear that loud and clear today.

The garrotting of Gibraltar and its economy also concerns me. I cannot think of a better word than garrotting for the slow strangulation of Gibraltar and its people by Spain's bully-boy tactics. I want the Minister to look at the problems of border control. In case he wonders why somebody from Chorley is worried about border controls in Gibraltar, I shall explain. Some constituents of mine visited Gibraltar, enjoyed their day and were coming back across the border. Tragically, there was an incident with a fishing vessel: Spanish fishermen were fishing within Gibraltar's territorial waters. The border was closed. My constituents were trapped in the middle, in neither Gibraltar nor Spain. They were not allowed to go back into Gibraltar or on into Spain. They spent more than 12 hours at the border post. There was no hot food; there was no drinks machine. It was totally unacceptable.

Mrs. Robinson, my constituent, who had tragically lost her husband not long before, was having a holiday to get over that tragic death, and this is how badly she was treated. She asked for help and none was given. The Clayton family, who were with her, gave her support, but to this day we have not had an apology from the Spanish Government. The arrogance of the Spanish ambassador in London was diabolical. Mrs. Robinson and I were given an ignorant reply that said that it was Spain's right to close the border. That is not acceptable, nor is it the way to treat European passport holders. I believe that Spain should now apologise and offer compensation to my constituents. The tourism industry is adversely affected when such things are allowed to happen.

I do not know—the Minister will be able to help me—whether Spain's proposal of 50 minutes or an hour has been accepted. It is not acceptable. A maximum of five or 10 minutes is acceptable, and no more. A country such as Spain, which applied to join the European Union and did so, should not breach European law and treat people with European passports in the way that we see day after day. That must be ended.

Some may say that my gunboat diplomacy is not the way forward, but it is not gunboat diplomacy. It is a question of facts and of doing something about it. We have spent too long debating the issue and pussy-footing around with Spain. The time has come to be firm and strong, and to say to Spain, "Please recognise that you are a good European partner. The way to prove that is to accept European law."

Let us see an end to the queues. Obviously, issues of democracy and Europe are involved. We are lucky to be among that luckiest group of people who enjoy democracy. However, everyone should have certain basic rights. It is tragic that a British overseas territory should be denied the democratic right to vote in European elections. We enjoy democracy, and we have preached its benefits around the world. I hope that the Minister will ensure that people who are British passport holders have the same right to vote in European elections that we enjoy.

I recognise that time is short. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) said that people from Gibraltar could be elevated to the House of Lords. Several names spring to mind, but I shall not mention them. France and Spain have no problem offering democracy to their dependencies, and double standards seem to apply in this context. We should end such double standards—they are unacceptable.

The report is helpful because it focuses our minds on the need to make progress. The people of Hong Kong, which was an overseas territory, were let down when we took democracy away from it and gave it back to the Republic of China. Please, let us not do the same with Gibraltar. We should listen to the people of Gibraltar and respect their wishes and views. We let down the people of Hong Kong, but we must not do the same with the people of Gibraltar.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): I begin by thanking the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), for reminding us that Gibraltar provides us with a special duty of care and that Spain has made many unreasonable claims towards Gibraltar which he and his Committee members found to be generally unfounded.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), who worked assiduously with other Committee members on the report. He has since passed on the baton of membership of the Foreign Affairs Committee to me. I pay tribute to him for the work that he did—I hope that Committee members recognise that his work made a measured contribution to the Committee's tasks.

I want to discuss some of the speeches that were made today, and I shall begin with the speech that was made by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley). He set out clearly three salient points, to which I hope the Minister will respond. The first involved the issue of frontier delays. I shall not dwell on that, but it is clear that nothing practical has so far been achieved. A difference of 51 minutes compared with 52 minutes is, frankly, laughable. Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman discussed the use of Gibraltar by NATO for defence purposes. He clearly set out the British Government's inadequate response to Spain's efforts to hamper NATO's operations—I believe that he said that we were moving backwards rather than making progress. Thirdly, he said that the right of Gibraltarians to vote in European elections has been a long-running failure on the part of successive British Governments. Many other hon. Members who have spoken this afternoon also emphasised that.

The hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) made a powerful case about the failure to defend Gibraltar's special interests and to secure its representation in the European Union. He was ably supported in an impassioned manner by the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox). Both hon. Members made us think about the realities of the situation—people are being deprived of basic democratic rights in a part of the world that is sovereign to this country, that owes its allegiance to this country and that is owed a duty of care by this country. The relationship works both ways.

I turn to the report. We find ourselves in the strange, if not ludicrous, situation of having to debate a report by the Foreign Affairs Committee a year to the day after its publication. If a week is a long time in politics, surely a year is the better part of a lifetime.

Unsurprisingly, things have moved on. We welcome the agreement that was reached in April, although it made parts of the report somewhat dated, if not redundant. I hope that the Minister recognises that the report informed and guided the Government in their negotiations with Spain and the European Union. It is generally agreed that the negotiations resolved several of the Gibraltar-related issues in the European Union. However, the sovereignty of Gibraltar and the Gibraltarian aspiration towards self-determination are part of an exceptionally long-running affair.

It is unreasonable to expect to resolve disputes to the satisfaction of all parties in the short term—and, in some cases, that may never be possible. It is not tenable to argue that the fact that the territory of Gibraltar was achieved by force 300 years ago means that Gibraltar is an irrelevant detail of some distant part of our history. There is a tendency in our culture to reflect on the glories of our earlier conquests with a little too much enthusiasm. Who can blame the Royal Marines, who have a long association with my home county of Hampshire, for proudly bearing the name "Gibraltar" on their battle honours? I believe that that was the first such honour that they gained. It is part of their history that they were in the "van" that scaled the Rock by force of arms around 1700.

It is a fact of history that, in cases without number, the boundaries of nation states have been determined by conflict. In the majority of such cases, those boundaries have stood the test of time and remain intact today. We should make no apology for our history but, now that we are in the 21st century, we must deal with the issues that constrain the well-being and aspirations of the ordinary citizens of Gibraltar.

I am pleased to note that the Government of Gibraltar responded to our report in June—a few days ago—by agreeing to 18 out of our 23 recommendations. The other five recommendations were dealt with, to an extent, in the agreement that the Government announced in April. Those common-sense arrangements are in the interests of Spain, Gibraltar, the United Kingdom and the European Union. That demonstrates that without raising the issue of sovereignty, it is possible to make significant progress. Previous speakers have already pointed out that as Gibraltar's defence role has declined, its role as an offshore financial services centre has increased.

Our debate so far has not highlighted the fact that Gibraltar is the gateway between north Africa and Europe and that it has a vital role to play in the fight against trans-frontier crime in that region. It is in our interests, and those of Spain and the rest of the European Union, to give full support to Gibraltar's commitment to combat the cross-border drugs trade, smuggling and other criminal acts.

Previous speakers have already referred to the scandal of the restriction of Gibraltar's telephone services. For four years, the Gibraltarian Government have been unable to comply with the European Union telephone liberalisation directives, for three reasons. First, Spain refuses to recognise Gibraltar's international dialling code. Secondly, Spain will not allocate to Gibraltar more than 30,000 numbers in the Spanish telephone system. Thirdly, Spain has prevented Gibraltar's mobile phone network from being granted roaming facilities with Spain. In other words, the Gibraltarian mobile phone network is cut off from the rest of Europe's facility of interchange between the networks.

We know that Gibraltar is an expanding financial centre, the continued growth and development of which is a key aspect of the success of its economy. One of the fundamental necessities of a modern economy based on financial services is robust and expanding access to e-commerce.

The Government are on record as saying that the future of our economy is linked precisely and aggressively with the way in which we develop e-commerce, yet they have done nothing to provide Gibraltar with access to the new economies of the 21st century, despite their awareness of its economy's dependence on that access. I hope that the Minister will acknowledge the seriousness of that problem to the Gibraltarians. Without access to modern electronic communications, Gibraltar's economy will be shackled and will face decline in the 21st century.

It is not good enough for the Government to pass the buck to the European Commission, with the matter to be decided as a private complaint. They must not only take all possible steps under the treaties to ensure that a determination is made by the European Commission without further delay, but be proactive in taking all possible steps bilaterally with Spain, so as to ensure that the issue is resolved. There is a major stumbling block to the future economic growth of Gibraltar and consequently to the well-being of Gibraltarian citizens.

Bilateral intergovernmental negotiations are essential, but so are regional level discussions—with the Government of Gibraltar and its agencies and with Seville and its agencies. Their common interests in the development of the region mean that national negotiations must be supplemented by regional dialogue and policy initiatives.

The airport arrangements must be reconsidered. Hon. Members have referred to several incidents highlighting the disgraceful way in which flights into Gibraltar can be hindered by the Spanish authorities. I hope that the Minister will tell us that there has been progress in that respect. The dual mandate plan was rejected, but surely another model can be pursued. For example, the Mulhouse airport arrangements on the Swiss border allow for the sharing of sovereignty.

Gibraltarian representation in the European Parliament remains a major outstanding issue. The Government must admit that they let the Gibraltarians down at Amsterdam. The effective Spanish veto over Gibraltarians' basic human right of representation is not only unfortunate, but unacceptable. The Government must ensure that during any further treaty negotiations, such as at Nice in December, the effects of treaty changes on the Gibraltarians must be considered and must be a priority for consultation and agreement. That is not to say that Gibraltar should be an overriding priority and that the British veto should automatically be wielded at the first hint of trouble, but the Government cannot allow Spain to hold all the cards.

We would probably all conclude, rather pessimistically, that constitutional talks on the future of Gibraltar's sovereignty are unlikely to make much progress in the foreseeable future. The positions of the Spanish Government and those of Gibraltar and the UK are too far apart. It is therefore better to take steps to regularise Gibraltar's status in the European Union—and NATO, bearing in mind the points that have been raised today—so that the Gibraltarians are not prejudiced as a result of their historical allegiances in a Europe that is trying hard to turn its back on its fractious past. That must be the Government's objective, to be pursued with diligence and commitment.

During today's debate, right hon. and hon. Members from all parties have expressed their deep frustration, and even anger, at the Government's apparent disinterest in Gibraltar. They seem to regard the matter as a little historical difficulty that is consigned to the margins of current negotiations. That simply will not do.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): I wholeheartedly welcome the debate and the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee, under the distinguished chairmanship of the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson). The report pointed up deficiencies in the British Government's current stance towards Gibraltar, and I can only hope that the situation improves.

May I begin by genuinely complimenting all hon. Members who have participated in this afternoon's debate? There have been speeches of real passion and force. I cite in particular the robust speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley) on NATO and Spanish obligations of membership, and the issue of voting rights. That issue was also discussed by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill), and—most eloquently—by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay).

The report concluded that > there have been occasions in the past when the British defence of Gibraltarian interests has not been as robust as it should have been.

I am afraid that the Secretary of State's response to that statement was not encouraging. He said that the Committee had been unable to produce examples of a lack of robustness on the Government's part, yet several such examples are clearly cited in the report. Many have been mentioned this afternoon, and I shall refer to some in my brief remarks.

I, too, welcome the recent Anglo-Spanish agreement, particularly given that its contents were welcomed by the representatives and people of Gibraltar. I also welcome the unblocking of business and the Secretary of State's categorical assurance that the agreement fully upholds Gibraltar's constitutional position. However, the Government of Gibraltar have expressed concern at Gibraltar's exclusion from the Schengen information system. As the Chief Minister has made clear, this concern is based less on the practical importance of the system to Gibraltar than the principle that, under pressure from Spain, it should not be excluded against its will from any EU measure. Perhaps the Minister could comment on that principle.

The common thread running through the findings of the report is that the Government must be unequivocal about their commitment to the wishes of Gibraltar's residents. I want to make it clear to the Minister that any equivocation makes it more difficult, not less, to engage in constructive dialogue with Spain, because it encourages the belief that a possible tranche of concessions is in the offing. The objective of British Government policy should be to respond to the wishes of Gibraltarians.

One way in which the Government could demonstrate their good faith in this respect is to reject outright the Matutes proposals on joint sovereignty and, in line with the Committee's recommendation, to do so now. The proposals were tabled in December 1997, but I am told that they remain in the Foreign Secretary's in-tray. Ministers will respond by saying that they will be dealt with at the next meeting of the Brussels process, so I have two questions for the Minister.

First, will he now endorse again Sir Malcolm Rifkind's rejection of the earlier informal joint sovereignty proposals? Secondly, if the Minister still feels that he cannot comment on such a fundamental issue outside the confines of a Brussels process meeting, can he tell the Chamber when the next meeting is due to take place, so that the uncertainty can be ended? Such constitutional issues are not the only ones on which this Government's approach might be described as less than robust.

One year ago, the Select Committee described the delays at the Spanish border as > unacceptable and wholly inappropriate between two parts of the EU.

The on-going delays, as many hon. Members have said, are no less unacceptable 12 months later. If relations are being normalised, why do such delays continue? They inhibit the free movement of people and put Spain in direct breach of its EU obligations. The Foreign Secretary told the Committee that the Government continued to press Spain to act, but the Government's approach does not seem to be having the desired effect.

The Committee urged the Government to initiate proceedings against Spain under article 227 if the Commission was unwilling to take swift action. The then shadow Foreign Secretary supported that call. One year of border delays later, the Government say that the situation is kept under review. Is it not time to do more than simply review? Have discussions on the issue taken place with the new Spanish Foreign Minister? What progress is being made, and why did the recent agreement not refer to action on border delays?

We must consider the crucial issue of the right to vote, for which hon. Members have forcefully expressed support this afternoon. Gibraltarians are the only EU citizens who cannot vote in or stand for European parliamentary elections. In February 1999, the European Court of Human Rights decided that the United Kingdom had violated the European convention on that issue. That ruling contrasts with the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1978, which says that Gibraltarians cannot vote as UK citizens in European Parliament elections. Which option will the Government choose? Can the Minister give a categorical assurance that full enfranchisement will be in place by the next European elections in 2004, as the Committee recommends? The overwhelming majority of people in Gibraltar wish to vote in an English constituency. Will the Minister respect their wishes?

I welcome the appointment of my colleagues Lord Bethell, Roy Perry and Dr. Charles Tannock as Gibraltar's representatives in the European Parliament, following a unanimous vote in the Gibraltar legislature. They have tirelessly advocated Gibraltar's interests, like many hon. Members across the party divide.

In the time available, I can touch only briefly on some remaining concerns of Gibraltarians. Other hon. Members have already discussed the issues eloquently. The House will be aware of the Government's U-turn in December 1997 on protecting Gibraltar's interests when discussing the NATO command structure. The Committee said:

> We regard it as extraordinary that Spain was allowed to join the integrated military structure of NATO while imposing restrictions on the military movement of one of its partners in the Alliance.

That was a missed negotiating opportunity. What progress is being made to make Spain lift those unwelcome restrictions?

The Committee rightly mentioned future potential in the use of Gibraltar's airport. The Foreign Secretary said that the airport's situation would not change without consultation with the Government of Gibraltar. Can the Minister assure the House that the Government of Gibraltar would have to consent before any change took place?

Finally, I shall deal with the telephone codes. The Spanish attitude to the 350 code and the mobile network could cause serious long-term damage to the Gibraltarian economy. Does the Minister consider that to be another issue on which action can be taken through the EU to ensure that Spain meets its obligations?

The residents of Gibraltar have expressed concern about the Government's stance on several issues. We debate Gibraltar all too seldom. We have close and sound relations with Spain and the links between our countries are strong and enduring. Spain is a success story, and I applaud the role that it plays so fully in NATO and the European family of nations. However, I trust that the Minister will not issue bland assurances about the vital issue of Gibraltar's future, but will acknowledge and respond to the legitimate concerns of the people of Gibraltar—our friends and fellow Commonwealth members for whom we indeed have a special duty of care.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Keith Vaz): As this is today's only foreign affairs debate, I am sure that the whole House would want to join me in saying how shocked and saddened we were to hear of the death this morning of Brigadier Stephen Saunders and to send his family our deep condolences.

I am pleased to respond to the debate on the Foreign Affairs Committee's report on Gibraltar. I know how seriously the Committee takes its responsibilities and I am aware of the depth of interest in Gibraltar, which is borne out by requests for updates to the Government's response to the report and by the continual correspondence that I receive from hon. Members on issues affecting Gibraltar.

I agree with the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) that we have had an excellent debate and that all who participated spoke with passion and knowledge. My hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) said that he wants to be remembered for the word "Gibraltar". I thought that he was a Member for Swansea, but he is obviously a Member for Swansea and Gibraltar. We in government will do our best to do justice to the sentiments, emotion, passion and, indeed, logic of what right hon. and hon. Members have said today.

I am privileged to have Gibraltar among my portfolio of countries. I paid my first visit there as the responsible Minister in May this year and held several useful meetings. I had discussions with Mr. Caruana, the Chief Minister of the Government of Gibraltar; with our new governor, David Durie; and with Opposition leaders. I enjoyed walking down the high street and meeting many of Gibraltar's citizens, to whose concerns I listened. I found it a prospering and thriving place.

All right hon. and hon. Members who have visited Gibraltar will know that it is a special place—so special that it can unite, for the first time in my parliamentary lifetime, my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) and the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill). We must obviously cherish the place. Gibraltar has a flourishing people and a flourishing press, especially the excellent Gibraltar Chronicle. The only person I did not meet while I was there was Mr. Albert Poggio, who was in London. There will for ever be a part of Britain that is Gibraltar, in the shape of Mr. Poggio.

As the formal response to the report makes clear, the Government are strongly committed to our relationship with Gibraltar and its people. We view that relationship as a partnership, with all that that implies in terms of responsibilities and obligations. There can be no dilution of the British Government's commitment to Gibraltar as set out in the preamble to the 1969 constitution.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) spoke with his customary passion. He used the example of his visit to Argentina and his conversations there about the Falkland Islands to argue that our commitment to Gibraltar is less strong than our commitments elsewhere. Let me reassure him and the House that Her Majesty's Government will never—and I mean never—enter into arrangements under which the people of Gibraltar would pass under the sovereignty of another state against their freely and democratically expressed wishes. I want to make that absolutely clear.

I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that, and that I shall not need to repeat it. That was and remains our view.

Mr. Chidgey: In that case, will the Government reject the Matutes proposals?

Mr. Vaz: I will come on to the Matutes proposals, which many people raised during my visit to Gibraltar and subsequently Spain. We will study the proposals and respond to them. They are part of the Brussels process. However, they must be consistent with the statement that I have just made, which is crystal clear.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting mentioned the referendum in which 44 people voted against remaining linked to the United Kingdom. I am sure that people are still looking for those 44 people. He asked whether I believed that the number voting against would be even lower now. That was an emphatic vote. We can play with statistics, but we cannot argue with them, and those statistics are absolutely clear. In answer to the question asked by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), we will respond to the proposals when the time is right. When that response is made, the Brussels process will continue, but we shall respond in our own time, considering the situation carefully and consulting constantly.

One feature of the new arrangements was the constant communication between my officials in the Foreign Office, Peter Caruana and the Spanish Government, despite the two elections that intervened. Mr. Caruana won an election in Gibraltar, and Mr. Aznar won an election in Spain. Discussions should take place privately. However, if hon. Members are under any misapprehension, I can reassure them that such matters are discussed all the time. When Mr. Caruana responded on the issue of cruise ships, there was an immediate response from the Foreign Office and an immediate telephone call to Madrid. That process is on-going and important in ensuring that we keep to our responsibilities.

As hon. Members know, the Government are responsible for promoting and upholding Gibraltar's interests in the European Union and other international forums. We have a keen interest in Gibraltar's economic well-being and strongly support its efforts to achieve a diversified and sustainable economy. During my visit, I was pleased to see what the Government are doing, the amount of private sector involvement and the enormous growth in the tourism industry, which is benefiting the people of Gibraltar greatly.

However, it is clear that building a constructive relationship with Spain is an important factor in Gibraltar's well-being. Trust, co-operation and dialogue remain the basis for progress. That is how we managed to achieve so much in our recent discussions. As I said, the arrangements announced by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on 19 April followed intensive discussions with Gibraltar and Spain. They deal with a range of issues that involve or affect Gibraltar throughout the European Union. The arrangements constitute an important package for Gibraltar, the United Kingdom and our EU partners. They also show the progress that can be made through quiet diplomacy, dialogue and co-operation.

We have been helped enormously by input from right hon. and hon. Members who have an interest in Gibraltar and by the report produced by the Foreign Affairs Committee. Hon. Members should be in no doubt about how seriously we view that report and how much it has helped us to achieve our successes.

The arrangements deal with a number of concerns, which found expression in the Committee's report. They resolve the long-standing problems over the designation and role of Gibraltar competent authorities in the European Union. The arrangements mean that the Gibraltar financial services industry can enjoy the benefits of passporting its insurance and banking services into the member states of the European Economic Area. Furthermore, they will make reformatted Gibraltar ID cards acceptable as valid travel documents within the EU. They have led to the adoption by the Home Secretary and his Spanish counterpart of a framework for co-operation between the Spanish and Gibraltarian police and pave the way for the adoption at the May Justice and Home Affairs Council of the United Kingdom's application to join part of the Shengen acquis. Gibraltar will participate in the same elements of the Shengen acquis as the UK, with the exception of the Shengen information system and provisions on cross-border surveillance.

No one has claimed that these arrangements resolve all, or even most, of the outstanding issues affecting Gibraltar within the EU, let alone the bilateral issues between Spain, the UK and Gibraltar. I also know that the apparent lack of movement on border restrictions since the package was announced has caused disappointment and frustration in Gibraltar and in the House, although the border issue itself, did not feature in the talks.

Mr. Donald Anderson: Did my hon. Friend refer to the apparent lack of movement on the border issue?

Mr. Vaz: I will come more fully to the important border issue because many right hon. and hon. Members have mentioned it. I am referring to what we discussed and that issue was not included. I have been to the border and I have a sense of what is going on there and I will come to it. I ask my hon. Friend to be patient. The fact that the arrangements do not include any reference to the border problems does not reduce their value. On the contrary, they are a demonstration of the Government's determination to seek solutions to Gibraltar-related problems that protect Gibraltar's interests. I hope that it will be possible to build on the more constructive atmosphere that the arrangements have helped to create. I should like to place on record my appreciation of the role that the Chief Minister of Gibraltar played to help bring about the successful adoption of the arrangements.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock and other hon. Members said that Mr. Caruana has not met my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. That is not true. They were introduced by none other than the ubiquitous Mr. Poggio earlier this year. Obviously that dialogue is important. I have invited Mr. Caruana to come to the UK officially to continue our fruitful and constructive dialogue. He happens to have attended Ratcliffe college, which is just outside my constituency. I have invited him to return to his old school. I also congratulated him on taking a lead from our Prime Minister: his son, James Thomas Caruana, was born shortly before I arrived in Gibraltar.

We have an excellent relationship with the Gibraltar Government. That dialogue will continue. I cannot promise you now to arrange a meeting between the Prime Minister and the Chief Minister but I can assure you that it will happen at an appropriate time, as it happened earlier this year.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It is kind of the Minister to give me these assurances, but they would be better given to the Chamber.

Mr. Vaz: I do indeed give them to the Chamber, Madam Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) asked about the appointment of the new governor. David Durie is an excellent choice. It does not in anyway represent a different strategy in dealing with Gibraltar. He has settled in well and developed good links. As someone who knows the European Union extremely well, having served for some time in UKRep in Brussels as a deputy to the current permanent under-secretary in the Foreign Office, I believe that he is uniquely placed to help with these discussions and the on-going dialogue. We must use the expertise of the governor, working with the Chief Minister and the United Kingdom Government, to deal with difficulties.

The hon. Member for Swansea, East and every hon. Member who has spoken today have mentioned the border delays. During my visit to Gibraltar last month I saw the border situation for myself and talked to a number of those affected by the delays. I know that it is an issue of concern to the Select Committee and I acknowledge that it has been raised constructively in the report and in the Chamber today. Having gone to the border with Mr. Caruana, spoken to more than a dozen people who were sitting in their cars waiting to cross the border and looked at what the Spanish authorities were doing when the cars got to the border, I assure hon. Members that it was a concern. That is why I raised it with my Spanish counterpart when I saw him in Madrid. Such concerns are raised on every appropriate occasion by officials in the Foreign Office with their Spanish counterparts. Clearly, if one does not take a car across the border, one is not delayed, and if one takes a moped, one is not delayed, but a person who wants to drive a car between the two areas is delayed.

We have told the Spanish authorities that we understand their need to search and check, but the time spent must be proportionate to what they are trying to do so that people are not inconvenienced and distressed. It is in nobody's interests for people to be inconvenienced. The hon. Member for Ludlow asked whether I said in Spain at a reception or a meeting that I thought that a delay of an hour was acceptable. I certainly did not. Anyone who knows me will know that I consider that a delay of even five minutes in a car, or wherever it is, to be unacceptable. Therefore, of course we did not say that.

A graph has been produced of the time that cars take to cross the border, and I showed it to my Spanish counterpart. What have we done about it? My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock was harsh on me and said, "It's all very well having these graphs and statistics, but what are you doing about it?" We have raised it with the Spanish officials, I raised it with Commissioner Vitorino when he came to London, it has been raised with him in Brussels and it is under active consideration by the Commission. We have made it clear that, on the basis of good will alone, Spain should cut the time that it takes to cross. We have said to Spain, "You have completed these arrangements. What is the point of making it such an issue?" We have made that point on behalf of the citizens of Gibraltar in our discussions with the Spanish authorities and with the commissioner.

Mr. Rowlands: As I and other hon. Members have pointed out, the words "concern" and "active consideration" were used twelve months ago and earlier. What specific action is being taken by the Commission now? Has notice been served on the Spanish authorities? What response did my hon. Friend have to the concerns that he expressed to his Spanish counterpart? I ask whether he had a response saying, "Yes, we will reduce the time. We are planning it. We are reorganising our border arrangements to achieve the minimum time." What has happened and is happening to deal with those concerns and active considerations?

Mr. Vaz: The words "active consideration" by the Commission should sound like words of praise to some hon. Members here, such as the hon. Member for Ludlow. We have made it clear that we expect the Commission to act. As a result of the debate, I will write again to Commissioner Vitorino to remind him in forceful terms of the concerns expressed here today and of my recent visit to Gibraltar and Spain. I shall re-emphasise what we have been saying. My hon. Friend is absolutely right: something must happen. However, there is a danger in talking about figures—and in saying what is acceptable and what is not—that those criteria suddenly become a bare minimum and even though it would not be necessary to reach that minimum, those who search the vehicles would seek to do so. That is why we use the word "proportionate".

When I went to Gibraltar with Peter Caruana and poked my face through the fence—with television cameras and a reporter from the Gibraltar Chronicle present—the cars suddenly went through very quickly. To those hon. Members who say that the only reason the delay was affected was that the Minister of State was visiting, I say that, when I was at the border, people went through very rapidly. However, I am not saying that I would like to go and stand there every week in order to sort out the problem.

As a result of what hon. Members have said today, I shall write again because this is something of which the Commissioner needs to be reminded. It will be appropriate for me to do so, because I have just visited Gibraltar and I can send him the photographs that we took of the waiting cars and ask for action to be taken. However, let us not say what is acceptable and what is not, because if one asked the average citizen sitting in the queue at the border, he or she would say that a delay of five minutes was unacceptable. One must be proportionate.

Mr. Hoyle: What is acceptable and what is not should be spelled out clearly. Words and letters are fine, but at the end of the day they will not change the situation. What will happen if this continues?

Mr. Vaz: I have made it clear that we are concerned about the matter. I have raised it with the Spanish Minister for Europe, who is aware of what we are saying. We will take action and write again. I shall also write to the Select Committee, following the action that we have taken, to explain what we have done. I cannot say to my hon. Friend now that, as a result of my letter, the whole situation will be resolved—if only every problem on earth were capable of being resolved by a letter from a Minister of State. That is clearly not going to happen so we must keep up the pressure and remind people of the difficulties that are being faced.

Mr. Gill: Further to the intervention by the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle), the Minister will be aware that some tough bargaining must take place later in the year. Is he prepared to say whether Her Majesty's Government will drive a hard bargain in Nice to obtain some satisfaction on this problem, which has gone on for so long? That is how the European Union works; by bargaining and counter-bargaining and by giving something away to get something else. We despair of any satisfaction being achieved by any means other than hard bargaining. Letter-writing and meetings do not seem to be delivering what we require.

Mr. Vaz: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman now feels that there is some use for European Council meetings and that we can discuss these matters and move forward. I am pleased about that, because I have read a number of his speeches on Europe and he is often critical of the effectiveness of those organisations.

I am not drawing up the agenda for Nice. We are about to approach the Feira European Council meeting, and I do not know what its agenda will be. However, I do not have to wait until the meeting in Nice to write the letter. It will be written as soon as this debate is over, and we shall make sure that the Committee is made aware of what is happening. The Commissioner has been to see me to discuss the matter. He is a man of integrity and also a lawyer, although I am not sure whether he is one of those expensive lawyers to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock referred. He knows the law, and he knows what needs to be done. That is why I can say that the matter continues to be under active consideration.

Sir John Stanley: Before the Minister leaves this key issue, will he tell the Chamber whether the Government are willing, in principle, to use the article 227 power that they possess, and if so, when?

Mr. Vaz: We always consider any means of fulfilling our agenda, but the hon. Gentleman knows that it is a matter for the Commission. We will continue to focus on that issue in our discussions with the Commission.

Mr. Donald Anderson: Essentially, the Minister is saying that there has been no progress on the issue. He has given an undertaking to keep the Committee in touch with developments. Does that mean that he will write to us? I have not spoken to colleagues on the Committee, but I anticipate that there will be some demand for the Minister to come before them to report, after a reasonable period.

Mr. Vaz: I always look forward to my visits to the Committee, and I shall be happy to go before it. Perhaps, "happy" is going too far, but I shall certainly respond to any letter from my hon. Friend, asking me to report to the Committee.

I must move on to other matters that have been raised, including, in particular, the issue of votes in elections for the European Parliament. The right of Gibraltarians to vote in European parliamentary elections is a matter of concern to the Committee, the House and the Government. The Government's commitment to secure the EP vote for Gibraltar is not in question. We tabled proposals in Brussels, during consideration of the common electoral principles dossier, and we will continue to work hard to secure consensus among our EU partners to give Gibraltarians the right to vote in European parliamentary elections. All EU member states should, as a matter of principle, help us to implement the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock asked why we contested the Matthews case, employing expensive lawyers to do so. The principles went beyond the simplistic conclusion. The case dealt with elections to a supra-national legislature, not just the legislatures of individual countries, so it was important to test the principle before the highest court. Within a month of the decision in the Matthews case, we put forward amendments to the 1976 Act. I was asked by the hon. Member for West Suffolk whether Gibraltarians will vote in the 2004 elections. I do not know, and I cannot answer him today. However, I can say that the Government will work extremely hard to ensure that they get the chance. We will do everything that we can to make it happen, but hon. Members know that we need the agreement of other member states to achieve it.

There is also the issue of whether people will have to vote in Spain. I have my own views on the matter, but I will not announce today where the polling stations will be. Such matters need to be considered carefully, to ensure that the people of Gibraltar feel that they are actively involved in the election campaign. That is crucial.

Mr. Mackinlay: We have now exposed the supine approach taken by the Government and the flaws in their legal and political thinking. The Committee does not accept that this is a matter for our European partners, although we might approach them as a matter of courtesy. It is an important issue of sovereignty and the Government are wrong about it. The issue is for us exclusively.

Is the Minister relying on the opinion, given by Baroness Symons in 1998, that the United Kingdom is constrained without the consent of our partners through annexe 2 of the 1976 Act? If that is what the Government are arguing this afternoon, why are they not raising it at the intergovernmental conference? I asked the Foreign

[Mr. Mackinlay]

Secretary in Committee yesterday, and he said that it was inappropriate. The Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Minister of State, who is here today, cannot have it both ways. If they are saying that there is an impediment under the treaty, which I do not accept, they have an obligation to raise it as a substantive issue at the intergovernmental conference and to say that it is a matter on which we shall stick.

Mr. Vaz: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the legal advice that he has just tendered. On balance, I prefer to accept the legal advice that has been given to me up to now.

Mr. Mackinlay: Which is consistently wrong.

Mr. Vaz: My hon. Friend says so, but if he feels that it is wrong, I should be more than happy to study the legal testaments and texts that he puts before me and to consider that. I am talking about principles, and the Government are talking about principles. There is a decision of the European Court of Human Rights that is binding on this country. We want to implement it, ensuring that it happens as quickly as possible, which is why we tabled an amendment to the 1976 Act within a month of the Matthews judgment. We may have contested that judgment, but we accept it, and now it is up to colleagues and member states. It cannot be discussed. The Foreign Secretary is absolutely right. He would not expect me to say that he was not, but he is right.

The intergovernmental conference has a short and focused agenda: it is discussing specific points to do with enlargement. [Interruption.] With the greatest respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock, I have been involved in these processes and have attended the meetings, and I can tell him that it has a specific, focused agenda. I know that he is concerned and distressed about these matters and I assure him that we are doing our best to ensure that this matter is dealt with. I want to see the Matthews judgment acted upon, which is why we acted so quickly.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) rose—

Mr. Vaz: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman for the last time, because I want to cover telecommunications and the airport. I would not want right hon. and hon. Members to say that I had not dealt with their points.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful to the Minister. Specifically on the right of Gibraltarians to vote, can the Minister take back this proposition to his colleagues in the Government? If there is not agreement by a time that allows implementation well before the next European election, we should legislate to ensure that we give Gibraltarians the right to vote. We would, therefore, conform with the convention and the judgment. If the European Union thinks that we are in breach, let it take the United Kingdom Government to court, as it is entitled to do, but we have a duty to honour the court's judgment and a duty to the people of Gibraltar.

Mr. Vaz: The hon. Gentleman's legal advice is that of a trained lawyer. I am not saying that it is better than that of my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock, but it is interesting. His opinion is that we should go ahead, if necessary breaking European Union law—[Hon. Members: "No."]—and wait for it to take us to court. I am sorry: that is what I thought he said.

Let me tell the hon. Gentleman and the Chamber that we shall study these matters carefully. We do not want to disenfranchise the people of Gibraltar. We are seriously focused on this issue and will take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that the judgment is implemented. We live in a democracy. We want to make sure that people participate in elections. That is why we, as elected politicians, knock on people's doors and ask them to vote for us. Of course we want the people of Gibraltar to vote as quickly as possible. We will take the necessary steps, but we will not act unlawfully.

We thank hon. Members for what they have said and for the legal interpretations that they have suggested, and we know that they mean them genuinely, but we must act, and shall act, within the law.

Sir John Stanley: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way on a point on which I asked for a specific response from him in my contribution, to which he has just responded. He will recall that I asked him for an assurance that in European elections the people of Gibraltar would be able to vote in Gibraltar. I imagined that it would be the easiest possible assurance for him to give. Is he aware that I, and I think other hon. Members, are utterly appalled by his reply and his equivocation on that fundamental point? May I offer him one more opportunity to give this Chamber the absolute assurance that the Government's policy for European elections is to allow the people of Gibraltar to vote in Gibraltar?

Mr. Vaz: I have not equivocated on that matter. I have enormous sympathy with what the right hon. Gentleman said. I agree that it is an important and fundamental principle and that we need to study the issue alongside the question of how the people of Gibraltar are enfranchised. I cannot announce today where the polling stations will be. I can say that these matters are serious and fundamental and must be dealt with carefully.

Mr. Rowlands: I am sorry, but I want to follow up the point made by the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Sir J. Stanley). The Minister has repeated what he said earlier—that he could not comment on the simple question of whether, if the people of Gibraltar have a right to vote, there will be polling stations in Gibraltar for them to vote in. I want the Minister to get up and say that when these matters are resolved, polling booths will be placed in Gibraltar.

Mr. Vaz: I have made my position clear. My hon. Friend and others want me to announce exactly where the polling booths will be, but I have put forward a clear principle that we want the people of Gibraltar to vote in the next European parliamentary elections. I have enormous sympathy with the points made by hon. Members, but I cannot go beyond what I have just said.

Mr. Hoyle: How would my hon. Friend feel if the people of Scotland had to vote in Wales? We are asking only for clarification. Will the polling stations be in Gibraltar? People in Scotland would not be expected to travel to Wales to vote. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Vaz: I have made my position clear. I cannot make an announcement today—before the 1976 Act is amended—about where the polling stations will be located. Asking me to do so is asking me to go beyond what I have said. I am not taking any more interventions, because I have answered the point and I want to move on to discuss other matters.

Mr. Spring: On that point, will the Minister give way?

Mr. Vaz: With respect, the hon. Gentleman does not know what the point is. No, I am going to move on to telecommunications. This is an important debate that covers several subjects. I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members would want me to proceed.

Telecommunications was another issue brought to my attention when I visited Gibraltar. The allocation of telephone numbers in Gibraltar was raised by Mr. Caruana and many officials on my visit. Although the Government have no formal locus in the case brought to the Commission by Gibraltar telephone companies, we have long pressed the Commission to bring about a speedy resolution of it. The shortage of numbers is now acute and we are in close touch with the Gibraltar Government about it. I have already spoken about my discussion with Mr. Caruana and I also raised the issue with my Spanish counterpart in Madrid. I asked him to look again at the problem, which is causing concern, and he promised to do so.

Clearly, Gibraltar is running out of telephone numbers. Mr. Caruana told me that there were only 30 telephone numbers left to be allocated. The request put by the Gibraltar Government to the Spanish Government was for an extra 10 million telephone lines—to deal not just with current, but with potential, usage. It is bizarre that in the year 2000, when so much is said about e-commerce, and the modernisation and globalisation of telecommunications systems, a place such as Gibraltar should be faced with this problem. That is why we raised it and asked for it to be dealt with as a priority issue. It cannot be right for no progress to be made.

The report rightly identified the airport as a key area for potential co-operation to the benefit of the people of Gibraltar and the neighbouring area. As with the border issue, the airport and EU aviation issues were not covered in the recent discussions with Spain and Gibraltar. However, all involved know that the Government are interested in making progress on that matter. We will continue to examine the possibilities for taking the matter forward in close co-operation with the Government of Gibraltar.

I saw the difficulties experienced at the airport. Hon. Members who have flown into Gibraltar will know that, at some point after landing, one can see people crossing the runway to get nearer to the border. I, for one, wondered what those people were doing. It is important to have a modern airport and that issue must be resolved in full consultation with the Government of Gibraltar. That point was put to me many times during my visit. Members of the private sector, including the chairman of GB Airways, urged me to obtain progress as soon as possible.

The Committee's report concluded with recommendations on handling the Brussels process and the sovereignty question, including the proposals made by Mr. Matutes in December 1997. We will reply to those proposals when the next Brussels process meeting is held.

Mr. Donald Anderson: With respect, when will that be? The schedule is as long as a piece of string.

Mr. Vaz: No meeting has yet been scheduled, but when it is, we will be in a position to respond to the proposals. I think that my hon. Friend knew the answer to his question before he asked it.

Mr. Anderson: That is why I asked it.

Mr. Vaz: He is a good lawyer. Perhaps he should offer legal advice to my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock.

Mr. Mackinlay: I have not irritated the Minister, have I?

Mr. Vaz: I can assure—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It is very nice to have such a display of interest in Westminster Hall, but perhaps we should all calm down.

Mr. Vaz: I have attended far too many selection meetings with my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock to be irritated by him. His contribution on Gibraltar and on other foreign affairs issues is extremely helpful.

Mr. Gill: Instead of legal advice, I suggest that we need an outbreak of common sense. What the Minister said will cause enormous alarm and despondency in Gibraltar. His refusal to say that there would be polling stations in Gibraltar cut right across the assurance that he gave at the beginning of his speech, when he said that sovereignty was not in question. If people cannot vote in their own country, sovereignty is indeed called into question.

Mr. Vaz: I ask the hon. Gentleman not to become too agitated. The record will show that I said that I would not announce the venues of the polling stations in today's debate. I have clearly set out the principles behind the entitlements of the people of Gibraltar. I have also referred to the law. The Government always abide by the law and we will implement the law to allow the people of Gibraltar to make decisions. I will not discuss again the venues of the polling stations.

Mr. Spring: The Minister's view on the intergovernmental conference is incorrect. It provides an opportunity to raise the issue to which we are referring, because one of its key elements is the charter of fundamental rights, which includes the right to vote. If he does not know that, what does he think the conference is about?

Mr. Vaz: I am sorry to correct the hon. Gentleman, who I know is new to his brief. The charter of fundamental rights is not part of the agenda of the intergovernmental conference. He can read about the conference on its website. It will deal with three issues that were leftovers from Amsterdam, two of the most important of which are the size of the Commission and the re-weighting of votes. It does not deal with the charter of rights, which is being drafted separately and dealt with by a separate convention, not reporting to the intergovernmental conference, but making a report initially to Feira and later this year to another European Council. I am sorry, but the hon. Gentleman should read the website with greater care before entering the debate.

The Committee raised the issue of cruise ships, and I can assure hon. Members and members of the Committee that we have raised that matter again. The Spanish authorities have informed us that they do not intend to take any further action. Clearly, the arrival and departure of cruise ships is crucial to Gibraltar's economy because tourism is involved, and we have received extremely important assurances.

The Government have welcomed and valued the Foreign Affairs Committee's interest in Gibraltar. I hope that I have made clear the Government's determination to stand by our commitments to Gibraltar and to uphold its interests. That requires close co-operation with Gibraltar. The general political atmosphere between Spain, the United Kingdom and Gibraltar has improved since the Committee decided to hold an inquiry on Gibraltar.

However, many problems remain to be resolved. I have raised some of them, and hon. Members have raised others. The recent EU arrangements show that those difficulties should be approached with patience, dedication, common sense and good faith on all sides. I know that I can count on hon. Members' continued interest in the area, as we try to deal with those problems. I can assure hon. Members that I will write to the Committee about the points that they have raised and I look forward to appearing before the Committee in the not-too-distant future to deal with any other issues that it considers outstanding.

5.40 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): I shall be brief and I apologise for not being present during the first part of the debate, but I watched most of it on the screen. I want to make two points. The issue that has, rather surprisingly, caused most concern among hon. Members, members of the Foreign Affairs Committee and others is the European elections. There may be a dispute about what the law is, but it is better for the British Government to be proactive and to try to assert their competence, rather than wait beyond the time of the next election.

I believe that the people of Gibraltar have not changed their view since I was last there to discuss the matter and other hon. Members have confirmed that. Having been let down by not being allowed to vote last time, the people are clear that it would be unconscionable, unacceptable and entirely inconsistent with the Court judgment if the people whom the treaty entitles to vote in the European elections do not have their votes guaranteed in good time for the next election. There is no acceptable alternative. A Court judgment saying that people have the right to vote is no good, when that right cannot be exercised at an election. We missed the boat last time. It could be argued that that was defensible, because the judgment was made late in the day. However, no argument could make that acceptable next time.

The Government may be required to change their policy. They might have to take the view that they cannot wait for an agreement that might not come. Unless the Spanish Government concede that they will agree to the simple principle that, irrespective of other views about Gibraltar, Gibraltarians have the right to vote, the Government have a duty under law to act in accordance with the law. The first step could be for the Government to place their legal advice in the Library and for us to place our legal advice there—we could take it from there.

This late squall on the agenda was not foreseen as a difficulty by right hon. and hon. Members. I refer to the Minister's inability to confirm the location of elections. A strict interpretation of one part of what he said relates to his inability to identify in which street or building an election will take place. However, unless he or other Foreign Office Ministers publicly clarify within hours of this debate that the Gibraltar elections will take place in Gibraltar, they will be in for an extraordinary response. They will face the wrath of all quarters of the House. I cannot undertake not to work with my colleagues to ensure that the matter comes back on to the agenda at an early opportunity. Ministers will be forced either to defend the indefensible or to change their position.

Mr. Vaz: There is no need to come back within hours to clarify the position. I was asked whether I thought that the vote could take place in Spain. I think that it would be daft for a vote that concerns the people of Gibraltar to take place in Spain. Exactly where the polling stations are and how the election will be conducted—whether attached to an English constituency, or whatever—I cannot announce today. Let me repeat that I believe that it would be daft for voting in a Gibraltar election for the European Parliament to take place in Spain.

Mr. Mackinlay: Would the Minister rule it out?

Mr. Vaz: I am happy to say that, yes.

Mr. Hughes: The Minister is now being more helpful. We have only a couple of minutes left, and it would be even more helpful if the Minister made it expressly clear, on the record, that the British Government would not countenance the people of Gibraltar voting anywhere other than in Gibraltar. That would suffice. We would require no further detail. As the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling said, that would rule out Spain, but not necessarily a link to British constituencies. The key is that they vote in Gibraltar. If the Minister will affirm that, we will have a much clearer position. I am sure that he and his colleagues would be grateful for the opportunity of clarification.

Mr. Vaz: Again, as I have said before, I am not going to announce today where the polling stations will be. I have made it clear that I do not believe that it would be right for the vote to take place in Spain. The hon. Member for Ludlow has asked me how daft I thought it would be for the people of Gibraltar to go to Spain to vote. The issues of whether there would be a link to an English constituency or an overseas list system—or where exactly the vote takes place—will have to be discussed with colleagues in the Home Office, who are responsible for elections. I cannot take that decision or pronounce on it now. As far as I am concerned, the vote should not take place in Spain.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful. I shall not pursue the matter throughout our remaining time, but I should like to secure one further clarification. The right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling asked whether the vote would take place in Gibraltar. The Minister need not worry about the method or the name of the constituency. Could we simply have a clear statement that it is the view of joined-up government across Departments that the people of Gibraltar's vote in the election for the next European Parliament will take place in the colony of Gibraltar?

Mr. Vaz: It is not for me or the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to take that decision. However, as a result of today's debate, I shall write to the Home Secretary to ask whether he has any preliminary views on the matter. We are a long way from ensuring that that happens, but we want to make progress as quickly as possible. I repeat that I shall pass on to the Home Secretary the comments made in today's debate.

Mr. Hughes: It would be in the interests of the Minister's Department, of the Home Office and, most of all—not least because, in negotiations, the Spanish know the score—of the people of Gibraltar that this matter is clarified. If it requires the Home Secretary to secure that clarification, the sooner it is done, the better for the reputation of the British Government.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes to Six o'clock.

Contaminated Land

Motion made and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.— [Mrs. McGuire.]

10 am

Mr. Derek Twigg (Halton): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate this subject, which is very important from a constituency and regional point of view. I want to spend much of my time discussing the terrible contamination incident that occurred in my constituency of Halton. The press and television have given much publicity to the incident, which was dealt with in a recent edition of the "Panorama" programme.

ICI is the largest employer in my constituency. In Runcorn, it has developed one of the largest industrial complexes in Europe, which is concerned mainly with the manufacture of chlorine. As part of a restructuring and refocusing programme, ICI announced a few years ago its intention to leave the bulk chemical business, move into fine chemicals and sell the Runcorn site. My constituents are therefore concerned about future employment prospects with ICI.

Prior to that development, ICI established "project pathway" to investigate the legacy of more than 160 years of industrial activity in and around its Runcorn site. That is an example of good practice, which should be welcomed and which many other companies should follow, but the initiative identified a major problem. At Weston village in Runcorn, a 12 hectare former quarry which was tipped between 1920 and 1970 was found to contain hexachlorobutadiene gas, known as HCBD. HCBD has seeped into properties in the adjoining residential area. The indoor air of more than 150 houses has been tested and HCBD has been detected in 21 properties and the local scout hut. Those families have had to move out of their homes, and ICI has provided a compensation package for 476 properties in the village. It has also guaranteed property prices for up to 20 years for those who stay in Weston village and purchased 53 properties from residents. However, eight families are still staying in hotels and seven are in rented accommodation.

It is difficult to describe the devastation and anxiety felt by my constituents in Weston village. The effect on the entire community has been terrible, and the lives of many have been turned upside down. They are concerned not only about their homes but about the health problems that may be caused by HCBD. The health authority, which has been somewhat overrun by this crisis, has carried out medical checks on those who live in the properties directly affected. However, there is a lack of information on the effect of HCBD on humans, and investigations are being carried out into what constitutes a safe level of exposure.

It is clear that ICI must take the blame for what has happened, but we should recognise that it has done much recently to meet its responsibilities and improve its record. Nevertheless, and despite the compensation package and efforts to identify the problems, there are issues still to be resolved. Unsurprisingly, it is not only those nearest to the problem who are anxious; constituents who live on the edge of the village also want guarantees in respect of property and health. ICI is reviewing the zones for which compensation is provided and house prices are guaranteed. The time that the review is taking is a worry to my constituents, and a conclusion needs to be reached quickly.

ICI has released results from borehole testing around the Weston quarries. The quarries were dug out over a number of years, and some of the sandstone from them was used to build Liverpool cathedral. However, the Environment Agency wants more information on contamination in the vicinity—specifically on contamination of groundwater in the area—to be released and put in the public domain. I do not know whether ICI has released that information yet: it should do so immediately. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary would see whether he can expedite the release of the information into the public domain.

Nowhere is the concern outside the immediately contaminated area felt greater than in Weston Point, the neighbouring village, which is downhill from Weston village. Weston Point sits next to the giant ICI complex—outside the factory gates. The residents want to know whether the village is affected by contamination from quarries or the ICI site. They have received assurances that it should not be, but there is no definitive evidence to prove that it is not. Boreholes have also been sunk around the ICI site, and the information from them is needed.

There is widespread concern in Weston Point about property prices and whether building societies will be willing to provide mortgages for people who want to purchase properties there. ICI previously held public meetings for Weston village residents. Weston Point residents now want a public meeting with ICI, the council and the health authorities, so that they can ask questions direct. I urge ICI to organise such a meeting in the near future as a matter of priority. Hundreds of my constituents have written to me about it, seeing such a meeting as a way to bring the issues into the open and discuss them.

Contaminated land can have a disastrous effect on a community. Nowhere is that more clearly seen than in my constituency. What has occurred demonstrates how badly a community can be affected and why the Government, local councils, regional development agencies and other partners must tackle the problem of contaminated land as a priority.

I want to speak more broadly about the problems of contamination for Halton. Halton is the original home of the United Kingdom's alkali and chemical industries. There is no household in the country that does not use a product manufactured from materials made in Runcorn or Widnes, so the industry's importance is clear. However, the heritage of the alkali and chemical industries over the past 150 years has been chemical waste tips of the most unimaginable kind. What were once green fields in Widnes became known as gallygu—a local term—and copper smelting, soap manufacture, phosphate fertiliser manufacture and a host of other chemical cocktails added to the present-day legacy. There was also, formerly, a large asbestos industry in my constituency, and again we see the consequences of that.

When Halton council came into being in 1974, it was determined to tackle that legacy. It has made much progress in reclaiming areas of dereliction, making Halton a greener and more attractive place. The contaminated site in Weston looks a very peaceful scene: it is a grassed area, with horses grazing on top of the quarry. One cannot imagine what is underneath it. Widnes, which bore the brunt of the chemical contamination for many years, is also a much more attractive place now. Since 1974, 180 hectares of land have been brought back into use, representing public investment of more than £20 million through the national derelict land programme.

Despite that good work, much remains to be done. The 1993 national derelict land survey identified 203 hectares of land still requiring remediation and reclamation. That represents 3 per cent. of Halton's land area and is equivalent to a 10-year programme. Many of the sites are large and badly contaminated and will be costly to remedy fully. The scale of the dumping in the past 150 years was such that more than 200 hectares of marshland across southern Widnes were tipped on to an average depth of 4 m. Our Victorian forefathers thought nothing of filling in ditches and watercourses with toxic waste from factories.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): In the north-west, in Lancashire and Cheshire, such reclaimed sites often have no site value afterwards because they have no active use. That has on-going revenue, as well as capital cost, implications for local authorities, which have to maintain additional open spaces which are not required.

Mr. Twigg: My hon. Friend makes an important point, to which I shall return later.

Councils sometimes come in for great criticism, but the work that Halton council has undertaken in the past 25 years in dealing with dereliction and contamination should be held up as a shining example of how councils, working in partnership with central Government and other partners, can significantly improve the environment and people's lives by showing innovation and the determination to make a real difference.

I want to highlight two examples in my constituency of how partnership with government can transform an area. St. Michael's golf course is a prime example of a local authority acting in partnership with government to transform noxious and dangerous chemical tips—on which I played as a youngster, as did many others. I apologise for any shortcomings that may have resulted. That area was known as "Ditton Alps", and comprised a series of hills of contaminated chemical waste covered in a white crust in which nothing grew. I shall summarise what happened. Fifty-five hectares of land were reclaimed, 60,000 trees were planted, 800 residents and 395 employees in local factories now view a green golf course instead of a chemical waste tip and 35,000 vehicles pass the site on a major highway route. The physical and visual environment has improved tremendously.

The Greenoaks retail scheme in Widnes is another prime example of the partnership approach. It brought back into use a former 7.4 hectare—20 acre—abandoned chemical works and transformed it into a 250,000 sq ft retail scheme, which provided much needed confidence in Widnes town centre. Direct grant aid reclamation to prepare the site for development amounted to more than £5 million. The consultant engineers to the project commented that > there may have been value in open cast mining the site for the barium and zinc spillages that were in the ground.

That resulted in £25 million of investment, 250,000 sq ft of new retail floor space in the town centre, dedicated public transport provision and direct pedestrian links to the existing high street.

Those are two classic examples of how a difference can be made. There are many other examples of work that has been undertaken to reclaim land to make it much greener and environmentally better in terms of jobs and housing.

I do not want to give the wrong impression of Halton. It has changed significantly for the better, even during my 40-year lifetime. Widnes, in particular, which historically has had the worst problems, has seen massive improvements. Many people have moved to Halton to live, which shows that it has become a much more pleasant and attractive place. However, more remains to be done.

It is important to stress that not all brownfields are the same. The term encompasses everything from sites previously used for housing or light industry, with limited problems, to severely contaminated sites containing highly dangerous and toxic chemicals. As I said, Halton's legacy from the chemical industry means that our brownfield sites are difficult and costly to deal with. Of course, Halton is not the only council in the north-west that faces such problems. On many sites in Halton, contaminants are not site-specific; adjoining sites have also been contaminated. The costs and liabilities associated with those sites are such that no developer would be persuaded to take on the challenge without financial incentives or legal protection from future liabilities. ICI accepted responsibility for contamination in Halton and has carried out remedial work, but it is often not possible to pinpoint who is responsible, particularly if the contamination goes back 150 years.

Remediation costs are often high. When coupled with low demand for commercial land, as in Halton, it becomes impossible to release redevelopment opportunities. Because the cost of reclaiming contaminated land for hard end users is so high and the demand for commercial land is so limited, the cheaper option of remediation for green end users has often been the only choice. For example, the cost of reclaiming the 3 hectare site of a former asbestos plant in Widnes was £1.2 million and it was sold to a car retailer for £143,000. When it is possible to reclaim land for housing, the value of surrounding housing often makes it difficult to recoup the cost of reclaiming the land. The cost of reclaiming the 1 hectare site of a former soap works in Halton was £500,000. The environment in the area was better than previously, but the site was sold to a house builder for just over £150,000, who sold the houses at around £47,000.

It is important to bear in mind the changing nature of the game. North West Development Agency funding is now targeted at hard end uses, which are not possible on most of Halton's sites because contamination is so severe and expensive to remedy. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, Halton had a rolling programme of direct derelict land grant schemes, which spent an average of £3 million annually. Current spending is £500,000. That shows how the current funding regimes do not help Halton and other chemically affected areas. A fraction of the money spent on the derelict site on which the millennium dome now sits would be needed to deal with the problems in Halton and would make a big difference. In addition, the massively increased costs of removal of contamination to landfill means that it is no longer economically viable to reclaim the majority of Halton's sites in line with current thinking on hard end use. In the early 1990s, the cost of removing contaminated waste was £20 per cubic metre. Today, the cost is £180 per cubic metre. Clearly, there are reasons for that increase, including inflation, but it is a problem.

There is a further problem with the Environment Agency's licence requirement. The cost of contaminated land makes redevelopment less attractive to private developers. The Environment Agency's rules are designed for brownfield sites surrounded by greenfield sites, but Halton has blackfield sites surrounded by blackfield sites. For example, the Environment Agency required a lined cell to be created and £200,000 was spent just to move material around and reshape it on an 8 hectare tip surrounded by 40 hectares of further tips containing the same material. Funding is driven by output—for example, jobs created, length of road built and hectares of contaminated land cleared. Green end use outputs do not carry priority, but when green end use provides the only sensible and practical option, it must be given a high priority.

The easiest and most commercially viable and desirable sites were reclaimed in the 1980s and 1990s. Halton has been left with the expensive, less viable and more hazardous sites. The public health officer in north Halton published a report last week highlighting the fact that Halton has some of the worst health problems in the country and a return to green end use is the only way of tackling some of the health issues related to contamination on many of those sites.

Only 5 per cent. of new house build in Halton is achievable on brownfield sites. The remainder of the brownfield sites are black and cannot accommodate residential uses by the very nature of the ground conditions. It is difficult to do anything with those sites other than to cover them and green them. It is clear that any thoughts of Halton getting anywhere near the Government targets for the redevelopment of brownfield sites are not realistic, and significant help is needed. Halton council will publish its draft unitary development plan in the near future. Much of the debate will focus on any proposed loss of greenfield and countryside sites for development purposes.

There is great anger in the Widnes side of my constituency about Widnes golf club wanting to sell off its land to a housing developer, to enable relocation to occur. I support my constituents' view that it is important to retain this green space in the centre of town, and that it would be a great loss if it disappeared. My constituents see a sizeable amount of derelict land in Halton, and they wonder why we have a problem developing it and why there are arguments about the possible loss of greenfield sites. I have already outlined the reasons. I am sure that, when the unitary development plan is published, major discussions will occur if any proposals are made to use greenfield or green space sites for industry or housing.

There is no doubt that the polluters should pay, but the difficulty lies in identifying them. As I said earlier, it was very clear in the ICI case who the polluter was, and ICI accepted responsibility. However, in Halton and many other places in the north-west, polluting has been going on for 150 or 160 years or more. Many of the companies responsible no longer exist or have been amalgamated with others, making identification difficult. When they can be identified, they should pay, but in many cases it is not possible to identify those responsible, especially in areas such as Halton.

I have had detailed discussions with my local authority, Halton, whose wealth of experience and knowledge on these issues is probably second to none. Halton has won several awards for reclamation schemes. I shall suggest a number of solutions, which we can debate and which I ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to consider.

The suggestions include the introduction of a strategic plan and framework for dealing with contaminated sites, rather than pepperpotting resources on an ad hoc basis; bringing together different funding streams and bodies working on contaminated land issues; and the establishment of more detailed classification criteria to highlight the varying degrees of severity of contamination on different sites. That last proposal is important, especially in Halton, because some sites are very contaminated and others only mildly so.

Further proposals include the development of a task force, similar to the coalfields regeneration initiative within English Partnerships, to tackle the severely chemically contaminated sites; the introduction of a greenfield development levy on highly profitable developments, to be used to subsidise the development of brownfield sites where negative land values and high-cost remediation combine to discourage private investment; the greater use of landfill tax credits to remediate chemically contaminated sites; and, finally, the possible introduction of a separate strand of national lottery good causes to deal with especially large and problematic contaminated sites. Those ideas are being discussed locally and they are shared by others in the region. It is worth introducing them into the debate, in relation to dealing with this problem.

I shall turn now to the problems in the north-west region. During my speech, I have dwelt on the problems affecting Halton, but they apply equally to many other parts of the north-west. Estimates suggest that there are between 100,000 and 200,000 hectares of contaminated land in the United Kingdom. The Environment Agency has estimated that there could be more than 300,000 hectares, although much of that contamination might be relatively minor.

I want to express my concern to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary at the delay in producing a definitive study on the issue, caused by problems associated with defining contaminated land and identifying money to tap-remediate such land once it has been defined as contaminated. However, I welcome the Contaminated Land (England) Regulations 2000, which came into force on 1 April 2000, and the important role that local authorities will play in their implementation. I am sure that authorities such as Halton will take proper advantage of them. Placing control with local authorities is right and proper.

The scale of derelict and contaminated land remains a serious problem in the region. With 9,900 hectares, the north-west has 25 per cent. of the country's derelict land in 11 per cent. of England's land area. That is the largest figure for any region. Sixty-eight per cent. of the dereliction in the north-west is in the Mersey belt, the industrial and economic heartland of the region. The regional development agency and the regional assembly see the reclamation of derelict land as a priority, and the assembly is addressing the issue of derelict land in the forthcoming draft regional planning guidance, which will be submitted to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State at the end of the month.

In its regional strategy, the North West Development Agency proposes a review of priorities and objectives for land reclamation, in partnership with the region's local authorities. The review will cover the 20-year lifetime of the regional strategy and will pay particular attention to the problems created by the chemical industry's redundant and derelict sites.

The physical environment is an important component of sustainable development in the region. It is critical to the quality of life—including health and safety risks—in deprived areas and to the image and perception that businesses and investors have of those areas. That is an important issue for the north-west, which does not do as well as some regions in attracting and retaining investment. Dereliction and contamination can affect a region's image.

Twenty of the 100 worst districts listed in the DETR's index of deprivation are in the north-west. It is no coincidence that those areas suffer from some of the worst problems associated with derelict, under-used, neglected or contaminated land. Hon. Members will not be surprised to learn that that list includes my constituency. The North West Development Agency supports the Government's policy of re-using brownfield land for new development, but believes that that can be done in the north-west only with public sector support. If polluters can be identified, they will be made to pay. However, that will not often be the case. Like Halton council, the agency believes that the variations in the property market mean that, in extensive areas in the region, extra costs are associated with building on previously used sites. The north-west of England has inherited significant environmental liabilities.

The land and property budget of the RDA is the main source of funding for dealing with dereliction. The North West Development Agency is concerned about DETR's plan to distribute the land and property budget nationally. That would reduce the NWDA's share, both in real terms and in proportion to other regions. The region has evidence-based policies, known as net environmental investments, to build on its better assets and bring brownfield sites into beneficial use. The north-west needs sustained commitment to physical regeneration and land restoration if it is to see an urban renaissance and tackle social deprivation. The scale of the problem and the time it will take to address it—a minimum of 20 years—justify additional resources; I need only look at my own constituency to see that. Partnership is the key to real change.

Mr. Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington): I congratulate the hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg) on securing the debate. I could detect no shortcomings in what he said, or anything that could be attributed to his having played on contaminated sites. I will not attempt to match his expertise on the subject of contaminated land in the north-west of England or on the activities of Weston or ICI in the area. I hope that my comments will be relevant to the north-west, but also to the whole of the United Kingdom.

The question of what we should do with contaminated and derelict land and how we pay for reclamation is a crucial one for all areas of the country, including the north-west. It touches on important issues, such as housing, regeneration, the environment, the countryside and—in particular, in the case of the hon. Gentleman's constituency—health. The United Kingdom has many assets, but lots of land is not one of them. Of the land that we do have, about 300,000 hectares, according to the Environment Agency, is affected by contamination, and a smaller area is itself contaminated. The available land that we have is under increasing pressure, and we need to use it as effectively as possible. If we do not, we shall continue to eat into the green belt and build on greenfield sites in urban and rural Britain. The countryside will continue to suffer, and the communities that could benefit from regeneration and the cleaning up of derelict and contaminated sites will continue to decline.

When the Government came to power in 1997, 52 per cent. of housing development took place on brownfield sites. Their target is to increase that figure to 60 per cent., which is an improvement on the previous Government's target, although it is still too timid—an overall national target of approximately 75 per cent. would be an ambitious target for the next 10 years. I know that this is a controversial subject—some argue that such a figure is unachievable, but others maintain that it can be realised. Unless we have an ambitious target, the Government will not be pushed. The overall figure, which would apply nationally, would be an average figure that would allow for local flexibility by reflecting the different circumstances that prevail in different regions.

It is disappointing that, according to the report by Lord Rogers, which was published in 1999, the Government's current performance indicates that they will fail to hit their 60 per cent. target. We need to take decisive action to ensure that the target is reached. Hon. Members of all parties share the laudable aim of seeking to maximise the development of brownfield land, but there is less agreement about the way in which to do so. Various solutions are possible—the hon. Member for Halton outlined several that would benefit the north-west of England, by bringing contaminated land into use, and the rest of the country, by reducing development on greenfield sites. In my constituency, the issue involves building on greenfield sites rather than cleaning up contaminated land because, fortunately, we have few contaminated sites. A couple of them have already been successfully redeveloped as housing projects and, as far as I am aware, only one such site remains in my constituency—a large gasholder that may be cleaned up at some stage.

One solution, which was referred to by the hon. Member for Halton, is to impose a greenfield development levy, which could encourage greenfield development and subsidise the cost of cleaning up contaminated sites. He cited the costs of clean-ups in his constituency—everyone accepts that such costs are phenomenal. The practice of building on virgin land will continue unless something is done to redress the balance between the costs of developing on greenfield and on brownfield sites—the extra costs are significant on contaminated brownfield sites. The tax system could be used to redress that imbalance.

Another good approach involves the use of VAT, which is set at zero for new build and at 17.5 per cent. for the renovation or conversion of existing buildings. Many hon. Members and housing and regeneration organisations regard that as ridiculous. That disparity should be redressed very quickly—if possible, in the next Budget. If VAT equalisation was achieved using a 5 per cent. rate, for example, any surplus generated could, as the Rogers report suggests, be used to subsidise the decontamination of the sites that the hon. Member for Halton mentioned. The Chancellor has an opportunity to introduce a greenfield development levy, which could be used to tax the excess profits on land sales. The bulk of the revenue raised could be used to clean up brownfield land, with a small proportion going to environmental projects that benefit local communities. That would help to redress the balance. The cost of cleaning up contaminated land is excessive and, although we have made use of less-contaminated sites that are easy to clean up, many sites require extensive clean-up.

The issue of contaminated and derelict land cannot be addressed without taking into account the role of land speculators. The uniform business rate taxes businesses on improvements that have been made to property, which discourages developers from improving property, because it would increase their tax bills. Developers who build up land banks for speculative purposes and leave the land undeveloped, in a dilapidated condition or even completely out of use, suffer no financial penalty. Does the Minister agree that it is time to consider alternative arrangements to replace the uniform business rate?

Site value rating would levy a tax on the value of unimproved land, but not on buildings on the site. The land alone would need to be assessed and a tax would be fixed on the basis of that value. A tax on land values would be unaffected by a landowner's decision to make good or bad use of the land and it would therefore pay landowners to make the best possible use of their land to gain maximum income. If the urban landowner is taxed on the value of the land, whether it is used or not, the cost of land speculation would pass from the community to the landowner. Urban areas would be regenerated without costly intervention and the pressure to develop green-belt land would diminish.

That is another positive measure. Derelict sites could be brought into use more quickly, which would speed up urban regeneration and reduce the need to develop greenfield sites. The much clearer picture of land availability and housing demand in rural areas would be an added bonus. It is hard to predict demand and know how much land is available for development, which means that more is brought into the planning system for development than is necessary.

It is right that the cost of clean-up should fall on the polluter. However, as the hon. Member for Halton said, the polluter often cannot be found. In such cases, the cost of cleaning up contaminated land falls to local authorities and extra costs are put on the Environment Agency. In an ENDS—Environmental Data Services—report of March 2000, the agency stated:

> If . . . the Agency's role should extend to the provision of guidance on any site where a local authority requests assistance, this is clearly a new duty and will require substantial new resources.

Mr. Pike: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that when local authorities consider new planning applications for opencast coal mining, they should be able to take into account the costs of future reinstatement? Bonds are often insufficient and costs that are not met by the private sector are picked up by the public sector. Does he accept that if we are not careful, we will create new areas of dereliction because local authorities cannot consider the financial standing of bodies that make such planning applications?

Mr. Brake: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his useful intervention. Local authorities should be able to take into account the cost of future reclamation. I shall ask the Minister a question on that in a few minutes, in relation to ICI.

I welcome the Government funding in the comprehensive spending review to support the implementation of the contaminated land regime, but I question whether sufficient funds have been made available. I do not know the precise estimate of the costs of cleaning up the quarries to which the hon. Member for Halton referred.

Mr. Derek Twigg: You have made an important point. At present, no definitive answer has been given on how the quarries should be reclaimed. The removal of materials may cause more contamination and pollution. A membrane could be used, but what guarantees will that give to my constituents that the pollution will not spread in the next 20, 30, 40 years?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. Before the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington replies, I must inform the hon. Member for Halton that I have not made any interesting observations. The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington may have done so. As the Chair, whatever my personal views are in a debate, they are withheld.

Mr. Brake: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that if you had the opportunity, you would make many interesting and useful contributions.

I have not seen the estimate of the clean-up costs. Indeed, from what the hon. Member for Halton has said, no estimate has been made at present and nor has a best approach been decided on to sorting out the problem. It is not unreasonable to think that the clean-up costs will be very substantial indeed and could eat into any funds made available through the comprehensive spending review. That is why I question whether sufficient funds have been granted through the comprehensive spending review to deal with the level of clean-up that is required. Any further moneys could be part-funded through a greenfield development levy or by additional revenue generated by VAT equalisation.

What assessment has the Minister made of the costs associated with part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act 1990? What assessment has he made of the cost to local authorities in this and future financial years? How does the Minister expect those costs to be funded? What assessment has he made of the role of insurance in the clean-up of contaminated sites? Does he agree that insurance is underused because the insurance companies are not in a position to insure budgets against overspend in relation to the clean-up of contaminated sites if that proves to be more costly than had been anticipated? Does he think that if ICI buys out all the homeowners in Weston—as was suggested in an article—it will have breached the spirit of the Act? Does he think that the purchase of the homes, while ensuring that the polluter pays, will allow it to pay less than the genuine cost of the clean-up?

Financial and fiscal rules are crucial to the debate. The planning process also needs to be reformed, perhaps through the creation of special planning zones for major reclamation projects, which would simplify and regularise the present, perhaps over-complex process. A shift from greenfield to brownfield development and the clean-up of contaminated land could be achieved by a small number of relatively simple fiscal changes. The question is whether the Chancellor will bite the bullet.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg) on raising the subject. It sounds as though he has been preparing for the debate for the past 40 years, given that he has acquired practical experience of the subject since childhood and in his constituency. I admire your restraint, Mr. Deputy Speaker: no doubt, you have views on the subject, which relates to that part of the country which is your home, and you would have expressed them, had not the rules of the Chair restrained you.

The subject of the debate might be less sexy than those of others in the Chamber this week, but it is arguably the most important. I say that the subject is less sexy, but even Hollywood has taken it to itself—it is topical. The current film "Erin Brockovich" goes to the heart of problems that the hon. Member for Halton has described. It is a shame that more hon. Members are not here to share their experiences, to hear of the problems in Halton and to tackle the Minister about the Government's attitude.

The subject is important in two main respects. First, we all have examples in our constituencies of contaminated sites: such sites might be former landfill sites, where there is a risk of contaminants leaching into nearby residential areas or into water aquifers. That is a potential problem in my part of the country, which contains the chalk downs of Sussex. Problems might also arise from former industrial sites. The hon. Member for Halton mentioned severely affected sites in Halton and referred to ICI. If those sites are not properly cleaned up—often because the liabilities of the polluter, if he, she or it is known and is still around, are uncertain—they are wholly unusable for future industrial, residential, leisure or other developments. The advantage of tackling the problems is that redevelopment brings community benefits. Many successful schemes have come from community partnerships. They bring many dividends, not least in terms of economic development and improvements to residents' health.

Secondly, the subject is important because derelict land, whether or not it is derelict because of contamination, is a wasted resource. We can ill afford such waste, which is a shared national problem. A thousand hectares of unused brownfield sites in the north-west represent 1,000 hectares of greenfield sites in the north-west or the south-east that could be saved from bulldozers. The problem is mutual, shared across the north-south divide and between town and country. The more that we can do to bring derelict areas in and around cities back into use, the greater protection there will be for green belts, greenfield sites and our countryside. Yesterday, the south-east regional planning committee voted on the Government's proposed house-building figures. The Government's response appears to be that they will carry on regardless—that is, regardless of the views of democratically elected members of councils in the south-east.

Proper recycling of derelict and contaminated sites will become more urgent by the day, especially if the Government stick to the White Paper forecasts of a 20 per cent. increase in the number of households from 20.2 million to 24 million by 2021. The forecast contradicts the experience of the past 30 years, during which the number of houses increased by only 10 per cent. at a time of a falling birth rate.

We welcome the new contaminated land regime legislation, which came into force in England on 1 April of this year. It results from part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 as inserted by section 57 of the Environment Act 1995, which was introduced by the previous Government. That legislation had five key points: focus, transparency, integration, consistency and better tools. We all agree with those aims and hope that the new framework will be successful, because we all have an interest in solving the problem.

As the hon. Member for Halton suggested, perhaps nowhere will the success of the legislation be judged more accurately than in north-west England, which, as he pointed out, has more than 25 per cent. of the all the derelict land in England. That is not surprising, given his constituency's history of heavy industry, especially the chemical industry. He referred to ICI, which has acknowledged its responsibilities and liabilities and is now seeking to take action. We can argue about whether its decisions are the right ones, but at least the company has acknowledged that it is responsible. A bigger problem is smaller businesses that have long since flown the coop leaving behind problems for others to clean up at their own expense.

The north-west also has environmental problems: I gather that its 6 per cent. tree cover is the lowest in Europe, which has average tree cover of 35 per cent. In addition, one third of the region's rivers are classified as poor or bad, and Liverpool and Manchester are the second and third worst cities in the United Kingdom in terms of failure to meet urban air quality guidelines. The north-east has an acute interest in making the legislation work, but it must provide a solution that the whole of the country can share and enjoy. We have a shared interest, politically and geographically, in the success of the new regime. I do not take issue with the legislation, especially as much of it was introduced by the previous Government. It is too early to judge its success, as it took effect less than two months ago.

I should like to ask the Minister some questions. I am sure that he will have copious time in which to respond to my comments and those of other hon. Members. First, I shall deal with spending. The hon. Member for Halton mentioned several times the number of successful schemes conducted during the past 10 years or so, under the present and previous Governments. However, in the financial year 1994-95, spending in the north-west on derelict and contaminated land treatment was £29.07 million, whereas by 1998-99, it had more than halved, to £13.62 million. During that time, 899 hectares of land in the north-west were reclaimed: £76.82 million was spent on the reclamation, which works out as roughly £85,500 per hectare, which is not cheap. The hon. Gentleman cited many examples that involved the expenditure of a seven-figure sum per hectare. That all goes to show that reclaiming land involves no small amount of resources.

Why was spending reduced during that period, and what are the Minister's future spending projections? Will there be a significant increase and, if so, where will the funds be found? How will liability be split between local authorities or central Government and private companies? Will the Minister give us some indications as to the size of the bill?

Mr. Pike: Does the hon. Gentleman accept the point that I made earlier? Sometimes, local authorities are not prepared to go ahead with schemes because they involve an on-going revenue commitment that cannot be met. For example, if they create a new open space, the grass must be cut. Even if the cost of such work is minimal, it is an additional cost that often cannot be met.

Mr. Loughton: I agree that such schemes are not one-offs. It is no good reclaiming a site and then letting it go, as that merely builds up problems for the future. I shall deal in a moment with the implications of orphan sites, which can arise from different sources. The problem remains of how to sustain funding, not least for the 20 years that most reclamation projects are designed to last.

I hope that the Minister will address the question of spending on the land reclamation programme, which provides funding for local authorities to reclaim derelict land if private-sector firms have no incentive to undertake the task. Under that scheme, because local authorities do not receive central Government funding specifically for that purpose, 100 per cent. of the eligible cost of approved projects is met. To what extent is the programme likely to be expanded? What percentage of the total area of derelict land under consideration has been identified as orphan land? How important is that consideration to the submission of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions to the Treasury in respect of the current comprehensive spending review?

What tax breaks do the Minister and his Department think would act as an obvious incentive for a private clean-up in cases where no obvious private liability can be shown? The Minister will be aware that it often proves too risky for new owners of previously contaminated land—or even land that is only suspected of being contaminated—to assume such a liability, given the much greater legal requirements that are, rightly, placed upon them and the consequent risk of being sued for contamination damage. Mixed ownership, where various firms or private individuals own a contaminated area, is also a problem. What measures do the Government envisage taking to ensure that a common approach is adopted toward such landlords, companies or individuals?

My third question relates to definition, which has already been mentioned. What is a brownfield site? What are the blackfield sites mentioned by the hon. Member for Halton? There is an inconsistency in the definitions used in the national land use database, which came into force in May 1999. Under those definitions, derelict land may include existing landfill sites. It may also include derelict land next to railway stations that is used for car parking, which use we and the Government would encourage, as we want to promote interchange facilities between various forms of transport to maximise the use of public transport. In no circumstances would we want housing, supermarkets or factories to be built on such land because that would have a detrimental effect on our transport strategies.

It has been estimated that only 20 per cent. of what is termed derelict or brownfield land in England is available and suitable for development. That equates to only 164,000 new dwellings, which is substantially less than the number of houses that the Government want to be built on brownfield sites. That potential shortfall is enormous, so the definitions must be correct.

A fourth factor is regional influence. The Rogers report recommended that the Government should have a strong economic policy to incentivise regeneration and the use of derelict land. I praise the north-west regional development agency report on derelict and contaminated land for recognising the problems mentioned by the hon. Member for Halton. The report stated that land reclamation will be a "central task" for the agency, which, at an early stage, will carry out a review of priorities and objectives for land reclamation in partnership with local authorities. However, it warned that it had serious doubts about the accuracy of the national land use database figures. What steps are the Government taking to ensure that we are all singing from the same song sheet and that that song sheet contains the right notes? There are many grey areas in relation to brownfield sites.

[Mr. Loughton]

I am sorry to ask the Minister so many questions, but I am sure that he will be delighted to write to me in reply, because I know that he takes these matters seriously. What value additional to that offered by local authority projects does he think is added by the involvement of regional development agencies in these matters? All the schemes mentioned by the hon. Member for Halton were local authority projects that were instigated long before regional development agencies appeared on the scene. How much derelict land reclamation work is to be funded in future by regional development agencies and how much by the Environment Agency grant in aid assistance for special site designation for orphan linkages—the problem of unclaimed land where the polluter cannot be traced? It seems to me that all the current action of regional development agencies takes the form of reviews and studies. When will those agencies tackle the problem and clean up the sites, rather than continue to hold apparently endless consultation exercises and reviews of the problem?

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake) mentioned insurance. I have had discussions with an organisation called Certa, which specialises in insurance underwriting for contamination problems. Will the Minister comment on the work that has been done in the United States by the Environmental Protection Agency on the availability of environment insurance and risk transfer mechanisms? The Environment Agency in this country has been surprisingly quiet on the matter. Open-ended liability is a real problem, as it acts as a disincentive to companies becoming involved; exploring insurance underwriting to minimise the risk is a practical solution. Will we hear more from the Government about promoting that practical solution?

It would be helpful if the activities of the west midlands-based ground water and contaminated land national centre were more widely known. Much expertise is to be found at the centre, on which many authorities, especially those in the north-west, could draw, but it seems to be an unsung organisation. There are also problems where the Environment Agency has supported the use of an insurance-backed bond to satisfy the regulatory requirements of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. However, the general opinion of the waste management industry is that bank bonds are the only mechanism available. Will the Minister comment on the use of bonds?

Let me give an example from personal experience. I was employed by a City merchant bank that had an investment trust. That merchant bank dated back to the 1870s and had been built on the financing of railway construction in north America. The investment trust was deemed to be liable for some asbestos that had been used in the original railway building work back in the 1870s. As recently as two years ago, it faced the prospect of a multi-billion-dollar lawsuit for something done by the builders of those railways, in which the investment trust had invested 130 years ago. If that lawsuit had gone ahead and a settlement had been made, the investment trust would have gone bust. Long-term insurance liabilities are open-ended risks, because one might be liable for events that go back not just a few years, but centuries, especially if there are American ramifications, because of the litigious approach adopted to such matters in that country.

The Rogers report called for fiscal action to recycle derelict sites, especially the 1.3 million urban buildings that it calculated were lying empty. We are told by a report in The Guardian in May that

> The patience of new Labour's favourite architect finally snapped this week.

The article goes on to say that Lord Rogers described the Government's attitude to the urban report, which was produced almost a year ago, as "disappointingly negative". Lord Rogers has now > decided that the only way to influence the Government is to go over the head of the Deputy Prime Minister and appeal directly to the Treasury, possibly on the basis that the Chancellor would be more likely to be in the country, as we are told that the Deputy Prime Minister has now become the Prime Minister for the third world. The article quotes a member of the urban task force as saying:

> But it is clear that the urban agenda has not yet occupied the centre ground of Government thinking.

What progress has been made, after three years of the present Government and 12 months on from Lord Rogers' urban regeneration report and the formation of the urban task force? What recommendations have been implemented, as opposed to further consultation being held, such as on stamp duty? Why did the Government not support the Urban Regeneration and Countryside Protection Bill presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen), which dealt with many of the problems that I have mentioned? We were told that Government measures would make that Bill superfluous, but I see no evidence of that.

The matters that I have raised are detailed, but they are of concern to everyone present and to many of our colleagues who did not attend this morning. We have a mutual interest in ensuring the proper working of the new legislative framework, whether we represent southern or northern, Welsh or Scottish, urban, rural or suburban constituencies. I ask the Minister to consider what I have said, although he might like to deal with it in more detail outside this Chamber.

11.6 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Chris Mullin): My hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg) has raised an issue that is serious, not only to his constituents, whose predicament he graphically outlined, but to the whole country, especially its old industrial areas. He comes from the north-west; I represent part of Sunderland in the north-east, which has many of the same problems. He described a truly shocking state of affairs relating to Weston quarries. I can well understand the devastation and anxiety caused to those of his constituents who are directly involved. The only mitigating factor is that ICI has accepted its responsibilities and is taking action. All too often, in areas of contamination, the original polluter has long since disappeared, or it makes arrangements to do so when the scale of the problem becomes obvious.

Amid the bad news, some better news and some lessons for the future can be found. I am glad to say that we are not creating more sites of the sort in question. Industry must now comply with rigorous controls on the way in which it disposes of waste, policed by the Environment Agency. We must still identify and resolve problems from the past, but the interesting lesson of Weston quarries is that the polluter, ICI, found and owned up to the problem. Thanks to the company's diligence in investigating problems that may have been caused by its past operations, risks to Weston residents have been identified. From my hon. Friend's remarks, I understand that some arguments about the details remain to be resolved with ICI, but the company is actively exploring ways in which to deal with the contamination risk. It also accepts that it will have to pick up the tab.

It would be wrong to say that everything has been handled perfectly or that it is now plain sailing—far from it. We have a lot to learn about the underlying science, and long-term solutions are still to be found. I am sure that ICI will have heard my hon. Friend's plea for the process to be accelerated. I shall raise with ICI the need to release information more speedily. In this case, ICI has taken a responsible attitude, but if the company had not done so, strong new powers are available to local authorities and the Environment Agency to deal with contaminated land.

The new contaminated land regime in part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 came into force in April this year. It places local authorities under a duty to inspect their areas to find problem sites and gives them regulatory powers to ensure that the polluter pays to deal with contamination. However, it is clearly better not to have to wait for legal action and for intervention by regulators: industry should find the problems that it has caused and sort them out.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment wrote in April to the chairmen of the top 300 companies asking them to help to clean up Britain's past and challenging them to act responsibly if they were responsible for problem sites. He specifically asked them to develop their own company strategy for identifying contaminated sites for which they are responsible—to be positive, instead of waiting for the regulators to call. I am pleased to say that the initiative is receiving a positive response from industry and that many companies are well ahead in looking at their land holdings to find problems and clean them up. That is good business practice, apart from being good for local communities and the environment. At few contaminated sites are the problems as dramatic or stark as they are at Weston quarries, but contamination issues must be considered carefully wherever old land is recycled to new uses.

The development industry, the professions and the emerging specialist land remediation industry are doing a great deal to clean up and inject new life into old contaminated sites, but we still face a significant problem throughout the country of derelict land, much, but not all, of which is contaminated. In some cases, contamination is the straw that breaks the camel's back and prevents redevelopment from taking place. I am sure that the north-west has more than its fair share of such sites.

My Department is working with Ordnance Survey, English Partnerships, the Improvement and Development Agency and local authorities to develop a national land use database. The first phase of the work has produced a snapshot of previously developed vacant and derelict land and other land in use that may be available for redevelopment. In 1998, that work identified 2,830 hectares of vacant land and a further 3,400 hectares of derelict land in the north-west. The figures for my hon. Friend's constituency are 38 hectares vacant and 31 hectares derelict.

Such areas of land in the north-west are noticeably smaller than those recorded in the 1993 derelict land survey. That reflects three factors. First, some of the land has been redeveloped and is no longer derelict—indeed, my hon. Friend described the work of his local authority and others in helping to deal with the problem. Secondly, some of the derelict land in the 1993 exercise was not counted in the new database, because it is urban and not suitable for new development. Land in that category includes derelict mines and quarries, and railway and military land that has blended back into the natural environment. Thirdly, there may be some under-recording on the new database. All that has been produced so far is a first snapshot: more work needs to be done to complete the database as a regularly updated source. Despite the lower figures, the database still shows that some 20 per cent. of the national total area of vacant and derelict land is in the north-west, compared with 25 per cent. as identified in the 1993 survey.

The Government are committed to bringing derelict land, in whichever region it is located, back into use for housing and other purposes. That is an important part of our goal of urban renaissance, which aims to improve the quality of life for local communities and to tackle social exclusion. My hon. Friend gave a couple of examples from his constituency—the golf course, reclaimed at great expense from a chemical waste tip, and Greenoaks retail centre. In Sunderland, there is the well-known example of our football stadium, which was built on the site of the old Monkwearmouth colliery and seems also to have improved the quality of the football played.

In the north-west, the regional development agency is responsible for the Government's land and property programme, which addresses the need for land for a variety of purposes, including industry and commerce, infrastructure, housing, leisure, recreation and green space. The national budget for the land and property programme is £254 million for the current financial year, allocated to the different regions on the basis of relative economic, social and physical need, as well as on-going commitments to projects. The north-west's share of the budget is £81 million.

In addition, English Partnerships is taking forward a national coalfield programme, which involves working with RDAs to assist coalfield communities who are suffering deprivation as a result of pit closures. An investment package of more than £354 million over three years is in place. In part, that might answer the point made by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton), who quoted figures suggesting that spending declined between 1994 and 1998. In the light of previous discussions with the hon. Gentleman on Government spending figures, I want to examine, not merely the two figures that he plucked out of it, but the entire picture, which is often rather different.

I should make two important points: first, for 1998-99, we operated according to the previous Government's spending plans; secondly, and more significantly, money for regeneration comes from many different budgets, not just the one to which he referred. I have mentioned some of them, such as English Partnerships' national coalfield programme. In the north-west, 26 hectares of land at the former Agecroft colliery, near Salford, have been reclaimed and serviced. The land is ready for development, and developers are showing a strong interest.

I appreciate that there are concerns about the budgets that will be available to RDAs and English Partnerships as receipts from the sale of industrial properties begin to decline. The long-term resource requirements of RDAs are being considered in the 2000 spending review. The hon. Members for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake) and for East Worthing and Shoreham invited me to give an insight into the current spending round. Far be it from me, at my lowly level in government, to make commitments on behalf of Her Majesty's Treasury. However, my Department has made clear to the Treasury the importance that we attach to reclaiming derelict land and making it attractive to developers, and recycling money in some of the ways that the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington suggested. He and my hon. Friend the Member for Halton can rest assured that their points about VAT and the greenfield levy have been put to the Chancellor by various parties over a long period, and my right hon. Friend is well aware of the arguments. Indeed, I recall making some of those arguments, too, in a previous incarnation. However, I am now a servant of the Government and everything that I say has to be strictly in line with the official position, which is that the Chancellor is considering all such matters.

Mr. Pike: On VAT, the Government have made it clear that the door has not been closed—it may not be wide open, but it is at least ajar. Does my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary agree that it is up to all of us who believe that there is a case for VAT to be equalised between new build and renovation to make that case very strongly to the Treasury?

Mr. Mullin: I certainly agree that the Treasury is the right place to make that representation and I would not prevent my hon. Friend or other hon. Members from making those points to the Chancellor. I think that he is probably well aware of them already, but repetition can do no harm.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halton made a number of very helpful suggestions. His first two—the introduction of a strategic plan and framework for dealing with contaminated sites rather than pepperpotting resources on an ad hoc basis, and the bringing together of different funding streams and bodies working on contaminated land issues—are the reasons why we set up the regional development agencies, which we hope are beginning to make progress in those respects.

I shall certainly reflect on my hon. Friend's proposal for a task force similar to the coalfields regeneration initiative within English Partnerships to tackle severely chemically contaminated sites, although it might, to some extent, be at odds with his earlier suggestion, in which he wanted everything brought together. I have already dealt with the introduction of a greenfield development levy; the same point was raised by the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington.

My hon. Friend mentioned greater use of landfill tax credits to remediate chemically contaminated sites. We stated in the waste strategy published a week or two ago that we are reviewing the use to which the landfill tax credits are put. That proposal is one possibility. The introduction of a separate strand of national lottery good causes to deal with especially large and problematic contaminated sites is a matter that my hon. Friend must pursue with our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport. As hon. Members have pointed out, some lottery money has already been spent on projects involving contaminated land, the best example of which is the millennium village in Greenwich.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington made the reasonable point that we must do all that we can—perhaps we are not yet doing enough—to increase the amount of new development on brownfield sites. One of the difficulties is that there tend to be more brownfield sites in the north of England, where there is least development pressure, and fewer in the south of England, where there is greatest pressure. All Governments have to face that difficulty. My hon. Friend the Member for Halton made the point that some brownfield sites are not suitable for development—they are, in effect, blackfield sites, on which houses should never be built. He cited the example of the Weston quarry.

The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham asked several detailed and difficult questions, and, having given them mature consideration, I shall probably have to write him a letter setting out some of the replies. One or two of his points were of a pettifogging nature, if he will forgive my saying so; they were attempts to score points, and do not merit a reply. On his question about insurance, he might be interested in a research project on the management of financial risks that is reaching its conclusion. It is funded by DETR and organised by the Construction Industry Research and Information Association. Its report is to be published soon and I commend it to the hon. Gentleman. That is all that I can usefully say in response to the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham, save that we can all learn from his point about promoting insurance underwriting in the light of the American experience.

In conclusion, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Halton for drawing this serious problem to the attention of the Chamber. Those of us who represent the older industrial areas have more reason than most to confront the consequences of our industrial legacy. The Government take that very seriously, and a great deal has already been done. Although I cannot promise that the problems will be solved overnight, I can offer the sustained commitment to addressing them for which my hon. Friend asked.

Partnership is the key to change; it cannot all be achieved by Government or local authorities. The polluters must also play a part. I am glad to say that in respect of those who are the most responsible, of which ICI is one, that is what is happening.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The debate has come to an end a few moments before time. As the initiator of the next debate, the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) is present, and the Minister has arrived in the nick of time, we can progress immediately to the next debate, which concerns the Government's response to the sixth report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life.

Standards in Public Life

11.26 am

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I have chosen to bring before the Chamber the report that was produced by Lord Neill to review the actions of the Select Committee on Standards and Privileges. Lord Neill is chairman of the Committee on Standards in Public Life, which reviews not only the House of Commons, but the House of Lords and other public institutions.

I am concerned about the fact that, although the report was produced six months ago, the Government have so far shown no inclination to bring its findings before the House of Commons. Those findings are extremely important, especially in view of the way in which the Standards and Privileges Committee has come to function in recent times. The recommendations would go a long way towards reinforcing public confidence in the House, which has become coloured, and to some extent eroded, by some of the proceedings that are currently associated with the Committee.

In October 1994, the former Prime Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), established the Standards and Privileges Committee to replace the Select Committee on Members' Interests, which was established in 1975. That Committee required Members to enter in a register any assets or earnings that might be considered to influence their political judgment. In connection with the establishment of the new Committee, another innovation was the introduction of a Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards to act as a conduit for complaints that people wished to submit to the Committee for consideration.

The tradition of Parliament disciplining its own Members goes back a long way. Such procedures were initially introduced to protect the parliamentary body from the Executive, which was inclined to intervene, in the form of the Crown or other bodies, to attempt to influence the decisions of Parliament—dramatically so, in the case of Charles I.

Recently, the Committee and the commissioner have assumed an altogether different complexion, in that they have become a conduit for members of the public to lodge complaints. Some of those complaints are sensible, some not so sensible and some are what courts of law would describe as litigious, and they can involve political opponents or, indirectly, newspapers. The aim is to get a Government Committee to consider matters under privilege—if the press had published details of a case de novo, libel action might have resulted. The Committee's role is considerably different from that which the former Prime Minister had in mind when he instituted it.

The first commissioner under the new regime was Sir Gordon Downey, who had previously been with the National Audit Commission. When he retired, he made several salient recommendations. He said that there should be a statute of limitation, and that complaints about matters that occurred more than seven years ago should not be taken up. It was difficult to produce relevant evidence from that long ago, and the need for hon. Members who were complained about to produce evidence in their defence would place inordinate burdens on them. He warned that a tit-for-tat political war might break out if parties sought to use the Committee as a political weapon. In fact, that is what happened—the war has been hotting up recently in a manner that does Parliament's reputation no good in the public's eyes, although it is helpful to the media because it generates much interesting copy.

An examination of some of the Committee's more recent judgments shows that it is not unreasonable to say that it has been used to whitewash the activities of some hon. Members, especially those of various Ministers. The commissioner made stringent criticisms of Ministers, but the Committee did not take them up, although if comparable complaints had been made against ordinary hon. Members, that might well have solicited the demand for an apology to the House. The system can also be used to intimidate hon. Members. I pray in aid the recent case involving the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone), whose face did not seem to fit some of the Government's criteria for the office that he was seeking. I do not blame simply the Labour party in this context—both parties have had a go.

Since the Committee's inception, about 50 or 60 hon. Members have been reported to it. The fact that the numbers are increasing is surprising—when the new rules were in place and the new intake of hon. Members realised that a different regime was in operation, one might have expected the numbers to decline.

Interestingly, those hon. Members who are reported are almost exclusively from the Labour or Conservative parties—the Liberal Democrats do not seem to feature. That may reflect their political chances of being in government, although there may be skeletons in their cupboard. Even the Prime Minister has been reported to the Committee, and we are still awaiting the outcome. That places the commissioner in a significant dilemma—to criticise and to bring charges against the Prime Minister would be novel and the process would be fraught with overtones that hon. Members would understand. Two previous Prime Ministers have also been reported. The great and the good are not exempt from the process—everyone appears to be in the firing line. Some will say that that is how it should be.

If a complaint is made with enough substantiating evidence, it will go forward and a report will be produced along with documents and other information that may be of great interest to newspapers. Sometimes, a complaint will undoubtedly have been initiated indirectly by a newspaper—the press will have a field day because they would be protected from libel action.

In December 1999, when the Committee had been in existence for five years, Lord Neill presented a review of its functioning, in which he made a number of important recommendations that I believe the Government and the House should consider and would wish to implement, not least in defence of the reputation of the House, because this tit-for-tat war is hotting up rather than receding. Far from protecting the reputation of the House, the Committee is open to manipulation by a number of bodies that have a view or a dislike of a certain hon. Member, or may simply try to discourage that hon. Member from pursuing a course of action that the trade union or organisation happens not to like. That impinges on the hon. Member's right to free speech or may influence his or her decision to pursue certain courses of action or types of investigation.

There is no doubt that the structure of the committee lends itself to those criticisms. It is based on the Select Committee procedure. The Neill committee does not go so far as to say that that is possibly a wrong formula, but it makes a number of criticisms of the formula. We all know that membership of Select Committees is based on the relative numbers of the parties in the House, so the Government have a predominance of members on the Committee. The present Committee has eight members of the Labour party, two Conservatives, one Liberal Democrat and an independent. As it now deals not simply with matters such as "What did you put in the register?", but goes much deeper into what would be matters of legal complaint if they were made outside the House, the nature of the Committee, as Lord Neill says, must be looked at and the balance of members on it made more even.

Lord Neill also points out that the Chairman is always a member of the Government. However much we respect the individual who holds that office, he says that that could be politically influential in weighting the opinions. He believes that the Chairman should not be drawn from the ruling party.

Lord Neill also says that hon. Members who are indicted—the Committee functions as a court of law—or are in the firing line have no redress against the committee's decision. Indeed, they do not know what it will be until the report is printed and they have two hours in which to review the report. Unless they have made an earlier plea, they have no opportunity to request a delay in the implementation of the report, so although they may have thought that the commissioner's position and their point of view were closely aligned, they find themselves without any redress and perhaps with no time to deal with the matters in detail.

Lord Neill deals with that point. He emphasises that individuals who disagree with the Committee's decision should have a right of appeal before an independent judge, or a person with judicial experience, and before two senior Members of the House. They may also require help in complying with the commissioner's demands for information, if the investigations are extensive. Lord Neill says that they should be given that help and granted legal assistance if they opt for a review of the committee's findings before an independent judge.

In the recent past, a Member of Parliament was accused of neglect by a disgruntled constituent and it seemed that the matter would be brought to court. The House considered whether legal expenses should be paid with parliamentary assistance in such cases. The response was favourable and the Government are considering what the next step should be. There is a strong case for Members of Parliament, as for any professional body, to have some form of insurance for legal expenses, and whether that is administered through the House or by individuals is a matter for consideration.

Before I came to the House, I was a business woman and carried legal expenses insurance. One never knows whether a customer might find fault with one's service or goods and it is necessary to protect oneself. Employers also need legal expenses insurance to cover the possibility of an employee going to an industrial tribunal. Members of Parliament are in a similar position and more vulnerable than previously. The well-publicised, "open sesame" system invites complaints that would not have been thought significant in the past. Such complaints are often more related to the political nature of this institution than to straightforward offences which, in other circumstances, might be subject to litigation.

Lord Neill said that there is no doubt that Members of Parliament are vulnerable to such complaints and suggested that we should bear that in mind when examining his recommendations. Hard cases make bad law and the setting up of the Committee was a reaction to a number of initiatives mounted by the Government when in opposition. It led to a reaction that may prove inappropriate and, if we pursue this line, require assistance for hon. Members who become caught up in it. It is time consuming and damaging to those concerned if newspapers become involved. The newspapers have the opportunity to report matters which, had they raised them de novo, might have resulted in libel actions by hon. Members to protect their reputations. Page 30 of the Neill report states:

> Given the politically-charged environment within which MPs work, it is likely that ill-founded complaints will be made from time to time in order to discredit the accused MP. It would be naïve to think otherwise.

When considering its general reputation with the public in pursuit of its legitimate political goals, the House should consider what we do about such complaints. Once upon a time, they might have been brushed aside because, in the old days, they did not create such a stir when hon. Members tended to trust each other to be honourable. The Committee has taken a political perspective, which I do not believe was intended, and both its structure and method of functioning are an abuse or contradiction of natural justice, which is the right to have a defence and to be tried by an independent body. All Committee members are related in some way to the hon. Member under investigation, either politically or because they know him. People who make judgments in our courts must prove that they have no acquaintance with the person whom they are judging. If that principle were applied to the Committee, its members would be excused from duty. For that reason, we need an independent judicial element, perhaps in the form of the commissioner. There must be a right of appeal to an independent body if all else fails so that the hon. Member and, to an extent, the House believe that the matter has been handled with complete independence.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. The hon. Gentleman did not notify me that he wanted to speak. I am not sure whether he has asked the Minister or the initiator of the debate for permission. I shall therefore call the Minister to respond.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Cabinet Office (Mr. Graham Stringer): I congratulate the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) on securing the debate. The sixth report of the Neill committee is undoubtedly an important matter. The committee chairman set up the report in March 1999. Hearings were held between the middle of June and July and it took six months before the report was published in January 2000. It covers a wide range of issues that are of interest to Members of Parliament, Ministers, civil servants, special advisers and lobbying and all-party groups, and that are relevant to sponsorship of Government activities, public appointments, proportionality in public appointments, task forces and business appointments.

The sixth report reviews the Nolan committee's first report, which made 55 recommendations. It contains 45 recommendations which, as the hon. Lady said, cover a range of important matters. For that reason, the Government have taken time to consider the issues in detail. She began her speech by saying that she did not know when we were going to reply to the report. In response to a written question from the hon. Member for Worthing, West (Mr. Bottomley), my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said yesterday that the Government intend to report before the end of this Session. That is some comfort for the hon. Lady.

Hon. Members should welcome Lord Neill's declaration that there is less cause for concern about the disreputable or dishonest behaviour that characterised the period before the Standards and Privileges Committee was established. It is important to remind ourselves of the environment that existed in the early to mid-1990s when Members of the House were accused of and proved to be taking cash for questions. There was a feeling of sleaze and all of us in public life, no matter how honourably the vast majority of us behaved, were affected by the bad reputations of others. It is to be welcomed that Lord Neill has recognised that the situation has improved. Anthony King, who was originally a member of the Nolan committee, said in his evidence to the sixth inquiry that, if it had not been for Neil Hamilton—this is probably the one good thing that Neil Hamilton did for parliamentary procedure—the dark places and the decline in standards of the late 1980s and early 1990s would not have been looked into.

I welcome the process that has been undertaken. Not only did Lord Neill's committee say that an improvement had been made, but its report focused on a shift away from the direct influence on hon. Members and people in public life by the payment of cash to the indirect influence of lobbying. Lord Neill was considering the matters that I listed when he produced the first report.

In some ways, the hon. Lady leaves me in a difficult position. Many of the points that she made are matters for the House to consider after the Government have reported. In preparing for this debate, however, I have taken the trouble to read many of the reports published by the Standards and Privileges Committee. I was present when the hon. Lady was herself the focus of one of those reports. I was present in the Chamber to hear her speech and the comments of other hon. Members who contributed to the debate. I read the report on her case, as well as other reports. It is only fair to say that I could see no evidence of political bias in the reports. The vast majority of the reports are unanimous. I do not think that anyone would accuse the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell), who is a member of the Standards and Privileges Committee, of political bias for or against any of the political parties represented in Parliament. As I said, the Committee has reached many unanimous decisions.

The hon. Lady's point about appeals is, in the final analysis, a matter for the House, but it is worth while commenting on it now. She was absolutely right: Lord Neill said in his recommendations to the Committee on Standards and Privileges that different processes should be put in place and that there should be an appeals process. It was made clear during the debate to which I referred, however, that that process would not have applied to the hon. Lady's case.

Lord Neill is very specific. I shall quote from paragraph 3.22 of the sixth report, which lists classifications of allegations, on which he makes proposals. Item A on the list is allegations of misconduct amounting to a criminal offence.

The report contains a clear recommendation that such matters should be handed over to the courts. It goes on to list the following categories:

B. allegations of serious misconduct not amounting to a criminal offence, the facts of which are in dispute (contested allegations of serious misconduct);

C. allegations of other misconduct, the facts of which are in dispute (contested allegations of other misconduct);

D. any allegation of misconduct not amounting to a criminal offence, the facts of which are not in dispute (non-contested cases);

E. malicious or frivolous allegations of misconduct.

In the hon. Lady's case, it was clear that the facts were not in dispute, as was pointed out in the debate about the matter. Lord Neill's recommendations relate to cases in which there is dispute about the facts, in which there should be an independent appeals process. I wanted to make that clear, because I did not want it to be misconstrued outside the House.

Many of the other points made by the hon. Lady formed a specific attack on the integrity of those who serve on that Committee. It is outrageous to suggest that those hon. Members, from all parties, would want to whitewash Ministers or that the Committee is being manipulated. There is no evidence of that. One or two unwarranted allegations were made against hon. Members, and I hope that the hon. Lady will withdraw those remarks. She used those unfounded allegations to make her case that the House should not regulate itself. Like many of the points that she made, that is a matter for the House of Commons and not for the Government. On those issues, she will find herself in a small minority.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Is the Minister aware that there would be a wider audience for his remarks if the Committee on Standards and Privileges were not meeting at this moment? Would he confirm that all hon. Members are under a duty to support the commissioner in her inquiries, so that facts can be put to the Committee and, if appropriate, to the House?

Mr. Stringer: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that information. I was not aware of that fact, although there is obviously more interest in Westminster Hall today than for most debates. It is a matter of great importance, and, as Members of Parliament, it is our responsibility to take an interest in such matters.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Before the Minister sits down, will he express an opinion on the other point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), when she referred to the constraints placed on hon. Members when defending themselves before the Committee, and the lack of resources allowing them to do so?

Mr. Stringer: The hon. Lady made a sound point. The Government will consider it and, in time, we shall give our response in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The debate has come to an end three minutes before time. We therefore move on to the next debate, which is initiated by the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East (Dr. Kumar).

Cleveland Police

11.57 am

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East): Some seven months ago, I spoke in a similar debate on Operation Lancet—a Police Complaints Authority probe into alleged corruption in Cleveland police. I need to update the House on the progress, or lack of it, on that matter, which is vital to the policing of Teesside. Since that debate, many people in my constituency and throughout Teesside have been in touch with me asking for the matter to be kept under the spotlight of parliamentary scrutiny. That debate touched the pulse of the people, which is why I raise the matter once again.

Operation Lancet is the probe under which Detective Superintendent Ray Mallon, famed for his pioneering work of zero tolerance policing in Britain, has been suspended for more than two and a half years. His suspension was accompanied by the suspension of another seven Cleveland officers. It is with regret that I have to tell the House that the questionable activities of that inquiry have continued for seven months. More serious, I must inform the House that it seems that we and the Teesside public have been misled about the true cost of the operation. Those costs are paid by the public purse, which causes me great concern.

The Government are rightly committed to modernisation and to justice and opportunity for all, rather than to allowing the old boy network to rule public services. It is time for a complete overhaul of the way in which the police are policed. It is time to bring in checks and balances to ensure that police officers act in the best interest of the taxpayers who fund them rather than in their interest and that of their friends.

The handling of Operation Lancet has raised such serious questions about the misuse of public funds and the perversion of justice that it is time for a public inquiry to ensure that the truth comes out. Operation Lancet has been flawed from the start. The crucial flaw came when Cleveland's chief constable and the Police Complaints Authority placed in charge of the inquiry a Cleveland officer who had, at best, limited experience of leading major crime investigations. That has contributed to the rambling, unfocused way in which the operation has stumbled on. The officer leading the investigation had recently been in charge of the CID at Middlesborough police station. Many of the 40 officers allocated to his investigation team had also served there. They were effectively investigating themselves—a clear conflict of interest.

Sadly, senior officers involved with Operation Lancet have repeatedly failed the public. Detective Superintendent Mallon was suspended on 1 December 1997 by Cleveland's acting deputy chief constable Robert Turnbull. Most people would make such a decision knowing that they should take—and could be expected to take—responsibility for the consequences. Not in this case, however. Mr. Turnbull left in controversial circumstances, pocketed a large pension and commutation courtesy of the Teesside taxpayer and took up a senior position in the sun-kissed Turks and Caicos Islands.

Mr. David Earnshaw, who became acting assistant chief constable, took over Mr. Turnbull's mantle. He insisted that Ray Mallon and his colleagues remained suspended. He also did not feel that the issue merited being seen through to the end. He has now quit the Cleveland police, pocketing a vastly enhanced pension and commutation in excess of £150,000, thanks to his activities on Lancet. However, his presence is still felt in the corridors of the Cleveland police headquarters because he has returned to take up a newly created senior civilian post. He is not the only officer who has left the Cleveland police who has been offered immediately a civilian post that had not been advertised openly. That smacks of a jobs-for-the-boys attitude. Such an attitude is clearly contrary to the equal opportunities policy that the Government and, presumably, Cleveland police have signed up to.

A litany of senior police officers has fallen by the wayside while Operation Lancet was in their control. Mr. Richard Brunstrom, Cleveland's other assistant chief constable and another person with oversight for Operation Lancet, slipped away quietly for the possibly quieter life of the North Wales police.

Mr. Andrew Timpson, the outside Warwickshire chief constable appointed to oversee Operation Lancet, was also replaced in controversial circumstances following complaints about his conduct. The man who replaced Mr. Timpson, and who so far seems to have survived the curse of Lancet—Assistant Chief Constable Lloyd Clarke of West Yorkshire police—clearly had severe reservations about the way in which the operation was evolving. Those reservations have taken root and Mr. Clarke has removed several of the officers who were helping to conduct the inquiry. I am told that he has completed his investigation and returned to West Yorkshire. I suspect that he is writing the report. The public surely have a right to expect senior police officers who launch costly inquiries to stay in post until the inquiries are complete. It is wrong that such officers can dodge possible disciplinary repercussions simply by retiring or otherwise leaving the force. A basic tenet of English law is that justice delayed is justice denied. The delays that beset Operation Lancet despite Mr. Clarke's latest efforts are still intolerable.

Ray Mallon was suspended from duty on 1 December 1997 for alleged activity—which he vehemently denies—that could be construed as criminal. In January 1999 he submitted to the Lancet inquiry a lengthy statement dealing with every allegation against him. The file on Mr. Mallon has been passed from the police to the Crown Prosecution Service, then to Treasury Counsel and finally to the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions, where it has remained since December. In January, Mr. Mallon was informed that the criminal investigation into him was complete. Will my hon. Friend the Solicitor-General explain why, if the investigation was complete and the Treasury Counsel recommendation was passed on seven months ago, Mr. Mallon still has not been told whether he faces prosecution? I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will assure the House that the Director of Public Prosecutions is not letting political interest overtake justice.

The costs of Operation Lancet are a very serious matter. They are expressed in two forms—the direct cost to the taxpayer and the cost of the loss of public confidence in the police force. That loss of confidence is based on the perception that a police force that appears to be totally introverted and obsessed with internal inquiries does not have its heart in fighting crime. I received a letter last week from June Goodchild, a well-respected member of the community who is vice-chairman of Easterside community council, who wrote:

In the summer of 1997—

that is, before Lancet—

we had a brilliant relationship with both the Community Team and also the Police Chiefs.

However, she states:

Since the Lancet investigation began we have been very lucky to even see a Policeman.

She adds:

I would like to know why members of the Public of all ages...feel they have no quality of life and also feel very unsafe, surely this should be the opposite, when we pay so much for the Police we have a right to feel safe but after so many complaints not everyone can be wrong.

The Cleveland police force recently announced its latest crime figures. A well-spun press release trumpeted the falling number of crimes such as burglaries, drug offences and car crime, but also showed, in an almost hidden paragraph, that the detection rate had dropped. Simple arithmetic should show that there should be a rough correlation between a drop in recorded crime and clear-ups. Such a correlation does not exist in Cleveland. Why? Perhaps the press release gives a clue to that, too. It states that the drop in the detection rate is thought to have been affected by a number of long running, serious and complicated inquiries which have tied up officers.

Many of those inquiries are, of course, operational, designed to investigate and solve serious crimes, but hidden behind that innocuous phrase is the truth that Lancet and the ever-increasing number of subsidiary inquiries are tying the force in knots. That means a serious cost to the public. Many of my constituents tell me their fears and their stories of stolen property that is not recovered, stolen cars that are never seen again, personal injury from assaults and, above all, the loss of confidence that police response will be speedy and criminals will be apprehended. That loss of confidence will take a long time to be repaired.

The direct costs of Operation Lancet can and should be quantified. Last month I tabled a written question about how much it had cost and was told by the Minister of State, Home Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), that the cost at that time was £2.6 million. It has been brought to my attention that the police authority papers over the three financial years show the cost to be far in excess of that. In addition, the continuing salary costs of eight suspended officers bring the real costs, I suspect, to double the figure that the House was given. I must ask for an explanation of the House being misled in that way, and whether there are other costs of which the House has not been informed.

It is imperative that those costs are given open and honestly. After all, they are coming out of the pockets of Teesside taxpayers who are picking up the bill and have a right to know what it has cost them. Therefore, I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that an independent auditor should be brought in to begin an assessment of the true cost of Operation Lancet and associated inquiries. Only then will the public be able to judge whether they have had best value. I know that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is considering reforms to both the mechanism and methodology of the Police Complaints Authority, which I applaud.

I suggest that the lessons learned from an inquiry into how Operation Lancet was handled will prove invaluable to such a shake-up. That will show how not to do it. It is not only the eight suspended officers who have suffered in Cleveland; the consequences of their suspensions have brought pain and suffering to their families as well as to the suspended officers themselves. The rumours and stories that abound do nothing for the morale of decent rank and file policemen and women. At the start of the inquiry, the Police Complaints Authority suggested that wholesale corruption, widespread brutalism and drug abuse were rife in the Middlesbrough police district. That has so far proved to be utterly unfounded and is a gross slur on the hard-working officers of Cleveland police—men and women who are a credit to their force and to their service. The least that those people deserve is an apology from the Police Complaints Authority.

I shall end by reiterating the basic facts of the matter. Eight Cleveland police officers have now been suspended for more than two and a half years without a single criminal disciplinary charge being levelled against them. The cost of Operation Lancet now stands at £5 million, which has been funded by the Cleveland taxpayer. The buck stops with the Government, who must explain what is happening. The public in my constituency have been hit by the largest hike in police precepts in Britain, yet those responsible for launching the inquiry have deserted the sinking ship. Moreover, they have walked the plank, but with very fat pay-offs and the knowledge that they have avoided any possible disciplinary repercussions. I urge my hon. Friend to agree to hold a public inquiry into the Operation Lancet fiasco once it is officially over, so that there is never again such an abuse of public office and public money in the police service.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Charles Clarke): May I begin, as is conventional, by thanking my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East (Dr. Kumar) for raising those issues, as he did in the previous debate to which he referred on 10 November last year? I am acutely aware of the interest that the inquiry continues to attract, both nationally and, more importantly, among the constituents of my hon. Friend and his colleagues in the area covered by the Cleveland police.

I shall begin by referring to what the Government are doing overall. I made a statement to the House a month or so ago to launch our whole approach to police complaints. There have been two inquiries; one by KPMG and another published on the same day by Liberty, which identified the best ways in which to fulfil our commitment to establishing an independent police complaints system. One of the key drivers in that is to reduce the time that is taken up by police complaints.

Unfortunately, the example from Cleveland described by my hon. Friend is not unique in terms of the length of time that the inquiry has taken for a variety of reasons, although the scale of that inquiry is more substantial than most of those undertaken by the Police Complaints Authority. We believe that, for some of the reasons stated by my hon. Friend, the system should be reformed. We are committed to reforming the system and have published a consultation paper based on those two reports, to which we are seeking early responses so that we can take action as rapidly as possible. Therefore, I have great sympathy with my hon. Friend's main point that the length of the inquiry has led to difficulties in delivering policing, and those difficulties must be addressed. However, it is still the case that the performance of the Cleveland constabulary is good, and morale in the force, according to Her Majesty's inspectorate, is also good.

Some of the language used by my hon. Friend was unwarranted, but, before I explain why, I shall put the facts of the case in context. The inquiry began in late 1997, following serious and disturbing allegations against a number of officers, not only Mr. Mallon. It would be inappropriate for us to discuss the details of the cases under investigation while the possibility of criminal and disciplinary proceedings exists. The Crown Prosecution Service is considering a number of files from Operation Lancet. The Lancet team began submitting files to the CPS in November 1998. The CPS referred them to Treasury Counsel for advice, and is now considering those papers. The investigation team asked to make further inquiries, after which, in the near future, the CPS hopes to be able to make decisions.

More files were submitted to the Crown Prosecution Service last year. Many of them have also been referred to Treasury Counsel, and I understand that there is material still to be submitted. That material will also need to be carefully considered, before decisions are taken on possible criminal proceedings. Responsibility for such matters rests with the Director of Public Prosecutions, and I know that he is taking a personal interest in the case.

I must rebut my hon. Friend's suggestion that there is any question of political interests conflicting with justice. The sole responsibility of the Director of Public Prosecutions in this area is to secure justice. No political interest conflicts with that, and it would be wrong if it did. That is not how the DPP operates.

The chief constable and the Police Complaints Authority are responsible for considering the disciplinary aspects of the inquiry and for determining whether officers should face disciplinary proceedings. The Police Complaints Authority has the power to recommend or direct that the chief constable bring disciplinary proceedings, if there is evidence that an officer has behaved improperly. The Home Secretary has a role in the process as the appellate authority and may be called on to consider any disciplinary appeals from officers arising from the inquiry.

Public confidence in the police service rests entirely on its reputation for integrity. That is why allegations, from whatever quarter, must be properly addressed and investigated. The length of time taken is, as I have acknowledged, a serious concern, but it would be wrong if serious allegations of the kind that have been made were not investigated. When allegations of misconduct are made, bringing the reputation of the service into question, there must be thorough scrutiny. That is why I am pleased that Cleveland acted robustly, initiating an investigation into the allegations, although I share the concern that the inquiry should be brought to a conclusion as swiftly as possible.

My hon. Friend referred to costs. As I told him in my answers, the overall cost of the Lancet inquiry, to the end of April, was £2.6 million. The costs can be broken down as follows: for Cleveland officers, including salaries, overtime and travel and subsistence, they are £1.271 million; for officers from Northamptonshire, Warwickshire and West Yorkshire, including salaries, overtime and travel and subsistence, they are £1.169 million; for other costs, such as accommodation and office expenditure, they are £182,000. Those are the costs, and they are based on figures given to us by Cleveland police. The only explanation that I can give for the difference from the figures quoted by my hon. Friend is that the figures that I have just given, which I also gave him in an earlier parliamentary answer, do not include the salaries of the suspended officers.

Dr. Kumar: The report produced by Cleveland police on budgeting provision shows that supplies and services for an inquiry that was unforeseen at budget time created an additional cost of £266,000. Similarly, for 1999, the cost of the special inquiry was significantly in excess of the original £1 million budget—an excess of £1.087 million. In the budget for this year, the cost of the special inquiry has exceeded outturn forecasts by £950,000—a total of £1.95 million. It is in the Cleveland authority's papers; that is where the money is going. It has not budgeted for it, and it is not accounted for in the answer that the Minister has given.

Mr. Clarke: The figures that I have given are based entirely on those given to my Department by Cleveland police authority. That is the way in which such things are done, and that is how we should proceed. I shall of course look at the detailed figures that my hon. Friend has given, and ask my officials to discuss them with Cleveland police authority. Perhaps my saying that the overall cost of the Lancet inquiry was calculated to the end of April has caused some confusion. Another possible explanation is that, as I said, the figures do not include the salaries of suspended officers.

My point is that the information that I have given this Chamber is not misleading—it is open and honest, and I regret that my hon. Friend has decided to use such language. An independent audit is not necessary, nor would a public inquiry help matters. However, in the light of my hon. Friend's comments I am willing to ask my officials to discuss the precise figures and try to establish whether there is any sense in which the published figures do not correctly represent the total cost to the police authority. However, I should reiterate that I do not believe that there is any inaccuracy in what I have said to this Chamber.

On personnel, Lloyd Clarke, the deputy chief constable for West Yorkshire, replaced Andrew Timpson, the former chief constable for Warwickshire, as investigating officer for Operation Lancet, after allegations came to light about Mr. Timpson's conduct. Those allegations were made in relation to Warwickshire constabulary, and were unconnected with Operation Lancet. Mr. Timpson subsequently resigned his post as chief constable, but the process had nothing whatever to do with Operation Lancet.

[Mr. Clarke]

I acknowledge that the departure of Mr. Timpson as officer in command of the inquiry was unfortunate, and partly explains the time that the process has taken. However, Mr. Clarke, who was swiftly appointed in his place, took forward with vigour the task of completing the inquiry. Several officers from Cleveland who are working on the inquiry have now returned to other duties and, as my hon. Friend said, Mr. Clarke's team has relocated to West Yorkshire, which will prove more cost-effective at this stage of the inquiry.

Eight officers are still suspended from duty, and Cleveland police regularly reviews such suspensions. Matters involving the suspension of police officers are governed by the Police (Discipline) Regulations 1985, and unless the chief officer decides otherwise, suspensions may continue until a decision is taken not to bring disciplinary charges, or the case is resolved. As I said, my hon. Friend is right to draw attention to delays in the process, and I hope that they will be rapidly resolved.

My hon. Friend also made some points about senior officers. Officers who have completed 30 years' service are legally entitled to retire on pension and seek further employment. He asked whether that is right. Outstanding issues of discipline need to be considered. Such matters arise in relation to this inquiry and elsewhere, but the law of the land is as I described it.

Mr. David Earnshaw, to whom my hon. Friend referred, retired from the police force on 31 March 2000. He had completed 33 years' service, and had deferred his retirement on two previous occasions at the request of the chief constable. Mr. Earnshaw performed the duties of acting assistant chief constable from 8 February until his retirement, and was therefore entitled to a pension commensurate with that rank. Mr. Earnshaw has been employed by the chief constable on a fixed-term contract in a civilian advisory role to Operation Teak, which is investigating alleged police corruption and is completely separate from Operation Lancet. Operation Teak is at a crucial stage, and the Crown Prosecution Service is considering relevant papers.

Dr. Kumar: My point related to equal opportunity policy. The Government and Cleveland police force might believe in the equal opportunity policy, but they do not demonstrate as much in reality. The post to which Mr. Earnshaw was appointed was not advertised, and the Minister cannot avoid that fact.

Mr. Clarke: The tone that my hon. Friend is adopting is entirely unacceptable in a debate of this kind. Mr. Earnshaw was employed on a fixed-term contract in a civilian advisory role. As far as I am aware, the chief constable fulfilled his proper obligations in respect of the appointments procedure, and in a manner entirely compatible with the equal opportunities policy and other relevant matters. I realise that my hon. Friend is angry about the case of Mr. Earnshaw, and he is entitled to express that anger, but the allegations that due process was not correctly followed are entirely wrong.

The allegations against Mr. Earnshaw were fully investigated by Mr. Williamson, deputy chief constable of Nottinghamshire constabulary, under the supervision of the Police Complaints Authority. I understand that the police authority considered an interim report on the investigation on Mr. Earnshaw's final day of service. The report said that there appeared to be no evidence to substantiate the allegations made against Mr. Earnshaw and that, therefore, there was no reason to defer his retirement. The result of the completed investigation was reported to the police authority on 8 June, a few days ago.

My hon. Friend also mentioned the case of Richard Brunstrom. Nottinghamshire constabulary is continuing to investigate allegations made against Mr. Brunstrom, who is now deputy chief constable of North Wales. I understand that the investigation is expected to conclude shortly. The departure of Mr. Brunstrom to North Wales was unconnected to Operation Lancet.

As my hon. Friend described, Deputy Chief Constable Turnbull applied for the post of deputy commissioner in the Turks and Caicos islands on 30 November 1998 and was notified that he had been successful on 2 February 1999. Consequently, he retired from Cleveland police on 8 March 1999 after 32 years in the police service, including almost two years with Cleveland police. Mr. Turnbull retired for personal reasons, to enable him to take up the post abroad; his decision was not linked in any way to Operation Lancet.

I have tried to demonstrate as openly as I can that I sympathise with my hon. Friend's and his constituents' reasonable frustrations at the time taken to complete the inquiry and the way in which it has proceeded, with the changes of senior investigating officer throughout. His suggestion about the motivations of those involved in the inquiry is totally unwarranted. It would have been entirely wrong if we had not investigated properly the serious allegations of corruption in the force, because people must be confident that the police operate with complete integrity. It was therefore right to investigate the complaints, although I acknowledge that the time it has taken has led to a series of problems.

My hon. Friend is concerned about the quality of policing. In the HMIC report last year, general morale in the force was described as "buoyant". I understand, although I am open to correction, that the chief constable has been fully and publicly supported throughout this period by the chair and all members of the police authority. I have noted the strength of my hon. Friend's support and that of others for Cleveland police's positive policing methods.

My hon. Friend referred finally to a public inquiry and to the lack of confidence. The best way to establish—or re-establish if that is necessary—full confidence in Cleveland police force is to conclude the inquiry, which is now near conclusion, publish its reports openly and take whatever disciplinary measures are necessary, so that the people of Cleveland can be confident that there is no corruption in Cleveland police force. That is a course of action to which the Government are committed and which I believe the House as a whole would want them to take, in relation not only to Cleveland police but to other police forces. I see no merit in a public inquiry that simply keeps the uncertainty going longer at a time when, as my hon. Friend correctly says, we must address the issues, so that they can be seen to have been resolved openly and directly and as quickly as possible.

I conclude by urging my hon. Friend, who has campaigned strongly on this matter in debates in the House and in private representations and whose integrity in pursuing the case I fully respect—I understand his motivation entirely—to do what he can to ensure that when the issues are resolved, which I hope will be soon, the positive approach to policing in Cleveland that is so necessary will be re-established.

I have tried to answer the various points made by my hon. Friend and I hope that he will accept my comments in the spirit in which they are made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): We now move on to today's final debate in Westminster Hall. I call, for the second time this morning, Mr. Brake.

Mobility Services (Sutton)

12.30 pm

Mr. Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I feel a sense of déjà vu in appearing before you an hour after I last did so.

I am grateful for the opportunity to initiate this debate on mobility issues in the London borough of Sutton and beyond. Had time allowed, I should have liked to cover many aspects of mobility—for example, access to and from trains and platforms. I am sure that that subject will be discussed during a public meeting that I have organised with my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow), at which Connex South Central and Go-Via, the two train companies that are competing for the Connex franchise, will be represented. I should also like to have talked about the Londonwide Taxicard service.

I had anticipated that the Minister with responsibility for transport in London would respond to the debate, because mobility involves transport as well as health-related issues. Nevertheless, I am pleased to see here the Minister of State, Department of Health. Most of my subject matter concerns the national health service rather than mobility transport.

I shall focus on four services in Sutton that provide services for people who are elderly or have a disability: the Shopmobility service, Banstead mobility centre, the medical engineering resource unit and the wheelchair service.

Transport and mobility are increasingly important as the population gets older and the number of people in the community with disabilities increases due to improvements in medical care. Many local facilities are dominated by much larger and more centralised services. That is especially true of the NHS, which has experienced successive mergers of trusts, such as the acute trust, the mental health service and the community trust. There is a risk that those mergers will make services less accessible to people who are not fully mobile. In Sutton, steps have been taken to create, as far as possible, a barrier-free society, including initiatives such as dropped kerbs, the freedom pass, buses that lower their platforms and developments at Sutton railway station—which will, with the exception of one platform, be accessible to people with mobility problems.

As the Minister will be aware, many people of limited mobility are unable to use public transport and therefore need an adapted car, electric wheelchair or special bus service. Generally speaking, a person with a disability should be enabled to move within a three or four mile radius of where they live, so that they can access health care, shops and other services that they need to use regularly.

The Shopmobility service can help with that. It is situated in St. Nicholas square in Sutton's shopping centre, has been established for more than 10 years, is open for six days a week and provides a free service to no fewer than 3,300 members. Members do not need to bring their wheelchair with them. They can arrive, leave their car, go shopping in the centre and return the wheelchair when they have finished.

[Mr. Tom Brake]

The Shopmobility service is funded by local authority traders and voluntary donations, and would benefit from increased ministerial recognition and support to ensure financial stability. Such is the renown of the service that people from Japan have come to Sutton to learn about the way in which it is provided.

I visited the medical engineering resource unit a couple of months ago. It has engineers on site who adapt computers and wheelchairs to make them usable by people who are more disabled than is normally the case. Children with weak arms, for example, require a sensitive control to operate their wheelchair or computer. The unit offers an excellent, constituency-based service.

I shall dwell in greater detail on the Banstead mobility centre. It is one of eight units that belong to Queen Elizabeth's Foundation for Disabled People. It was established nearly 20 years ago to assist disabled people to achieve an optimum level of outdoor mobility which would enrich the quality of their working and social life.

It recently received an Investors in People award and has been re-accredited with the Forum of Mobility Centres. It provides a service to people of all ages and disabilities, including, for instance—I shall not quote the full list with which I have been provided—those with strokes, multiple sclerosis, arthritis or cerebral palsy. The people who access the centre typically live within a 50-mile radius of it—it offers a valuable service to all London boroughs.

The centre has four main purposes: to provide information on mobility, assessments for relevant forms of transport, training and research. It has charitable status and is supported by Queen Elizabeth's Foundation for Disabled People and Ford. It provides free information to people with disabilities, family and friends about outdoor mobility. In a typical year, it takes about 8,000 phone calls from people who are seeking information and it receives between 300 and 400 visitors.

During the past couple of years, no fewer than 1,000 people have been to the centre for assessment as drivers, passengers or wheelchair users, and each assessment lasts for most of a day. There is a bungalow that people can use while they are taking an intensive driving course in preparation for their driving test and, critically, there is a track on site that can be used for practice and tests. The training programmes are many and varied—the centre provides training packages for people who want to pass their test and for driving instructors who want to specialise in disability work.

I draw the Minister's attention to a problem that the centre is experiencing. As tenants on the site, the centre has access to the private roadway of what was Queen Mary's children's hospital. Part of that site has subsequently been sold for residential development, which means that the road network to which the centre has access for tests has been halved. A copy of the relevant map was faxed to the Minister, and I hope that he is aware of the site's current layout.

The residential development has brought some benefits. For example, the developer created a new park—the site contains green-belt land—to ensure that the footprint of development was smaller than, or equal to, the previous development on the site. The park will bring enormous benefits. However, it will not increase the centre's access to safe roads on which people can practise driving and take their test. For that reason, the centre wants to purchase land on the site that is adjacent to the property. There is a football pitch close to the centre that has rarely, if ever, been used. It is certainly not in current use, and could be converted to create additional road space on which the drivers could practice. The Minister can see the location of that site on the map.

This point would perhaps have been more suited to the Minister with responsibility for transport in London, had he responded to the debate. However, I understand that there would not be an issue if a track were created on the site, in relation to its open land or green-belt status. The creation of a small amount of road space would not infringe any planning rules or regulations.

A further service on this site that I have not yet mentioned is the wheelchair service, which is funded by the NHS and provides a broad range of wheelchairs to more than 4,500 users a year. The Minister might be aware that this service has been quoted as an example of good practice at a recent meeting in Llandudno. The wheelchair service, the Banstead mobility service and the medical engineering resource unit are, therefore, all adjacent to one another on the same site.

I should like to emphasise to the Minister the importance of keeping together this cluster of organisations specialising in mobility issues. Their collaboration has developed in the past decade, and they share equipment and road space. It is important for people who want to access their services that all the services are located in the same place. If someone were coming not only to look at an adapted car, but to access the wheelchair service, he or she could do so in the same location, thereby reducing the amount of travel and avoiding the problems that someone with a disability might encounter if they had to access those services across a much wider area.

I also want to raise with the Minister the concern that the wheelchair service, which is now part of the larger South West London Community NHS trust—formerly the Merton and Sutton Community NHS trust—might be moved. I would discourage that, for the reasons that I have outlined.

We need to keep this cluster of organisations together: it could become a centre of excellence for the whole country, in relation to mobility services. The medical engineering resource unit, which has a website, receives requests from all over the world for the equipment and facilities that it provides. It makes this provision in a research and development capacity, rather than a production capacity. It is dependent on other organisations to develop commercially the products that it has developed in a trial environment. Another reason for keeping those services together is the fact that the wheelchair service and Banstead mobility centre provide modular courses that have received national accreditation on that site.

Finally, I should like to pose a small number of questions. I shall be quite happy if the Minister responds later in writing, particularly as some of my questions concern transport rather than health.

What assessment have the Government made of the role of the Shopmobility service in integrated transport? It is all well and good to get people to shopping centres on adapted bus services, but what can be done to integrate schemes such as Shopmobility into the transport picture? Are there any plans to extend the network of Shopmobility services throughout the United Kingdom, and what is being done to promote the scheme? I am sure that the Minister recognises the valuable work of that service in enabling housebound people to have access to shops and social activities. What is the Minister's view about keeping Banstead mobility centre, MERU and the wheelchair service together, and does he agree that that facilitates the exchange of information and ensures that the services remain accessible to users who want to make contact not just with one service, but perhaps two or three? Does he believe that the cluster of mobility services could be promoted as an example of best practice to encourage other regions to institute similar services? Will he confirm or deny whether there are plans to move the wheelchair service from Carshalton, and will he comment on allegations that managerial staff at the wheelchair service are not being consulted on plans about their future by managers in the NHS? Does he agree that the cluster is a good example of voluntary and statutory organisations working together and of joined-up mobility services?

I extend an invitation to the Minister from the Banstead mobility centre to visit the centre, as other Ministers and Members of Parliament have done, so that he can appreciate the importance of allowing those services to thrive together. With the Government's support, Carshalton could have a cluster of mobility services that is unique in the country.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Denham): I thank the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake) for providing the opportunity to discuss the provision of mobility services. I shall try to respond to the specific issues that he raised, although, as he said, some are the responsibility of other Departments. The Minister in my Department who deals with most of the day-to-day matters is in Committee, but I shall try to respond to them.

It may be helpful if I outline what the Government are doing to secure the future of the mobility service nationally and examine some of the local issues. We are committed to effective joint working across different organisations and one of the aims of last year's White Paper, "Modernising Government", was to remove the artificial barriers between different public services to ensure effective co-operation. We want a seamless and efficient provision of services.

Mobility services require close working across many different sectors and different Departments with joined-up government and strong partnership working from all stakeholders. We have tried to achieve that by working closely with colleagues in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and other Departments. Only last Friday, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport announced three-year funding for mobility centres. We are aware of their enormously valuable contribution in enabling disabled and older people to obtain impartial professional advice on driving and vehicle choice as well as on a wide range of other aspects of personal mobility. In last week's announcement, my hon. Friend said that my Department and the DETR had agreed to contribute more than £1 million jointly to the 11 English members of the Forum of Mobility Centres. That funding, which was secured for an initial period of three years subject to annual review, will be used by mobility centres to improve and expand their services and provide a comparable level of professional advice and service at all the centres.

As I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows, the recent chair of the Forum of Mobility Centres, Mrs. Morigue Cornwell, is the manager of Banstead mobility centre in his constituency. She has been leading the campaign for the funding to be secured, and I am pleased to say that Banstead mobility centre, as one of the leading centres in the country, will receive £78,000 from the fund this financial year. Indeed, Banstead mobility centre, which is a voluntary organisation and is part of Queen Elizabeth's Foundation for Disabled People, provides an excellent example of this service, and I take this opportunity to place on record our appreciation of and gratitude for the good work carried out there.

I want to relate a number of issues that the hon. Gentleman raised to his constituency interests. I am pleased to say that local stakeholders in Sutton are actively working together to plan for the future of mobility services. Indeed, I believe that Banstead mobility centre was represented at a planning seminar held last Friday for statutory and voluntary agencies involved in transport provision for older and disabled people. The seminar was held by Sutton's Disabilities Issues Group, which is part of Sutton's multi-agency planning structure, and included representatives from the South West London Community NHS trust and the local health authority, as well as the manager of London Transport's unit for disabled passengers. A wide cross-section of voluntary organisations was also represented, including South London Dial-a-Ride, Sutton Community Transport, Sutton Mencap, Sutton Volunteer Bureau, Sutton Alliance of Disabled People and Sutton People First.

The aim of the seminar was to establish key priorities in improving service provision for users. The hon. Gentleman will be pleased to know that it is generally recognised that, compared with some boroughs, Sutton has a well-developed range of accessible transport services. However, the seminar was about more than discussing problems: it identified a range of issues to improve service provision as well as two clear priorities for action. The first was the need to provide comprehensive information for users and service commissioners about what is available and how to obtain access to a service. The second was the need for better co-ordination of the range of services to enable the optimum use of resources, pooling them wherever possible. There was also a discussion about the way in which the transport infrastructure in Sutton can be improved to benefit those with mobility needs. Representatives will have an opportunity to give their organisation's views on the council's interim transport plan before the council finalises it in July.

We welcome the fact that an action plan will be drawn up following that meeting and that all those different organisations can work together in this way towards a common goal. It is a good example of joined-up working. The local efforts will be complemented by the work being done nationally to improve mobility services.

The hon. Gentleman rightly referred to the valuable contribution to local mobility of disabled and older people made by Shopmobility schemes. It started with three schemes in 1981, by 1987 there were 13 schemes and now more than 231 schemes are used by more than 200,000 people a year, who undertake about 1.5 million trips. The schemes vary in size and in the facilities that they offer. That is one of the reasons why there are no standard funding arrangements. Some are completely funded by local authorities, some are run by volunteers and others have a mixture of local authority and voluntary funding. The National Federation of Shopmobility, an independent registered charity that supports existing Shopmobility schemes and encourages the formation of such schemes throughout the United Kingdom, supports them.

We recognise the important role that Shopmobility schemes play in the chain of accessible local transport for disabled people. We believe that the decision to introduce such a scheme should be taken at a local level. The provision of schemes is also best dealt with at a local level, through the retail sector, as in the case of many shopping centres, or by local authorities, which are best placed to judge the needs of their areas.

It is worth noting that shopkeepers in many areas have reported a significant increase in their takings following the introduction of a Shopmobility scheme—not only because disabled people are good customers in shops to which they have access, but because their friends and families are more likely to shop in places where they can go together as a family or a group. I recognise the good reputation that has been earned by the Shopmobility scheme in Sutton, which offers services such as manual and powered wheelchairs and powered scooters, escorts, including escorts for visually impaired people, and parking for blue—formerly orange—badge holders within 40 m of the office.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Banstead mobility centre. As he will know, Merton, Sutton and Wandsworth health authority—supported by the local community NHS trust—has announced, following a process of public consultation, its intention to close Orchard Hill as a base for residential services for people with learning disabilities. That has caused concern among related users of the site, such as those to whom the hon. Gentleman referred. The proposed closure of Orchard Hill is subject to judicial review, which is due to be heard in the High Court in July. It would therefore be inappropriate for me to comment further, other than to say that I believe that the proposals for change have been made with residents' best interests at heart.

In relation to the work of Banstead mobility centre, the hon. Gentleman referred to the possible availability of the football pitch and the possible co-location of the mobility centre, the medical engineering resource unit and the wheelchair service. I shall bring him up to date on the current position. The land, along with the rest of the Orchard Hill site, is held by the NHS executive London regional office. It will take the request from Banstead mobility centre into account in determining the future use of the site, and fully assess it against all the other options. The local authority will deal with other issues, and any application will have to go through due process.

Mr. Brake: Does the Minister believe that Banstead mobility centre, which has been the tenant of the site for many years, should be given any priority in respect of the land sale?

Mr. Denham: I fully recognise the role that the centre plays, and pay tribute to its excellent work. However, it would be invidious of me to say that a group should be given priority without full knowledge of the competing priorities that might be involved. The claims and interests of Banstead mobility centre in applying for use of the land will be given appropriate consideration by the London regional office.

On a wider level, the trust has initiated a rapid review of its wheelchair services, which will deal with arrangements for the future delivery of those services, including the relationship between Sutton wheelchair services, Banstead mobility centre and the medical engineering resource unit. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the trust's review will carefully examine the issues surrounding the benefits of collocation that he discussed.

Mr. Brake: May I encourage the Minister to express a view on whether he thinks that collocation is the way forward?

Mr. Denham: Some of these issues are best dealt with by people who work at a local level with local stakeholders. It is not necessarily right for Ministers to say in Adjournment debates, "This must be the conclusion of a review which is currently under way and hasn't yet completed its work."

I want, above all, to assure the hon. Gentleman and his constituents that a process is in place to consider not only the future of wheelchair services but the strength of the arguments for collocation that he has put during today's debate. As Minister, I would not want to think that those arguments would go by default because no part of the system was charged with the responsibility of considering them. I am sure that the review will do so.

I hope that I have covered the majority of the points that the hon. Gentleman raised. If I find that any matters are outstanding, I shall write to him or draw them to the attention of my colleague at the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at One o'clock.

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Christians in Egypt

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Betts.]

9.30 am

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Last week, the first pedestrian bridge across the Thames in more than 100 years was opened. The new crossing is one of countless initiatives to mark the new millennium. While most people throughout our country continue to celebrate the start of the Christian calendar, I want to focus on pressures on the Coptic Church—the remnant of believers from the first days of Christianity. I am sad to report that while we celebrated the start of the millennium with fireworks, laughter and parties, in Egypt the new year was ushered in with a massacre of 21 Coptic believers. It was the worst episode of violence against Christians in decades.

It is easy to forget that, although Christianity started in the middle east, Christians in that region face persecution and possible extinction. While mass genocide in places such as Rwanda rightly grabs our attention, the plight of the people we are considering is important and relevant. I heard disturbing details of the persecution of the Coptic Church at a meeting organised by the Jubilee Campaign, the British human rights group. I met a Coptic bishop and Dr. Helmy Guirguis, the president of the United Kingdom Coptic Association, when they came to my home. Those men gave deeply moving accounts of atrocities against the Coptic Church in Egypt. It was strange to sit in the comfort of a Westminster home listening to quiet, impressive men, and being shown photographs of beatings inflicted on their people.

I was concerned when the two gentlemen told me that, in their view, the Government seemed unwilling to lend their full support to help the Egyptian Copts. It appears that it was difficult for a Minister—not the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle)—to find time in his admittedly busy schedule to meet those Church leaders and hear the report of the human rights violations. I hope that the debate might lead to a meeting.

The Government were clearly ready and willing to support the concept of human rights in Egypt, but there was no direct evidence that they were prepared to make representations to the Egyptian Government. It is therefore fortunate that I have a factual and detailed report of the millennium massacre directly from Alexandria. I shall relate it shortly. I hope that it will spur the Government into action and into representing our deep anxiety about that incident and others to the Egyptian authorities in London and Cairo.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I refer to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests and the fact that I visited Egypt recently as a guest of the Egyptian Government. When I was in Egypt, I spoke to the Grand Imam about the problem. He said that he believed that he and the Coptic Pope were close personal and spiritual friends. He said that whatever incidents had taken place did not reflect an aggressive attitude on the part of the Egyptian Government. He said that they were reprehensible incidents that had to be tackled. He believed that he and the Coptic Pope were as one spiritually and were personal friends. Does that give my hon. Friend any hope in the circumstances that he is about to relate?

Mr. Leigh: Yes. I am grateful for that intervention because it underlines the complexity of the matter. I am not talking about mass genocide, or the Egyptian Government overtly discriminating against Christians. We are not considering open disagreement between the Coptic Pope and the Muslim community. Enormous efforts are made to try to live together. However, we are considering a complex matter. The Coptic Church in Egypt is under great pressure. Disturbing recent incidents support the view that matters may be getting worse, despite efforts to make improvements. It is important that we do not remain silent. Silence strengthens the hand of those who persecute people from other churches.

I shall outline a little history. The Coptic Church is heir to a 2,000-year tradition of Christianity in Egypt. By tradition, it traces its origin to 42 AD and the formation of the first Church in Alexandria by St. Mark the evangelist and martyr. The Egyptian Church has an ancient heritage, and is the largest and one of the oldest Christian communities in the middle east.

Egypt was a province of the Byzantine empire. Before the Arab conquest of 640 AD, all Egyptians were known as Copts. Early Arabs called Egypt the land of the Copts. After the Arab conquest, Egyptians gradually converted to Islam, and Muslims became the majority population in Egypt. Coptic means "Egyptian" in the pre-Arabic language of the country. While opinions differ on the origins of the word "Copt", most agree that it is a derivation of the Greek term "Aegyptos", which the Greeks called Egypt and the Nile. It currently denotes the original Christians of the country who retained their faith when the majority converted to Islam.

Today, Copts comprise more than 6 million inhabitants—more than 15 per cent. of Egypt's population of 65 million. The Church in Egypt, including Protestants, Catholics, Anglicans and Orthodox denominations such as Syriac, is the largest Christian community in the Arab world. The Coptic Church has survived more than 1,000 years of petty oppression and sometimes outright persecution. Recently, it has been the target of systematic and brutal attack by extremists who try to influence the authorities to exercise their religious privilege. It has also witnessed the quiet erosion of its status in society.

Christians in Egypt are bystanders in the conflict between the Government and Islamic fundamentalists. They are frequently caught in the crossfire. They believe that the authorities do not give them adequate protection from such aggression. The difficulties that the Christian community in Egypt faces are varied, and I shall detail them. I am grateful to several sources for the information. They include the United Kingdom Coptic Association, the Jubilee Campaign, the Egyptian Centre for Human Rights for National Unity, Just Law International, Compass Direct, Open Doors, the office of Congressman Joseph Pitts, the head of the religious liberty taskforce of the United States Congress and Christian Solidarity Worldwide.

For years, the Government in Egypt have strictly enforced laws that date back to the Ottoman empire. They forbid the construction of new churches or the repair of existing churches. Christian churches can be built only with express permission of the President. The Hamayouni edict of 1856 requires the Head of State's approval for repairs, even mending a church toilet. In the past 10 years, few churches have been constructed. Some communities have been working for a church for 30 years.

I recently read "From the Holy Mountain" by William Dalrymple. It states:

> According to the Government's own statistics, mosque building had accelerated—some 125,000 unauthorised masjids had been erected in the last decade alone—but in the same period, the Hamaynoic Laws had been used to deny permission for the building of more than a handful of churches.

In December 1999, the decree was relaxed and permission must now be sought from a local authority. The change requires mosques as well as churches to obtain permits for repairs, but mosques receive permission far more easily.

A report published by the Committee for Fact Finding in Sectarian Incidents recorded in the People's Assembly on 28 November 1972, identified the following:

> Total of existing churches in Egypt: 1,442
> Total churches that are licensed by royal or presidential decree: 286
> Total of churches without permits: 1,156.

Those 1,156 churches function illegally and face the wrath of the authorities. Permits that are sanctioned are frequently for churches that were built approximately 100 years ago. More recently, surveys have been undertaken by the Egyptian Centre of Human Rights for National Unity, which, among others, has sent documentation to the Jubilee Campaign. I have many examples of locations without in Egypt without a church, but shall cite only a few. An application for one was made in Mamoura district in 1967, but the presidential permit has not yet been granted. In Luxor, no building permit has been granted by the local authorities since 1979. There is no church on the northern coast—375 km from Alexandria to Marsar-Matrouh—nor in the towns of Sixth of October, Al-Rehab, Al-Sherouk, Al-Nahda, Badr, Al-Salam, and so the list continues.

I also have many examples, which I can send to the Minister, of locations where churches have had difficulties, but I shall mention just two or three. The Church of the Virgin Mary in Ashmonein in Malawi has been closed. The Church of the Virgin Mary and Mar Girgis in Al-Ayat and the Church of Shaheed Abu-Seifein, Governorate of Al-Fayoum were burned down, and so the list goes on.

I shall refer to some of the problems and difficulties faced by Copts in Egypt. Under Islamic Sharia law, conversion from Islam to any other faith is punishable by death. Converts to Christianity face harassment from not only the state, but their own families. In fairness, Sharia law is not strictly enforced in Egypt, but it has been recognised as the foundation of Egyptian law. The Egyptian Government do not allow people to change their religion or the names on their identity cards and other personal papers if they convert. That regulation does not apply in the case of converts from Christianity to Islam. That difficulty is constantly faced in Egypt. Such discrimination is not overt, but it makes life very difficult, especially when it involves changes to identity cards.

The Egyptian Government have done too little to control those who provoke hatred against Christians. For example, an Egyptian newspaper reported that the nationally famous late Sheikh Muhammad Mitwalli Al-Sharawi referred to Christians as "infidels". He was also accused by a Christian leader of making extremely derogatory remarks about Christians and Christianity. On one occasion, he allegedly stated that "the Sons of Dogs call the Torah the Old Testament." His implication was that Christians are sons of dogs.

There are reported cases—I shall not read out the list—of the use of rape as a means of forced conversion. Admittedly, those events are rare and, of course, abhorrent and intolerable, but they have taken place and should be dealt with firmly. Forced conversion is illegal according to Egyptian law. Egyptian civil law number 31, 1948 sets a legal age of 21, and Egyptian child law sets the age of consent at 18 years. The Grand Sheikh, Dr. Tantawi, issued a decree in 1997, stating that no Christian girl should be forced to marry a Muslim and that Christian girls younger than 21 cannot convert to Islam without the consent of their legal guardians.

There have been complaints of inaction by Egyptian authorities in the face of such practices and of refusals to act on behalf of victims and their families. Again, under Egyptian law, a Christian must speak to a priest or pastor before converting to Islam, but that law is rarely applied and a clergyman is usually informed only after the conversion takes place.

A major reason for conversion is economic. Conversion to Islam improves Christians' economic prospects because of the widespread discrimination against employing and promoting them. Pressure to convert is also applied to Copts, with offers of material reward, money, jobs, accommodation and even a spouse.

All that is serious enough, but I shall now deal with reports of violence. In the past five years, extremists have killed more than 100 Christians. In that period, not more than one or two of the killers have been arrested, tried and convicted. In the past two decades, more than 700 Coptic Christians have been wounded in attacks; more than 700 properties and businesses of Christians have been targeted by militants; more than 120 churches have been burned or ransacked; and about 100 homes have been destroyed. On 4 May 1992, armed members of the Islamic group, Al-Gamma Al-Islamyia, conducted a co-ordinated attack that resulted in the killing by gunfire of 13 Christians. I have a long list of many such incidents, which I can send to the Minister, but I shall not read it out.

In August and September 1998, more than 1,000 Christians were detained in Sohag province in upper Egypt, many of whom were tortured, including 13 and 15-year-old girls. That was the incident that prompted the Coptic delegation to visit me. Bishop Wissa of Baliana and his co-priests were targeted for their part in exposing police brutality and reporting it to non-governmental organisations outside Egypt. They were interrogated and charged, but released, pending trial, after posting bail of 100 Egyptian pounds each.

One of the worst incidents was the millennium massacre. Five predominantly Christian villages in upper Egypt's Sohag province were ravaged over the new year weekend. At least 21 Christians were killed and another 34 hospitalised with injuries. More than 80 Coptic homes and businesses were destroyed, along with a village church. That was the worst sectarian violence for years and the largest massacre of Egyptian Christians for decades. Significantly, El-Koshesh is the same village where, 22 months ago, police were charged with brutality when more than 1,000 Christians were arrested.

I could go on relating such completely up-to-date information. For example, on 5 June this year, the Sohag criminal court convicted a Coptic Christian of murder and sentenced him to a maximum term of 15 years. Shaiboub William Arsal was convicted of murdering his cousin and a friend following a gambling dispute in August 1998. His defence lawyers are convinced that the verdict was a political decision and that the prosecution case was based on forced confessions extracted from two army conscripts from the same village after they were tortured. The Egyptian Organisation of Human Rights accused the police of detaining more than 1,000 Christians after the double murder at Al Kosheh and treating many of them brutally in an effort to pin the crime on a Christian to prevent tension with Muslims from occurring.

To reveal the horror of that incident, I quote a little passage from The Glastonbury Review—a journal of the British Orthodox Church within the Coptic Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria. It states:

> On New Year's Eve, Friday 31 December . . . an argument broke out between a merchant and a customer. The situation could have been brought under control but the local security forces failed to intervene and before long a mob was on the rampage whilst all night long Christian-owned homes and shops were looted, destroyed and finally burned. Unchecked by the authorities, assaults against property now turned to persons and the killings began. Copts were living in fear and stayed in their homes, not even able to open their windows. They did not feel safe at all. Some congregated far from the attack areas but were able to hear shots being fired.
> The violence soon spread from El Kosheh to surrounding villages, including Awlad Touq East and Awlad Touq West, Naga Moussa as well as other areas. St. George's Church in Alwad Touq was destroyed and all of its contents were looted. Fear was spreading among Copts as they witnesses these uninterrupted acts of vandalism and killings. All of these acts occurred without any intervention on the part of local authorities.

Pope Shenouda has tried to take a moderate line, which is why he kept quiet after the first incident. Perhaps that prompted the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls). Pope Shenouda waited three months after the first incident before issuing any public statement. I continue to quote the review, which states that > when he did so it was with the intention of bringing the polarisation resulting from this first incident to an end and preventing further escalation. Having worked for so long and so assiduously to foster good relations between Christians and Muslims and in support of national unity as the surest antidote to Islamic extremism, he rejected foreign interference and counselled quiet resolution for discussions with the authorities.

> For their part the authorities assured him that complaints would be properly investigated, grievances righted and those who were responsible brought to justice. Unfortunately, not only were these promises not fulfilled but the principal perpetrators appeared to be rewarded whilst the innocent suffered.
> His Holiness felt that this failure to address matters was the cause of the further problems, "In all honesty attempting to cover-up the previous events in El Kosheh approximately one and a half years ago, by means of acquitting individuals responsible for the incident and accusing the victims, has led to the escalation of the problem in a horrific manner. Physical attacks have turned into killings".

The Egyptian Government are aware of our concerns and they acknowledge that the constitution guarantees religious freedom. However, they often say that those terrible incidents are not sectarian clashes, but personal feuds. I understand the problems that they face with extremists. For example, the ruthless murder of the leading secular dissident, Farag Foda, has escalated the problem in Egypt, but Christians are dangerously exposed.

What do the Christians and Copts want? The answer is simple and can be summarised in one word—equality. The president of the United Kingdom Coptic Association has told me that they seek nothing less than equality. That is all. At the start of the 21st century, when the world considers equality and human rights as birthrights to be taken for granted, we cannot ignore such injustice. I call on the Government to place the plight of the Coptic Church at the head of the agenda in discussions with the Egyptian authorities.

Copts are not asking for special treatment or compensation for centuries of discrimination and persecution. They want to feel that Mr. Mubarak is President for Muslims and for Copts. They want him to care for them and to address their concerns. They want him to meet their religious leadership regularly and perhaps visit their churches, which other Presidents did. That would no doubt break down walls of mistrust and build bridges of tolerance and harmony between Muslims and Christians.

Copts want the abolition of the antiquated 19th century Hamayouni decree, which restricts the construction of new churches and the repair of existing ones. Copts want all Church trust lands returned to the Copts. The income generated by those lands was used to provide for needy Copts. Copts want all Egyptian citizens to have freedom of belief, including the freedom to change one's religion. Copts want religious affiliation removed from national identity cards, job applications and so on. Christians must not be identified and discriminated against.

Copts want the education curriculum to be revised to guarantee that it contains no denigrating references to Christians and Christianity. Copts want the Government to control the media to ensure that they refrain from conducting attacks against Christians.

[Mr. Leigh]

Copts want an end to discrimination in job appointments and promotions. Few Christians are appointed to key jobs, such as Ministers or other Government officials. At present, there are no Christian governors, mayors, chiefs of police, presidents of city council or deans of college.

Copts want the Egyptian Government to be serious about apprehending those who murder Copts, to punish them to the fullest extent of the law, and adequately to compensate the victims of such crimes. Copts want to be allowed to enrol in all schools that are publicly funded, such as the Al-Azhar university. Copts want to be treated with honour and dignity within police departments. Copts want an end to religious discrimination that prevails at all levels of the Egyptian education system. Copts want an end to the enforced conversion of Christian girls.

I hope that our Government will raise the matter of the new year massacre of 21 Christians with the Egyptian authorities in London and in Cairo, and seek assurances that it will be thoroughly investigated. I also hope that Ministers visiting Egypt will raise these matters and apply and encourage concern in international forums. When I wrote to the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) about the Al-Kosheh massacre, he replied:

> We shall encourage the authorities to take appropriate action against anyone found to have committed a crime or to have violated international human rights standards.

That is encouraging, but what does it mean exactly? The Minister also said that the Foreign Secretary had > discussed interfaith issues with members of the Government, including President Mubarak.—[Official Report, 14 March 2000; Vol. 346, c. 163.]

However, there is no indication that the Government have made direct representations on behalf of the Copts. I hope that the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Leeds, West, will tell us that Her Majesty's Government are now prepared to do so.

In a written answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman), the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Neath, said:

> Our embassy in Cairo has been following the events and has discussed them with the Egyptian authorities.—[Official Report, 2 February 2000; Vol. 343, c. 624W.]

That could mean anything. It could just mean a polite request for information.

On 3 February 2000, the Minister of State said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan):

> When my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary visited Cairo . . . this year, he met the Sheikh Al Azar and Bishop Daniel as well as members of the Government . . . Interfaith issues were part of the discussion.—[Official Report, 3 February 2000; Vol. 343, c. 737W.]

Again, what does that mean? Did the Foreign Secretary make direct representations on the part of the Copts?

It is important to ensure fundamental rights of political representation, to end educational apartheid, to allow the building of new churches, and to prevent massacres and killings. I hope that the Government will make strong representation on all those matters.

The Copts are a brave and quiet people. They are used to discretion. Indeed, they often have to deny in public what they say in private. They do not overstate their case in any way. William Dalrymple quotes a Copt as saying, "We Copts have always been attacked for our faith. Compared to some of those attacks these troubles are nothing." "So what sort of attacks are you thinking of?" said Dalrymple. "Oh, the massacres of Emperor Diocletian, for instance," was the reply. These matters have been going on for a long time, but that does not mean that they are not serious.

The old Ottoman empire was relatively tolerant of Christian minorities. Up to recent times, our record in Christendom was far worse than theirs. The result is that, whereas at the beginning of the 20th century there was a thriving Christian community all over the middle east, today only 14 million Christians are left out of a population of 180 million in the middle east. Istanbul is virtually cleared of Greeks, and the Syrian Orthodox Church is a dying ember in Turkey. Only in Syria has the Church survived relatively in tact, but, with the death of Assad, that may change. In Lebanon, the Maronites are in retreat. In Jerusalem, a commentator said that the last Christians could be flown out in nine jumbo jets. In Egypt, the Copts are fearful, knowing that if Mubarak falls things would probably only get worse.

I am not opposed to the Egyptian Government. I know the difficulties that they face in resisting fundamentalism. I can also understand the reticence of our Foreign Office, which is rightly anxious not to criticise a Government who are moderate by middle east standards and vital to the peace process. However, as a friend of Egypt, we have the right and duty to speak up. Christianity is, by origin, a middle eastern religion. If we remain silent, by the end of this century it will no longer be a religion practised widely in the middle east.

It is estimated that more Christians were massacred worldwide in the 20th century than in any other century of the two millenniums. The world is becoming less, not more, tolerant. We should proclaim the values of tolerance in our own society and praise Muslim values. By speaking out, we will discourage intolerance everywhere and ensure that religion unites people rather than dividing them.

9.56 am

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) on gaining this Adjournment debate and raising a vital issue. I am vice-chairman of the all-party friends of Egypt group. As my hon. Friend stated, this country is a friend of Egypt, and it is vital that such issues are raised openly and freely.

To be true friends of Egypt, it is vital to ensure that problems and crises such as those facing the Copts in Egypt are eradicated, and to encourage a feeling of toleration and understanding in that country. It is an important country: it has a population of 63 million and sits between the middle east and Africa, both of which are strategically important regions. We have interests in both those areas, and a number of British people live in Egypt.

I recently went to Egypt with the all-party group, and we visited Cairo among other places. Last year, we managed to set up meetings with a number of Egyptian Ministers, including the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee. There have also been visits by Egyptian Ministers to this country, and I and other members of the all-party group met them and raised issues, including the situation of the Copts.

We went to a factory in Sixth of October, which is an amazing, vast and growing city. We visited Unilever, which had a number of British workers. We spoke with a Copt who felt that there was no impediment to her job acceleration. She had reached quite a high position in Unilever. The issue that we are discussing and some of the events that my hon. Friend has mentioned, although ghastly and appalling atrocities and human rights violations, including violence and death, are exceptional in Egypt.

Ministers have made a number of visits to Egypt in the past three years. I hope that this issue has been paramount in their thoughts when they have spoken with their opposite numbers in Cairo. It is vital that they take every opportunity to have a constructive dialogue with Egypt.

I am involved in a number of all-party groups, including those on China and Turkey. Human rights violations not only occur, but some seem to be promoted by the Governments of those countries. Where we look to influence them, it is right to do so through constructive dialogue where possible, although, in certain examples such as Zimbabwe, constructive dialogue seems to be a complete no-no. It does not matter what we say to Mugabe—he will just carry on with his campaign of terror against the people of that country—but the Egyptian Government have not systematically carried out atrocities such as those referred to by my hon. Friend.

On our previous visit, we met the Grand Imam and spoke about the Copts and the death penalty. We had a free and frank discussion. As my hon. Friend said, the Egyptian constitution guarantees religious freedoms. We must do what we can, even when personal feuds exist, and I believe that the Government and Islam, the Muslim religion, have a role to play in ensuring that atrocities are stamped out. Egypt wants to maintain good relations with this country and although we know of the tourism atrocities in Luxor and a number of other places, the Government seem to have taken speedy action to stamp them out. I hope that they treat the atrocities in other parts of Egypt equally seriously.

My hon. Friend talked about what he wants for the Copts and spoke on behalf of us all when he mentioned tolerance, dignity and respecting the rights of people of minority religions. He also referred to churches and planning. To flip that on its head, there are planning issues for building mosques in this country. In certain areas, it is difficult for planning permission to be given and building a mosque never seems to be popular among the local population. Although they show great tolerance, their area never seems to be the right place to put a mosque. I have one in my own constituency and do not believe that it is in the right place, so perhaps similar issues are being discussed in Egypt and various other countries.

Over and above simple planning procedures, my hon. Friend mentioned a number of atrocities that give us great cause for concern. I, too, ask for those issues to be raised time and again through the British embassy in Cairo, when the Minister meets his opposite number and when other Ministers visit Egypt. We must work with the Egyptian Government and should perhaps suggest where we can help to ensure that the minority who perpetrate atrocities show greater tolerance and understanding. The all-party group also has a role to play in raising those issues whenever possible. My hon. Friend might think it helpful if we tried to arrange a meeting with someone from the Egyptian embassy, perhaps even the ambassador himself, to enter dialogue and discuss what progress can be made. I have met the ambassador a number of times and he has been very helpful in all sorts of areas. I am sure that this is an issue on which the all-party group may be able to facilitate progress.

I conclude as I began: we are friends of Egypt, and I believe this country to be a friend of Egypt. Being real friends means having the honesty to say where things are going wrong. When there are problems, it is only right for us, as friends, to point them out. I hope that initiating the debate will enable more progress to be made. Sweeping those issues under the carpet would only make things worse. I congratulate my hon. Friend again and hope that, through the Minister, progress can be made.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) on initiating the debate and endorse everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) said.

When politicians talk about Christianity, there is an audience that automatically turns off. That is well understood, but if being a politician in today's Parliament has any value, and given the significance of this particular year, we should applaud any Member who is prepared to take the time and trouble to raise the atrocities carried out against Christians throughout the world. In particular, I pay tribute to Christian Solidarity Worldwide and the Jubilee Campaign, which do marvellous work to alert people to all sorts of issues throughout the world. We should applaud the way in which those organisations conduct their lobbying, which contrasts with that of one or two other groups that tend to antagonise rather than encourage hon. Members to support their view.

Two years ago, I was privileged to be a member of the United Kingdom delegation to the Inter-Parliamentary Union annual conference in Egypt, which I had never visited, although I was only too well aware of pyramids and the Nile. However, other matters were brought to my attention that week and after, one quite graphically: the day after the UK delegation had returned home, terrorists planted a bomb by a museum. They were a day late in their activities. That incident brought all the difficulties home to us. Perhaps I should not speak for all colleagues, but the UK delegation was slightly irritated by the protection we were given throughout. We thought, "This is a lot of old nonsense; everyone seems pleased to welcome us." Of course that was not the case at all.

During that week, I saw poverty the like of which I had not seen before, whether it be in the Philippines, Pakistan or elsewhere. I was gripped by the scale of problems in Egypt and at a loss as to the solutions. I know that the Minister is a devout Christian and I do not want to over-criticise the Government's role and their response to the questions of hon. Members, a long list of which I have asked. However, I feel in my heart of hearts that these matters are not at the top of their agenda, although I could be completely wrong. [Interruption.] The Minister says, from a sedentary position, that that is not the case. However, although this is 2000, I feel that Christianity and trying to help people who wish to practise it—not only in this country, but throughout the world—is not the focal point of the Government's agenda.

The Government seem to think that Christians form a diminishing number of the population, so perhaps there are other priorities. That may or may not be the case and no doubt the Minister will mount a robust defence, but a number of opportunities have been missed. Hon. Members have already touched on Church property, conversion, the incitement of hatred against Christians, use of rape as a means of forcing conversion, pressure on Christians to convert to Islam and violence against Christians.

I want to focus briefly on two of those, beginning with the use of rape as a means of forcing conversion. Some people would immediately say, "That is absolute rubbish. Where is the proof?" I hope that hon. Members keep raising the issue long after the debate is forgotten and put it to the test, but the Jubilee Campaign has received reports from Christian sources in Egypt of the use of rape by Islamic extremists to coerce Christian women to convert to Islam. In Egyptian society, a girl's virginity is highly valued. Its loss through rape is often viewed by her family members as a loss of honour. That leads to their ostracising the victim, or even killing her.

It is difficult for a rape victim to find a marriage partner. Extremists use rape to pressurise Christian girls to convert. After the girl has been raped, the extremists promise that they will arrange for her to be married to a Muslim if she will convert to Islam, guaranteeing that they will provide her with a husband. Conversion offers marriage to a member of the group and "security" to the victim, whereas returning to the family after the rape would result in potentially fatal consequences. That practice is reportedly becoming more widespread.

I know that many people will be cynical and say, "That cannot happen in this day and age," just as it is completely dismissed that baby girls are culled in China. I believe the Jubilee Campaign. I believe that those atrocities are happening. It is beholden on this the mother of all Parliaments to continue to disregard the smirkers and doubters and to speak up on the issue, so that world leaders will raise the point when they meet. Let other world leaders smile at them when they do so.

There have been complaints of inaction on the part of the Egyptian authorities in the face of such practices: complaints that they refuse to act on behalf of the victims and their families. That has undoubtedly led to a change in life style among Christians in the upper part of Egypt. There is a growing reluctance to allow girls to attend schools. When girls are allowed out of the house, they are usually accompanied by a male member of the family.

What is going on in Egypt as regards the property of the Church is of great concern. The legal foundation for the Egyptian state's control of Church property is the Ottoman decree of 1856, which was amplified by the Interior Ministry in 1934 as the Alazabi decree. That decree severely restricted the construction and repair of Christian churches by requiring Christian congregations to submit petitions for building and repairs to the head of state. The decree completely contradicts the 1971 constitution.

Regarding repairs to Church property, progress has been made over the past two years. In January 1998, an amendment was made that delegated presidential authority to issue permits for church renovation to the country's 26 provincial governors. On December 28 1999, President Mubarak decreed that church repairs no longer required presidential, a governor's or federal ministry permit. Only planning permission from the local council was required. However, the need for presidential assent in order to build a new church is still required. That is ridiculous. There can be no justification for such nonsense.

No such permission is necessary for the building of mosques. In addition, churches may not be built in an Islamic locality. It is absolutely crazy. That criterion creates a loophole for the refusal of any application to build a church, as any locality may be considered Islamic. It theoretically promotes the persecution of Christians. A church may not be built within 100 m of a mosque.

In practice, the state systematically obstructs the construction of new Christian churches, halls, offices and parsonages, leaving many parishes without adequate facilities for worship and other congregational activity. The Coptic Orthodox Church has particularly suffered in that regard. Few of its applications for building permission have been accepted. Even the successful applications can take up to 30 years before presidential approval is granted.

Although the current Egyptian Government boast that, since President Mubarak has been in power, he has not denied permission for a single church to be constructed, the fact remains that many applications have never reached him. Even if an application receives presidential approval, in practice, it will often be blocked at the level of the Interior Ministry. In some cases, after permission had been given by the president for construction, Muslims quickly built a small mosque within the 100 m limit, thereby preventing the church's construction.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough would not wish the debate to damage our relationship with the Egyptian Government. I do not think that we are particularly bothered about our relationship with Her Majesty's Government, but we certainly would not want to damage our relationship with the Egyptian Government. As I know my hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring), our Front-Bench spokesman, will say, the Conservative party understands all the issues involved in trade; we understand those only too well.

We recognise that people will say, "What did the Conservative Government do for 18 years with their relationship with the Egyptian Government?" No doubt all those matters will be raised, but we have come into a new dawn since May 1997. Her Majesty's Government has had more than three years to deliver on all their promises. Given their style, I should have thought that they would have been delighted to put Christianity at the heart of government.

The celebrations of the year 2000 have not been entirely joyous. There were many people who thought, "Never mind the hype about the dome, the millennium eye, the new bridge and all that; it should all be about Christianity". Therefore, what could be a finer tribute to the United Kingdom celebrations of the 2,000 years after the birth of Christ than the mother of all Parliaments, in raising issues concerning Christianity in this country and throughout the world, but in Egypt in particular, making a difference and stopping the persecution of those people in Egypt, who have devout beliefs in their Christianity and should be allowed to worship without any interference whatever from the Egyptian state?

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) on raising the issue in debate. I am pleased to reply on behalf of the Liberal Democrats.

We have all heard about what went on in Egypt over the millennium. I say at the beginning—I have got more and more stirred to say this while listening to hon. Members—that I was raised as a Christian, I love God, but I loathe religion. I think that it is dangerous and causes immense suffering throughout the world. We need to play it down in the modern world, not up.

I have read the reports from the non-governmental organisations; we have been well briefed. The Jubilee Campaign and Christian Solidarity Worldwide have sent us briefings. We heard about those briefings in detail from the hon. Gentleman. There are sickening reports of torture; I entirely agree. There is abuse of human rights and the introduction of Sharia law by stealth, it is alleged. The hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) has talked about rape as a means of converting Christians to Islam. Referring to my previous remarks about religion, I remind him that, in Kosovo, the Christians were raping the Muslims to destroy their lives and to ensure that they could not be proper Muslims any more. It happens on both sides all the time. That is why I loathe religion so much.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell) wrote to the Egyptian embassy and, indeed, to the Foreign Secretary after the incidents over the millennium in Al Kosheh, and was assured that the Egyptian Government had taken the matter seriously. For what it is worth, I shall quote the embassy response:

> The incidents which occurred on the 2nd January 2000 at the city of Dar El Salam were a reaction to false information and rumours about events in Al Kosheh.
> A large number of the Christian inhabitants of Al Kosheh . . . took refuge and were hiding in the houses of their Moslem neighbours.

Such friendship between religions is common. People who feel as I do can often be quite friendly across the board.

The embassy response continues:

> That reflects the sudden nature of the event and the deep rooted cordial relations between the two communities.
> The incidents that occurred in Al Kosheh and the events that followed started with a quarrel between a shop owner and one of his customers.

I have no idea whether that is true.

> The investigations establish that these incidents do not reflect a bias towards any religion.

That is what is claimed by the Egyptian Government. I agree that it is difficult to believe when one takes word for word what is said by the Jubilee Campaign and Christian Solidarity Worldwide. I therefore looked up the Amnesty International reports on what was going on in Egypt. I have four pages of them here, three of which are entirely occupied by accounts of abuses of Muslim groups.

The Egyptian Government come down very hard on religious groups, it would appear. We read of torture, imprisonment without trial, the imposition of the death penalty—what I must call the usual pornography of violence which takes place in countries all over the world. The treatment of people by their own police force, and their treatment when in prison, is pornography, and is perpetrated against both Christians and Muslims.

Mr. Leigh: To be fair to the Egyptian Government, they are engaged in a vicious war against an Islamic fundamentalist terrorist group. It is an ugly war, and the hon. Lady should be careful about what she says. The Egyptian Government are not persecuting Muslims in any way; they can be accused of acting very strongly, perhaps too strongly, against terrorist groups, but there is no persecution of ordinary Muslims in Egypt.

Dr. Tonge: What I am trying to illustrate is the fact that Egypt's human rights record is by no means good, as far as I can tell from the Amnesty International reports. Even if those arrested are terrorists, there is no need for the treatment that they are receiving. I am saying that there is a good deal of equality in the treatment of the groups involved. I think that the hon. Gentleman made a very biased speech.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on his point about planning applications. It was fair to point out that planning applications for mosques are sometimes difficult to get through in this country. I am pleased to say that there is a mosque in my constituency, which provides a useful centre for Muslims in the constituencies of Richmond Park and Kingston and Surbiton. I hold a surgery there every two months; I am always well received, and always have a good afternoon. I pay tribute to those who go to the mosque and foster such good relations in my community.

I look forward to hearing the Minister's reply. I contend that there is some brutality and abuse of human rights in Egypt, but that it is being dished out to all sections of the population, not just to Christians. There is a good deal of doubt about the way that the Egyptian police are behaving.

I must confess a love for Egypt and Egyptians, which I share with the hon. Member for Ribble Valley. I have been to Egypt twice, and I had a dear neighbour—a constituent—who was Egyptian. I sprinkled his ashes in

Kew Gardens a few weeks ago. He loved his country, but he loved the United Kingdom equally, and I think he would be horrified if he were able to listen to this debate. Perhaps he is listening.

We need to reassure Egypt of our support. We want it to be part of the international community. However, I appeal to Government representatives from the Egyptian embassy—I am sure that they are here—to listen carefully to the debate, and to improve human rights for all their people.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) on introducing the debate. We all recognise and applaud the fact that he genuinely tries, as a Member of Parliament, to consider some of the key moral issues of our times and the practices in our society in the light of Christian ethics, and I believe that all Members respond to his sentiments. The same can be said of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess).

Although there are no clear figures relating to the size of the Christian minority in Egypt, it is undoubtedly significant, and 90 per cent. of the Christian community belongs to the Coptic Orthodox tradition. Many years ago, I stumbled into a church in Luxor where a mass was taking place, and was very moved by the ceremony.

In our country, we believe in religious diversity, and think that it should be accommodated in any pluralistic society. There is no doubt that Christians in Egypt have suffered significant difficulties, especially at the hands of Islamic groups, in a number of ways.

The jizya tax originated in the seventh century, and involved the defeated Jews of Khaybar paying a tribute to their Muslim conquerors. Some Islamic groups are trying to revive the tax, claiming that Christians and Jews accorded a separate and subordinate status under Sharia law must pay a special tribute to secure their own protection. The Egyptian human rights lawyer Moris Sadek says that the tax is nothing more than > a form of extortion used by Islamic militants to fund their campaign of intimidation and terror against Christians, tourists and the government.

The extent to which some Islamic groups are prepared to go to reinstate the tax is of considerable concern. In an interview with Al Ahram Weekly in 1997, Mustafa Mashhour, head of the Islamic group Muslim Brotherhood, publicly called on Muslims to impose the tax, saying:

> Christians must pay jizya . . . it is part of Sharia.

Human rights groups in Egypt estimate that up to 2,000 Christians are being forced to pay; the actual figure may be considerably higher.

Coptic Orthodox leaders describe the practice as akin to a "religious mafia". It is reported that at least 40 Copts have been killed for refusing to pay the tax in recent years. Some Christians are too afraid to inform the police of the pressures. There is a widespread belief among Christians that pressure is being put on the Christian minority, either directly or indirectly, to convert to Islam.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) spoke of her loathing of religion. She talked of the violence of rape, but she was really talking about human failings and human weaknesses, however detestable. That is the antithesis of what religion is about. To equate feelings about those terrible human failings and weaknesses with a loathing of religion is a quantum leap that I would not wish to make.

The Christian community is vulnerable to many kinds of pressure because of its economic situation. There is a widespread belief that there is discrimination against Christians in terms of employment and promotion, and that conversion to Islam is the only way of improving their economic position. There are reports of constant intimidation and persecution, to which my hon. Friends have alluded. Let me describe the problem affecting one family.

In March 1997, 13-year-old Teresa Shakir, a Coptic Christian in the eighth grade at school, was taken by her teacher—believed to be an Islamic extremist—to a police station. The police and the teacher tried to force her to convert to Islam, it has been alleged. Her family were able to obtain a form from the chief of police, instructing that the young girl be returned to her father, but it is reported that the local police refused to release her. Only after the family had contacted human rights organisations, Pope Shenouda and the office of the President was the girl finally released. The police had held her incommunicado for nine days.

In November 1997, Teresa's older brother returned home late one night to discover that his parents and younger brother had been shot to death, and another sister wounded. Teresa was also dead. Her brother ran to the police station to report the incident, and was arrested and accused of murder. To cut a long story short, a retrial is due to take place, at which I hope that justice will be done.

The case that I have described has been a major source of anxiety in the Christian community, whose members do not consider the Shakirs' family history to be unique. Egyptian Christians feel threatened by Islamic groups. Rightly or wrongly, they do not feel adequately protected by the police.

I hope that the Minister will say what recent representations he and the Foreign Secretary have made to the Egyptian Government about the problems of the Christian community and their human rights. What measures can he take to seek to improve the human rights of Egyptian Christians?

Egypt is, of course, the jewel in the crown of Islam. Its unique history, beauty, and intellectual and spiritual life have exerted an influence on the whole Islamic family of nations. Britain has close and friendly relations with Egypt, and it is also worth noting that the Egyptian Government have had their own significant problems with Islamic fundamentalists. They have reacted vigorously against such violence and extremism, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) noted.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I declare an interest in that I recently took part in a visit to Egypt, courtesy of the Gulf Centre for Strategic Studies. In the course of it, I raised the subject of the death penalty. Does my hon. Friend agree that the existence on the Egyptian parliamentary statute book of the death penalty is undesirable, as is the fact that conversion from Islam to any other faith is punishable by death? Do not those factors effectively act as a spur to private citizens in Egypt, who think that it is both legitimate and desirable to mete out violence to people who are Christians or who are in the process of converting from Islam to Christianity?

Mr. Spring: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. I hope that the Minister will take it on board, and that he will consider it in the light of Egypt's human rights obligations.

No one is suggesting that the Egyptian Government promote any calculated persecution of the country's Christian citizens. Traditionally, there has been greater religious tolerance in Egypt than in many other parts of the world. However, I urge the Minister to bring to the attention of the Egyptian Government the important questions of religious freedom and human rights set out so graphically by my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough.

Egypt is a member of the United Nations. It is a signatory to the international covenants on civil and political rights and on economic, social and cultural rights. The attempts by Islamic groups to reinstate the tax that I described, the planning difficulties alluded to so powerfully by my hon. Friends, and the ordeal of the Shakir family that I set out illustrate the pressures on Egypt's Christian minority. These concerns have been raised frequently by Egyptian Christians, most recently after the tragic incident in January described by my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough, when 21 Christians were killed. I therefore urge the Government to raise the issues of justice and equality for all Egyptian citizens, in practice as well as in the law.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. John Battle): It is routine to congratulate hon. Members on securing a debate such as this, but I shall go further and say that the Government are grateful to the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) for introducing this topic.

The hon. Gentleman has a track record in such matters, and his interest in the welfare of Christians worldwide is well known, in this Chamber and beyond. He has led several delegations on behalf of Christians to my office in recent months, the last time on behalf of Christians in Burma, and he is respected for the consistent rigour with which he campaigns. Raising this important subject in the Chamber, as other hon. Members have noted, helps maintain a spotlight on it, as our deliberations go far beyond this quiet Westminster Hall.

I also welcome the tolerant tone of the debate, which has been well balanced. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) called for constructive dialogue, and that has been evident in the spirit of the debate. I agree that what the hon. Member for Gainsborough called the plight of people is important and relevant, and that we should regularly discuss such matters. Violence and abuse are unacceptable, and the House's opposition to them should present a seamless robe.

Freedom of religious worship is a basic human right, and must be respected. All hon. Members should work together to ensure that it is respected fully, and we have a duty and responsibility to raise such matters in debate.

I know that many hon. Members have read troubling reports in the press and have received direct accounts about violence between Christians and Muslims in Egypt. They have also come across allegations of police brutality and of other harm to members of the Christian Churches in Egypt. The hon. Members who have contributed to the debate have presented a detailed and worrying catalogue of charges this morning. I shall try to respond to the points that have been raised, and to set out what the Government have done. I shall be happy to receive more details from hon. Members who want to take matters further, and to act on them. I assure hon. Members that the Jubilee Campaign's representations continue to be welcome and respected, and that the Government take them seriously.

I shall begin with the incidents in upper Egypt to which some hon. Members have referred. The first Al Kosheh incident in August-September 1998 resulted in the murder of two Christian villagers. That was followed by numerous arrests and there were allegations that many of those arrested were tortured in police custody.

The Government have made clear to the Egyptian authorities our concern that the allegations—in particular those of police brutality—must be fully and effectively investigated. Soon after his appointment last year, the new Egyptian prosecutor general reopened the investigation. It remains open, due to the number of matters under investigation. The Government will keep a close eye on developments.

The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) is no longer present, but I can say, in response to his intervention earlier, that people do not believe that the Egyptian Government are systematically persecuting people. Independent human rights organisations have stated that more than 80 per cent. of the Al Kosheh villagers are Copts. They point out that it is, therefore, not surprising that, when arrests are made after an incident, some or most of those arrested will be Copts.

However, that inevitable effect of the numbers involved in no way excuses any torture that may have taken place—one case of the torture of a human being is one too many. Although what has happened does not necessarily add up to organised religious persecution, that does not mean that the Government do not take the matter seriously.

The hon. Member for Gainsborough drew attention to the case of William Shaiboob, the Copt who has now been found guilty of the two murders and sentenced to 15 years hard labour. We are following his case with close attention, as two of the main witnesses at his trial withdrew their evidence and claimed to have been tortured.

I understand that, on Monday, Mr. Shaiboob's defence lawyers put a request for an appeal to the Court of Cassation, Egypt's highest appeal court. That case is now being heard. It is, therefore, technically sub judice so we cannot comment further as that would prejudice it. However, our embassy in Cairo is following the case closely, and will keep Ministers informed. I shall be happy to keep right hon. and hon. Members who have raised these points and others informed as we receive information.

The second incident took place in and around Al Kosheh in January this year, when violence and rioting left some 20 Christians and one Muslim dead, and 19 Muslims and 14 Christians injured. As with the first Al Kosheh incident, our embassy in Cairo has been keeping us up to date with regular reports. We have discussed the incident on several occasions with the Egyptian authorities; we are not afraid to raise these difficult issues with Egypt, because our strong relationship enables us to have a tough conversation occasionally, and that is as it should be. We have a good, open and free dialogue with the Egyptian Government on these matters. We have discussed them on several occasions, and have stressed the need to investigate them fully and bring wrongdoers who commit crimes to trial. That is exactly what we are monitoring now.

Given the intense interest that there has been, and in order to hear from the villagers first hand, a member of our embassy staff in Cairo visited Al Kosheh in May. He was the first and only embassy official from any country to visit so far. He talked to members of the village council as well as to individual Muslim and Christian villagers, including some of those whose relatives had been killed. He found that the atmosphere in the village was stable—there is now a strong security presence to ensure law and order and calm.

It was clear that the authorities had also made some real efforts to encourage reconciliation between the communities. Whether those efforts are successful will become clear only with time. Obviously, given the feelings of animosity and mistrust in that poor, traditional and divided rural community, in which more than 80 per cent. of the population is Christian, it remains to be seen whether reconciliation and tolerance work at a local level, but it is a project to work at.

We understand that when the Egyptian authorities set up their investigation into the second Al Kosheh incident, they consulted religious leaders and co-ordinated their efforts closely with them. On 11 March, the public prosecutor announced that he had completed his investigation into the events, and that 97 Muslims and 38 Copts would be charged in connection with the murders and the events leading up to them. I understand that five Copts have been charged with attempted murder, and that the rest have been charged with illegal assembly, damage to property and ownership of firearms without licence. No religious leaders, it might be noted, have been charged.

Two trials opened on 3 and 4 June, in a normal criminal court. One was for those accused from Al Kosheh and the other was for those accused from a nearby village. Both trials were adjourned until 7 August and 3 July respectively. Our embassy in Cairo will continue to monitor both trials. In other words, where there is criminal activity, the due course of law and order in bringing people to trial should take place. We like to insist that it does, and we are monitoring the fact that it is. That should be on the record, and part of the account of these events.

Other questions have been raised, of a rather wider nature. The hon. Member for Gainsborough listed a number of tragic attacks on Christians by Muslims, including acts of terrorism. All people should deplore murder, and terrorism in particular, wherever it occurs. The hon. Gentleman spoke of a systematic and brutal attack by extremists. I would simply add that systematic and brutal attacks by extremists are extremely difficult for any society to defend itself against, as we have seen recently in other countries, without the state taking an over-secure approach, as it were, to tackle the possibility of problems.

Sadly, the problem of terrorist attacks is not confined to Egypt and nor, within Egypt, has it been confined to Copts. Foreign tourists, including British citizens, have also suffered at the hands of fundamentalist terrorists. The Egyptian authorities have expressed their determination to prevent such attacks and to increase security for all. We fully support their attempts to increase security for all. The difficulty, as the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) pointed out, is that that can lead to a kind of over-protection to defend people against possible terrorist attacks. Getting the balance right is extremely difficult in individual circumstances.

Acts of fundamentalist terrorism must be the most difficult threat that any society can face. It does not necessarily mean that there is something wrong or corrupt at the heart of a state if there are terrorist activities within it.

Some hon. Members have claimed that there is systematic state discrimination against Copts that amounts to persecution. We maintain a regular dialogue with many Coptic Christians, from the Coptic Pope, to bishops and clergy, and to ordinary members of local communities in Egypt and elsewhere. We listen to their views and opinions—we take readings of their interpretation of the situation. Not surprisingly, as in all human situations, we hear a range of different opinions, not least on discrimination. While some Copts do indeed talk of persecution, other leading Copts tell us that they do not believe that there is a general Egyptian Government policy of discrimination against Christians; nor do they talk of persecution. We need to take that range of views into account in working towards that agenda. Building an atmosphere of tolerance and respect has been mentioned in this debate.

The Copts are deeply concerned, as are we, about any cases of violence, allegations of police brutality and other reports that raise human rights concerns. Such matters are always of concern, regardless of the ethnic or religious background of the person or group concerned. However, that does not necessarily mean that there is active state persecution in Egypt.

The Egyptian constitution provides for equal public rights and duties without discrimination due to religion or creed. Forced conversion, to which hon. Members have referred, is illegal under the constitution. The President has been very clear on such issues, stating publicly that he wants to see more Christians in the next People's Assembly after the elections this autumn. Ensuring that assemblies, Parliaments and Governments are properly balanced according to the population is not always easy, as we know from our experience in this place when it comes to getting the balance right between the genders. However, that is on the agenda of the Egyptian President, which is encouraging.

We have also seen positive changes on another issue that the hon. Gentleman raised—the difficulties that Christian communities in Egypt have faced in building and maintaining their places of worship. It is just a few years since William Dalrymple's book came out. I suggest that matters have improved slightly since then. The difficulty that Christian communities face in this respect is on the agenda.

In 1998, authority for granting permission for church repairs was devolved from the President to the regional governors. I am not opposed to that. The hon. Member for Ribble Valley—I nearly said upper Ribble, but it is more like the valley of the Ribble—made a telling intervention about linking that to events here, as did the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge). When planning permission is sought in this country, reconciling local communities of Christians, non-Christians and Muslims in not easy. I know that from my own constituency.

Negotiations for a community centre to have a minaret on it so that it can become a mosque can turn into an enormous argument and conflict about religious histories and traditions. I am waiting to see what happens when the application is made for the call to prayer five times a day to begin at sunrise, not at 7 am every morning, given that sunrise is currently at 4.28 am. I am simply saying that we have not reconciled those conflicts in our society either, so we need to work together internationally on the agendas of tolerance.

I prefer such decisions to be taken locally, rather than that the Prime Minister should decide whether a mosque should be sited in my constituency. To devolve such decisions to local areas is not a bad thing. It should be a stimulus for people to work together to build communities, instead of being antagonistic and oppositional, and not seeking reconciliation.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Battle: The hon. Gentleman is itching to intervene, so I gladly give way.

Mr. Bercow: Notwithstanding the Minister's remarks about the Egyptian constitution, will he comment on the fact, about which the Jubilee Campaign—among others—is most concerned, that, under Sharia law, conversion from Islam to another faith is punishable by death? There seems to be something of a tension between the constitution and the practice of the Islamic faith.

Mr. Battle: There appears to be a tension, but I made it clear that forced conversion is illegal. The question remains: does it happen? The practice in local communities may not always comply with the law and then the state has to act to ensure that the local community conforms. I accept that there is tension—just as there are tensions in this country over similar issues. However, we do not have time to spell them out, and this may not be an appropriate debate in which to do so.

I welcome the hon. Gentleman's use of the word "tension", as that suggests that we should address the matter. There is conflict, but it does not need to degenerate into violence and personal abuse; we should look for ways to reconcile such conflict locally, so that people can live together, tolerating each other's activities, behaviour and practices—respecting one another as human beings. That should be the challenge for all religious traditions; it should be at the heart of their theological practice. I make that point because there is no easy reconciliation between the law and practice in any context.

As I pointed out, the authority for granting permission for church repairs was devolved, in 1998, from the President to the regional governors, but, in December 1999, it was decreed that all places of worship would be subject to the 1976 civil construction code—putting mosques and churches on an equal footing. Permission for new church buildings remained in the hands of the President, but, as hon. Members will be aware—from correspondence with my Department and with the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain)—President Mubarak has agreed all applications put to him since he came into office in 1981. When such matters were referred nationally, there was agreement; that brought about reconciliation locally, including over planning permission. If we consider planning permission in our own country, there are also some question marks; we can understand the tensions involved in that process.

We shall continue to follow these matters closely; we take them seriously. We raise them regularly—not merely through nods and hints in passing conversations, but to point out that they are important matters. We have strong back-up evidence and research, and we need to act on them. We discuss them with the Egyptian Government and religious leaders.

When my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary visited Cairo in January, he met a wide range of people from many communities, including Sheikh Al Azhar, the leading Egyptian Muslim cleric, and Bishop Daniel, a Coptic bishop, as well as President Mubarak and other members of the Government. He discussed inter-faith issues and the importance of dialogue and tolerance. He pointed out that, even though all our societies have not resolved such matters, we could none the less work together on a common agenda.

That conversation and those representations were not a one-off. We shall maintain our dialogue with the Egyptian Government; we shall welcome positive change when we see it; we shall encourage the authorities to bring to justice anyone who has committed a crime or violated international human rights standards; but we shall not be afraid to raise human rights concerns. At the same time, we need to try to remain in touch with a wide range of Egyptian Christians so that we receive first-hand reports of matters that affect Christian communities in Egypt—cases of discrimination, for example.

While balancing the evidence, we must continue to raise such matters and to campaign for an increase in tolerance. The way in which we do so can either contribute to the spirit of tolerance or can undermine it.

This morning's debate could help, in a small way, towards generating a stronger atmosphere of tolerance—the tone of the debate is to be welcomed.

The debate will not be confined to this Chamber; these matters will be taken further—by the Government and by the Egyptian authorities. We thank the hon. Member for Gainsborough again for raising the issue, as well as for his introduction and presentation of the debate—it was a model to all of us.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): This debate was requested by some Liberal Democrats from south-west London; it was not initiated solely by me. We hope that the Government will treat it as part of their consultation exercise. I cannot mention everything, but I want to raise one or two matters in the context of the future of the national health service and the next tranche of money that the Government will allocate to it. I do not speak as a Liberal Democrat spokesperson; this is a Back-Bench debate, so for its purposes I am a Back-Bencher, expressing my Back-Bench views.

The Prime Minister often says that the NHS must get used to change. However, at present, the health service is definitely sick and one of the causes of its sickness is change—unfortunately. Although I accept that much change is needed, this time—this year—the Government must get it right. We cannot go on reorganising the health service, because the energy of everyone—managers, doctors and nurses—is going into the process of change and reorganisation, instead of into the improvement of patient care. As someone who has worked in the health service for many years and who has undergone many changes and reorganisations, I plead with the Government to try to get it right this time.

The health of Londoners has always been at issue. I have been practising for long enough to remember when the Black report on the health of Londoners was published. I do not know what happened to that report. It stressed the importance of the link between poverty and deprivation and ill health. It made exactly the same points as eight subsequent reports. I do not know why we have to keep producing reports that say the same thing.

London has some incredible centres of excellence. Some of the best medicine and surgery in the world is practised in this city, but, at the other end of the scale, we have inner-city areas where medical facilities are appalling and where there is squalor, poverty and ill health.

I was considering the health services in the Tottenham area, as a by-election will be held there soon. They are patchy. I compared some of the statistics for Tottenham with those for Richmond, which is in Surrey but is also a part of London. In Tottenham, the infant mortality rate is three times higher, and the rates for tuberculosis are five times higher than those in Richmond.

Long ago, as a medical student, I was taught that a key indicator of poverty and deprivation is TB. It occurs where there is poor housing, poor health and poor nutrition. We have that in areas of London. I obtained the figures for TB from the Library; they clearly show a frightening rise in the number of cases in London over recent years.

I have spoken to people who work in the national health service who have had to contend with, among other things, the recent scandalous shortages of TB vaccine. I must draw the matter to the Minister's attention. It is no excuse to say that the manufacturer does not want to manufacture the vaccine any more because the patents have run out and it is not making enough money from it. Someone must get on with manufacturing that vaccine, so that a generation of children does not grow up unprotected against TB. TB is on the march and it is resistant, and it is an indicator of what needs to be done in this city.

Let us consider the modernisation funds that were recently given by the Government and gratefully received by the health service. I understand that the first tranche was intended for primary care development, but in the London area 90 per cent. of it was used to address the deficits of the trusts; it did not go into primary care at all. The London region had allowed St. Mary's hospital and the Chelsea and Westminster hospital—large, famous teaching hospitals—to run up huge deficits. The new money was used to pay off the debt.

The remaining 10 per cent. of the first tranche was used to pay off the overspend on drugs in primary care. I know that the Government are addressing that problem, so I shall not go into it in detail; I simply ask how will the Government ensure that the second tranche of money, which we are all looking forward to, will be used for patients, not to cover the debt that has built up over years of mismanagement of the health service. In attributing responsibility for that mismanagement, I would cite previous Governments more than the current Government.

General practitioners are very enthusiastic about primary care groups and trusts. After initial reservations, all the GPs in my area whom I talk to now express enthusiasm. Particularly in the London area, we desperately need computerised records, but they must link up with those of hospitals. I understand that my local health authority, the Kingston and Richmond health authority, will run a pilot scheme for computerised patient records. I hope that the hospitals will be as enthusiastic about it as the general practices are, because it seems to me that the consultants and some of the people working in the hospitals are less enthusiastic about the switch to computerised records than the GPs.

Before I leave the subject of GPs, I repeat my plea on behalf of those in the London area who have had to wrestle with the problem of asylum seekers in the past two years. It has been a great problem for them. One of the greatest difficulties has been the lack of translators and language facilities. Everyone knows that there is a telephone line that one can ring to obtain a translation of almost any language, but it is very difficult—as I have found—to conduct a consultation with a patient in a consulting room when a telephone is in the way.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): Does that remark indicate a lack of confidence in NHS Direct, where there is a telephone in the way of the consultation?

Dr. Tonge: No. The patient telephones NHS Direct and receives advice. As a doctor, I have reservations about that service, but I was referring to the language service that doctors can use when they have a patient with whom they cannot communicate. I have had to use it myself. One rings the language service and speaks to someone who can speak Serbo-Croat or whatever language one needs, and then one has to interview the patient via the telephone, which is terribly difficult—almost impossible. I hope that the Government will acknowledge that GPs in the London area have been wrestling with those problems.

Although it is not a feature of London alone, a problem remains in co-ordination between health services and social services. I have worked on both sides of the pale: I have been chair of a social services department and I have worked as a manager in community health. The two sides must be brought together. The Liberal Democrats would like to see them brought together under the auspices of local government. I do not mind any more how they are brought together, but they must be brought together. In the interests of patients, the buck-passing cannot continue.

I shall briefly discuss beds and NHS facilities. Over the past 10 years, there has been a 35 per cent. reduction in acute beds in the health service in the London area. I have failed—someone else in the Chamber might be able to help me—to find the figure for the percentage reduction in mental health beds, but I know that too many have been closed and that even the Government admit that.

The enthusiasm for competition and the internal market led hospital to fight hospital against closures. In my area, two hospitals were competing for supremacy. To show their hospital in a better light than the competitor, managers made extravagant claims and projections about how they would cope with patient flows, where patients would go and how facilities in their hospital would be able to cope—claims that did not materialise.

I plead with the Government: if there are to be any more closures in the London area, for heaven's sake let us have the extra facilities in place before a hospital is closed. In my area, the closure of facilities at Queen Mary's hospital in Roehampton created chaos at Kingston hospital. I pay tribute to the staff and managers at Kingston hospital who dealt with that, but the casualty department was woefully inadequate. Now, thankfully, the money has come through and a new casualty department will be ready at the end of next year, but that should have been in existence before Queen Mary's hospital closed; likewise the beds to replace those in Queen Mary's hospital. What I describe as a portakabin ward had to be put up to accommodate the extra patients. Funding has only just come through to create a proper ward block to look after our patients adequately.

If my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) had been here—I pass on his apologies—he would have told hon. Members that in our area we also urgently need better diagnostic facilities. Patients from a huge area depend on Kingston hospital, and the facilities at Queen Mary's hospital are sadly out of date. For example, we have no magnetic resonance imaging in the area. In the United States, every hospital has an MRI scanner—it is standard diagnostic equipment nowadays. We must have proper facilities. Likewise, for radiotherapy we have old cobalt machines instead of linear accelerators. There is so much to be done.

The bed closures have caused a phenomenon that horrifies me. Bed occupancy rates are often touted. If we visit hospital managers—I do so regularly—we are told that bed occupancy rates are 95 or 96 per cent. My response is that that is a disgrace. It is impossible to run an acute hospital if 95 per cent. of its beds are occupied all the time. The result is that sick people must wait on trolleys and chairs for empty beds. In the mental health sector in London, the bed occupancy rates are 130 per cent. That does not mean that there is one patient at the top of the bed and another at the bottom; it means that while a patient goes out for treatment for a day, another patient occupies their bed while they are away. It is appalling.

High bed occupancy also causes poor hygiene. Recently, I initiated a debate about the rise in methicillin resistant staphylococcus aureus infection and the lack of hygiene in NHS hospitals. High bed occupancy is the cause. There is not enough time even to wash one's hands between patients, to clean down drips caked with blood or to ensure that the ward is tidy.

We cannot continue with such occupancy rates. They cause bad practice and corner cutting, and if there is an influenza epidemic or a disaster—such as a serious crash—they cause mayhem. I have experienced it. We must tackle the problem. We need more empty beds in the national health service, and we need more low-tech beds for the so-called bed blockers—those poor and mainly elderly patients who cannot be sent home and must be kept in hospital while social services and the health service pass the buck between themselves to decide whose responsibility they are.

I urge the Government, before they close any more small hospitals and cottage hospitals, to think very seriously about improving those hospitals in the London area in the context of low-tech beds, GP beds and nursing beds where elderly patients can receive the sort of care that they expected to receive for the rest of their life from the health service.

Other issues that affect London disproportionately are pay and accommodation. I saw a student nurse in my surgery last week. She is a mature student with two children, but her husband walked out on her three years ago, so she is on her own. She had managed to find a house that was just about big enough for herself and her two children and the rent was £10,500 a year. That is a bargain and good going in the Kingston and Richmond area, so she is not complaining about that. However, her bursary—it takes into account the fact that she has two small children—to be a student nurse at Kingston university and at St. George's hospital in Tooting is £8,500. Because she is a student nurse, she cannot claim income support and, because she is not on income support, she cannot receive housing benefit.

There is no way that my constituent could manage unless she did care assistant work at night. She thought she might be able to claim the working families tax credit if she carried out her studies during the day, picked up her children and worked at night. However, she then faced the problem of finding someone to look after her children at night, and that costs money. Will the Government please examine this problem, which does not affect only student nurses? I have been lobbied by other nurses. One of them said, "I'm really lucky that I have a council house, but my pay and conditions are so awful. I am so busy, tired and stressed that I think that I am going to have to leave nursing."

The price of accommodation is a big problem in London. I do not know whether it can be addressed through London weighting. It affects not only nurses but pathology laboratory technicians. We have all heard about the cytology technicians—they are university graduates—who earn £12,000 or £13,000 a year. There is a huge need for better pay and conditions for staff in London.

I take a deep breath before I mention hospital consultants. I shall qualify my remarks by saying that the vast majority of hospital consultants—I am married to one and I know many of them—are decent people who do an amazing job and work extremely hard. The British Medical Association will tell us that independent research carried out for the doctors and dentists review body by MORI in February 1999 showed that hospital consultants worked on average 50 hours a week in the health service, and that is not bad. Surgeons and anaesthetists work between 40 and 70 hours per week in the health service.

The research does not break down the figures for London and it does not go into much detail on them. I have had experience of the health service for 30 years and I know exactly what is involved. In the London area, consultants have a huge opportunity for private practice and their contracts are arranged in a rather odd way. One can be a full-time consultant and work eleven elevenths of one's time, because the contracts normally include Saturday morning. That still enables consultants to practise privately, provided that they do not earn more than 10 per cent. of their health service salary. I would not accuse consultants of fiddling their tax; I am sure that they do not do that. We must accept that they work their eleven elevenths in the health service, put in many hours and earn only 10 per cent. extra.

However, many consultants opt for another contract. It is a nine-elevenths contract which gives them two free sessions a week in which they can practise privately. Some say, "Okay. On Wednesdays and Thursdays, I work in the private sector, but I work for the NHS for the rest of the week." Many consultants work that way and it is absolutely fair and above board. However, there are a number—I know because I have worked in the NHS—who spread the two sessions over lunchtimes, early mornings, evenings and any other time when they get a senior registrar to cover for them. I could tell all sorts of anecdotes and tales of consultants who are not in NHS hospitals as much as they should be, but who can always be found in private hospitals. The problem of consultant contracts must be addressed for the sake of the future of the medical profession and the reputation of consultants.

Mr. Hammond: Obviously, no one condones anyone who seeks to cheat the system. However, for the sake of balance. will the hon. Lady tell us whether she is aware from her personal experience of the surgeons and anaesthetists who would like to carry out more NHS work, but who are unable to do so because of the rigidities relating to support staffing and operating theatres?

Dr. Tonge: I entirely accept that point and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has raised it. Consultant contracts are not the only problem. Many consultants are forced not to work for the health service because of the non-availability of an operating theatre owing to the closure of hospitals and the lack of provision in the hospitals that remain, or to the lack of staff or beds. I shall return to that point later, which, if not the only reason, is one of the reasons for the problem that has been described.

I represent a well-heeled constituency and when my constituents see a consultant, they are disturbed when they are invariably asked whether they want to be seen privately. If they do, they are told that they can be seen tomorrow or the next week. If they do not, they have to spend 12 to 18 months on the waiting list. That makes people suspicious and upset. If the same consultant can operate on them next week, why cannot they be operated on under the health service next week? Why do they have to wait 18 months for the same man to carry out the operation?

Even more ridiculous things happen in specialisms such as diagnostic radiology. I know of a consultant in a hospital not far from here who sees all the private patients and carries out all the investigations on the private patients that are referred to his department. The patients are referred by general practitioners and other doctors from all over the region and the managers love that because it brings revenue into the hospital. The consultant takes his fee from the patient and then returns a little whack to the hospital for the use of its facilities. Consultants who see private patients who have jumped the queue in the health service cause health service patients to wait much longer for their investigations.

In the hospital that I have mentioned, there is not a particularly long wait for the investigations; it has plenty of capacity. However, a young woman in my constituency has had to wait nine months for a pelvic ultrasound examination. That is ridiculous when private patients can be seen in an NHS hospital just five or six miles away and have the same investigation carried out within a week. That cannot be right, so I urge the Government to tackle that problem.

I suspect that I shall not have any friends or colleagues left if they get to hear about what I have said this morning, but—to be really nasty—the consultants who carry out the most work in private practice are, sadly, the consultants who receive the biggest merit awards. The more doctors and surgeons one knows and the more one is a member of the private practice referral club, the more likely one is to be nominated by one's colleagues for a merit award. That fact must be aired publicly, so I put my head on the block by airing the issue this morning. The Government must take that problem on board.

There is no shortage of consultants in London and there is certainly no shortage of beds and facilities; there is loads of spare capacity in the private sector. If the Government are serious about reducing waiting times and waiting lists, they have two clear options. They can use the private sector for NHS patients and let Sir Lancelot Spratt take his patient for a hip replacement down the road to a private hospital if he cannot do the operation in an NHS hospital—and why not? Alternatively, we should tell consultants that if they work exclusively in the health service where they will be given more beds and better facilities, they will receive much greater rewards than they currently earn.

Most NHS consultants receive consultant pay, not consultant pay plus merit awards. Therefore, their pay is not comparable to that of lawyers, who probably earn two or three times as much they do. In addition, lawyers do not suffer from the angst and are not subject to the flak that consultants have experienced in recent years.

Mr. Hammond: Does the hon. Lady not see a potential danger in inviting the most eminent surgeons to make the choice that she has described? There is the risk that they will be lost to the health service altogether. I have always found it a rather attractive feature of the health service that a surgeon who charges a high fee to see a wealthy patient from overseas in the morning will work in the afternoon seeing patients free at the point of use in the health system. Is that not a strength of our system?

Dr. Tonge: It is a strength of the system, provided that it is not abused. My contention is that the majority of consultants probably do not abuse it. However, those of us who have worked in the medical profession know that it is abused. Often, when an eminent person is seeing a patient in his private rooms, his senior registrar and junior staff may be coping like Trojans in his out-patient clinic in an NHS hospital. That needs to be examined carefully and tactfully. The Government must recognise that consultants need better rewards than they currently receive in the NHS if they are to compare with other specialties and are to continue to take the risk of doing complicated procedures that may sometimes lead to a patient's death. However, both options cost money.

I am sorry to have taken so long, but I shall conclude with a point about funding, which relates not just to the health service in London, although it affects us acutely. The health service cannot go on without secure guaranteed funding every year, and funding must not depend on the whims of the Government, focus groups or whatever we think will give us enough political kudos. The health service needs far more funding than the Liberal Democrats have ever proposed and more than the Government are planning to give it. Indeed, it needs more money than any political party is prepared to take out of direct taxation. That is the problem: no one is honest enough to tell the British people that if they really want the sort of health service to which they aspire, it will cost them money. It would actually be much cheaper to pay far more in taxes than to take out private health insurance, perish the thought. The problem is never declared openly and we desperately need a debate about how we will fund the health service in future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): There are seven speakers to get in if everyone who wishes to make a contribution to our debate is to be satisfied. I must therefore alert the Chamber to the fact that I shall be looking for concise, pertinent and clear statements that do not take an awfully long time.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): As is traditional, I congratulate the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) on securing the debate. I agree with her concerns about mental health beds in the capital and think that her point about them was particularly important, although I suspect that the thrust of her other remarks will get the most attention. I share the general view that the amount of private work done by a small number of consultants needs to be examined by the Government. I understand that that is happening, but the Minister may be able to comment further.

I welcome the debate as it is almost a year since we last debated London's health services, on a Government motion in an Adjournment debate. Today's debate gives us an opportunity to see how London's health services have progressed in implementing the Government's health reforms. This time last year, the key strategic issue facing London was how to inculcate the principle of partnership. The hon. Lady's experience of two local hospitals battling for supremacy is one with which my constituents would have considerable sympathy. In our debate last year, I said that, at times, there seemed to be a sense of bureaucratic imperialism in the health service, with the chief executive of an acute hospital battling with the chief executive of another hospital over services that they wanted.

How have matters developed in the past year? I shall give local examples and discuss the atmosphere now prevailing in Harrow's health care services, which have embraced the Government's national priorities with enthusiasm. In relation to national priorities on heart disease and strokes, the Harrow West primary care group has agreed local development schemes and incentive targets with all GPs and practices in the group. The GPs have identified all the patients on their lists at risk of heart disease, strokes and diabetes. There are now proper records and monitoring of the treatment of those patients. There is new investment by the primary care group in clinics, and staffing levels to meet concerns about heart disease, strokes and diabetes.

Another positive development in health prevention is the recent launch of the Harrow Heartbeat health campaign, which is a multi-agency primary prevention exercise aimed at raising public awareness of how to avoid heart disease and diabetes. The primary care group has worked to develop better access to care and has been successful in extending psychological counselling, for example. There used to be only 13 practices with access to such counselling; now all 27 practices in the primary care group have access to such services.

Practice-based mobile ultrasound services have been extended from two primary care teams to 22 practices in the primary care group, and local waiting times have come down from 11 weeks to two weeks, easing considerably the pressure on hospital ultrasound services, especially at Northwick Park hospital. All practices are now able to carry out cryosurgery—surgery on bumps and lumps—which, again, eases the pressure on hospital out-patient referrals. There have therefore been positive local developments on better access to care for patients.

Most significantly, £2 million is being invested in Northwick Park hospital's accident and emergency unit. That investment has been needed for at least 10 years and is only taking place thanks to this Government. The newly refurbished unit should be open in September. Furthermore, £5.8 million is due to be invested in two linear accelerators at the Mount Vernon cancer unit, which will substantially improve the quality of cancer care available to my constituents and others in the region who benefit from the hospital. It will also give my constituents much-needed reassurance about the future of Mount Vernon hospital.

There is considerable concern nationally about quality of care, not least in the light of what is taking place on the issue at the General Medical Council this week. In my constituency, the primary care group has delivered a clinical audit covering all GP practices, and a second audit is due to take place. Proper peer review visits are being made to all the primary care practices. There have therefore been good and positive developments in both primary and secondary care in my constituency.

We have done a lot, but I want to highlight one or two matters on which further work must be done. I spoke in the Easter Adjournment debate to highlight the need to expand the provision of intensive care beds at Northwick Park hospital. There is an urgent need for significant investment in intensive care in outer London, so that my constituents and their relatives do not have to travel into central London to benefit from the intensive care services there.

Northwick Park hospital is ideally placed to benefit from additional investment in intensive care. It is a fully staffed unit. Northwick Park is probably one of the most successful hospitals in London in maintaining a full staffing complement for its intensive care needs. However, the existing facilities are not adequate to meet the local demand. I hope that the Minister will convey as a matter of urgency to her colleagues the need to accept and recognise the business case for an expansion in intensive care beds at Northwick Park.

Another local issue in Brent and Harrow is a review of the capitation process and formula. Under the present formula, Brent and Harrow is considered to be above its target so we tend to receive less growth moneys than other districts. The skill of many of the people who work in the primary care group, the health authority and the local trusts has meant that we have been successful at winning new funds for the NHS locally, but a review of the capitation formula needs to take place. I, for one, do not accept that the formula properly reflects the needs for health care in Harrow.

Recruitment and retention of nurses have received substantial attention in other debates both in this Chamber and in the main Chamber, but recruitment and retention of support workers are equally crucial to the quality of care. I am thinking of cardiac technicians and technicians who work in the delivery of pathology services. The pay and conditions of those professionals need attention.

I suggest that we need some more investment in the assistance that we offer to patients who think that they have not received good service from the NHS. In my constituency, the son of a woman who died had some genuine concerns about the quality of care that she received from one of my local hospitals, but he had and still has problems in obtaining access to medical expertise to advise him and help him read the medical records available to him and judge whether there was significant substance to his concerns. We have done a great deal to improve London's health service and health care for my constituents, but there are other things that we need to do, and I hope that the Minister will take those concerns forward.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge): I congratulate the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) on securing this debate. The attendance shows how popular the subject is and the need for the debate. Perhaps I can make a plea to the Minister. The hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) said that a year ago we had an Adjournment debate in Government time on health services in London. I suggest that a proper debate on the Floor of the House is about due. We do not want to have any more waiting for that.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park raised one issue about which I have a genuine question. I am not too up on it and perhaps she can give me an answer. I understand that if a GP holds only computerised records and not hard copies, he or she is in breach of some regulation, and that that deters many GPs from computerising records.

In Hillingdon, we have recently had the arrival of the primary care trust—one of the few in London. It is early days, but it has been greeted by most of the people in the health agencies with open arms. It seems that, although it is early days, the enthusiasm and optimism shows that PCTs might well be appropriate in certain areas, certainly in suburban and urban areas.

I and the two other Members of Parliament for the London borough of Hillingdon had a meeting last Friday with all the health agencies, including the community health council, to find out whether there was a cunning plan for Hillingdon. We feel that we are just drifting. We were slightly reassured. We are having a further meeting, but there is a great willingness to work together. We were told by someone from outside the area that Hillingdon is a good example of an area in which everyone is working towards a common goal. The social services department is working closely with the health agency to try to resolve some of the problems that we know exist.

We are not entirely sure what the big plan is for Hillingdon. We have our own vision and ideas of what we want and expect for NHS patients in three or four years' time. Although many matters need to be dealt with for the time being, we also want to look to the future. We are worried that once we have our own plan, regional and perhaps national plans will be changed.

If the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. McDonnell) were here, I am sure that he would raise the problem that he has and that I share in the Uxbridge constituency—the problem of GP practices. As time is short, I will make passing reference to the work that my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) has done in promoting the problems facing Mount Vernon and Harefield hospitals, which were mentioned briefly by the hon. Member for Harrow, West.

There is a great deal of concern locally—when I say "locally" I mean over quite a wide area—about threats to close those two hospitals. I cannot single out either of them, but Harefield is regarded as a national asset, and I find strange the idea that it would improve people's health to take them into the inner city for their operations and recuperation. Anyone who has been to Harefield knows what a tranquil and idyllic spot it is. Even a layman such as I realises that being in a place like that aids recovery.

As time is short, I shall not rehearse the points about Mount Vernon. I mention only the A and E unit, which has gone, and the burns unit and the cleft palate unit, which are under threat. There is a strong feeling locally that consultation with local interested parties is consultation for the sake of it. It seems that the decisions have already been made. Whether that is true remains to be seen, but there is a strong feeling that the consultation is just lip service.

I share many of the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Richmond Park. I have many of the same problems, including recruitment and retention. The hon. Lady mentioned the TB vaccine. I have taken up the issue and found out that there has been no routine BCG vaccination of children under the schools programme in Hillingdon for the past two years. In a letter dated 21 January 2000, I was told that this was due to the non-availability of BCG vaccine. I should like to know from the Minister whether there has been any improvement and what the Government plan to do about the problem. Are there any plans to vaccinate people who missed out? In that case, there will surely be a huge backlog. In the light of increasing incidence of TB, what threat is there to those children who have not been vaccinated? Do the Government consider the vaccination to be as vital as do the parents of those children who have not been vaccinated? I hear little on the subject from the Government, and I hope that today we shall hear more.

As Members of Parliament, we hear only the complaints, sometimes serious complaints, that come to us, so it is easy for us to think that everything is doom and gloom. Many questions surround the NHS in London. I pay tribute to all those people who work in the health service in Hillingdon, who are doing their utmost, sometimes in difficult conditions. There are some good things going on; I particularly mention the diabetes unit at Hillingdon hospital, which is certainly first class.

I regret that, as a Member of Parliament, I have spent the past three years or so fighting closures in the local health service. I should like to be welcoming the arrival of new services. It is a great shame that most Members of Parliament have been fighting such causes for some while. I make a special plea for increased renal services in our area. There seems to be a dearth of such services in west London—particularly of dialysis, but in a range of other services, too.

I am sure that the Minister is aware of the great disappointment and frustration, not only in my area and in London generally but throughout the country, about what is happening in the NHS. If we are not careful to address those concerns quickly, there really will be a crisis. I do not want to talk up crisis for party political gain, but if she walks the streets, she will find that that is what everybody is saying.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) on securing this vital debate. It is vital in the true sense of that word because it concerns the life and death of our constituents here in London.

I must disagree with the hon. Lady on one specific point. Early in her speech, she made a plea for no more change in the health service. I want more change; I want the sort of changes that we are seeing at Northwick Park hospital accident and emergency department. It was originally designed 30 years ago to accommodate just 40,000 attendances a year, but in the past year, that A and E department saw 75,000 people through its doors.

Dr. Tonge: I must qualify the point. There is great difference between reorganisation of management structures and new facilities that will affect patients.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand very well the hon. Lady's point. Indeed, were there time, I would elaborate on it.

I am delighted that we have secured the £2.2 million from the Government modernisation fund to make the change that is needed. Work has already begun. It includes a new six-bed resuscitation unit, a dedicated child care service, 22 new major injury bays, new minor injury bays and accommodation in the new A and E department for 90,000 attendances—more than doubling that of the present design and allowing for a 25 per cent. increase on throughflow. That is the sort of change that I welcome, and I am sure that the hon. Lady would do so, too. It is the sort of change that I want more of.

As anyone in Brent will tell you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the overcrowding of the A and E department at Northwick Park was desperately exacerbated by the scandalous closure of the emergency unit at Edgware hospital, which was rushed through by the Conservative Government just one month before the election. My greatest disappointment since becoming a Member of Parliament has been to find that we could not reverse that decision.

We had pledged to review the closure. It was only after the election that the true extent of the deviousness surrounding that closure became apparent. The Tories had not just closed the A and E department; without telling the public, they had let the contract to demolish the surgical block. Without surgical back-up, it is of course not safe to have an A and E department. The promised review therefore could not restore the emergency unit. That is the sort of change that I did not want.

Together with other local Members of Parliament, I spoke to colleagues in government—indeed, to the now Secretary of State for Health—and secured for the hospital another review of all the services that were to take place on the site. The full business case for the redevelopment of Edgware hospital has now been approved at a capital cost of £21.8 million. That is £22 million of new money going into services and provision for the local community in Edgware, Brent and Harrow.

A pilot of a primary care walk-in centre will open in August. The new hospital will include consultant-led out-patient services, children's services, day surgery and a birth centre. Those are all changes in the health service in the Brent and Harrow area that we want and on which we welcome the Government's initiative.

However, there are other aspects of the service in Brent and Harrow which the Government must address and change. I believe that the Minister knows of my concern, which is shared by my hon. Friends the Members for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) and for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty), about the provision of breast screening by the Brent and Harrow health authority.

Women should receive reports of abnormal results from breast screening within two weeks. In fact, the results are reported within four weeks. The Government set a target for assessment of abnormal results within two to three weeks. The time span is up to six weeks. That is a desperate situation for women who are concerned about an abnormal scan and who want to find out what is going wrong and what treatment they might be able to receive. Mobile units in the Brent and Harrow health authority are clapped out. There is one left that is working. I challenge anyone to say that a screening unit that has for five months stood in a car park in Stanmore is truly mobile.

Those are the sorts of problems with which we are dealing, and they must be addressed by the Government. I know that ministerial colleagues are committed to providing good oncology services and that screening is one of the most fundamental parts that is subject to the review that the Department is undertaking, but I urge the Minister to respond to the concern of all local Members of Parliament and to ensure proper provision.

I shall finally pick up a point made by the hon. Member for Richmond Park on the curse of tuberculosis. She talked of it as one of the most fundamental indicators of poverty. She may or may not know that my constituency has the highest incidence of TB. I raise the point because, although otherwise correct, her remarks cannot apply to Brent, North.

Brent, North is a comparatively affluent constituency, but 40 per cent. of its population comes from the Indian subcontinent, and they return there frequently. The health authority—I have been in discussion with it—is convinced that the real problem is with the Indian community visiting family on the subcontinent, where conditions are as the hon. Lady described, contracting TB and returning with the infection. I share her deep concern about the matter, but incidence of the disease in my local community is not indicative of poverty.

If time permitted, I would comment on many other issues. In particular, I welcome the reduction in the waiting lists in the Brent and Harrow health authority at Northwick Park from 11,500 to 8,500—a 25 per cent. reduction during the past three years. However, I am conscious of the time, and I know that other hon. Members wish to speak.

11.50 am

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge), and apologise for arriving late and missing the start of her contribution.

I shall focus my brief remarks on an issue of major importance to the health service in London—the balance of funding between primary care services and the acute sector. Hospitals have always been synonymous in the public mind with the health service, but most people look to primary care—in many ways the cinderella service—to deal with their health care needs.

The balance of funding has been a problem in London since the advent of the national health service in 1948. A major recommendation of the Tomlinson report in 1992 was that there should be a shift of resources from the acute sector to primary care. It was suggested that that should be achieved through a reduction in bed numbers. I shall not elaborate on the problems that that has created in London, but the report recognised the difficulties of funding primary care and the provision of GP services in the Greater London area, which was identified as a major problem by the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall).

The Tomlinson report made a number of recommendations for improving the number of GPs, the associated services provided by health centres, and GPs' premises. However, it is clear from the Turnberg report of only two years ago that the problems of primary care in London continue and in many ways intensify. Since 1990, GP numbers in London have fallen by 1 per cent., during a period when they have risen by 6 per cent. in the rest of the country, and at a time when the population of London is increasing.

There is a particular problem with single-handed GP practices. Whereas they have reduced to 8.6 per cent. of all GP practices in the rest of the country, in London they represent 20 per cent. of practices—a major issue for London health services.

With regard to list sizes, the number of GP practices with lists of more than 2,500 is much greater than in the rest of the country. I recognise that there is far more population movement in Greater London, so some lists may well be inflated, but the pressure on GPs in London is significantly greater than on those in the rest of the country.

The problem of GP premises was supposed to have been addressed by the Tomlinson report in 1992, but in my district, Enfield and Haringey, 55 per cent. of GP premises remain below the minimum standard.

Taking all those difficulties together, we can understand why Leslie Turnberg stated in his report:

> General practice lags behind the rest of the country and appears to be getting worse rather than better.

The problem is not just the failure to attract GPs into Greater London. There is a series of associated problems, often but not exclusively related to single-handed practices. I refer to the additional services that we have come to expect from health centres—the provision of practice nurses, chiropody and so on. Those are not provided in Greater London, as they are in other parts of the country. The training of staff to provide those services is not being achieved in Greater London, partly because of the number of single-handed practices, and partly because of a lack of commitment to maintaining staff of the highest standard.

The professional development of GPs is a further issue. Many single-handed GP practices in London are run by elderly general practitioners, many of whom have never had to update their skills and are still practising as though the health service was still in the 1950s and 1960s, rather than going into the 21st century.

The provision of proper primary care in the most deprived areas has been a particular problem. The difficulty of attracting GPs to deprived areas was partially addressed by the Government in 1998, when they made available £25 million for additional deprivation payments. I welcome that, but there are continuing doubts. It is clear in London and other parts of the country that deprived areas face significantly greater problems in attracting staff.

I recognise that a salaried general practitioner scheme may overcome some of those problems, but we must find ways of attracting GPs to work in those areas. The way in which the payments scheme operates is not to the advantage of the service. There seems to be some confusion about whether the payment is for additional work load, for providing additional time for the patient, or to attract staff into less attractive areas.

I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to re-examine the deprivation payments scheme, to see whether there is anything further that the Government can do to ensure that our most deprived areas—those that have been the focus of the recent report entitled "A National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal"—will be able to offer a level of service comparable with that available in other parts of the country.

Finally, I hope that the spending review will address the balance of funding between primary care and the acute sector. Tomlinson got it entirely wrong by suggesting that resources should be shifted across the two. With the additional resources that are to be made available, there is an opportunity to provide an adequate level of funding for primary care. If we do that, we may create a health service in London that meets the real needs of its people.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) on securing the debate. It is a timely debate, following on, as others have pointed out, from a debate in Government time about a year ago. From the contributions that we have heard today, it is clear that it would be valuable if there were a further debate in Government time, so that more hon. Members—London Members in particular, but others, too—could contribute.

Speeches have reflected a range of constituents' experiences and the concerns of professionals in the health service. As the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) rightly said, in our mail bags we receive and pass on many brick bats; we receive fewer bouquets. However, much of what the national health service does in London and elsewhere is excellent and needs encouragement, promotion and further development.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park has raised several important issues. I want to mention some, and develop a couple of other themes that emerged from the debate. She was right to mention the huge health inequalities that exist in London and the litany of reports that have identified the strong relationship between poverty, deprivation and poor health, and the need to do more.

My hon. Friend was right to highlight bad practice and corner cutting, as she put it, that is caused by an obsession with bed occupancy rates. The fixation with bed occupancy statistics, and efforts to concentrate on conditions rather than the person as whole, can lead to lack of attention to detail in the care of an individual, often at the expense of that person's dignity and overall care.

My hon. Friend identified another problem, which applies to my constituency. She spoke of change that is not about investment in services, which the hon. Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) rightly described and welcomed, but organisational change. The NHS appears to be in perpetual revolution. It perpetually changes its organisation and management structures, not always with the outcomes trumpeted by the Ministers who initiated them. The primary care groups and primary health teams in the latest review are useful to drive primary care, but I am worried about the lack of integration of health, especially primary care, with social care. In my constituency, there is a lack of coterminosity between primary care groups and social services departments. That could get worse.

My hon. Friend said that she was making a Back-Bench speech. She made a typically forthright speech and raised many issues that will continue to be debated in this place and outside for some time. She was especially right to consider staff vacancy rates. It is important to acknowledge that capacity is vital in dealing with many anxieties that are raised with us in our constituencies. We have only to consider the legacy of staffing in the NHS to appreciate that the problems with which the Government grapple did not necessarily begin on 1 May 1997. They were long in their manufacture under the previous Government's tenure. We have only to consider the age profile of many staff, especially nurses, to realise that the current problems are not likely to be solved for some time. Many staff are approaching the end of their time in nursing. We must acknowledge that when considering the resources for tackling vacancy problems.

London suffers from the most acute staff shortages in professions allied to medicine and in nursing. One in three of the 15,000 vacancies throughout England are in London. The three-month vacancy figures for nurses and midwives show 2.6 per cent. in England and 5.1 per cent. in London. The figure in my health authority is 4.9 per cent; in my local Epsom and St. Helier trust, it is 6 per cent. Managers are grappling with genuine problems. They have to go ever further afield. Reports in the Evening Standard show that they look not only further afield in this country, but abroad to try to find additional staff to plug the gaps.

The hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) mentioned the need to invest in intensive care services. I agree, but we must acknowledge that there was intense pressure on intensive care beds in London last winter and that that was caused, at least partly, by staffing problems. There are 20 per cent. vacancies in intensive care units in London. The problem is therefore not simply one of beds and units. However, the hon. Gentleman was right to point to the need for investment in such services in outer London.

The problem of vacancies is caused partly by the fact that people are being priced out of London. That applies to public sector workers generally, and especially NHS staff. In the past year, house prices have increased in London by 23 per cent. It is a harsh reality that a newly qualified nurse, who earns approximately £17,000, cannot get on the property ladder. As my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park rightly said, our benefits system makes it difficult even to get into the rented sector.

I want to address two other issues briefly. First, I want to speak about neurology, another Cinderella service which needs some attention in London. I understand that a review is currently taking place. I hope that it will shed light on the way in which the services might be developed in future. Specialist services have suffered through reorganisation and fragmentation. It is therefore important to consider the way in which we can tackle that.

Probably more than one in 30 people in London are affected by neurological conditions. There is only one neurologist per 200,000 people in the United Kingdom. I suspect that the position may be worse in London. There are not enough neurologists to fulfil demand. I undertook a survey earlier this year and found that the average wait for a first appointment with a neurologist was 19 weeks. The longest waits were 23 weeks. That is unacceptable when trying to map out the necessary care pathways to provide support, care and attention. Indeed, in this country, patients who sustain a head injury or stroke have half as much chance of waking with a neurologist or a neurosurgeon at the bottom of the bed than anywhere else in the developed world. That is an unacceptable measure of our position as a country.

Many neurological conditions leave people feeling marginalised and left to navigate their own way through the care system. Early diagnosis is vital; it leads to a better prognosis. Clear care pathways and counselling are often the key to many neurological conditions. Greater co-ordination of service providers and a multidisciplinary approach are essential. I hope that the Government will consider developing not only the strategy that is being worked on in London, but the need to provide a national service framework to develop neurological services.

Secondly, I want to speak about communicable disease, to which the hon. Member for Brent, North and my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park referred. I shall concentrate on mumps, measles and rubella, and tuberculosis. There is a strong correlation—although the hon. Member for Brent, North cited some evidence to contradict it—between deprivation, low immunisation levels and outbreaks. That is not surprising when we take into account that 11 out of the 20 poorest boroughs in England are in London.

Let us consider TB first because mortality rates in London are a serious problem. Incidence of TB in London is 80 per cent. above the national average. Incidence is concentrated in some of the most deprived parts of London. The hon. Member for Brent, North identified other reasons why it is a problem in Brent. There is also a serious problem in east London. The incidence in east London is six times the national average. The hon. Member for Uxbridge is right to draw attention to the backlog of BCG vaccinations and the potential problems that that could cause, for example, a future increase in TB.

The recommended level of immunisation to avoid outbreaks of mumps, measles and rubella is 95 per cent. In the United Kingdom, take-up is 88 per cent; in London, it is 80 per cent. However, like any average, that figure hides wide variations. In some parts of London, the figure is as low as 71 per cent. Outbreaks occurred in east London last year. They were not major or life threatening, but they are a serious cause for concern when we consider that serious outbreaks occurred in the Netherlands, where immunisation levels are too low. Consequently, the more fatal elements of the condition were reached.

We need a concerted campaign to increase immunisation. Even if poverty is not the cause of outbreaks, low immunisation is a major reason for the increase in outbreaks. We need to consider carefully what immunisation levels in London mean for outbreaks in the next five to 10 years and ensure that we put that right now.

This debate has been a useful taster of the fuller debate that I hope will be allowed in Government time because many issues need to be discussed, including high-tech investment, about which hon. Members have spoken, and the need to deal with the detailed care of individuals. As my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park has said, the statistics on health inequalities in London are striking. Those inequalities need to be acknowledged in allocating resources and using existing resources more effectively, which means considering how to improve capacity without losing sight of Cinderella services, such as neurology. We must ensure that we drive home the message about immunisation and the links with poverty and communicable diseases so that health in London is as good as anywhere else in the country.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): I apologise to hon. Members for my late arrival. I had not realised until today that debates in Westminster Hall could start before the allotted hour. I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) on securing the debate. She seemed to be slightly torn between the temptation to attack the current Government and the temptation to attack the previous Government, so she had a go at both, safe in the knowledge that the party that she represents is unlikely to be burdened with that responsibility.

We have had a good debate, and hon. Members have made some important and interesting points, to which the Minister will want to respond. London is different. London's size, population density, ethnicity mix, social problems and environmental characteristics provide a specific backdrop to its health agenda. Many of the issues that hon. Members have raised reflect the more general problems of the NHS across London.

The hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) made the point, which I am fond of making, that we as politicians are guilty of a tendency to focus on hospitals and acute services, yet primary care and community services represent the routine point of contact with the NHS for the great majority of people. A health agenda that works for Londoners must address the inadequacies in those services and provide people in the heart of the capital with the same quality of primary and community services that those who live on its periphery and in the surrounding suburbs have come to expect. Until the primary care tier is right, the secondary sector will always struggle to do its job properly against a background of inappropriate referrals and self-referrals to hospitals.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park referred to the huge additional burdens that the influx of asylum seekers have put on health services in London. That is an example of the specific problems that London faces. The incidence of TB is soaring. One estimate suggests that TB could have increased by 80 per cent. in 1999 alone, which inevitably imposes a huge burden on the service. There are other pressures, including HIV. A third of all HIV suffers in the United Kingdom live in London. The number in south-east London alone has increased by a third in the past two years, yet, for example, the genito-urinary medicine clinics at Guy's and St. Thomas's are forced to shut their doors once they have seen 100 patients because of the lack of resources. Facilities are not being used to address the urgent problems that face the capital.

Substance misuse and mental illness are particular problems in London, as hon. Members have said. Those problems affect twice as many male London residents compared with the United Kingdom average. Health authorities in London are inadequately resourced to deal with those specific problems, often with the result that improvements in basic health services for Londoners are not taking place as fast as in other parts of the country or as fast as necessary.

I am very concerned that the consensus by which the NHS prospers and has worked for the past 50 years will start to break down if what I shall typify as the ordinary working Londoner finds that the health services cannot deliver for him and his family, that the accident and emergency department cannot respond when his child needs it and that the family health services are not there for him and his family when they need them because of the extraordinary burdens that face the health care system in London. In addressing the specific needs involved in mental illness, HIV, sexually transmitted diseases, TB and so on, it is important that we do not lose sight of the fact that we have to preserve that consensus by providing appropriate services across the board.

Outer London has some of the longest A and E waiting times and, on average, London as a whole has longer waiting times than the rest of the United Kingdom. That is linked to the problems of staff recruitment and retention. Some London trusts are 30 per cent. under establishment in nurses and are surviving only by using agency and bank staff.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park described the problems facing student nurses on bursaries. I have seen examples of such problems in my constituency, where house prices are almost as high as in hers. That urgent problem needs to be addressed. I do not pretend to have an instant or easy answer, but it is vital that it is resolved so that the health service in London has a future.

The hon. Lady also dealt with bed-occupancy rates—obviously, a critical issue given the rising number of hospital-acquired infections, yet the Government are still closing beds. According to The Sunday Times last Sunday, that has led to scenes of third-world chaos and squalor at a major teaching hospital in London.

On the eve of the election, the Government's slogan was "24 hours to save the NHS". Now that they are in office, they seem to be slightly less pressured by time. In response to the Turnberg report, the then Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said that it would take 10 years to improve London's health services, but, in the meantime, the NHS is still failing Londoners too often. Deficits are piling up in health authorities and trusts.

[Mr. Philip Hammond]

The Government promised a moratorium on hospital closures, but, after their three years in office, the axe still hangs over several London hospitals and beds are whittled away in others. Other hospitals have gone. Bart's—which was supposedly saved for the community and which, we were told, would focus on cancer and cardiac services—will not be a general hospital serving the local population, but a specialist unit. To all intents and purposes, for local people, Bart's has closed—a triumph of spin over substance and another broken election pledge.

The Harold Wood hospital scheme has been scrapped. The Havering hospitals NHS trust has now conceded that the new Oldchurch hospital will not be completed before the autumn of 2005, and people close to that situation believe that 2007 is a more accurate estimate. A further 200 beds have been cut from the planned number at the Royal London hospital development and the split-site solution has been chosen. Senior consultants have condemned that decision as a "dangerous" political fix, which presents a "serious risk" to patients.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park has spoken about the situation at Queen Mary's hospital, Roehampton. Ambulance response times there were only 26 per cent. compliant with the Government's target, which had knock-on effects in maternity and A and E services across west London. Services at the Royal Free, Whittington and other hospitals are facing continued threats and uncertainty.

What of the future? The fact that London has an elected Assembly and an elected mayor has not been mentioned. They are bound to want to have a say in the health agenda for London. Across the country, political interference and attempts by politicians to micro-manage the health agenda have been part of the problem, not of the solution. I hope that the Minister will reassure us that the NHS in London will not be turned into even more of a political football when the clash of titans takes place as the mayor gets into his stride.

The Minister needs to tell us that the extra money that will be made available to London during the next three or four years will reach the health authorities and can be used to improve primary and secondary services so that ordinary, hard-working Londoners can be confident that the NHS in London will be there for them when they and their families need it. After all the other extraordinary pressures that are specific to London have been dealt with, the ordinary people of London must find that the services that they need exist so that the consensus that is essential for the NHS to survive and prosper in the 21st century can be rebuilt.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Gisela Stuart): I congratulate the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) on securing this timely and useful debate. Up until the last 10 minutes, I thought that it was specific to London, and I wish that I had more time to respond to the points that she raised. I realise how busy she has been this morning, as I saw her taking part in the earlier debate on Christians in Egypt. Her concerns go well beyond her constituency.

I shall deal with the specific points before coming to the more general aspects. Consultation is part of the national development plan. Some people have said please, no more change, and others have said that they want more change. I think that we need both. We need continual change, but it must be part of a much wider, strategic framework.

The hon. Lady referred to bed occupancy rates. I am aware that there have been problems with bed occupancy in hospitals in her constituency. However, I understand that they have now been alleviated. Kingston hospital has 30 more acute beds than it had last year, and the provision of mental health beds at Queen Mary's University hospital in Roehampton has improved because alternative provision and arrangements have been made at Tolworth hospital.

I was grateful that my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) recognised the improvements that have been made, but he highlighted the issue of intensive care beds, especially in Northwick Park hospital. I understand that he has a meeting tomorrow with the regional director of the NHS executive in London. I hope that he will have a successful exchange of ideas.

The hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) was concerned about whether consultations in this area are real consultations. I point out that the Mount Vernon hospital accident and emergency department was closed under the previous Government. We must not lose sight of the past. Closing accident and emergency departments is not a significant characteristic of this Government: we are concerned with the provision of services. The consultation process can sometimes be unsettling for communities. We seek certainty, but the very process of consultation involves a period of uncertainty until decisions are made.

Many hon. Members raised the subject of tuberculosis and the TB vaccine. We are fully aware of the problems. The Government are in discussion with the manufacturers about the national shortage of vaccine. I assure hon. Members that the Government have made sure that the available vaccine goes to the children who are most at risk. In London, where this is a specific problem, the Thames regional directors of public health in 1998 published "A strategy for tuberculosis control in London: a need for change". As a result of that, a taskforce was set up in consultation with multidisciplinary agencies. We are piloting a TB register in London, and we shall soon have some of the results of that scheme.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) reminded us of the disgraceful manoeuvring in relation to Edgware hospital, which made a revision of the plan impossible when we came into government. He raised valid concerns about breast screening in his constituency. I am fully aware of the number of parliamentary questions that he has tabled on that issue. If he would find it helpful, I should be happy to facilitate a meeting with Ministers to discuss the matter further.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) expressed his concerns about funding for primary care. He explained the problems faced in many parts of the country, especially in big cities. As a Birmingham MP, I recognise some of the problems that he referred to, but not on quite the scale that people face in London. Considerable extra funding is going into the primary care sector, not least the £10 million additional funding in 2000-01 that has been targeted on improving primary care premises in London. I am sure that my hon. Friend welcomes the opening of the walk-in centre in Tottenham and Edmonton on 31 July.

The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) referred to the problem of boundaries, which is almost insoluble. There will always be overlapping boundaries: there is no perfect solution. It is important in the establishment of primary care groups and subsequent primary care trusts that the configurations we end up with have a natural dynamic. Communities should have cohesion. Sometimes boundaries will be concurrent, but in other places they will not be. Where there are overlapping boundaries, especially between health authorities and social services, we want provisions to be put in place that will overcome the problem.

Like all of us, the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) learned something new today. I hope that he welcomes that learning opportunity. We welcome such developments in the national health service. I must challenge his notion that the problems are due to inadequate resourcing. He rightly said that we need a national consensus for a national health service. If there is one party that is committed to a national consensus for a national health service out of taxation it is the Labour party. We do not think that private insurance is the way forward.

To come back to the overall problems, what the debate showed is that London contains an extremely diverse community. It does not have a static population: some 7 million people live in London, but 25 million tourists visit the city, some 670,000 commuters come into London to work and almost a million people travel into the city centre every day. It has great diversity, including some of the most deprived areas and some of the most affluent. It has extraordinary nationally and internationally recognised medical expertise, and some examples of the worst practice.

That is why one of the first things we did when we came into government was to establish the Turnberg review, which was an independent investigation into the needs of London. We also set up the NHS executive's London office. The Turnberg review reported in seven months, and the Government accepted all its recommendations. It is important in the London context that all the agencies work together.

Hon. Members raised the issue of mental health. It is important to remember that on 11 April the Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), launched "Mental Health in London: A Strategy for Action", which was developed jointly by the NHS executive and the social care regions. As the hon. Member for Richmond Park said, health and social care services must be delivered coherently.

These strategies are underpinned by increases in resources and the provision of new services. It is no accident that, of the 36 walk-in centres, a quarter are in London. The new services of NHS Direct will be available for the whole of London by 31 October. The Soho walk-in centre is important because it is a local health service centre that includes the Chinese national healthy living centre. That is a recognition of the ethnic diversity of London.

The funding that has gone into London has been unprecedented. There has been huge capital investment of £3.5 billion in a building programme, and there is year-on-year recurrent investment that is not used to pay off debts, as has been suggested. We expect any institution, whether it is a hospital or a trust, to finance its services coherently. In London, new moneys are certainly not being used to repay old debts. They are used to address the shortcomings in services, and to reconfigure services so as to provide a better service for everyone in London.

Focus is being put on health action zones working together with the new London mayor to provide a much healthier environment for people in London. We have recognised the need for strategic input, for extra money and for extra help for the training and retention of nurses. We are confident that we will put those policies in place.

Industrial Deafness

12.29 pm

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West): I welcome the opportunity to bring the case of my constituent, Mr. James Fryer, of Purley in Reading, to the attention of the Chamber. Sadly, due to ill health, Mr. Fryer cannot be here to witness the results of his four-year struggle to obtain industrial injuries disablement benefit. However, it is obvious to me that there is a clear case for the legislation surrounding the IIDB qualifying criteria to be reviewed by the Government.

I want briefly to outline the history of my constituent's case. As my hon. Friend the Minister and hon. Members will know, to qualify for IIDB the claimant must have worked in a prescribed occupation and the claim must be made within five years of having worked in that employment. For 34 years, Mr. Fryer worked with power presses at Waymaster Ltd. in Reading. However, unfortunately for him, and for some bizarre reason, power presses are not listed in the Department of Social Security guidelines and the occupation is not prescribed.

Mr. Fryer has suffered hearing loss as a result of his employment. That has been supported by subsequent medical reports. He made his claim for IIDB in 1996 and was refused in the same year in which the social security tribunal upheld the idea that the use of a power press did not constitute the use of a prescribed tool in a prescribed occupation. The nub of that argument is that power presses somehow make only background industrial noise. Anybody who has spent time on the shop floor and has seen such a press in operation will know that the very last thing that a power press makes is background industrial noise. It makes a considerable noise, and 34 years' work in the industry is likely to have some effect on a person's hearing. I should know; I was born right next to Heathrow airport, which is one reason why I have to shout a lot.

It is worth quoting the DSS tribunal hearing of 3 November 1996. Giving the grounds for his appeal, Mr. Fryer states:

> If you read the first paragraph of NI 207 you will find that Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit was introduced to help the very people like myself. That is the first and foremost reason of its existence.
> Secondly I do not believe there are two kinds of industrial deafness and I don't think the members of a tribunal will either, but if you can prove me wrong would you please put it in writing so that I might forward your statement to Mr. Hayworth, the hearing consultant at the Royal Berkshire Hospital, so he does not unknowingly mislead other people into thinking that they are industrially deaf when in fact, according to your rules, they are not.

A senior consultant at a well-respected hospital is advising constituents of mine that they qualify for that benefit when, because of a vagary in the rules, they do not.

Although I could continue at length, I am aware of the time constraints. However, I must quote the adjudicating officer's statement:

> Mr Fryer is claiming that his deafness has been caused by working with power presses. In his letter of 23/4/1996 Mr Fryer states his deafness has been caused by working for 34 years with power presses and "for the rules to exclude power presses is very wrong".
> As Mr Fryer has not worked with any of the prescribed tools or in any of the prescribed occupations in the five years prior to his date of claim the decision at box 1 was given.

Unfortunately, that decision was to deny Mr. Fryer IIDB. It is ridiculous that we have such time-limited criteria. Even though someone worked in an industry for 25 or 30 years—34 years in the case of my constituent—and because of the five-year gap before the hearing impediment became such that he felt able to lodge a claim, Mr. Fryer is somehow ineligible. Somehow, 34 years' work in heavy engineering counts for nothing under the rules.

In my three years as a Member, I have made a number of representations about Mr. Fryer to Ministers in both Houses. Although the responses have helpfully set out the legislation surrounding the qualifying criteria for IIDB, unfortunately the law offers my constituent little hope of obtaining a benefit that was established in 1974—in his eyes and mine and, I would suggest, in the eyes of Parliament at that time—to cater for people such as Mr. Fryer.

I have had copious correspondence with Ministers, which has been useful but not productive. A letter from Baroness Hollis of Heigham states:

> You also expressed concern about the fact that Mr. Fryer's occupation is not on the list of prescribed occupations for which industrial injuries disablement benefit in respect of deafness can be paid. A disease may only be prescribed as an industrial disease if it can be treated as a risk of occupation and not as a risk common to all people and where, in particular cases, the occupational link can be established or presumed with reasonable certainty.

Apart from the fact that that statement makes absolutely no sense whatever, it defies logic to suggest that members of the general public wander in and out of engineering shops, exposing themselves to noise caused by power presses. That is the implication of what the Minister wrote.

My gripe is not with the treatment that my constituent has received from the Government, but with the inflexibility of the IIDB qualifying criteria. I call on the Government to relax the criteria for those who have suffered hearing loss or impairment as a result of their employment. I understand that the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council keeps under review literature that relates to hearing loss at work. That fine, independent body then reports to the Secretary of State for Social Security and advises him or her accordingly. I put it to my hon. Friend the Minister that there is a case for reviewing the way in which the scientific evidence is used in this area.

Perhaps my hon. Friend can advise me whether the Government have any plans to establish a group to look more deeply into the problem. I want to hear from him today whether there will be a full review of the criteria surrounding industrial deafness and the prescribed occupations. I am aware that being able accurately to assess the nature of a claimant's hearing loss after the statutory five-year period is a problem for Ministers, but I hope that they will look again at the nature of the employment that perhaps led to the hearing difficulties in the first place.

I draw to the Chamber's attention the results of "Indecent Exposure", a joint report on noise at work by the Royal National Institute for Deaf People and the Trades Union Congress that was published in March last year. I congratulate both bodies on their fine work in researching excessive noise in the workplace. I am sure that, like me, hon. Members will be concerned to learn that current Health and Safety Executive figures suggest that at least 1.3 million employees are exposed to noise levels above 85 decibels—the point at which noise affects hearing and can affect it in the long term.

The connection between hearing loss and excessive noise is certainly not one that any self-respecting scientist or doctor would dispute. Clearly, the Government have done much to improve working conditions for millions of employees throughout the country. However, it seems clear that improvement is still lacking in this area and, despite various regulations and Acts of Parliament, industrial deafness still is not treated as seriously in the workplace as its consequences demand.

The report "Indecent Exposure" discovered that nearly a quarter of all respondents to the RNIDP-TUC survey reported listening to uncomfortably loud sounds for more than four hours a day. Almost one in five construction workers, more than one in 10 workers in the manufacturing sector and those working on oil rigs reported being exposed to uncomfortably loud sound for more than eight hours a day. A third of respondents said that work tasks left them with dullness of hearing—in 16 per cent. of cases, the dullness was continuous—and 20 per cent. reported that work tasks left them with ringing or rushing noises in their ears or head lasting more than five minutes.

Just as worrying is the fact that nearly half the respondents said that they were concerned that noise levels at work were affecting their hearing. However, only a quarter had raised their concern with someone and only two thirds had approached their employer. I endorse the noise at work campaign, which called for a number of improvements in the regulatory regime, such as:

> more research into the dangers of noise in industries where the risks are not understood, or acted on . . . employers to meet their legal obligations under the Noise at Work Regulations 1989, reducing the risk of noise damage in the workplace; employees to be aware of the potential risks to their hearing from working in noisy environments, to wear appropriate ear protectors when provided and to inform and work with the employers to reduce noise risk; and greater awareness of the cumulative effects of noise damage—both from the workplace and from leisure activities—which increase the risk of hearing damage and tinnitus.

Those are very worrying figures, which should concern us all, particularly those of us who represent the few places in the country where there is still heavy industry, and manufacturing industry at that. To that end, I urge the Minister to re-examine the law surrounding the criteria for prescribed occupations with a view to offering my constituent some recompense.

I urge the Government to commission a report into noise levels in the workplace and their health implications, and to do more to encourage enforcement of existing noise regulations. I ask them to encourage employers and employees to foster a more ear-friendly culture in the workplace, especially through enforcement of the Noise at Work Regulations 1989.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Hugh Bayley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) on raising the important issue of occupational deafness. I sympathise with the difficulties that his constituent has experienced. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the persistent way in which he has pursued Mr. Fryer's case. He has proved again that he is an exemplary Member of Parliament speaking up for his constituents.

Before I respond to my hon. Friend's points, it may be helpful if I give some background information about occupational deafness and the industrial injuries benefit scheme. Occupational deafness became one of the prescribed diseases for industrial injuries disablement benefit in 1974. To qualify for industrial injuries disablement benefit on the ground of occupational deafness, a person must have worked in one or more of the prescribed occupations for an aggregate period of at least 10 years. The person must then claim benefit within five years of leaving the occupation that caused the hearing loss.

The person will be tested to see if he has an average hearing loss of at least 50 decibels in both ears due to damage in the inner ear. In at least one ear, that must be owing to noise at work. To get benefit for occupational deafness, the person's disablement must be 20 per cent. or more.

As hon. Members may be aware, the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council is an independent statutory body which provides advice to the Secretary of State for Social Security. The advisory council consists of a chairman and 16 members. There is an equal number of representatives of employers, appointed by the Confederation of British Industry, and employed earners, appointed by the TUC. The remaining members come largely from medical backgrounds connected with occupational diseases.

The advisory council advises the Secretary of State on the prescription of industrial diseases, on legislation and on the industrial injuries benefit scheme itself. When the advisory council prescribed occupational deafness as a disease in 1974, it considered that the prescription should cover those most at risk of substantial, work-related hearing loss.

The advisory council recommended that there should be four qualifying conditions. Those related to, first, the level of hearing loss; secondly, the occupations; thirdly, the length of exposure to noise; and, fourthly, the time limit for claiming benefit. The advisory council can recommend prescription only where there is good scientific and epidemiological evidence of a link between the disease and the occupation. Since 1974, the provisions for occupational deafness have been extended in line with further recommendations from the advisory council in 1979, 1983 and 1994.

My hon. Friend asks whether there will be a full review of those issues. I confirm that a review of occupational deafness is taking place. I will return to that later. First, I should like to comment, as far as I can, on the issues raised in relation to Mr. Fryer's case.

As my hon. Friend will be aware, Ministers cannot become involved in individual claims for benefit. Claims for benefit are entirely a matter for Benefits Agency decision-makers or, before July last year, adjudication officers. When they are contested, the claimant has the right to ask a social security appeal tribunal to hear the case. The tribunal, which is independent of the DSS—tribunals are accountable to a judge, not to the Department or to Ministers—can overturn the adjudication officer's decision.

The tribunal has the status of a court of law and a Minister cannot ignore or overturn its decision. Therefore, it would not be right for me to enter into a detailed discussion of the decisions on Mr. Fryer's claim. However, in his case, I understand that there are two main issues of concern. The first issue relates to time limits and the second relates to the types of job listed as a prescribed occupation.

In 1983, the advisory council recommended that the time limit for claiming benefit should be extended from one year to five years. The Government agreed with that recommendation. The time limit was set at five years and not longer to ensure that occupational deafness is linked to a prescribed occupation and is not due to subsequent environmental or natural causes, or simply the ageing process.

Mr. Salter: Does the Minister accept that, although there may be a case for a time limit to avoid fraudulent claims, my constituent worked on the same piece of machinery for 34 years? Does that not indicate that his industrial deafness is unlikely to have been caused by anything in the five and a half years that passed between his leaving that employment and his registering a claim? It is the fact that he is out of time that caused the problem in the first place.

Mr. Bayley: Under the earlier rules, there was a one-year, rather than a five-year, time limit. A time limit is necessary because the longer a person waits before making a claim, the greater the probability that some factor other than noise at his former workplace injured his hearing.

I hope that my hon. Friend accepts that a time limit is needed, even if he feels that the five-year period is too short. However, if we have a time limit of any kind, there will always be the chance that someone will apply just beyond the time limit—just too late for his or her claim to succeed. The decision to extend the time limit from one year to five did, of course, improve the rights of a claimant.

The second issue, on which my hon. Friend dwelt most, related to the prescribed occupations for industrial deafness. More than 20 types of job are prescribed for occupational deafness. The jobs range from those using continuous glass-toughening furnaces, to work in ships' engine rooms, the use of band saws for cutting metal in the metal founding or forging industries and certain work on gas turbines.

Mr. Fryer argues that his deafness was caused by operating power presses, with which he worked five years before his claim for IIDB, and that his former occupation should be prescribed. Of course, his claim had to be determined on the basis of the law at the time. The tribunal has determined that, on the basis of the law at the time, he did not qualify for the benefit. However, I will try to respond to his argument.

The Government's decision on what to treat as a prescribed occupation is informed by the expert advice that we receive from the advisory council. As I have said, the advisory council is looking at the whole issue of occupational deafness.

In August 1998, the advisory council issued a consultation paper entitled "Occupational Coverage For Occupational Deafness." The paper invited evidence and views about the occupations already listed and about those not listed but which evidence suggests should be considered for inclusion. The paper also invited evidence and views about whether the approach to occupational coverage should be reconsidered.

The advisory council set up a group called the occupational deafness working group, whose job is to take forward the examination of occupational deafness. The working group is examining all the evidence that it has received, and is preparing a draft report for consideration by the full advisory council later this year.

The advisory council would recommend prescribing an occupation that used certain tools and machinery only if there was strong and sound scientific evidence that that occupation carried a generally much higher risk of occupational deafness.

Mr. Salter: Are power presses being considered as an additional category in this welcome consultation?

Mr. Bayley: I am afraid that I cannot answer that question, because I have not reviewed the evidence. The working group is reviewing it, however, and when it reaches conclusions it will submit them to the advisory council. If my hon. Friend writes to me with full details of the type of power presses on which Mr. Fryer worked during the five years before he made his claim, I will pass them to the council. I should point out, however, that even if the council supported Mr. Fryer's view, that would not alter the decision in his case, which would still have to be based on the law as it stood at the time of his claim.

Mr. Salter: I must make it clear that I have explained to my constituent—as, I am sure, all hon. Members do in similar circumstances—that, however vigorously we pursue such cases, we cannot expect retrospective legislation, much as we would like it. It is extremely rare for a Parliament in any western democracy to countenance retrospective legislation.

What we want—what I want, certainly—is an assurance that there will be no repeat of the injustice that I believe Mr. Fryer has experienced. We must close any loopholes in the legislation and the regulations to ensure that such episodes do not occur again, and that other hon. Members are not here in five or 10 years presenting exactly the same arguments to my hon. Friend's successor.

Mr. Bayley: I thank my hon. Friend for explaining to his constituent why the rules of Parliament do not allow legislation to be made retrospectively. I accept that his constituent feels strongly that the type of tool with which he was working should be prescribed. As I said, if he gives me full details of the type of power press that was involved, I will pass them on to the advisory council.

When the council has fully examined the issues, it will produce a report setting out its conclusions and any recommendations for the Secretary of State to consider. I understand that it hopes to publish the report later this year or early next year, and I assure hon. Members that the Government will consider carefully any further advice that it may provide.

Employees who suffer hearing damage as a result of exposure to excessive noise at work may be able to obtain compensation from their employers under common law, on the ground of the employers' negligence. The fact that someone does not qualify for industrial injuries disablement benefit does not prevent that person from pursuing a claim for compensation against his or her employer.

Mr. Salter: It would be difficult for my constituent to pursue Waymaster Ltd under common law, because it has gone out of business. What would my hon. Friend advise?

Mr. Bayley: I am afraid that I cannot advise on an individual case without knowing all the circumstances. I can only advise on the law.

The Government believe that noise-induced hearing loss caused by work is a serious and significant occupational health problem. As my hon. Friend said, exposure levels for many workers remain considerable: the Health and Safety Executive estimates that more than 1.25 million people in nearly 90,000 workplaces continue to be exposed to noise levels that could damage their hearing. There is no excuse for anyone's hearing to be impaired owing to loud noise at work. There is long-standing legislation requiring employers and manufacturers to address the problem, and to make noisy machinery quieter. The Noise at Work Regulations 1989 are the mainstay of the regime. They require employers to reduce risks from noise to the lowest reasonably practicable level, and to take specific actions in the case of certain noise levels to protect employees' hearing.

The Health and Safety Executive has produced a range of guidance to help employers and others to comply with their statutory duties. It has also developed a new long-term strategy on noise at work. It will promote more effective control of exposure to noise on the part of employers by encouraging the introduction of quieter machinery and processes. It will also promote the effective use of purchasing policies, the application of noise control measures and, when noise levels cannot be reduced, the correct use of ear protection. Employees have responsibilities to protect themselves by complying with notices and wearing ear protection.

The Government consider that wide-ranging provision is currently made for sufferers from deafness in the industrial injuries scheme when the disease has an occupational cause. There must be rules governing the payment of benefit, and inevitably there will be individual cases that are not covered by those rules. I am confident that there is a reliable and independent way for changes to be recommended to the Secretary of State, through the advisory council, when new scientific evidence about occupational deafness comes to light. As I have said, the council is currently conducting a review. I cannot predict its recommendations, but when its report is published I shall ensure that my hon. Friend receives a copy. I also assure him that, when the Government receive the report, we shall consider its recommendations carefully.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. John McWilliam): I know that a green light is flashing on the Annunciator, but as a Division could not be taking place anywhere other than here, and as a Division cannot take place here anyway, I suggest that hon. Members ignore it.

Drink Driving

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): I am raising this subject because of the case of Charis Yeoman, who was a constituent of mine.

Charis was a 20-year-old student nurse. She was killed in 1997. While driving her car on a dual carriageway, she was hit by a driver who in the previous six hours had consumed six pints of beer and 10 measures of spirits, and then driven down the Tiverton link road to prove that he could do it in record time. For therapeutic medical purposes, a blood sample was taken from the driver after he had been taken unconscious to casualty, but it could not be used as evidence in court because the criminal concerned had not given permission, and would not give permission, for it to be so used.

In Charis's case, the police were fortunate in being able to track down the pub where the drinking had taken place. It was a busy bank holiday, and the publican did not volunteer to the police the fact that the individual concerned had drunk to such excess on his premises. Luckily, because it was a busy day, there were enough witnesses, including one who was able to specify to police the excessive amount that the man had drunk.

The point I am making is that, in bringing the prosecution, the police could not rely on the evidence provided by a blood test. That could also have happened when there were no key witnesses to bring a prosecution at all.

Charis Yeoman's case is not unique. We know that there are other such cases elsewhere in the country. In a letter written to me in 1998, Assistant Commissioner Paul Manning of the Association of Chief Police Officers referred me to the 1989 White Paper "The Road User and the Law". Although attitudes to drink driving have changed dramatically in recent years, the same problems still exist. The purpose of this debate is to seek Home Office Ministers' support for changing the law so that natural justice can prevail in such cases. Justice is not well served as the law now stands.

In 1998, I had a meeting with the Minister then responsible for these matters, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael). When the right hon. Gentleman changed Departments, his successor as Minister of State at the Home Office, the right hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), wrote to me, stating:

> The Government is sympathetic to the principle that an offender should not evade conviction for the very serious offence of drink driving, and we would be willing to consider possible improvements to present legislation.

Much time has elapsed since I had those meetings with Ministers. That is because I had to do more research into the matter and, more pertinently, I discovered that the Kent constabulary was preparing a detailed paper on this and other issues to do with testing and breathalysing people. However, I wish to focus today on the law covering blood tests in drink-driving cases.

I have held meetings and corresponded with a range of people and bodies, including the Association of Chief Police Officers, the British Medical Association, the General Medical Council, police surgeons and biochemists. I have spoken also to other hon. Members who have had constituency cases resembling the one that I have described.

Most importantly, the Kent constabulary report by Sergeant Tony Ramskill has now been published. I know that the Home Office has been able to study it, as have other interested parties. My presentation today is about more than that report, but it is an important piece of research which could help to clarify how we can improve the legislation.

The report mentions the Charis Yeoman case, and it discusses the difficult and vexed issue of whether blood samples should be taken when the driver is unconscious and unable to give permission. That matter has implications for the medical profession and for police surgeons. Sergeant Ramskill's study goes into some detail, and makes specific recommendations about the role of police surgeons, who in future may be given permission by a hospital's accident and emergency doctors to take from patients blood samples that could then be used as evidence in court.

That is a vexed issue. It has been addressed in other countries, and trials have already been held here. The Lothian and Borders force and the Fife constabulary currently use hospital staff to take blood samples. That system has also been trialled recently at a hospital in Cheshire.

Under the Road Traffic Act 1988, such samples have to be taken in a hospital. Two key issues therefore arise that need to be dealt with. First, the BMA has told me that it has concerns on behalf of its members, especially on behalf of admitting casualty doctors, about doctors' responsibility to their patients. That is a difficult problem, but it could be resolved by changing the way that the law is framed, so that admitting casualty doctors are not placed in a judgmental position. I must make it clear to the Minister that the proposal is not that doctors should be required to pick and choose whom they think the police might pursue for criminal prosecution.

I had a meeting some time ago with the BMA's ethical committee, which has responded to the Ramskill report, and continues to express concern. The BMA's response to me in a letter encapsulates the legitimate concern that must be addressed:

> the role of a doctor is to treat people with a clinical need, whether they be a drink driver or the victim of a drink driver. The basis on which society permits doctors to help individuals who cannot consent themselves is that to do so is in their best therapeutic interests. Unless there is evidence to the contrary, consent can be assumed. Although there may be grounds for society to decide that it wishes to expand the scope of implied consent to include consent to taking and/or testing of samples for forensic purposes, the BMA considers that it would be inappropriate for doctors to press for such a change. A change in the law would have an inevitable impact upon the therapeutic relationship, and one which could undermine confidence in the doctors' role as patient advocate. Were such a change to be made, it would be important that the impetus came from society, not the medical profession.

The BMA clearly recognises that a problem exists. The association—rightly—represent the concerns of its members, but it acknowledges that the House represents and articulates the views of society in general. Society does not believe it right that the law allows someone who wilfully drinks to excess and takes another person's life to evade prosecution and an appropriate sentence. The challenge for hon. Members is to find solutions to the problems that I have described that allow doctors to carry out their duties without undermining the patient-doctor relationship.

The Kent police study found that 94 per cent. of medical staff would be prepared to take blood samples if that would not make them subject to legal challenge by patients. The remaining 6 per cent., of course, would not be willing to do so. Now that the report is available, Home Office Ministers should seek solutions to the problems that have created the difficulty in the law.

The available choices need to examined and pursued. First, should the law be changed so that drivers in road traffic accidents are tested automatically, subject to medical consent and as long as such tests do not jeopardise medical treatment? That option should be considered carefully. Blood samples are always taken from unconscious drivers taken into casualty departments. The sample size could be increased, so that it could be divided and stored properly. In that way, drivers could give their consent, or otherwise, to their blood samples being tested later, when they were in full possession of their faculties. That extension of the current procedure would not require any new invasive technique, as needles are used anyway to secure the routine therapeutic sample.

The Ramskill report also suggests that police surgeons should be allowed to remove samples, with the consent of the casualty doctor or the doctor in charge of the unconscious driver. Once the driver was well enough, he or she would have the right to agree, or otherwise, to the analysis of the sample being made known to the prosecuting authority.

As I have mentioned, matters of law arise when samples are taken, and we must consider carefully the position of the doctor. It would be one way forward if we could ensure that the law was changed so that the legal position of the doctor was not undermined, and he or she would not be subject to legal challenge under the civil or criminal law on the grounds that the procedure they had carried out was invasive and constituted an assault. Once the legal problems that doctors fear were overcome, we could start to address the ethical issues that must also be considered.

The experience of other countries such as Belgium, Cyprus, Denmark, Australia and many others, where blood samples are taken, indicates that changes are needed now in this country. I make no specific recommendation to the Minister, other than to say that recent research must now open up that area of the law to change, so that justice can be done, and can be seen to be done.

On the issue of ethics, the GMC has outlined its agreement, subject to reservations, such as the need for trust between doctor and patient to be assured. I believe that that issue can be overcome without the doctor's position being undermined. In the matter of ethics, the wider issue of the safety and health of members of the public who may be maimed or killed if drink drivers are not successfully prosecuted should also be considered. I return to the point that the BMA made in its letter to me about society pressing for this change. If Members of Parliament are to represent the views of society—I speak generally, not only about my constituency case—we must recognise that society is concerned about the safety of the public in general, which can be served only by successful prosecutions and appropriate sentences.

I have considered carefully the rights of victim and killer. While I would not wish to undermine the important doctor-patient relationship, I question where the balance lies in ethical terms. Does it tip in favour of the person who has perpetrated a criminal offence, but has been lucky enough to escape with his or her life and is taken to hospital, conscious or unconscious, through the accident and emergency entrance? Or does the balance tip in favour of the rights of the victim, who—as society must recognise—still has rights even though he or she has died?

Unlike the perpetrator of the crime, the victim is taken through a different hospital entrance and immediately becomes the property of the coroner. If we are considering issues of ethics and morality, the rights of the victim in those circumstances have at least equal weight with the person who has perpetrated that crime. In such cases, the evidence that is critical to a prosecution and an appropriate sentence should not be denied to the victims and their families.

In recent years, we have seen a distinct change in public thinking about the whole issue of drink driving, and we sometimes have to make judgments that are not easy, but do at least put the victim first. Therefore, I ask the Minister to consider whether now is the time to make progress in this area. I know that he has received much extra information, and I have far more information than I have been able to share with him in the course of 15 minutes.

Much technical information was provided to me by the clinical biochemistry department of the Royal Berkshire hospital about the way in which blood samples should be kept and stored so that they can be used as evidence in court. That point will need to be addressed after consideration of the principle of changing the law. I do not doubt that we will need consultation on the issue, but the difficulties are not insurmountable.

I hope that when the Minister replies to the debate he will agree to a meeting with me before the recess, so that we can explore in more detail how the matter might be taken forward. In that way, for Charis Yeoman and others like her, people who drink and drive and wilfully claim the lives of others will know that they will be prosecuted under the law without being able to deny the judicial system the very evidence that proves their guilt.

1.16 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Charles Clarke): I genuinely congratulate the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) on securing the debate. To be frank, I was not personally aware of the details of the cases and histories involved in this important and vexed issue, until the hon. Lady secured the debate and I briefed myself for it. I am grateful to her and can immediately agree to her final point, because I am happy to meet her before the recess to discuss how we may make progress. It is a very important issue and it is right that she campaigns on it.

The hon. Lady was generous enough to say in her introductory remarks that the issue has concerned several hon. Members. For example, my hon. Friends the Members for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) and for Luton, South (Ms Moran) have campaigned on it.

It is appropriate, as I begin, to comment on the case of Charis Yeoman, which the hon. Lady mentioned. It is right that we acknowledge the terrible tragedy that berell the family when Charis was killed in the road crash, and I wish to express condolences to the family on behalf of everyone concerned. Perhaps I may offer them the consolation that if we are able to change the law in the future, something constructive may come out of that terrible tragedy.

As the hon. Lady knows, the issue has been the source of debate for many years, and it is the difficulty and sensitivity of all the points involved—many of which she mentioned—that have made it such an intractable subject. I am pleased to have this opportunity to debate the matter because it is an area of law and medical ethics that we need to consider regularly to see whether any changes have occurred to justify taking a different overall view from that taken in the past. The hon. Lady cited several reasons why we should do so.

Of all of the road safety issues involving death and serious injuries on our roads, none has received greater support from the public than those concerning drink driving. We want to ensure that we continue to make progress and reduce the casualties still further. In consequence, any deficiencies in the current arrangements must be considered most carefully. That is especially true if practice, procedures and the existing law may lead to offenders escaping trial and a due sentence, because—for the reasons the hon. Lady mentioned—the necessary evidence cannot be collected in time. She may be interested to learn that we shall publish a consultation document on the whole question of penalties for road traffic law to take the debate still further forward.

When a patient is admitted to hospital as a result of a crash, the first concern must be for that patient's welfare, whatever the circumstances that led to the admission. That is right and we cannot resile from it in any way. In consequence, the road traffic legislation recognises that the normal procedures associated with breath testing cannot be applied to that patient unless the doctor treating him or her is satisfied that the necessary procedures would not be prejudicial to the proper care and treatment of the patient. That also raises the key ethical issue of whether the doctor involved in treating the patient would be acting contrary to medical ethics if he became part of the process of gathering evidence to prosecute his patient.

The duty of care to the patient, and indeed to patients in general, could conceivably be undermined if it was thought that doctors were somehow operating on behalf of the authorities rather than primarily caring for the patient. That is the issue that has informed much of the response from both the British Medical Association ethics committee and the General Medical Council.

As the hon. Lady said, there is also the issue of obtaining the patient's consent. Doctors can take blood samples without the patient's consent, because their primary duty is a therapeutic one that is designed to help the patient. The whole breath-testing procedure rests crucially on obtaining consent. I understand that, in law, any taking of blood without consent would constitute an assault and would have to be treated accordingly. The hon. Lady referred to that fact in her comments on intrusive forms of medical treatment.

The law already provides that those who refuse to provide a sample commit an offence for which the penalty is not dissimilar from that for an ordinary drink-driving offence. However, often patients are not in a fit state to give their consent, even when the doctor is prepared to allow a sample to be taken.

Mrs. Browning: My understanding is that when a person is conscious after an accident but declines to give a sample, the penalties are pretty derisory. This point may be tangential to the specific subject of the debate, but I do not think that the current one-year maximum penalty is sufficient for those who refuse to give a blood sample. I was therefore pleased to hear the Minister say that the Government will consult on the way in which courts treat drink driving in sentencing.

Mr. Clarke: That is a perfectly fair point, and I am sure that the hon. Lady will make it in response to the consultation paper that we shall issue. That paper is based on a view that has been expressed in various ways on both sides of the House—that our penalties have not been updated sufficiently to take account of what she correctly described as the change in public attitude towards driving offences, particularly drink-driving offences, and their tragic consequences. Her point is well made, and I am sure that she will make it directly in response to the consultation.

The classic case in the sphere that we are discussing is that of the unconscious patient from whom blood has been taken for medical diagnostic purposes, but from whom a sample for drink-driving purposes cannot be taken. Indeed, that is exactly the example that the hon. Lady gave. It has been suggested that the use of any remaining part of a diagnostic sample might be used for forensic analysis, and that consent could be obtained from the patient at a later date. There is indeed a precedent for that in a previous case. Under current arrangements, however, that would be a very speculative process that would be open to substantial challenge in court proceedings. Nevertheless, that is exactly the argument that the hon. Lady is using.

Alcohol-impregnated swabs are usually used in the taking of diagnostic samples. It is already well established that that might be used to invalidate the blood sample. Usually, no preservative or anti-coagulant is mixed with diagnostic samples. Therefore the sample starts to deteriorate in various ways, which could make further analysis difficult or easily open to challenge.

Mrs. Browning: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Clarke: I shall in a moment.

There would be difficulty in establishing the chain of evidence—that is, incontrovertible evidence that the blood was taken from the patient to the point at which it was sampled and finally analysed, and that no errors in its handling or labelling had occurred in between. By the time that the diagnostic sample could be released, it could well have been degraded by bacteria.

I wanted to list those points. They all involve technical issues, but they show that the standard medical procedure used for diagnostic purposes raises problems in the context of drink-driving legislation. However, I acknowledge what the hon. Lady said about the technical evidence that she has acquired. I give way to her.

Mrs. Browning: Obviously, I would be happy to make available to the Minister the information that I have been given by the clinical biochemistry department. I believe that sample degradation could be overcome by the use of fluoride, which stops that process. I also agree that, for the purpose that we are discussing, changes would have to be made to the way in which samples are taken and stored. However, I think that the problems that the Minister described are technical ones which could be overcome.

Mr. Clarke: I acknowledge that the hon. Lady is right. It certainly seems right that overcoming such problems would require a change in medical procedures in cases involving suspected drink driving. The issue, however, is whether such changes in procedure, which perhaps could be achieved along the lines that she is suggesting, would be ethically acceptable to doctors in the framework that we are talking about. That is precisely the issue that we are debating.

As the hon. Lady said, the Home Office runs a scheme to fund individual police officers to undertake research projects that it is thought might throw light on operational policing issues. As part of that, the Home Office agreed to fund the recent report by the police officer in Kent constabulary to which she referred. He has produced recommendations on the matter following a study of the position in Australia. Of course the views that he has expressed are not those of the Home Office; as the report itself makes clear, they are the views of the author alone. Nevertheless, he has tried to address a very difficult subject and, within his remit, has significantly added to the sum of knowledge on the issue and moved it forward precisely as the hon. Lady has described.

I am also aware that the British Medical Association and the General Medical Council have seen the report and commented on it. I have copies of letters from them explaining their position. I shall place copies of those in the Library for hon. Members to refer to, and send a copy of them to the hon. Lady. I also have a very interesting annexe produced by my officials on the procedures and problems associated with testing hospitalised drivers for alcohol, which consists of a flow-chart showing the difficulties of the process. I shall also send a copy of that to the hon. Lady, for her information in taking the debate forward.

Although the General Medical Council has said that in principle it would be acceptable to take blood from a person who is not competent to give consent, its letter goes on to explain all the practical difficulties involved. Those difficulties match the concerns expressed by the chairman of the BMA's medical ethics committee.

My officials have talked to both the BMA and the GMC, and we believe that there is not a fundamental difference of view between the two organisations on the issue. We also believe that the different ways in which they have expressed their views are the result of their different functions, not of a basic difference of opinion. However, none of that undermines what the hon. Lady has rightly said—that we have to face the issue head on. In the context of the competing rights involved in the case that we are discussing—those of victim, doctor and driver—we have to find a resolution that is acceptable to the community as a whole, to ensure that people do not get away with illegal activity simply because of an evidential problem that could not be resolved differently.

I have thought it appropriate to make it clear that the ethical problems with which we have been struggling have not changed substantially since publication of the report by the officer in Kent county constabulary. None the less, I also want to tell the hon. Lady that we are happy to look again at all the issues involved in the light of the latest position, and of the points that she has made.

Following this debate, I shall talk to my colleagues in the Department of Health to determine whether there would be value in having a joint Home Office and Department of Health consultation on the subject, to discuss some of the issues. As a result of the way in which the hon. Lady has raised the issues, I think that it might be helpful to take forward the debate in a slightly more structured way. As I said, I shall talk to my colleagues in the Department of Health to see whether some process of that type might be appropriate.

As I also said, I shall be happy to meet the hon. Lady before the recess, as she requested, to discuss how we might take the whole debate forward. It is very much a cross-party issue, on which many hon. Members on both sides of the House are concerned to ensure that we make progress.

The Government have always made it clear that we should like to resolve any difficulties in drink driving enforcement. I know from the way in which she has dealt with this debate that the hon. Lady recognises that there are difficult and complicated problems involving medical ethics and procedure, and technical issues that need to be resolved. I am inclined to think that the type of consultative process that I described might be the best way forward. Therefore, as I said, before she and I meet before the recess, I shall talk to my colleagues at the Department of Health to determine whether a joint process to take the debate a bit further forward is possible.

I should perhaps take this opportunity to reassure doctors, and the GMC and the BMA, that we take their ethical questions extremely seriously. It is important for us to understand the exact basis of the position and to propose procedural or technical solutions that would accommodate those concerns and find a way through. However, as the hon. Lady said, at the same time we have to be clear that society and the community want us to ensure that there is genuine justice—so that the perpetrators of what are, after all, crimes can be properly brought to justice, in a manner that I hope will also inhibit future breaches of the law, and thus future tragedies.

I am very grateful to the hon. Lady for initiating this debate. I have responded to it as constructively as I can, to try to move us forward.

Mrs. Browning: I am grateful for the way in which the Minister has responded to the debate.

Mr. Clarke: I appreciate that comment. This is a cross-party issue, and I know that both sides of the House would like to see progress made on it.

Sheltered Housing

1.29 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I am grateful to be able to present a debate on sheltered housing. It is an important issue, and I hope that, via my hon. Friend the Minister, we shall be able to take some elements of it forward.

As I am sure the Minister knows, 22 to 28 May was sheltered housing week. Like other Members of Parliament, I participated in some of the visits and activities that took place during that week. I intend to discuss what I see as the importance of sheltered housing, drawing on the experience of my local authority in Stroud to help me so do. I want to look at the issues related to sheltered housing, particularly the development of very sheltered housing. I will use evidence from my own constituency, but will also look at what is possible in the country as a whole. I hope to be able to draw some conclusions from that, and to ask my hon. Friend some questions, which I hope that he will be able to answer.

I am indebted to a number of people who have helped me put together the text for this debate—Wendy Wilson from the House of Commons Library, Steve Neale from Stroud district council, Christine Allen from the National Housing Federation, Eileen Short from the daylight robbery campaign and, last but not least, all those involved with the emerging role of sheltered housing campaign. All those people value sheltered housing and demonstrate why it is necessary to have a debate at this time.

There is no statutory definition of sheltered housing. However, most sheltered housing schemes share certain common features, including the provision of accommodation designed with the needs of elderly occupants in mind—although not exclusively so—and the provision of on-site wardens and emergency call systems.

Standards for sheltered housing were laid down in the 1969 Ministry of Housing and Local Government circular 82/69, which introduced the concepts of category 1 and category 2. In category 1 schemes, communal facilities and a resident warden are optional. Dwellings can be bungalows as well as flats. Lifts are not usually provided. The circular intended that category 1 provision should be for the relatively independent elderly. Category 2 schemes comprise flats under one roof, and there must be communal facilities, resident wardens and lifts. Such dwellings were intended in the circular for more dependent elderly people.

Circular 82/69 has not been mandatory since 1980, but its influence lives on. The labels—category 1 and category 2 schemes—attract difference housing allowances and adhere to different cost frameworks. Category 1 and 2 sheltered housing is more expensive than ordinary housing because of its features and facilities—specially designed housing, a resident warden service, a communications system and communal facilities over and above those found in ordinary housing.

Sheltered housing dates back to just after the second world war. It took some time to take off—in fact, only 28,000 people lived in such units as recently as 1960. However, as my hon. Friend knows, during the 1960s and 1970s, there was a considerable increase in the sheltered housing provision. I am grateful to Anchor and Hanover housing associations, which identified for me the importance of their role, as well as that of the local authority.

There are three key issues to identify at the outset. First, how appropriate is sheltered housing today, given some of the alternatives that are available, such as staying put, and care and repair? I declare an interest in that I am a director of Stroud care and repair, so I appreciate the importance of people being allowed to stay in their own home. However, I do not see that as conflicting with my support for sheltered housing.

Today, there are about 500,000 sheltered housing units. Some 300,000 of those are in the public sector and 200,000 are in the private sector, with registered social landlords. They are mainly, but not exclusively, for people over 65. Some of the units are not easy to let, leading to repercussions which I will dwell on later.

At a time when we have a gradually ageing population, it seems strange, after the peak in the growth of sheltered housing that occurred in the 1960s and 1970s, there has been a decline ever since. For example, only 402 units were developed in 1997, the last year for which I have figures, compared with 1989, when some 7,000 units were developed. Something is happening to the demand for, and the supply of, sheltered housing. That is a little worrying and we must get to grips with it.

Much of the debate is about what is suitable for older people, what they want and what they expect. There are other issues, however, such as finance—what people pay in rent and what help they have to pay it. In addition, schemes in the private sector have been linked to leasehold problems. I have dealt with one of them myself.

I should like to use my district council area for the constituency that I represent as a good exemplar of what is best about sheltered housing. Stroud has 29 sheltered housing schemes, of which two are very sheltered. It has been a forward-looking authority, providing accommodation for people in their later years. There is a good take-up of units, but there is not the same desire to move into them that there was in the 1970s and early 1980s.

There are many valued aspects of the various units in Stroud. All older people who need it are able to link up with a central control system, so that, even if there is no warden on call, they have a back-up. There are good communal facilities in each unit, and some of them are comparatively new. There are many other ways in which people can have the benefit of living communally.

What is the future for sheltered housing, which has an image problem? As I said, there has been a rapid decline in the number of units provided year on year, affecting the private and, more particularly, the public sector. There is a funding issue, which is linked to people feeling that what they pay for is good value for money. We always come back to the housing benefit debate, which I shall say more about later. There are also issues about service charges and the cost of warden help.

However, sheltered housing has some good aspects. All the evidence suggests that there is a high satisfaction rate among people living in sheltered accommodation. There is an attempt to reinvigorate—almost to reinvent—sheltered housing, led by the emerging role of the sheltered housing campaign, which I welcome. Other things are happening on the back of sheltered housing, the most important of which is the move towards very sheltered housing for the more fragile older person.

What is the Government's response to this? I wish to highlight two documents, one of which is the Green Paper on housing. I am a little disappointed that it does not make more of sheltered housing. The main point, to which I have alluded, is how to grapple with the difficult issue of housing benefit. I welcome the attempts to sort that out; it has an especially deleterious effect as one of the reasons that people do not want to go into sheltered accommodation.

I welcome the move towards transitional housing benefit that began in April, as well as the continuing consultations. There is evidence that people are beginning to take note of those matters; that may change some of the adverse perceptions of the high cost of living in sheltered accommodation. I lay my cards on the table by stating my support for the daylight robbery campaign—inasmuch as people feel some anger that, because we have not yet sorted out housing benefit, there is some subsidisation of those who pay full rent either by those who do not, or through the housing revenue account. Until we deal with that difficult issue, the anger will remain. It has certainly been expressed to me—we need to do something about the problem.

The second document relates to the "Supporting People" programme, from which a series of papers was produced. The programme takes an holistic approach to dealing with the problems of older people. The original document identified the need to try overcome some of the complications caused by unco-ordinated and overlapping funding streams and to make more transparent who has responsibility for the support of vulnerable people. It examined structures and pointed to the need to make them easier to understand. It proposed the evolution of a more comprehensible strategy that would be more likely to be carried through. It also noted that the housing benefit problem should be sorted out.

As the document states, that will mean that we are > putting people first . . . addressing the needs of vulnerable groups—and producing

> high quality services and > a logical and transparent approach—to the planning of such housing.

A disappointing aspect of my research into this matter is that one of the strongest concerns expressed during the consultations was about where sheltered housing fits in. That point needs to be addressed and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will do so. There are many reasons for that concern, but the main one is that, in these times of change, sheltered accommodation does not fit neatly into any of the relevant categories. It is not genuinely supported housing—unless it falls under the very sheltered category. People want some explanation of that point.

During the debates on the Care Standards Bill, I expressed the concerns, raised by some of the organisations that run sheltered units, that the registration of such units might lead to a considerable loss in the benefits available to some residents. If that situation could be clarified and overcome, that would be welcome.

We are beginning to examine different ways of using our sheltered accommodation. The most obvious is the move towards very sheltered—or what my authority describes as extra sheltered—accommodation for older, frailer people or those who have special difficulties. Stroud was a pioneer in that form of housing. It started a scheme in July 1993, working closely with Gloucestershire social services and the health authority. The stated objective of the scheme is to provide > enhanced personal and social care of residents . . . Provision of emergency care, if required, 24 hours a day, 7 days a week . . . To provide a cost effective alternative to residential/institutional care. To provide additional domiciliary care co-ordinated by the Wardens promoting an ability for residents to live more independently in the community.

Last, but not least, it offers the possibility to enter into contracts with different care providers.

The beauty of such schemes is the opportunity for mixing—of ages, of people with different problems and of funding streams. Although it might be good to clarify and co-ordinate such schemes to make them more coherent, they have much to recommend them. They show that there is a strategic future for sheltered housing in such specialised forms.

How can we move towards those different uses for sheltered accommodation? I hope that the Minister will consider the need to get the accommodation right and the parallels between the ideas expressed in "Supporting People" and the royal commission on long-term care for the elderly. We are an ageing population; we need to provide different facilities for older people. The main demand is for people to stay in their own home for as long as possible. We need to develop and use resources in the best possible way.

I hope that we can develop centres of excellence that will serve the wider community, so that specialist facilities for vulnerable people can be produced in an innovative way, using—dare I say it?—joined-up thinking and action. However, some key issues must be addressed. We need to revisit the purpose of sheltered accommodation and how it is allocated.

We must consider the role of the warden. The increasing professionalisation of the warden service is good. Two of my friends—Diane Wyatt and Carol Snell—are the key wardens in the very sheltered schemes in the Stroud district; they demonstrate the high capabilities that result from training and support.

We need to examine how care is provided, how people gain access to it and who pays for it. We need to overcome the difficulties associated with some of the more difficult-to-let accommodation. That applies equally to the private and to the public sector.

Sheltered accommodation has a place and it has a future, although it is reasonable and right that its role should change. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will address four points.

First, what is the position of the transitional housing benefit scheme—especially in relation to sheltered accommodation? Secondly, can the Minister clarify the registration process proposed in the Care Standards Bill? Thirdly, what are the Government's views on the evolution of very sheltered accommodation? Finally, how do they envisage the relationship between the public and private sectors? Can they be pulled together through the best value initiative?

I have given my hon. Friend plenty to do, so I shall conclude my remarks and listen to his response.

1.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Chris Mullin): My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) has raised a significant issue. As he says, more than 500,000 older people live in sheltered housing—more than in residential and nursing homes put together. My hon. Friend asked several questions and I shall do my best to address them. If I do not do justice to them, no doubt we can pursue the matter through correspondence.

The Government are in no doubt as to the potential benefits of sheltered accommodation in enabling older people to remain independent for as long as possible in their own homes. Residents speak enthusiastically of the benefits of such accommodation: having their own front door; having the options of company and of privacy; of feeling a real sense of security and peace of mind; and of the importance of being able to remain part of a community. Sheltered accommodation is clearly a positive housing choice for many older people.

My hon. Friend touched on several matters. The "Supporting People" programme aims to ensure that the highest quality services are provided to vulnerable older people. It will mean that a wide variety of options will be available to them—ranging from retirement housing, to traditional sheltered housing and to "floating" support services—designed to enable them to stay in their own homes. The programme will raise the priority of support services and encourage local authorities to take a more strategic approach to provision, integrating it with social and health services.

As my hon. Friend said, concern has been expressed about the impact of the new funding arrangements for sheltered housing under the "Supporting People" programme. First, regarding the impact of the transitional housing benefit scheme, which was introduced in April this year, concerns have been expressed about the need for private sector tenants, including owner-occupier leaseholders, to have a valid community care assessment in order to get help under the scheme.

We needed a statutory gateway to ensure both that the claimant requires support and that the landlord can provide the support needed. The community care assessment provides that gateway. Relatively few private sector tenants receive help with support charges through housing benefit. We appreciate that there are concerns, and we have worked closely with the Department of Health to issue comprehensive guidance to both social services and housing benefit sections to make processes as smooth and as simple as possible.

Looking at the long-term arrangements under "Supporting People", the Government recognise that, when many existing sheltered housing tenants moved into their accommodation, they regarded it as a home for life. They did not expect to be rendered insecure in their tenancies or to be facing different terms and conditions as a result of changes to the funding of their accommodation. I assure existing tenants that when "Supporting People" is introduced, in April 2003, they will not have to move out of their homes or see a change in services provided, simply as a result of the change in funding arrangements that will be introduced in three years' time.

As my hon. Friend mentioned, service providers have expressed concerns that the changes will be excessively bureaucratic. The Government are determined that the administrative arrangements that are put in place for "Supporting People" will be straightforward, cost-effective and transparent. My hon. Friend asked me for detail. There is still a great deal of work to be carried out before "Supporting People" is implemented in April 2003; indeed, we have some time in which to do that work. The Government will work closely with local authorities, service providers and service users to develop a programme that can deliver the kind of high-quality support services that vulnerable people, including older people, need and want.

My hon. Friend mentioned the daylight robbery campaign and campaigners' fears about Government proposals to introduce resource accounting into the housing revenue account from April 2001. I have received many representations on that issue and I must say that there is some misunderstanding around, which we have done our best to clear up, but without complete success. Assumed surpluses on local authorities' housing revenue accounts underlie daylight robbery campaigners' concerns.

As my hon. Friend knows, we are introducing a major repairs allowance, which will have an immediate and substantial impact on those assumed surpluses and will address many of the campaigners' concerns. Full details of the major repairs allowance will be included in the annual determination, which will be sent to local authorities in December.

I mentioned the growing popularity of sheltered housing. With more and more older people actively choosing that type of accommodation, concern has been raised that there is no statutory inspection regime. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend mentioned that, but it is probably worth mentioning anyway.

Local authorities are subject to best value performance reviews of their housing stock, which would include sheltered housing. The housing inspectorate also carries out audit and inspection of local authority housing services. Registered social landlords who provide sheltered accommodation are regulated by the Housing Corporation, which sets performance standards.

The Care Standards Bill, which is passing through Parliament, will introduce the regulation and inspection of all types of home care provision, including that provided in sheltered accommodation.

Mr. Drew: All the evidence that I have shows that these changes are greatly welcomed. The worry is purely about the benefit implication.

Mr. Mullin: I am grateful. I cannot immediately provide my hon. Friend with the details, but we are working on them and I have given a general assurance, which I hope that he will relay, that we do not intend to threaten in any way the existing arrangements for tenants. We still have some time to go in which to agree the precise details.

Concern has been expressed about the definitions used in the Care Standards Bill of "care home" and "personal care", and there are fears that those will require sheltered housing to register, the consequence being that older people might lose their entitlement to benefits. That is the issue that my hon. Friend is interested in. The vast majority of sheltered housing schemes involve care being provided to people in their own home. In those circumstances, whether they are an owner-occupier or a tenant, that home cannot and will not be registrable as a care home.

The Bill's definition of "personal care" is intended to clarify, rather than change, the definition in the Registered Homes Act 1984. The existing definition in the 1984 Act is care that includes assistance with bodily functions.

The intention of the new definition is to ensure that advice and encouragement given in connection with such care would be included within the definition of personal care. Other forms of advice and encouragement not connected with assisting a person with their bodily functions will not be included, and the Department of Health intends to table an amendment to the Bill in due course to make that clear.

As I mentioned, the role of sheltered housing is changing. Demographic changes over the next 20 years will have a substantial impact on housing policy. The number of people over 60 is likely to rise from 6.5 million in 1996 to nearly 9 million by 2021. The number of frail older people is growing even faster.

Older people's aspirations are also rising. Individuals increasingly expect services to respond to their specific needs and preferences. Quite rightly, they are no longer prepared to put up with "one size fits all" services. Flexibility, choice, independence, information and involvement are the key issues raised by older people in relation to the accommodation and services that they receive.

Very sheltered housing, which my hon. Friend mentioned, has been developed as a way of bringing social care and housing together. It is used as a base for support and care provision which can enable older people to remain in sheltered housing as they become frailer instead of having to move into residential care. That type of accommodation, which is being developed in Stroud and throughout the country, is helping to widen the spectrum of housing options for older people.

In response to that changing picture, the Government aim to ensure a better and wider choice of options, with access to quality services which enable older people to lead active, independent and secure lives. To that end, the Departments of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and of Health are working together to develop a housing strategy for older people, which aims to ensure that they are able to secure and sustain their independence in a home appropriate to their circumstances. It also aims to support older people to enable them to make active and informed choices about their accommodation by providing access to, and advice on, appropriate services and housing options, including sheltered housing and extra care or very sheltered housing.

The strategy will also recognise the important links between housing, health and social services for older people and the need for those services to be integrated locally. Effective housing, allied to the right care, support and wider services, can be the springboard that enables older people to live life to the full. The Government hope to publish the housing strategy for older people later this year.

The future of housing for older people, including sheltered housing, holds many challenges and opportunities. Taken together, the Government's own work and that being carried out in the sector itself will ensure that older people have more choice about where they live and the type of services that they receive. Sheltered accommodation certainly has an important role to play in the development of quality services for older people that are flexible, responsive and user-focused. I am sure that, in the years ahead, we shall see many improvements in this sector.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the issue. If he wishes to follow up any further concerns by correspondence, I shall be glad to reply.

Question put and agreed to.

Voluntary Sector

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Betts.]

2.30 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Paul Boateng): I very much welcome this debate on volunteering. Looking around me, I am left with the comforting thought that interest in volunteering outside the Chamber is considerably greater than it appears to be in it.

Volunteering and the voluntary sector play a crucial part in our society. They are the fabric and building blocks of our communities, both urban and rural. As such, the Government believe that it is vital to recognise the extent to which volunteers act almost as community glue. Volunteers are a sign of a healthy society.

We must give the voluntary sector the recognition and support that it so richly deserves. In 1997, nearly half of adults had taken part in volunteering in the previous year and 29 per cent. of adults volunteer in some form or other regularly each month. Their contribution to society has been valued at about £40 billion. As such, they are major players.

Central Government spend some £104 million a year supporting volunteering. Local and health authorities add an extra £150 million and the national lottery adds £145 million. That is £400 million in total, which is a significant investment in the sector. We must ensure that we get a clear picture of what that investment generates and what we are spending it on. The Government have a responsibility to promote and encourage voluntary and community activity and we are assisted in that task by the active community initiative, which has been established to ensure that we give the voluntary sector the attention and support that it deserves.

I should like to spend a few minutes outlining the key themes of the initiative, which aims to promote and encourage more voluntary and community involvement. We want to raise awareness and inspire more people to get involved. We want to increase opportunities for volunteering, make it easier for people to get involved and support the development of active community up and down the country. This should not be seen as the Government getting people to do something for nothing, which would not be an appropriate basis for Government involvement in the voluntary sector and in volunteering. It is about supporting and encouraging folk to contribute to their communities, to have a voice in the services that they receive—and often help to deliver—and to feel an integral part of the society in which they live. It is all about empowering and engaging people and combating social exclusion.

One of the Government's first tasks in advancing this agenda is to establish how best to motivate people to volunteer. Most Members of Parliament have volunteered at some time and many still do in one form or another. We began our involvement in the communities that we serve as volunteers and many of us know that volunteering, as well as reflecting the needs and problems of other people, can be enormously fulfilling in itself. It can enrich volunteers' lives.

For the past few years, I have attended the Whitbread volunteer action awards, which is always an inspiring occasion and a pleasure to attend. It is a source of inspiration because meeting the organisations and individuals who are being honoured gives one a sense of what they have gained, as well as what they have given, through their voluntary activity.

Members of Parliament are often invited to a whole heap of dos and occasions, some of which are a greater pleasure than others—I make that bold confession, with which I am sure colleagues will identify. The Whitbread awards are a genuinely unalloyed pleasure because of the sense of can-do, excitement and commitment generated by people who give so much to others. It is a genuinely uplifting experience. As a society, we need not only to build on such occasions, but to give them the profile and recognition that they deserve—and the Government are determined to help with that.

We are taking several initiatives, one of which I should like to share with the Chamber this afternoon. I refer to TimeBank, which we launched on 29 February in partnership with the BBC. It may not be into Premiership football, but it is certainly into volunteering, in a big way. The aim is to involve more people by encouraging them to donate time as part of a national campaign.

The new initiative recognises the changing pattern of volunteering. The pressures, complexity and demands of modern life—including family life, as well as work—affect individuals, who may be able to give two hours one week, none the next and eight the week after. The voluntary sector must be able to respond flexibly to demands and TimeBank enables—through the concept of banking up hours—the donor and recipient better to organise their contributions.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I am sorry to have missed the opening of my right hon. Friend's speech. It is good to hear him speak about the voluntary sector again, as he did in my constituency some time ago.

Judith Taylor, a local representative of the Women's Royal Volunteer Service in Gloucestershire, has told me that people can find it difficult to attend pre-retirement courses. It is not just a question of the time available from week to week; it depends on how much time people have at different stages of their lives. Judith Taylor often used to be invited to pre-retirement courses to talk about the benefits of volunteering, but that no longer happens. Would my right hon. Friend like to comment on that?

Mr. Boateng: I certainly would. I know how healthy and active the voluntary sector is in Stroud, having visited the town and seen for myself the contribution that people are making to the creation of safe communities. That is an important aspect of the contribution that the voluntary sector can make to crime prevention and reduction strategies.

Changes have undoubtedly taken place in the generational pattern of volunteering and I want to deal with creating opportunities. We need to deliver high-quality volunteering opportunities and schemes in which people want to get involved. One of the four target groups that we have identified for action is older people. Alongside young people, employees and those from minority ethnic groups, they represent a particular challenge in ensuring that they can access volunteering opportunities. We must also address certain trends that have developed in volunteering, as they affect those target groups.

The Government have approached the issue of older volunteers in precisely the same way as my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). First and foremost, we have listened to the views of the target group and those working with it. A number of hon. Members will be aware that we have been holding listening events up and down the country over the past few months to hear what older people have to say and we have received several messages about older people and volunteering. The debt of gratitude that we owe older people was brought home to us forcefully at the final large event, which was held at the Queen Elizabeth II conference centre. Many older people have devoted a lifetime to volunteering and a big thank you is owed to them.

The number of older people volunteering is now dropping off. We need to ask why and find out what opportunities exist for them to enter volunteering. Older people have a wealth of expertise, energy and experience to offer their communities. It is important that we value those skills and find ways of ensuring that they find a channel into our communities.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael)—through his time at the Home Office and subsequently in Wales—has always taken an interest in the older volunteers initiative, which his work inspired. We launched that initiative to improve the quality and quantity of volunteering opportunities for older people. We have committed some £1.5 million to that task over three years to ensure the success of the project. To date, some 26 projects have been funded up and down the country, precisely to address the issues that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud outlined.

I should like to say a few words about younger people, because it is at both ends of the spectrum that needs are currently unmet. It was to recognise and to tap into the energy and commitment of younger people that we launched the millennium volunteers. That is a flagship initiative, aimed at engaging 16 to 24-year-olds in voluntary activities. Some 160 millennium volunteer projects have been set up across the country. Some 4,000 young people have joined and many more join daily; 600 have earned millennium volunteer certificates and 300 have earned millennium volunteer awards. Those awards recognise the personal development of young people and the benefits that they have brought to local communities and gained themselves from the experience of volunteering.

Mr. Phil Hope (Corby): I want to emphasise the importance of engaging young people in their communities. Too often they are seen as the problem and not the solution. If we engage with them actively in their communities on issues of crime, vandalism or raising educational standards, we can achieve miraculous results, as I see in my constituency. Does my right hon. Friend agree that we want to see much more education for citizenship and community involvement in schools, as well as through local community groups, to get young people at the heart of tackling the deprivation that some of our neighbourhoods experience?

Mr. Boateng: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend. He has a wealth of experience on these issues, both personally and professionally in his work for the all-party group. We know that volunteering and the sense of civic responsibility that it brings gives a practical demonstration of the values and ideals that we want to inculcate in schools. That led my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to put a new emphasis in the core curriculum on civics, as it was known in my day. [Interruption.] It was not that long ago and should not be cause for ribald laughter. It is known today as education for citizenship and we owe an enormous debt of gratitude to Lord Weatherill for his work on forming the citizenship commission, which has informed the development of thinking in this area.

Finally, I should like to say a few words about the role and responsibilities of employers in this area. The millennium volunteers project has developed on the basis that it is important for CVs, future development and careers. Employees not only have the potential, sometimes unlocked, to make a contribution as volunteers, but, in doing so, they develop skills and expertise that make them better employees and an added resource for their employers. A number of employers are beginning to recognise that and to blaze the trail for others.

It was right for the Prime Minister to make one of the key elements of his speech at the active community convention earlier this year a challenge to employers to give their employees the equivalent of one day's paid time off in the next 18 months to work in the community. Several companies have already announced their commitment to the scheme and we hope to encourage others to join them. It is a way for employers and businesses to show civil responsibility and of adding value to the skills base of the work force.

It is important for the Government to give a lead in the matter, which is why the head of the home civil service, Sir Richard Wilson, has written to all Government Departments asking them to give their staff a day each year for that purpose. We have been working with business to support Cares Incorporated as well as the City Cares project, which is under way in 10 cities in the United Kingdom. It will bring 100,000 people into voluntary work, with business setting the example and encouraging and supporting others.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion): I heard with interest the Minister's remarks on support for employees who volunteer. I welcome the Government's initiative and leadership in the scheme, but does the Minister agree that taking part will be difficult for those who are unemployed and receiving the jobseeker's allowance who want to widen their skills portfolio? Some of my constituents still complain that the voluntary work that they undertake is questioned by officialdom. Will the Minister investigate that aspect of the matter?

Mr. Boateng: We are working closely with the Department for Education and Employment and the Department of Social Security on that issue, to which I shall refer later.

We have identified older people, younger people and employees as target groups for the activities we propose. A fourth group is also important: our fellow citizens in the black and minority ethnic communities, who have a long tradition of community self-help which they have not always identified as volunteering. They have not necessarily been seen by the mainstream voluntary sector as a group that would attract interest and involvement. That is a missed opportunity, because there are many black and minority ethnic citizens who are anxious and able to get involved and who currently are an untapped resource.

We are working to alert the mainstream voluntary sector that there is an untapped resource out there and to work with black and minority ethnic voluntary sector organisations, which, for too long, have been the poor relations in the system. We want to build up their capacity and link them into the voluntary sector infrastructure to maximise their opportunities to contribute to the development of society and the whole community.

To help that process, there are initiatives within the active community units, one of which is geared specifically to twinning black and minority ethnic voluntary sector organisations with their larger mainstream counterparts. That has a double benefit. It benefits the larger, mainstream counterparts because it helps them to attract more black and ethnic minority volunteers and helps them to establish themselves better in those communities. Secondly, and significantly, it helps to build the infrastructure and the capacity of the black and minority ethnic voluntary sector. We have taken that forward with a specific funding stream and a series of regional seminars to ensure that black and ethnic minority organisations are better able to become involved in partnerships, consultation and decision-making.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) referred to people who may not be in work but who want to develop voluntary activities that might cause them to fall foul of the welfare and benefits arrangements and asked how better we can reach out to them. There is a common myth that people on benefits cannot volunteer. Unfortunately, that myth is sometimes believed by people in benefits offices, employment offices and so on.

Unemployed people can undertake voluntary work and it can be a means of acquiring skills that help to lead to paid employment. We are well aware that there are further issues arising from the complexity of benefits rules. In particular, we know that the requirement that jobseekers must be available for work within 48 hours can discourage people from making a commitment to voluntary work—hence the importance of flexibility. We are considering what can be done to ease that problem and our considerations form part of a work programme that has been taken forward by a small group within the active community unit, which has been set up to look at barriers to volunteering. The group was established in response to one of the recommendations in Lord Warner's report, "Giving time, getting involved". My right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Social Security are committed to ensuring that benefits offices and employment offices are aware of the significant role that volunteering can play in getting people back into work.

I am pleased to announce today that, following legal advice, the Department of Social Security will provide new local guidance, advising that no account be taken of time credits earned in time exchange schemes when calculating income-related benefits. That is a major step forward and comes in response to long-standing concern in the voluntary sector. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security made that clear in a parliamentary answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs Gilroy).

I believe that the measure will assist enormously in taking forward a range of initiatives, particularly TimeBank. It would not have been helpful if interest had been generated in TimeBank as a result of prime-time television coverage, only for those expectations to be dashed by the complexity surrounding its inter-relationship with the benefits rules.

To ensure that we encourage groups that have not previously been able to access volunteering opportunities to do so, we have provided nearly £1 million to set up a national database of volunteering opportunities. That is important because we know that new technology gives us hitherto undreamt-of opportunities to reach out to people, some of whom, for a variety of reasons, may be housebound. They may have access to a computer, but not have any way of getting out and about easily. Opportunities to volunteer could be made more widely known through the internet, and there are opportunities to volunteer on the basis of access to a computer. We want to build on the opportunities held out by the new and exciting developments in technology.

These are exciting times for the voluntary sector. We can ensure that the sector plays a full role in community self-help and development. The Home Office is leading a cross-departmental group on the resourcing of community capacity-building to bring greater coherence to the system under which community groups are funded and to give greater support to the community groups and leaders who rely—often almost exclusively—on volunteers. That is all part of a wider picture of support for the development of active communities.

The independence of the voluntary sector is important. It operates at a distance from Government, has the capacity to innovate and challenge established ways of doing things and is close to the people. All of those things should be cherished and preserved, but we must not allow that distance from local or national government to be an excuse for the Government to renege on their responsibility to create a context in which there can be true partnerships between the voluntary and statutory sectors. The partnerships must be based on an understanding of the importance of that independence and the vital integrity that goes with it.

[Mr. Boateng]

The work that has been done by the voluntary sector and the Government in the compact is important, for it lies at the heart of the understanding that must exist between the sector and the Government about what each party must bring to the table. That is the best hope for the future of the framework within which the partnership with the voluntary sector can develop. It is a great and exciting partnership, and we ought to be profoundly thankful for it.

3.3 pm

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): I am glad to follow the Minister, as I share his admiration for the organisations and individuals who contribute to the voluntary sector in this country and his assessment of the importance of a thriving and independent voluntary sector to the health of the United Kingdom.

The Minister rightly said that most Members of Parliament have engaged in voluntary work of one sort or another. One of the pleasant surprises that I had after being elected to the House eight years ago was to discover the sheer scale and variety of volunteering in my constituency. That is probably reproduced in each of the 659 constituencies represented in the House of Commons.

Probably all of us in the Chamber today could give a long list of the different organisations and committed individuals that we have encountered during our time as Members. I can cite everything from hearing dogs for the deaf to the Buckinghamshire Association for Mental Health to the Aylesbury elderly Asian lunch club, all of which contribute in different ways to social well-being.

The Minister rightly gave priority in his speech to the work of volunteers in giving practical service to others. I would not wish to detract from what he said on that, but voluntary organisations contribute to this country's well-being in another but related way—they provide opportunities to celebrate what brings us together as communities. At this time of year, many of us find ourselves attending various fetes and other such events, which raise funds for good causes and are usually a celebration of neighbourhood identity. That is something of value that the voluntary organisations bring to this country, which no Government agency, however well intentioned, can reproduce in the same way.

Volunteering and the organisations are one of the greater strengths of the British tradition. They are what Edmund Burke meant by his term "the little platoon" or what sociologists probably call mediating organisations. The Chief Rabbi, in his recent Mais lectures, referred to organisations that were not part of a state but which were greater than the individual and within which we learn habits of trust, mutual respect and regard for the greater good, which help to sustain the sense of mutual dependence on which the security of a market economy and a liberal and free political system rests. The health of the voluntary sector, which commands cross-party support in this country, is important.

Although I shall ask some questions and make some criticisms in my speech, I shall intend them, even more than usual, in a constructive spirit. As the Minister said, large numbers of people volunteer in this country. One estimate that I have seen is that 3 million people regularly volunteer. However, as he said, the number is falling according to some surveys, although it remains high. That is borne out by anecdotal evidence. I can give instances of youth organisations that have folded because they have been unable to get week-in, week-out commitment from adult leaders to enable them to function.

That phenomenon is probably partly the result of changes in society and at the workplace. People are under greater pressure at work and there are more families where both partners work who want to keep their limited free time for themselves as a family. The surveys bear out the truth of the adage, "If you want something done, ask a busy person to do it". One survey showed that people are more likely to volunteer if they do a lot of overtime at work, if they have children under 15 living at home or if they are carers of relatives at home. The lesson is that we should not be defeatist. The general trend, on which both the Minister and I have remarked, is that we, as legislators, need to do everything in our power to remove disincentives from the people whom we wish to become involved in the voluntary sector.

While I was preparing for this debate, I looked through the Government's recent publications on the idea of a compact between the Government and the voluntary sector. I say without reservation to the Minister that I wholeheartedly welcome the idea of codifying relations between Government and voluntary organisations in a readily comprehensible fashion. We should also inculcate throughout Government, in every Department and agency, an understanding of what needs to be done to make the Government's activities understandable to the voluntary sector and to take account of the needs and working culture of voluntary sector organisations.

I warmly welcomed the Minister's concluding remarks, in which he championed the independence of voluntary organisations. Risks are run when the voluntary sector becomes increasingly involved in carrying out what were previously Government functions. That is not a party-political point—much of the effort stems from the reforms to personal social services that were introduced by the previous Government.

As the Minister said, we, as politicians and members of society, value voluntary organisations' independence and their ability to innovate, experiment and engage with the particular circumstances of an individual or local case. That approach is not available to Government officials, who have to abide by the Whitehall rule book. There is a risk that growing dependence on the Government may lead to an erosion in the voluntary sector of those qualities that we value most strongly, which could be a disincentive.

Lord Griffiths of Fforestfach summed up the way in which such a state of affairs might come about. He wrote:

> Typically, a charitable organisation starts, not infrequently with a religious affiliation, with a small number of highly committed individuals who are prepared to devote their time, skills and money to a cause. The organisation is then "discovered" by government and politicians are eager that they are seen to support it through public funding. Full time staff are hired to make the programme more professional, then new members are added to the board who lend credibility because of their experience on other government bodies. Certain of the original objectives are downgraded because of their more controversial character and because of this decision significant amounts of public funding are obtained. Volunteers however begin to feel their support is now unnecessary and drop out.

Whichever party is in office, it is right for the Government to seek to draw on the particular qualities and strengths of the voluntary sector. It is of the utmost importance that we avoid making voluntary organisations little more than another arm of the Government machine.

The Minister should bear in mind the concerns that faith-based organisations have expressed about bidding for funds. They feel that, whether they are dealing with the Government or local authorities, they are forced to choose between being true to their religious integrity and complying with the policy of the local authority or Department. Will the Government do everything within their power to simplify the funding arrangements, bureaucracy and form-filling with which voluntary organisations have to deal? I have been told by a number of organisations representing the voluntary and charitable sector that there are too many forms which are too lengthy and take too long to fill in. There are complex performance indicators, which often vary a great deal depending on which Department is responsible for a particular initiative—even where initiatives have been designed with similar objectives in mind.

Too many new initiatives emanate from the Government, not all of which are sustained for more than a short period. Several voluntary organisations are concerned about the balance between core funding and project funding. They are making representations about what they see as a tendency for money to be doled out in small parcels for which they have to spend a lot of time and energy bidding, but which do not guarantee the continuation of the organisation's activities over the medium or longer term, because the Government project may exist for only a short time.

Mr. Boateng: I am listening with great care, attention and some sympathy for the voluntary organisations concerned to the points that the hon. Gentleman is making. However, does not he think that his points would be that much stronger if he had prefaced them with a fleeting moment in the confessional? After all, it was the Government whom he supported for many years who began the Government tendency of unwillingness to commit to core funding. My sympathy for the voluntary sector would be stronger if he confessed his party's responsibility in that respect.

Mr. Lidington: As I said with regard to social services, I am perfectly willing to start from the premise that while the previous Conservative Administrations transformed this country for the better during their 18 years in office, we did not get absolutely everything right. One of the relatively few consolations of going into opposition is that it gives one the freedom to think through what one did right, or wrong, in the past.

Will the Minister explain how the Government see the way ahead? It is difficult to strike the balance correctly, because the Government's priorities are inevitably not the same as those of the voluntary organisations. The present Administration have a habit—which is not confined to their dealings with the voluntary sector—of top-slicing budgets and handing money out in little packages. That involves bidding bodies in a disproportionate amount of effort. Complaints on that score come not only from the voluntary sector, but from the educational and national health service sectors.

I should like to raise with the Minister two other matters on which I have received representations from voluntary organisations. The first is the impact of the national minimum wage legislation; the second, he will not be surprised to learn, is the Criminal Records Bureau. I shall be happy to spend a while in the confessional on the latter subject, because I understand the difficulties that he faces. We need to answer important questions on both those counts.

I shall deal first with the impact of the national minimum wage. I understand that section 44 of the relevant Act created an exemption from the regulations for what were termed voluntary workers. This has involved a great deal of uncertainty for voluntary organisations over definitions. The National Centre for Volunteering has suggested that the Act should be amended to insert into its preamble a sentence such as "This Act does not apply to volunteers", as a way of giving greater certainty.

A problem that has already arisen is the extent to which perks, benefits in kind and discounts on services provided by the charity should be counted as wages. Does the payment of such items take the person concerned out of the category of a volunteer helper and into that of an employee to whom the national minimum wage legislation would apply? For example, people who work in charity shops, for organisations such as the National Trust or as volunteer guides in historic buildings sometimes are allowed a discount on the product or services sold by the organisation for whom they are volunteering. Does such a concession mean that that person counts as an employee? Such questions are being asked in the voluntary sector.

The same point applies in respect of voluntary workers who are working away from their home. This issue might affect young people spending time away from home—perhaps in a gap year—carrying out voluntary work on a particular project. In many cases, such people would be paid some sort of pocket money, rather than a wage; an allowance to permit them an occasional visit to the cinema or a pint in the pub during the weeks or months when they are engaged in their voluntary work.

If those payments were to be considered wages by the authorities, it would provide a disincentive to that type of volunteering because the organisation would have to either pay those people the national minimum wage or discontinue such pocket money payments, which could restrict the take-up of that type of voluntary work to those able to afford to subsidise their volunteering from other resources. That would not be desirable.

On the Criminal Records Bureau, I understand the Government's dilemma very well. Someone has to meet the cost of checks. If volunteers were to be granted an exemption, the Government would have either to find the money from elsewhere in their expenditure programmes or load the cost of that exemption on to the fees charged to non-volunteers for criminal record checks.

The voluntary organisations are expressing growing fears that this system of charging will prove a great disincentive and make life even more difficult for them. The organisations serving young people are especially concerned. The Scout Association says that it already vets and trains more than 65,000 volunteers a year at an annual cost to the association of about £100,000. It estimates that if it had to carry out an enhanced criminal records check on each volunteer at a cost of £10 a head, it would incur a further cost of £750,000 a year, in addition to its running costs.

The Minister will know that amateur sporting bodies are also expressing concern. It is often overlooked that sports organisations attract more volunteers than any other part of the voluntary sector. It is estimated that about 1.5 million people give of their time to amateur sport in the course of an average year. Those hon. Members who, like me, are parents will probably agree that young people gain a tremendous amount from the time that other adults are prepared to give to coaching soccer, rugby, cricket, swimming and other sports. Sports bodies, the Scout Association and the Guide Association are therefore concerned about the imposition of fees for criminal record checks.

The National Centre for Student Volunteers has said that it is concerned not merely about the possible disincentive of the fee, but about the sheer hassle of having to apply for a check to be carried out, especially where the voluntary work will be done in a university vacation. In such a case, would there be any guarantee that the necessary paperwork could be completed before the opportunity to do the work had passed? The Government and the Criminal Records Bureau must try to ensure that applications for criminal record checks will be processed quickly. Whether or not a fee is payable, volunteers for whom a check is necessary should get clearance quickly, so that they do not give up, walk away and find something else to do because they are fed up with waiting.

A number of questions arise for the Government. What is the Minister's most recent assessment of the cost to the voluntary sector of the planned system of fees? How many people does he think will be affected? As he knows, in the past, several voluntary organisations have challenged the Government's published estimates. The Government are supposed to produce an impact assessment before the Criminal Records Bureau starts operating and charging fees. Given that the bureau will commence operations in 2001, I hope that the Minister can assure us that a detailed assessment will be produced later this year. Will he issue guidance on how the system will operate, especially the way in which the concept of substantial unsupervised access to children and young people should be interpreted?

Conservative and Labour Ministers have always taken the view that voluntary organisations are not obliged to have their helpers vetted and such arguments were used when my party was in office. However, I wonder whether the Government have taken full account of the pressure that insurance companies are exerting on voluntary organisations. In my constituency—and, indeed, on a wider scale—voluntary organisations are saying that they will feel obliged to ask not that the straightforward criminal record check be carried out, but the enhanced check. Otherwise, they fear that insurers will not provide cover where an organisation is sued because it failed to carry out a check that would have shown that a helper had harmed a child. The Government should not stand back and say, "It's up to the voluntary sector to decide whether to carry out checks." Voluntary organisations are under much pressure from insurers to secure checks on all volunteers who work with children and young people.

What thought are the Government giving to the impact of the requirement for checks on after-school clubs and other initiatives that they are helping to fund and that are directed at young people? I presume that volunteers who work in such organisations will be asked to permit a criminal records check to be performed. Will the Government allow for the cost of police national computer checks in their funding?

Although I have some criticisms of and questions for the Government, I start from the position of sharing the support for the voluntary sector that the Minister and his colleagues have shown. The thriving and innovative voluntary sector is one of this country's greatest traditions. It has existed for many years and all of us must work hard to pass it on in good health to future generations. In doing that, we will contribute to the greater well-being of the country.

3.32 pm

Jackie Ballard (Taunton): Like others, I have been a volunteer—not just a political volunteer. However, I have discovered that one carries on being a political volunteer even after one is being paid to be a politician. I was also a recruiter and organiser of volunteers when I worked in adult basic education, so I know about the difficulties in finding suitable volunteers. The volunteers whom I had to recruit needed to give blocks of their time to help adults with literacy or numeracy problems, so I understand what the Minister said about the inflexibilities in the benefits system. Those inflexibilities affect volunteers who have to commit to being in a certain place at a fixed time for a set period if they are to do an individual any good.

In our background research, we have all read papers containing figures on the number of volunteers and the hours that they work. I read a different paper from the Minister and the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington). It said that volunteers give more than 18 million working days a year, the equivalent of contributing £1.4 billion to the economy. That figure is different from the £40 billion that the Minister quoted. I do not know how those figures were calculated. It is probably impossible to calculate the economic worth of volunteers, although it might be a worthwhile exercise. Does the Minister have another figure?

Mr. Boateng: No, but I wonder whether that was the same statistician who calculated what the Liberal Democrats could provide with an extra penny on income tax.

Jackie Ballard: I am so disappointed. I thought that the Minister was in one of his generous moods and that he would not go in for such petty political backbiting. He has disappointed me, as he so often does, but I will try to live up to the name that he gave me in Committee on the Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill and behave responsibly.

My experience of statisticians is that no two ever agree on statistics. We should not put too much store by statistics or statisticians. However, whatever the exact contribution made by volunteers might be, it deserves to be recognised in the country and at the heart of Government more widely than it often is, which is why I welcome today's debate.

In our jobs as Members of Parliament, we encounter many people every day who give up hours of their time to do voluntary work. I am amazed at how much time some people devote not just to the well-known charities, but to helplines or statutory organisations such as the NHS, which—to make a brief party-political point—often uses volunteers to eke out its meagre resources. Some people even volunteer to work for Members of Parliament.

I recently met a constituent who works full time, but devotes much of his spare time to running a youth club in Milverton. He saw that a need was not being met, rolled up his sleeves and got on with it. We owe such people a great debt of gratitude. Indeed, volunteers are the unsung heroes of our society, without whom many organisations would collapse and many people would fail to receive vital services. Our communities are much the richer for these people.

I shall mention several organisations in my own constituency to make a wider point. The first is St. John Ambulance, which I visited recently. I was made keenly aware of its difficulties in recruiting volunteers. There is a greater need for services as voluntary organisations grow, but fewer people have time to give, so it becomes increasingly difficult to recruit volunteers. Hon. Members will be attending fetes and carnivals in the next few weeks, many of which could not take place without the presence of St. John Ambulance—for insurance as well as safety reasons. It is vital to the success of other organisations in the community, so there is a knock-on effect. St. John Ambulance also provides training, internally and externally, which helps to save lives every year. As a result of lottery funding, it is running first aid courses in some of my constituency's villages to train first-line responders in the event of emergencies—a vital job to help support the emergency services.

Last Friday morning I was shown around Beech Grove school in my constituency by the head teacher and the chair of governors. It reminded me that school governors are another volunteer group—perhaps not one that immediately springs to mind—that performs a responsible and vital role. It is an increasingly time-consuming role, particularly for the chairman of governors. Some hon. Members have been chairs of school governors and some—perhaps the Minister—still are.

I recently attended a youth council conference in Somerset that brought home the importance of volunteer networks, without which youth participation in the form of youth councils could not take place. If we expect young people to become active and valuable members of society, we must provide opportunities for them to be consulted and give them an input into our democratic systems. There is a tendency to view voluntary work as about helping people in need, but it is also about involving people in diverse ways in their communities. Becoming involved in projects to ensure that decision makers listen to young people's views is another part of volunteering, as it is not always carried out by the statutory sector.

Last Saturday, the mayor of Taunton Deane organised a millennium parade through the town. A huge variety of voluntary organisations—more than 100—took part. The hon. Member for Aylesbury spoke about a range of organisations, and I noticed a range from the Samaritans to the majorettes—very different in their aims and objectives.

Many voluntary organisations value the framework and support that they receive from joining together under the umbrella of the Council of Voluntary Service. I note that neither of the two previous speakers mentioned CVS. I am especially aware of its work because I used to be a member of the executive of my local CVS branch. I know first-hand of its ability to bring together social, economic and environmental groups to contribute towards community planning. Local organisations and their communities need the CVS to build skills capacities and competences through partnerships.

I have regular meetings with voluntary organisations in my constituency and they all tell me that they do not want to lose sight of their core objectives and become over-bureaucratic to take on and deliver either the local government or national Government agenda. The CVS is in an ideal position to facilitate compacts, if it has adequate core funding. This comes down to the issue of core funding versus chasing project funding, for which I would not blame a specific Government. I have been a member of local government and this is not a party-political issue.

All Governments who see themselves as guardians of public funds are likely to put over-bureaucratic demands on voluntary organisations and to have bright ideas and seek bids for project funding. However, we must find a way to ensure that that does not overtake the core objectives of voluntary organisations so that they end up employing people to do their accounts and they lose sight of their original purpose. The whole process takes time and resources and that is why the CVS is an ideal player in it. There is a constant issue for voluntary organisations in managing the conflicts between their internal values or aims and the external policy environment, such as the divergent and changing expectations of partners and the new financial opportunities, especially bidding opportunities and the inevitable financial constraints.

Volunteering and the nature of voluntary organisations have changed a great deal in the past two decades. Their services are needed more now than ever before and perhaps in some ways the terms "volunteer" or "voluntary" are no longer suitable because without some of the services provided by the voluntary sector, the statutory services would find life incredibly difficult. As the hon. Member for Aylesbury said, many more people are now in paid work, so there are fewer volunteers to cope with the increasing needs of communities and statutory organisations.

[Jackie Ballard]

Some people feel that they have no skills to offer, but all that many people who are in need of help want is a little of someone else's time and attention—something that most people can offer. Many people volunteer their time to home visit schemes that are organised by local authorities and charities such as Age Concern. They provide a lifeline for people who may not necessarily suffer from any disability, but who benefit from having someone to talk to once in a while. Lewisham health centre, which is nowhere near my constituency, runs just such a scheme to help older people cope with loneliness by providing someone to speak to them on the phone or visit them in their homes.

The Minister spoke about the BBC's TimeBank scheme. I should like to mention another. I do not know whether the Minister has come across the Lewisham time bank but it is attached to the health centre. It enables volunteers to earn time credits for helping their neighbours or others in their communities. They can spend those time credits on services for themselves. A general practitioner, for example, can prescribe a few hours of visiting for someone who is lonely or depressed—I do not mean clinically depressed, but what most lay people would describe as depressed. Such schemes can give a value not just to the act of volunteering, but to the volunteer.

In his speech in March, which has already been mentioned, the Prime Minister said > let us give generously in the twin currencies of time and money.

He was right to identify time as a unit of currency and it is one currency of which some people, such as the retired and the unemployed, have plenty. But many of them do not have much of the other currency—money. Why not allow them to exchange their time for goods and services?

The expansion of the scheme could be worrying for Governments. If local authorities were involved in time bank schemes, they could allow time credits to be exchanged for car park tickets or for access to leisure facilities. It may be a revolutionary idea, but when one starts to think about it, there is no end to where it could lead. One could set up an alternative society, swapping time and services with each other without using money. However, Treasury and Department of Social Security officials would get very worried about that. I am pleased that the Government are looking at the existing, or perceived, barriers to volunteering for people who are on benefits and I am delighted with the Minister's announcement about time credits, which is very positive.

There are many time-bank, time-credit or funny-money schemes in this country, but there are many more, and older-established ones, in the United States, where there is a long-established culture of volunteering. Like many hon. Members, I have an American intern working with me, and she tells me that university students in the United States compete for the chance to spend their holiday time volunteering, building houses, caring for children and so on.

There are service-learning programmes in which people give their services free of charge to help organisations in need. For example, accounting students give up their time to help in schools. Others volunteer to work in parenting schemes for at-risk children; in meals-on-wheels and family-assistance schemes in hospitals; in neighbourhood cleaning schemes; and in shelters for abused women. Volunteering is a worthwhile way to help others while learning new skills and being valued as an individual. As the Minister said, it is an impressive addition to any CV.

I will not repeat the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Aylesbury about voluntary organisations' anxiety that Government proposals will make them pay for checks on criminal records. However, I, too, have been lobbied by several organisations, including the guides and the scouts who rely largely on volunteers. I do not have to declare an interest as the honorary vice-president of Somerset Scouting Association as it is certainly not a pecuniary interest.

The checks are vital and it is important that voluntary organisations take as much care as statutory organisations and business about those who work with children and young people. I hope that the Government's review in July will show that they have much more money than they expected in their coffers and that they will thus grant voluntary organisations an exemption from the fee for criminal record checks.

We have much to learn from other countries that make use of people's volunteering skills. Many people are prepared to play a part in their community through voluntary schemes, although getting involved in local politics or the local council may be the last thing that they want to do. However, many of us became involved in local politics through the volunteering route. I was first involved in campaigning for a toy library, helping to set it up and running it when I had a very young child. Volunteering is often the route into politics, but many people do not want to get politically involved. They are happy to give up their time to volunteer for other things.

Volunteers should come from all sections of society—young and old, working and non-working. If working people are to give their time and skills to the community, they will need their employers' support. As the Minister said, the Prime Minister laid down a challenge to employers, many of whom do not recognise the value to their organisation and to society of having employees who are active as magistrates, local councillors, school governors or in voluntary organisations.

I am one of several Members of Parliament on a secondment scheme through the National Council for Voluntary Organisations. I chose to work with Crime Concern, which last night held a dinner for corporate sponsors, which I attended. I learned there of a large London brewery that released 50 members of staff during working hours to act as mentors to children at a local school who are at risk of offending. That is an excellent example to other employers, who I hope will take up the Prime Minister's challenge. However, one day in 18 months seems rather a small challenge to rise to and I hope that they will give more time.

I have long been interested in community measures such as time dollars and community banking. Mutuality has been missing from volunteering so far; community banking takes place with volunteer support to set up a mutual organisation, the idea being that communities band together to offer cheap finance. The bank is administered by a team of volunteers, so costs are kept to a minimum.

The other attractive aspect of mutuality is harnessing the time, skills and caring of people who themselves need help. Rather than so-called do-gooders or mentors moving in to help the underprivileged or marginalised members of society, it is better to involve such people not as passive recipients of help but as active participants with something to contribute. In debates elsewhere the Minister and I have discussed how people who get into a spiral of offending often have low self-esteem and need someone to tell them that they could be better people. The same argument applies to people living in a disadvantaged community who feel that they are just the recipients of help with nothing to offer in return. Mutual volunteering could help to overcome that problem.

We are fortunate to have so many people who are willing to give up their time to help out in charity shops, hospices, meals-on-wheels services, day care centres, support groups and many other activities of our society. Volunteers do not volunteer for nothing; they gain from the experience. Whenever I recruited volunteers I was always careful to say that voluntary actions were not always done just out the goodness of people's hearts; volunteers gained a feeling of self-esteem and they were contributing something worthwhile to the community.

As the Minister said, volunteering can—through fostering regular attendance at meetings and putting some routine back into people's lives—help to get people back into paid work. We must be careful not to make volunteering too professional and not to impose so many types of accreditation around it that it puts it out of the reach of ordinary people.

Jackie Ballard: I am pleased to see the Minister nodding. Not every country in the world has the volunteers and volunteer networks that we have. We are fortunate to have a long tradition of volunteering. We must be careful not to destroy that tradition by good intentions.

3.54 pm

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): Volunteering is the essential act of citizenship. Active engagement in the communities in which we live—not rights or the passports that we carry—is what makes us citizens, and I make no apology for reinforcing that point. My right hon. Friend the Minister made the same point when he referred to volunteering being of the essence and the fabric of society. Due to his wide experience of the voluntary sector and community interests, I am delighted that that aspect of Government policy is in his hands and I welcome his announcements here today.

The United Kingdom has a vibrant and successful voluntary sector. There has been enormous progress in promoting a spirit of partnership, but volunteering still has an old-fashioned ring to it. It is seen as dowdy here, in comparison with the United States of America, where voluntary work is increasingly seen as a core activity and is viewed by business managers as well as individuals as an essential element in a CV. We are talking only about image and language in that respect, because our level of activity and the range of our voluntary and community sectors are enormous—probably greater than in any other country. Even on that large base, much progress is being made by the voluntary sector—but much remains to be done. In my contribution, I want to recognise the value and work of the sector, stress the importance of partnership and look to priorities, particularly in innovation.

The previous Opposition day debate of 23 July 1996 was almost unique because there had been no debate on the voluntary sector or volunteering for many years. It was an opportunity for all those who took part to celebrate the work of the sector. I am pleased that this debate is taking place on the Government's initiative and I hope that it will become a regular feature of the House's calendar. Clearly, there is a mass of issues with which we ought to engage. They are not, perhaps, the controversial and partisan issues, but issues that should be teased out in intelligent debate between people who have experience of the voluntary sector and a concern for it.

It is the responsibility of Government to nurture the sector, although we must be sensitive to its need for independence. All parties have accepted those points. I am pleased that so much of what the Labour party called for when in opposition, in terms of the development of that partnership, in publications such as "Building the Future Together", has been delivered. I congratulate the Minister and his colleagues on their recent work. The development of the compact at every level throughout the United Kingdom is an enormous step forward. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister for his participation and to people in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, where separate processes have led to developments that are similar, but are very much owned by those countries.

Mr. Hope: I regret that my commitment to an engagement at the Trustee Conference 2000 means that I cannot stay to contribute to the debate. My right hon. Friend is hiding his light under a bushel. He is the author of the compact that is now establishing a brand new relationship between the Government and the voluntary sector at a national level and in regional and local government. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the work that he has done has set the standard—I am sure that he does—but that, although we have made progress, there is more to be done, particularly on rolling out the compact at local level?

Mr. Michael: Many people recognised the need for the developments and many people, including my hon. Friend, came to the House with experience of the voluntary sector. They brought their experience with them, so that the House is now seized of the need for the relationship.

The Labour party developed its approach in opposition, but did so in partnership with the voluntary sector—listening and debating. Parallel activity took place in the voluntary sector. The National Council for Voluntary Organisations took a major initiative that led to the Deakin report. That made a significant contribution in England and there were parallel working groups in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, where the voluntary sector itself sought to develop a different type of relationship. It has been a collective effort, and I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Hope) for his contribution, both in his professional background and since he was elected to the House, particularly in his work with the Back-Bench group on the voluntary sector.

There is a great range of important innovation. The Prince's Trust has undertaken a variety of activities designed to motivate young people, taking risks that it would be more difficult for the statutory sector to take. On the Government side, there has been the development of the millennium volunteers. I am glad that my right hon. Friend referred to the role of older volunteers. Often, one hears people in their 80s talking about helping "old people" who are about 10 years younger than they are. I had that experience with my father, when he was alive. Following the year of older people, there has been increasing recognition of the important part that they play. There is potential for greater future involvement, as the number of older people and younger retired people increases. We need strategically to expand that innovation.

I welcome the cash commitment to expand the work of older volunteers to which my right hon. Friend the Minister referred. That approach needs to be developed in a strategic manner that does not simply involve one-off projects or funding for a short period. Much good work has been supported by lottery funds, but most of those efforts tend to be short term. A service that is provided for two or three years may disappear unless there is sustained funding, which can sometimes be provided by Departments, local government or voluntary contributions. However, the situation can be difficult— the example of the old urban aid funds shows that services can disappear, although they were good and the community came to depend on them. It is crucial to provide sustained support for the best projects.

I want to discuss two important innovations that suggest a way forward: those are, the community action network and the Cares programme, which was initiated by Business in the Community. Perhaps I should add that I joined the advisory board of the community action network, although that is not a pecuniary or declarable interest.

The purpose of the community action network, which has grown quickly, is to encourage the outstanding community projects around the country to exchange information and knowledge. Some of those projects are well funded, some are local and others, such as Track 2000, which is in my constituency, are grass-roots organisations.

During my time at the Home Office, with CAN we invited various voluntary sector organisations to take part in a discussion. They discussed, via the web, what they should say at that first meeting. As a result, it was one of the most coherent and well-prepared meetings in which I have had the pleasure of taking part. That shows how new technology can be used by the voluntary sector.

Some 350 members of the community action network are now helping to spread innovation and to compare practices and experience—they discuss what works and what can be transplanted, so that success does not simply remain local, although many of the projects, of their nature, are local. Local successes can be transplanted and replicated in other places. We should strongly encourage such efforts and I know that the Home Office is supporting this work.

The community action network brings together the public, private and voluntary sectors. Several innovations have shown that the three sectors have the capacity to work together. Experience to date suggests that there is a capacity for dynamic innovation, although it can be difficult to manage a dynamic relationship between different sectors, which may include several Departments. The ways in which health authorities work make it hard to secure a proper and sustained engagement with the voluntary sector in community development.

I also want to discuss the Cares programme. I had the privilege of being invited by Sandy Leitch, who was leading a task force for Business in the Community, to join him and the National Centre for Volunteering on a visit to New York to examine the work of New York Cares. That shows how the lead in such initiatives can come from various directions—it can come from a community or voluntary organisation, the Government or the business sector. We should welcome and encourage such diversity. That initiative led not to the transplanting of the American experience to the United Kingdom, but to the development of our own model. I am pleased to see how that has developed through the action days that have been organised. Some 275 companies and 7,100 employees have taken part since September 1999. That remarkable upsurge in activity is in addition to the existing activities of voluntary organisations.

Ten Cares partnerships are now operational in cities around Britain, including the Cares programme in Cardiff. Coincidentally, my constituency was one of the pilot projects. I am very pleased that the National Assembly for Wales has given £400,000 for Wales-wide development in every town and city. The programme's innovative activity is being matched with that of the existing voluntary sector. That is a positive approach; people are saying not, "We're new: we can come in and do everything", but, "We can add to what is already there and work with existing organisations."

I referred earlier to the role of voluntary activity in the CV of someone who is seeking employment. The National Centre for Volunteering has highlighted the fact that the 1997 national survey of volunteering revealed that 18 per cent. of those surveyed said that their employer encouraged voluntary work, and 40 per cent. said that they would be either very interested or quite interested in participating in voluntary schemes organised by their employer. That underlines the importance of voluntary work being seen as something that is encouraged. It also demonstrates the potential of the Cares programme, given employers' involvement in it. The National Centre for Volunteering suggests that government should help to encourage flexible working hours to facilitate the community involvement of employees. It also advocates schemes that could assist business in encouraging volunteers—for example, tax breaks or a scheme akin to payroll giving, with voluntary activity rather than money being the benefit that is provided.

My right hon. Friend the Minister, when he spoke about encouraging employees, referred to the role of the Secretary of the Cabinet, Sir Richard Wilson. I pay tribute to him for the superb example that he has set in encouraging Government employees to become involved in volunteering activities. His initiative at the Home Office in 1997 had a significant impact. There is nothing like leading by example from the top and I pay tribute to the lead that he has taken.

The National Centre for Volunteering has raised the issue of unemployed people and people who are active social entrepreneurs in their local community. That is to do not only with unemployed people voluntarily giving their time, although I am pleased that more is being done to remove the obstacles. However, people who take a lead in their local community and become social entrepreneurs, doing valuable and fulfilling, but unpaid, jobs in the community, sometimes have to leave those jobs in favour of paid work. That can leave a vacuum, in that much voluntary activity collapses and, indeed, help for unemployed people disappears. The national centre suggests the inclusion of a social entrepreneur option in the new deal. There are potential difficulties in implementing that, but the idea merits further exploration.

Social entrepreneurship, as a concept, is as hard to put a finger on as entrepreneurship in the business sector, involving as it does the old question of whether entrepreneurs are born, developed or trained. I have looked with interest at the work of the school for social entrepreneurs, which was started by Michael Young—Lord Young of Dartington—who seems to have lost none of his capacity for innovation. If that school proves a success and the people who go through the training course are able to take a major leap forward, it would say a lot for education and training in that field. That is something on which we could then build for the long-term future.

Training needs a greater emphasis in relation to volunteering, voluntary organisations and voluntary activity. There is always a tendency to make savings on training when money is tight, as it is most of the time. However, if volunteers are to fulfil their potential, they need the opportunity to develop their skills and knowledge, just as employees do. We should place a great deal of emphasis on that.

I join my right hon. Friend the Minister in welcoming the report of Lord Warner's committee, and I hope that a long-term strategic approach will be taken to the implementation of its recommendations. Will the Minister tell us the Government's intentions in that regard when he sums up? The contribution of the voluntary sector to the new deal should not be underestimated. From the beginning, the most difficult young people have needed to be motivated and given the first step on the path into work. That is of interest to all of us, not only because we believe that all young people should have opportunities, but because it is those young people who need particular help who are likely to do damage to themselves and to the wider community.

I refer to the rest of the Minister's portfolio—the way in which the devil makes work for idle hands. If young people are to respect society, they have to be part of society. Young people from the most deprived communities—and often those from ethnic minorities—frequently have not had as many opportunities as others. I welcome the work of the voluntary sector in the new deal in that regard and I hope that it will be strongly promoted in the future.

Tradition and consistency are on the other side of the coin to innovation, and I share the view expressed earlier that faith-based voluntary organisations need to be encouraged and nurtured. The church is often the only professionally led organisation still in existence in some of our most deprived communities and run-down areas. Increasingly, in modern times, the mosque as well as the church may be the key to engaging the community in its own future. Tradition and consistency in the voluntary sector, therefore, must be nurtured.

I have some involvement in the Youth Hostels Association, of which I am a vice-president, and the citizens advice bureaux service. A variety of organisations should not be allowed to slip down the list of priorities for support and encouragement simply because they have been around for a long time.

I shall return to the most important development of recent times: the development of partnerships. That is where I started in voluntary and community work and, during the past couple of years, I have been pleased to see major innovations in Wales. The Wales Council for Voluntary Action has now based itself in Baltic house, a stone's throw from the National Assembly for Wales. The engagement between the new Assembly and the voluntary sector is vibrant as a result of that initiative. The Assembly has also established a partnership council as one of the three strands of partnership—the others being with business and with local government—that are the key elements in its being. Others could learn from that.

The development of local compacts has grown out of the agreement of the Wales Council for Voluntary Action and the Welsh Local Government Association to set targets together. The delivery has been patchy, but some of it is extremely exciting. During my period as Secretary of State, I asked all public bodies in Wales to establish a compact with the relevant voluntary sector. One of the most exciting developments was in Neath-Port Talbot, where the local authority and the local council for voluntary action joined with the NHS trust and health authority to adopt a tripartite approach to the development of volunteering and voluntary activity. Again, that approach strives to break down the barriers.

The development of a compact involves not simply codifying good practice, but creating a new vibrancy in society and a planned release of new energy into the voluntary sector. Certainly, there is a danger that the voluntary sector will be flooded if national or local government expect too much of it, and the relationship must be managed with great care. However, that relationship must also be strategic. If the voluntary sector is to continue to be successful, consistency is crucial.

I mentioned crime reduction and I was pleased to hear the hon. Member for Taunton (Jackie Ballard) mention that she is a former board member of Crime Concern. I regard the work of that organisation and others such as the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders, and Victim Support as crucial to crime reduction in this country. It is not simply that they do additional good work: they do things that the public sector cannot. Partnership between the public and the voluntary sectors—which, again, requires the involvement of business—is crucial, and such organisations are essential to delivering stability in society.

Finally, I too underline the importance of involving young people. As has been said, it is difficult to get young people to regard volunteering as exciting. In my experience as a youth worker, the only way to get them to volunteer was to tell them that they were volunteering only after the event, by which time it came as something of a surprise. One must get them involved and engaged, and words such as "action", "care" and "community" have a greater appeal than "volunteering". That presents a problem. One cannot talk about volunteering without using the word, but to attract people one almost has to avoid it.

In Wales, the National Assembly launched the "Young Voice—Llais Ifanc" initiative, the purpose of which was to use the internet and e-mail to encourage youngsters to talk to each other—rather than just the Government—about policy. If we allow concerns and suggested remedies to develop independently, young people will engage in voluntary activity and, indeed, the political activity that is essential to the survival and development of our democracy. Political activity is, after all, a voluntary activity—none of us has been forced into it—and it is rather sad that we live in a society in which such activity is, in the main, denigrated. Just as volunteering needs a fresh and positive image, so does political activity, and perhaps the two are not entirely unrelated.

On the responsibility of Government, it is interesting to note that other countries are looking at, getting excited about and learning from developments in this country. Last weekend, Lord Dubs and I spent some time with people from eastern Europe who were interested in learning how to involve non-governmental organisations in the development of a civil society. They brought a refreshing air of excitement. I hope that debates such as this will engender greater interest and excitement among hon. Members.

Let us explore the words to be used in relation to volunteering, but let us speak positively and regard it as the essential act of citizenship. Let us press the Government in everything that they do to emphasise the importance of these activities. Many Government Departments—the Home Office, the Department for Education and Employment and the Cabinet Office—are now taking initiatives. The social exclusion unit has made a major contribution in promoting ideas of social inclusion. We know of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's interest, which has been put into financial terms in recent decisions; we know of the Prime Minister's close interest in the voluntary sector. We must move towards coherence from Government: perhaps sometimes there are too many voices, which makes it difficult for the voluntary sector to be sure what messages are coming from the Government. That can lead to energy being diverted in a variety of directions.

There is a difficulty about us wanting, as we all do, children and those with whom volunteers work, such as adults with learning difficulties and the elderly, to be properly protected by the use of the criminal records system. It gives a mixed message from the Government when that will cause a burden for those organisations that use volunteers most. I recognise the difficulties and the dilemma that Ministers face in dealing with that. Ultimately, it becomes a central dilemma for the Government and one that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could perhaps look at again to ensure that they give a clear and simple message about the importance and value of volunteering.

In that context, all organisations in the public sector, including local authorities, must be encouraged to provide funding in a way that makes it easier for the sector to apply for and receive financial support within the new time scale. Now that the Government have moved to a three-year time scale for funding, there is no reason why that should not be passed on by public bodies and local government to the voluntary organisations.

Finally, new ideas are necessary if we are to get right the balance between core funding and project funding. I know that some thought has been given to strategic funding for the voluntary sector. That would allow continuity of thought and development without a return to the old system, where so much money went to administration that comparatively little was available for activity on the ground and the development of innovation and good projects.

Let us unite in persuading Ministers that encouragement of the essential act of citizenship has support from all sides of the House and from the community at large.

4.23 pm

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion): I begin by declaring a possible interest. I worked for five years for the national representative body for the voluntary sector in Wales, the Wales Council for Voluntary Action. I still have pension rights, so I clearly have a stake in the future of the voluntary sector.

I welcome the Minister's announcement that time exchange schemes will be taken into account in the benefit regulations. I ask him to go a little further along the lines urged by the hon. Member for Taunton (Jackie Ballard), particularly with regard to local exchange trading schemes, which are local exchange mechanisms. A local exchange trading scheme in my constituency is having problems with unemployed people who pledge one another not only time but services, as a sort of currency. Local officialdom is not receptive to what is happening there.

I also welcome the pronouncement by the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington)—I am not sure whether it was an announcement—who spoke glowingly for the Conservative Front Bench about liberal society. I thought that liberal society had gone downhill in the Conservative party. However, at least in this consensual Chamber I welcome his remarks on a liberal society without elitism. I agree with his remarks in that context.

I want to focus on the contribution of the voluntary sector to Welsh civic society, as seen from my own perspective and experience as someone who has worked for a voluntary sector organisation for several years and who, like other hon. Members, became involved in the first place by being a volunteer.

I shall start by giving throwing some statistics into the pot. They differ from other statistics that we have heard, so perhaps we can take an average and work out where we are.

The annual income of the voluntary sector in Wales has been estimated at about £570 million, which is a significant amount and is equivalent to 2.2 per cent. of the gross domestic product of Wales. There are about 25,000 active voluntary organisations in Wales, of which 90 per cent. are small local organisations. It is important to remember that many voluntary organisations have their headquarters in London and elsewhere in the United Kingdom, which skews the perception of voluntary activities because they are often thought to be outside Wales. Wales has many small voluntary bodies.

The Minister said that 29 per cent. of the adult population in Wales are active volunteers, but my figures show that 80 per cent.—1.9 million people—are active volunteers and that each contributes nearly four hours of voluntary time every week. There is a big difference between 29 per cent. and 80 per cent., but statisticians use different methods to obtain figures. The value of that voluntary work to the Welsh economy is estimated to be £3.4 billion. The figures sometimes seem to go beyond reality and perhaps the new economics have gone too far. The contribution of voluntary organisations and volunteers is equivalent to about 15 per cent. of gross domestic product in Wales. Accusations are sometimes made of facts and figures being added together and totalling more than 100 per cent. of GDP when every sector has made a play for its part of the economy. However, the contribution of the voluntary sector in Wales is significant and it ranks alongside sectors such as agriculture, farming and tourism. It is in that league and it is important that its value is accepted.

For every £1 of statutory funding, the voluntary sector contributes £2.30p in matched funding, time and effort. We face the problem of finding resources for objective 1 structural funding in several areas in Wales and elsewhere in the United Kingdom and the contribution of the voluntary sector to meeting structural funding obligations can be significant. It has a full part to play, but that does not let the Government off the hook in finding sufficient matched funding in the comprehensive spending review. The voluntary sector should contribute added value to the process; it should not supply funds to substitute for Government expenditure.

Having put on the record some of the facts and figures from one part of the United Kingdom, I want to say how important the voluntary sector is to civic society. The compact between the Government and the voluntary sector in Wales, to which the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) referred, states:

> Voluntary action plays a central role in our modern pluralistic society and enhances the democratic process.

Within the past week or so we have seen how the voluntary sector can enhance the democratic process when it delivers its views to politicians.

I see from the voluntary sector in my constituency how flexible it can be and how it is able to respond to demand as it arises. Statutory organisations sometimes take years to conduct research and to put together funding bids, but the voluntary sector can be up and running in months, weeks or days and sometimes hours. Organisations in Aberystwyth that help the young homeless, Hype in my constituency, and the Ceredigion advocacy network, which helps those with mental health problems, have filled a gap and, at short notice, have provided a service that was not available in the statutory or private sector. The voluntary sector often brings such organisations closer to the people and encourages greater participation. In turn, that builds confidence and skills among participants. We have already heard a little about the contribution that volunteering makes to employers and those seeking jobs. I like to think that the voluntary sector is not only the civic society, but the learning society at work. Volunteering is the process by which most people gain new skills.

I support what the hon. Member for Taunton said about accreditation in the voluntary sector. We must monitor progress and the value of the public penny that goes into some voluntary organisations, but we must not overburden individuals with a requirement to gain national vocational qualifications or meet other criteria. We must maintain the maximum flexibility and allow people to gain skills and measure their own progress. When self-esteem is low, people measure their progress against that of their peers, not against external criteria that they must meet. It is important that Government policies give the voluntary sector sufficient freedom to continue in that way.

I want to illustrate the way in which the voluntary sector has worked in Wales by giving a short history of its contribution to the preservation and promotion of the Welsh language. I became involved in the voluntary sector and perhaps ended up in this House by that route. The first voluntary efforts to revive the Welsh language were made in the 18th century, when Madam Bevan set up circulating schools. They taught Welsh, which was forbidden by the state at that time. The Act of Union ruled out the use of Welsh in public life.

It took the voluntary sector, driven by the non-conformist faith communities, to realise what was happening. It set up a whole raft of initiatives, which are now familiar even to those outside Wales. The eisteddfod was restored to its current form in the 19th century. The Gorsedd, which started in London on Primrose Hill, was fuelled by a real voluntary visionary—Iolo Morgannwg. I think that he never had much of a job, but was a lifelong volunteer. He was also addicted to hard drugs, but I do not advocate volunteering in that way.

The eisteddfod and the Welsh language societies continued to flourish in the early part of the 20th century. The Urdd Gobaith Cymru—the Welsh league of youth—was set up and has proved an extremely effective way of teaching the Welsh language to children. It led to the first Welsh language school, which was voluntary. It was not allowed, or at least not encouraged, in the Government-funded system. That first Welsh language school was in Aberystwyth in my constituency. The 1960s saw an increase in the number of organisations such as the Welsh nursery schools movement—Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin—which led to a revival of the language.

[Mr. Simon Thomas]

Curiously, the Welsh language movement also saw itself as being outside the mainstream voluntary sector. As a result, many voluntary organisations in Wales now have difficulty attracting Welsh-speaking volunteers. That is both an anecdotal and a recorded problem. For example, the citizens advice bureaux in some parts of Wales want and need to provide a bilingual service, but have difficulty attracting Welsh-speaking volunteers. The Welsh language community has taken part in volunteering around chapels and churches, which has not been fully brought into the mainstream. However, that is developing, with the Assembly's encouragement, and I am sure that that will continue.

My crude interpretation of voluntary organisations is that they are often highly innovative and even radical at first. They challenge the system and attract opprobrium and ridicule. That leads the Government not to work with them, but against them. In time, the voluntary organisations start to deliver services; they become part of the fabric of provision and the services that they deliver are absorbed into what is done by the Government or private business. The hon. Member for Aylesbury set out the progress of a voluntary organisation in terms that were more elegant than my crude analysis, although he was quoting someone else.

Some voluntary organisations get fossilised; they pay too much attention to their representational role on committees and so on and progress is blocked. However, they often work in close partnership with local government organisations and businesses, which is encouraged by the Government. I welcome many of the Government's measures in that regard.

When voluntary organisations start to become old-fashioned or inward looking a new bud sometimes comes out of the old rootstock and flourishes vigorously. The statutory sector does not have the same ability, when the old growth has come to an end, to go underground and re-emerge elsewhere in a new form.

I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth for his hard work and enormous energy in forming the compact in Wales and the Partnership Council. Although the Wales Council for Voluntary Action represented a lot of demands from the voluntary sector, if there had not been a listening voice at the other end we would not have got as far as we have done. The partnership arrangement with the voluntary sector will be a monument in Wales to the right hon. Gentleman and a testament to his hard work.

The Partnership Council is part of the Welsh Assembly; it was enshrined in the Government of Wales Act 1998 that there should be a scheme between the voluntary sector in Wales and the National Assembly. That is unique in the United Kingdom. The Partnership Council puts the voluntary sector on an equal footing with local government and business, which businesses do not find so amenable, but we are working on that.

In Ceredigion, we are also working hard to prepare for objective 1—I mention in passing that we are waiting for matched funding for objective 1. The objective 1 forum has one third representation from the voluntary sector, one third from local government and one third from business. That has given the voluntary sector the profile that it deserves within the plans for objective 1; whether or not we accept all the figures quoted, it deserves it for its contribution to GDP. Some members of the farming community in Ceredigion told me that they are not sure whether the voluntary sector contributes anything to GDP, although the arguments advanced today repudiate that view. The voluntary sector has a great deal to do in helping the area move towards objective 1 status and encouraging the projects, especially training, that will result.

The voluntary sector has also made a huge contribution to the proposal for a children's commissioner in the Care Standards Bill, which recently had its Second Reading. The wide and in-depth participation of children and young people in discussing what should be the work of a children's commissioner strongly influenced Welsh Members when they considered the commissioner's role.

The Partnership Council, whose job is to implement the scheme, put out the voluntary sector scheme for consultation, which is still going on. That scheme contains several important elements, one of which is an agreement on the way in which the Government should consult the voluntary sector. Such agreements are not always followed, but people do their best; the compact on volunteering acknowledges its value and the manual on voluntary grants helps the voluntary sector to claim the relevant grants. It sets out the way in which that sector and the Government will work in partnership. It also has a brief view on community development, which I mention because it is the only part over which I have had any influence. The hon. Member for Aylesbury will see that these compacts include not only codification but a lot of other detail.

The council has a preponderance of voluntary sector members, including 21 sectional networks. I am pleased to say that for the first time that includes a structured sectoral representation from the black and ethnic minority in Wales. That is to be welcomed. The Partnership Council is a strong voice for the sector. It complements the activities of the other bodies such the Wales Council for Voluntary Action and the National Assembly.

I should like to say a few words about the role of the voluntary sector and volunteering in rural areas. It is important to plead the case for diversity and pluralisation in rural areas. There are an estimated 1,487 voluntary organisations in my constituency. That is rather precise for an estimate, but it takes the apportionment of other national bodies into account. What is more certain is that 700 local organisations are active in my constituency. With a population of about 70,000, that is roughly one organisation for every 100 people, which is a much higher ratio than one finds in urban areas.

In Cardiff, for example, there is one local organisation for every 250 people. In Rhondda Cynon Taff, another densely populated area, there is one organisation for every 240 people. That discrepancy underlines the different rural and urban needs. There is wide diversification and there are transport problems in getting and delivering services to local people. I have different organisations doing the same jobs in different towns and villages. In Aberystwyth, Lampeter and Cardigan, one organisation does the same job as another organisation, but they are separate. That might be seen by some as duplication.

The voluntary sector is often accused of being too highly duplicated, although that accusation is never levelled at supermarkets. It delivers different projects for different people. We must bear that in mind, particularly in rural areas. We must deliver voluntary support close to the people. That sometimes means that one ends up with the same or similar organisations doing similar jobs. It certainly places enormous strain on local government funding and fund raising. I hope that the rural issue will be taken into account in Government policy when they consider the voluntary sector. Community transport, volunteer bureaux and the local CVS are essential for rural areas.

The national lottery has made a significant contribution in Wales. On the whole, the picture is mixed. The National Lottery Charities Board has been very successful in Wales. It has responded to the needs of Wales. Tribute should be paid to the previous chair of that board, Tom Jones, who made a huge effort to be responsive to the voluntary sector and in particular innovated the small grants scheme in Wales, which was then rolled out across the UK. Many voluntary organisations throughout the UK now have access through the small grants scheme to support and train their volunteers. They will be grateful for what was done in Wales. It was a successful innovation.

We are now finding problems, however. They are not just the problems of short-term funding that have already been described, but the problems of the declining funding from the National Lottery Charities Board, caused in part by the new opportunities fund that the Government introduced. It is a highly valued fund but it has shaded the line between lottery money and statutory funding. It needs to be monitored carefully to ensure that we do not use lottery money to replace what should properly be statutory funding. That promise was made by the previous Government and I have not heard this Government say that they want to break that promise. We must monitor that.

The introduction of that fund means that there is less money for other funds. I know that that means that there is more money for the schemes that it supports and that some of them are good, but it has caused some problems with the National Lottery Charities Board, which has been extremely successful in delivering locally in Wales. It was annoying—I will not put it more strongly than that—for many people in Wales and for volunteers in Wales when the National Lottery Charities Board announced that it had less money to allocate in the next few years for projects in Wales at the same time as the millennium dome received more money.

Let us look towards the future. There is no doubt that times are changing in the voluntary sector. I used to be a community development manager, and I saw such a job advertised in the paper yesterday—not that I am looking for another job. I scanned the description to find out what the job entailed, only to find that it was a job on the web, managing on-line communities. It had nothing to do with what I suppose we would call real communities—it involved virtual communities. Globalisation and aspects of the internet will significantly change the way in which the voluntary sector works. The voluntary sector is also innovating in that respect, but I have no time to elaborate on that now.

We must avoid introducing any compulsion in the voluntary sector. I support hon. Members' comments about the need to preserve the sector's independence, to protect independent management committees and to ensure that the majority of members of those committees are volunteers. We should not allow professionals to run voluntary bodies while volunteers are simply told what to do. We must ensure that volunteers participate in running the bodies for which they work.

I will finish with a thought from the recent visit to Canada of the Select Committee on Environmental Audit. My attention was drawn to a headline that called for the introduction of "compulsory volunteerism". I am sure that we would not recognise that in this country. I accept that many good ideas come from north America, but I think that the voluntary sector will reject any ideas of communitarianism or forcing people to volunteer, which are floating around on the outskirts.

Preserving the independence of the voluntary sector so that it can respond flexibly to society's needs is a key task that the Government must bear in mind in formulating all their policies. If the Government can preserve the sector's ability to be independent and to criticise Governments, as well as work with them, without being penalised, they will support the voluntary sector well.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): I welcome the debate and I apologise for my sporadic attendance. It is not easy to operate in Committee and in Westminster Hall at the same time and I hope that hon. Members will be understanding. However, I may have to spoil the party. Presumably, the debate was initiated to celebrate national volunteering week, but I wonder whether it was sheer coincidence that the Labour leader was invited to address the Women's Institute with a speech that also concerned volunteering.

I do not see the rosy volunteering situation that the Minister described. Parliament is now organised in such a way that hon. Members are invited to receptions morning, noon and night. The attendance of a photographer is arranged, our photographs are sent to our local papers and we are given badges of the particular organisation to wear. Such arrangements are attractive to Members of Parliament. I am wearing the green "Full Stop" badge of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and I have about three more in my pocket.

I applaud all such initiatives. It is good for Members to be associated with voluntary organisations, but what are we doing to help them? One or two hon. Members mentioned the largesse that they enjoy, but they are certainly not enjoying it in my constituency. I volunteer with the Women's Royal Voluntary Service and Barnardos and I wish to use the debate as an opportunity to celebrate voluntary organisations in my constituency. They are finding it tough to survive.

Some hon. Members made an important point about the difficulty of attracting young people into voluntary work. I received an excellent briefing—I had not asked for it in advance—from the Central Council of Physical Recreation, which talks about "taxes" on volunteering in sport. It cites criminal record checks under the Police

[Mr. David Amess]

Act 1997 as a great burden. The briefing singles out other burdens such as the Transport Bill, the uniform business rate, the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, the national minimum wage, the climate change levy and so forth. That unsolicited briefing, which focuses on young people, highlights the difficulties created by the Government's taxation policies. When Southend was under the control of the dreadful Liberal-Labour coalition, many of our voluntary organisations had their grants cut. Thank goodness, after the first Thursday in May, all the cuts were restored and voluntary organisations are being encouraged again.

We can all make speeches about how marvellous volunteers are and how much we are associated with them, but it is what we do that counts. Society under the present Government is facing such difficulties that, if it were not for voluntary organisations, it would be in a state of collapse. Many people out there simply do not understand what voluntary organisations are about. I shall never forget meeting someone at a football match who spoke about the St. John Ambulance service as if it were a paid organisation. Thank goodness, St. John Ambulance people were there and they helped with several incidents at the match, saving the taxpayer a great deal of money.

I am wearing the badge of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Locally, it raised more than £50,000. It provided services for risk management of dangerous adults, helped abused children, worked with children and young people who demonstrated sexually abusive behaviour, helped families to understand why abuse happens and how it affects children, offered counselling and therapy for children recovering from abuse, and provided much needed help to prepare and support children and young people giving evidence in criminal proceedings. The NSPCC is doing all of that—it must save us huge amounts of money—but we take it for granted.

What encouragement are we giving the NSPCC? I am wearing its green badge, but I doubt whether that will go far. I am happy to work with the Government if they have any ideas about how to help that organisation. In my area, it manages a helpline for 88 abused children a week. Last year, it answered 2,134 calls. My local NSPCC branch, under Mrs. Betty Finch, should certainly be congratulated.

I am attached to the WRVS and spent Monday at Southend hospital. We all know about the meals-on-wheels service, but I wonder if we all appreciate that volunteers man retail outlets in the hospital entrance. I talked to the ladies about why they had become involved and I was deeply moved.

Many voluntary services are run by people who are involved with the particular problem that the organisation aims to help. We all understand that the Arthritic Association, for example, tends to use people who suffer from arthritis. However, the WRVS is a wonderful organisation of highly intelligent women. It made me so angry when, after a recent speech, people made disparaging remarks about the women in the WI, saying that they were good only for knitting and making jam—it is a pity that others cannot knit or make jam. To dismiss these ladies with such remarks just because they do not want to listen to politics is extremely distasteful.

The WRVS has more than 115,000 members and needs more volunteers. On Monday, it told me that most members are in their 60s, 70s and 80s and asked where the youngsters were coming from. If the Minister has any ideas on how we might boost numbers in the WRVS, I should be delighted to work with him on that. It offers a wide range of care packages—more than 1,100 social clubs for the elderly, 323 trolley services in residential homes, 94 contact centres where children can meet absent parents in a safe environment, toy libraries, prison visit centres and books-on-wheels services. In Southend, the WRVS distributed more than 4 million meals on wheels last year, raised £50,000 for Southend General hospital and helped out when the aircraft was hijacked at Stansted.

As for the Women's Institute, we should be in no doubt about the fact that it did not invite the leader of the Labour party to address its members. He arranged it and it went down like a lead balloon.

Mr. Michael: The hon. Gentleman acknowledged that he has attended intermittently this afternoon. Does he realise how much like a lead balloon is his contribution? Up to now, the debate has consisted of people speaking from experience—not just placements, but long-term involvement with the voluntary sector and its crucial role in our lives. I suggest that he wind up his lead balloon.

Mr. Amess: I am sorry, but this Parliament is democratically elected and I am not going to be patronised by the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Michael: Yes, you are.

Mr. Amess: No, I am not going to accept the right hon. Gentleman's admonishment. I was sent here to represent my constituents and to share my views with others. The fact that the right hon. Gentleman does not like my message says more about him and the Labour party than it does about me and my contribution to the debate. We know how today's Labour party is run: it cannot stand an alternative point of view.

I feel so strongly because I find that many voluntary organisations are struggling and I want to know what the Government will do to help them. The Salvation Army in Southend is magnificent; it has two wonderful centres and an eventide home providing care for 34 elderly people. It raises a huge amount of money locally, for which I pay tribute.

Barnardos is a substantial organisation. It works with more than 47,000 children and young people each year and has 250,000 volunteers. We all know about its work with less fortunate children. In my constituency, about 350 fund-raising volunteers give up their time—it ranges from four hours a year to several days a week. They help with house-to-house charity collections, distribute and sell lottery tickets, and collect and bank envelopes. There are two Barnardos shops, which rely heavily on their 32 volunteers, who lend their assistance with everything from window-dressing to administrative work.

During my time as a Member of Parliament, I have been associated with three hospices: St. Luke's, Little Haven and Fair Haven. St. Luke's hospice is one of the most inspiring voluntary organisations that I have had the privilege to see. An extraordinary lady called Trudy Cox shared her dream with us. I walked away from our initial meeting thinking that I had heard it all before, but she sacrificed everything and her dream is still there today in the form of St. Luke's hospice. The Little Haven hospice in Southend, West serves children from a wide area of Essex, and the Fair Haven hospice is round the corner from where I live. It also looks after a huge number of people.

Sadly, because the hospice movement has funding difficulties, we are having to redouble our efforts. Indeed, my wife suggested that we set about raising extra funds for those two hospices and that is what we shall do during the summer.

The South East Essex Advocacy for Older People in my constituency is an independent citizen and crisis advocacy service for all those aged over 60 who live in south-east Essex. It has some 23 trained volunteers, who work on a one-to-one basis with individual elderly people with problems. Again, it had enormous problems of lack of funding and support from the previous council and I hope that we will be able to tackle those problems soon.

We also have Southend Mencap. Last week or the week before, there was a mental health lobby of the House, when our constituents shared their problems with us. Besides its paid staff, Southend Mencap has more than 125 local volunteers, who help at sports clubs for the learning disabled, drive minibuses, man shops, befriend disabled people, act as advocates, fund raise and carry out other services.

I have the honour to be the president of the Southend branch of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, which is another excellent organisation. It helps people who love and care for animals and who witness all sorts of cruelty. There are more than 200 branches in this country, which are run by 16,000 active volunteers and 330,000 regular supporters. Without them, I dread to think of the suffering that animals would face.

Then there is the diabetes organisation, Diabetes UK. Yesterday, we were invited to a reception in the House and I make no criticism of that. The fact that Harry Secombe made the effort to be at that reception with hon. Members despite his health problems, shows how strongly he feels about that organisation. In my constituency, more than 40 members of the diabetes club help to serve and educate people who are diabetic or potentially diabetic.

The list is endless. We also have the Friends of Southend Hospital and Neighbourhood Watch—all sorts of voluntary organisations. I am the joint chairman of the all-party group on the Scout Association. Scouts and guides make a huge contribution to our national life and very concerned about the Criminal Records Bureau charges. They have told me that the Minister who is responding to the debate has suggested that, > providing free checks would be an unsustainable burden on the public purse.

The Scout Association's view is that,

> If the costs are seen as unsustainable by Government, then it is hard to see how they could be sustainable by a charitable voluntary organisation.

I stress that those are not my words but those of the Scout Association. If the Minister finds them offensive, he must argue with his hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Pound), the joint chairman of the all-party group, who shares my views, the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Hope), who was here earlier and the previous Speaker of the House of Commons, Lord Weatherill, who also feels strongly about the charges on voluntary organisations such as the scouts.

I am pleased that we have had this debate, because too often we—by that, I mean, "we"—pay lip service to the work of our voluntary organisations, which are under increasing strain to sustain their activities. I simply ask the Government to reflect on their approach to such organisations, because in my constituency I have seen no tangible benefit from Government funds. If the Minister can correct me, I shall be delighted to be corrected, but I hope that he and his colleagues will do all that they can to encourage as many people as possible to join voluntary organisations in my constituency and others.

5.04 pm

Mr. Boateng: We have had an excellent debate, with one exception. It must be said that the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) warned us that he intended to spoil the party, and he did. However, he did most damage to his own party. His comments were in no way representative of the tone employed by the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), who led for the Conservative party. Perhaps they were performing a Mr. Nice and Mr. Nasty routine—if so, they were true to character.

I was deeply disappointed by the speech of the hon. Member for Southend, West, which could have contained so much more. It consisted of a list of excellent organisations in his constituency, interspersed with bile and balefulness. His points could have been made without adopting that tone and he would have done better not to have bothered with the difficulties, as he described them, of traversing between the Committee Corridor and Westminster Hall. When he recognised that the game was up in his previous constituency, he had no difficulty traversing the short space between Basildon and Southend, West, for reasons that he has made balefully obvious. However, let us put the hon. Gentleman's speech to one side and concentrate on the subject and the other, excellent speeches made this afternoon.

The debate reflected not only the diversity of the sector, but the complexity of some of the challenges that it must meet. One of the most complex is core funding—as opposed to project funding—which was raised by the hon. Members for Aylesbury and for Taunton (Jackie Ballard) and with which my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) has had to wrestle. We must not lose sight of the importance of project funding, which enables partnerships to develop between central Government, local government and the voluntary sector. Those partnerships build on the capacity for innovation and risk taking that is central to the voluntary sector's contribution to the development of many policy areas, to which all right hon. and hon. Members referred this afternoon. We must not lose sight of the importance of that, and the importance to it of project funding.

[Mr. Boateng]

Section 64 funding of the Department of Health, with which I am familiar, is central to the effectiveness of that funding stream. It encourages new organisations and new ideas to enter the arena of public policy and practice development by funding research into, and evaluation of, innovative projects. We cannot afford to lose that, but at the same time it is undoubtedly true that the process that began and accelerated under the previous Administration—of central and local government backing away from core funding—has imposed considerable strains on the sector. That is because, while one can approach a variety of sources such as trusts and businesses as well as the Government for project funding, one cannot whip up the same degree of enthusiasm from business and other charitable sources in relation to core funding. That is the experience of the voluntary sector and it has created a problem that necessitates the Government revisiting the issue of core funding.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth has been described as the "author" of the compact. I prefer to describe him as its grandfather. In his initial work in this area, he wisely required central Government and the voluntary sector to meet once a year to review the operation of the compact. He was absolutely right to do so. That gives everyone the opportunity to take stock as to where they are going, find out what the problems are, ascertain which ones have been overcome, and find out what messages the developing relationship in the compact has delivered.

That annual meeting took place a few weeks ago and I am happy to share with the Chamber that we agreed there that the time had come to revisit the issue of core funding, precisely for the reasons that right hon. and hon. Members touched on today. We shall have to get the balance right; we have not got it right at the moment. It is not easy, because resources are always limited, but we cannot allow the infrastructure of the voluntary sector to be degraded by an absence of core funding. If we do, we shall be defeating the very purposes that we are seeking to encourage and develop by project funding.

I welcome the developing consensus across the Chamber on this issue. We must build on that and develop it in the coming year. I share my right hon. Friend's hope that we shall have regular debates on the voluntary sector. This Chamber provides a good venue for that. I hope to be able to report some progress in this troubled but significant area a year hence, after the next revisiting of the compact.

We touched on several other issues that have been of concern to the sector. I intend to take up some of them with hon. Members in correspondence. However, it is right that I deal with the issue raised in connection with the Criminal Records Bureau now. It has given me, as well as others in government and the voluntary sector, considerable cause for reflection as to how best to get it right. We believe that we have done so, but I am able to reaffirm that before making any regulations prescribing such matters as fees to be charged by the bureau, we shall carry out the regulatory impact assessment mentioned earlier. It will be carried out in consultation with the relevant bodies, including representatives from voluntary organisations and the scouts and guides, and it will provide a thorough and up-to-date assessment of the risks, costs and benefits of our proposals. Many figures are flying around, but some of those that have been contributed to the debate by the voluntary sector are questionable. That assessment will give us a better idea of the costs of the various certificates.

The cost of the enhanced criminal record certificate is likely to be around £10 and the other certificates are likely to cost around £5 or £6. However, attaining the certificates will not be mandatory—organisations will decide on the need to check volunteers and grant-funding bodies will decide whether to reimburse that cost—and not every volunteer who works in a particular sector will need a certificate, or one of the level of the enhanced criminal record certificate. For example, someone who takes a troop of scouts or guides away for a residential camp is in a different position to a volunteer who works at a Wednesday night meeting in a church hall. Parents rightly have different expectations in that regard. I shall not try to second guess the decisions that the scout movement will come to about the levels of certificate that it will require of its volunteers, but we should not proceed on the basis that the enhanced criminal record certificate will always be required.

Mr. Lidington: I welcome the Minister's statement reaffirming that a full impact assessment will be carried out before regulations are laid. As part of that assessment, will he undertake to examine the definition of substantial unsupervised access? The way in which that notion is interpreted by voluntary organisations and their insurance companies will have a significant bearing on his point about the distinction between a person who accompanies a scout or guide group on a camp and someone who turns up at a meeting on a Wednesday night at which other adults are present. The same principle bites on the operation of Sunday schools.

Mr. Boateng: That is one of the issues that we shall need to thrash out with the voluntary sector and child protection organisations. We should not forget that the voluntary sector will benefit from the existence of the CRB, which has long called for precisely the measures that we are taking. It recognises the risks that are posed by those who have preyed on children and young people—my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth and I had to deal with many such tragic cases in the Home Office. Such people use voluntary sector organisations as a cover for their activity. Their guile, evil and capacity for deceit beggars belief. Organisations that they have used as a cover and children and young people, who will be better protected, will benefit from the fact that we are making life more difficult for those people and making it easier to expose their activities.

No one should underestimate the extent to which we are responding to a widely perceived need. I am the first to recognise that, in doing so, we must work in a way that takes the voluntary sector with us and does not actively deter volunteers. The biggest deterrent to volunteers is not the fact that they might have to pay up to £10 for a certificate, but the fact that we now live in a society where this evil has taken such a root that people are afraid to volunteer for some forms of work with children and young people because they are afraid of what people may say about them. That is the depth to which our society has degenerated and we have to draw it back from that abyss. If that means adopting the CRB proposal, I think that that is a price well worth paying, as will the overwhelming majority of our fellow citizens, people who work in, and love, the voluntary movement and everyone in this Chamber.

This has been a good debate. I shall write to right hon. and hon. Members who have made specific points. Anyone who attended the debate, or reads our proceedings, will glean from it the richness and diversity of the sector and of the experience that can be gained from working within it as a volunteer, the extent to which it contributes—not only in terms of monetary value—towards our society and, above all, the way in which it binds together, in a way that promotes cohesion and sustainability, groups of individuals into the communities that make up society as a whole.

Volunteers make society stronger and healthier, which is why we celebrate their work here today. We also rededicate ourselves, and our institutions of Parliament and Government, to continuing to work alongside them towards the common objective of a strong, safe, sustainable and sustaining society.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-three minutes past Five o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 5 June 2000

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Internal Mailbags

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee what the total cost was of the recent replacement of the House of Commons's internal mailbags; and for what reasons the former mailbags were replaced. [124179]

Mrs. Roe: This is a matter for the Serjeant at Arms, I have asked him to reply to the hon. Member.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the President of the Council on how many occasions since 31 March 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124121]

Mrs. Beckett: During the period 31 March 1999 to the end of March 2000, Special Advisers in this Department travelled overseas on one occasion.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Human Rights

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will set out the response of the Government to concerns over human rights protection in the UK identified by the UN Special Rapporteur on the Independence of the Judiciary in his report to the April 2000 session of the UN Human Rights Commission; and if he will place the relevant documentation in the Library. [121868]

Mr. Mandelson: The UN Special Rapporteur's oral statement to the 56th session of the UN Commission on Human Rights focused on Northern Ireland and therefore my hon. Friend's question has been passed to this Department.

A copy of the UN Special Rapporteur's oral statement is now available on the Internet at www.unhchr.ch.

The UK Government's response will be placed in the House of Commons Library once it has been completed.

Military Complaints Procedures

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he plans to lay before Parliament Mr. Jim McDonald's annual report as Independent Assessor of Military Complaints Procedures in Northern Ireland. [124534]

Mr. Ingram: Mr. McDonald's report is being published today and copies are being placed in the Library.

I note that Mr. McDonald has said that the military authorities have continued to respond constructively to his independently developed assessment of their role in the complaints system, and that the renewed priority given to training in the specific areas of complaint handling and complaint avoidance produced good results in 1999.

The Report of the Independent Assessor continues to provide valuable reassurances to both Government and the public that the army's complaints procedures stand scrutiny. The Government attach importance to this role and its statutory basis is to be continued through the Terrorism Bill, currently before the House of Lords.

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he will publish the report by Mr. J. J. Rowe QC on the operation during 1999 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996. [124533]

Mr. Ingram: Mr. Rowe's Report is being published today and copies are being placed in the Library.

Mr. Rowe recommends the continuance of the EPA powers.

A continuance Order has been laid to continue in force the EPA until 24 August, the date on which the Act will expire.

Before 24 August, the EPA will be replaced by the Terrorism Bill, currently before the House of Lords.

Under the Terrorism Bill, temporary emergency provisions for Northern Ireland will be set in the context of permanent UK-wide counter-terrorism powers.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions since 31 March 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124116]

Mr. Mandelson: During the period 31 March 1999 to the end of March 2000, Special Advisers in this Department travelled overseas on one occasion.

There has been no Special Adviser in post since my appointment on 11 October 1999.

DEFENCE

Regular Army

18. Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the net inflow was into the Regular Army in the last financial year. [122657]

Mr. Spellar: In the financial year just ended, there was a net inflow of 175 in the trained strength of the Regular Army. This is the first time since 1986 that there has been such an inflow, which represents a significant and welcome improvement.

Zimbabwe

19. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on British military involvement in Zimbabwe. [122658]

Mr. Spellar: Nine British Army and two RAF UK military personnel currently serve in Zimbabwe as part of the British Military Advisory and Training Team (BMATT) Southern Africa. The BMATT's main role is to provide regional peacekeeping training in countries throughout the Southern Africa region. We are keeping the situation under review.

In addition, two Army personnel, the UK Defence Adviser and his assistant, provide advice to the British High Commissioner in Harare on defence issues.

Joint Force 2000

20. Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in establishing the Joint Force 2000. [122659]

Mr. Hoon: I am pleased to confirm that Joint Force Harrier was formed, under the command of Rear Admiral Iain Henderson, on 1 April this year. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces had the pleasure of attending the launch ceremonies at RAF Strike Command and RAF Wittering on 31 March.

Joint Force Harrier combines the Royal Navy's Sea Harrier and RAF Harrier squadrons in a single force which is able to operate from land bases or carriers, as the recent operation off Sierra Leone has demonstrated. In 2003 both fleets will be co-located at RAF Cottesmore and RAF Wittering to fully realise the significant operational benefits that the creation of Joint Force Harrier will bring.

Iraq

22. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many sorties RAF personnel made in patrolling no-fly zones in northern and southern Iraq in the last year. [122661]

Mr. Spellar: Between April 1999 and March 2000 RAF aircraft flew a total of 2,683 sorties in the no-fly zones; 450 in the Northern no-fly zone and 2,233 in the Southern no-fly zone.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 10 April 2000, Official Report, column 19W, on Iraq, what role tanks play in the Iraqi Integrated Air Defence System. [120804]

Mr. Hoon: Iraqi Main Battle Tanks play no part in the Iraqi Integrated Air Defence System.

Radioactive Materials

23. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on the destruction of radioactive materials held by his Department. [122662]

Dr. Moonie: The primary legislation controlling the holding and disposal of radioactive materials is the Radioactive Substances Act 1993 and its associated Exemption Orders. Although the Act does not apply to Ministry of Defence activities, my Department's policy is to apply standards and arrangements which, so far as is reasonably practicable, are at least as good as those required by the Act. This policy is promulgated in the Departmental Environmental Manual, Joint Services Publication 418, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Vacant Homes (Hendon)

24. Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of his Department's former homes in Hendon are vacant; and if he will make a statement. [122663]

Dr. Moonie: We have sold former married quarters in Hendon to the Notting Hill Housing Trust and in Mill Hill to Annington Homes as part of the sale of all married quarters in England and Wales in 1996. We do not know how many of these are empty once they are no longer our responsibility.

Nuclear Proliferation

25. Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with Foreign Office Ministers about the proposals by the New Agenda Coalition to the current nuclear proliferation treaty review conference. [122664]

Mr. Hoon: I have kept closely in touch with the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), during the course of the Review Conference.

AWE Aldermaston

26. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with the Environment Agency following the decision to refer for judicial review the activities carried out at AWE Aldermaston. [122665]

Mr. Spellar: Ministers have had no discussions with the Environment Agency on this matter since the EA granted a licence to AWE plc to operate at Aldermaston. However, officials of the Ministry of Defence and of the Environment Agency hold regular discussions as part of the normal course of business and these have included the judicial review of the Environment Agency's recent discharge authorisations for the Aldermaston site.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of procedures adopted by the private operators of the Aldermaston site to give his Department temporary ownership of radioactive substances; and if he will make a statement. [122573]

Mr. Spellar: I presume that the question refers to erroneous reports that the Ministry of Defence sought to avoid public scrutiny of measures to dispose of some slightly radioactive material at its DERA Shoeburyness site. In fact, the transfer of material was carried out only after the Environment Agency (EA), following a period for consultation with local authorities, had granted approval on the basis that the environmental impact of disposal in this fashion is minimal. The material in question is conventional high explosive removed from obsolete nuclear weapons, dismantled by the Atomic Weapons Establishment, and only contains small traces of radioactive tritium. The EA provides independent monitoring at the Shoeburyness facility to ensure that there is no risk to staff or the public from these activities.

Kosovo (NATO Ordnance)

27. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of how much NATO ordnance was (a) directed against imposter targets and (b) dumped unexploded in the Adriatic as a result of bad weather during the war in Kosovo. [122666]

Mr. Spellar: NATO's assessment of the air campaign was made public by the then Supreme Allied Commander Europe, General Wesley Clark, in September last year. It is the most comprehensive assessment undertaken and is explained in detail on NATO's website www.nato.int/kosovo/press/p990916a.htm. The Ministry of Defence has not undertaken a separate assessment of how much NATO ordnance was directed against decoy or imposter targets.

It would not be appropriate to comment on behalf of other nations, but no UK aircraft dropped ordnance in the Adriatic during the campaign.

Training

28. Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the number of opportunities for training with live ammunition in each of the last five years. [122667]

Mr. Spellar: Service personnel are trained, individually and collectively, in all aspects of their roles, and live firing of weapons is one element of a balanced training programme which is subject to the constraints of time, money and infrastructure. The opportunities available to military personnel to train with live ammunition vary according to the specialisation of the individual concerned, and also according to the operational role of the formed unit to which that individual belongs. Because most live firing is carried out at unit level, the information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Territorial Army (Balkans)

29. Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the role of Territorial Army soldiers serving in the Balkans. [122668]

Mr. Spellar: A total of 3,975 Territorial Army soldiers have been mobilised for duty in the Balkans since December 1995. Their role has been to provide individual reinforcements with a variety of skills to Regular Units on operational tours, and fill a number of staff appointments in the various Headquarters in the Balkans.

Sierra Leone

30. Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the use of United Kingdom forces in Sierra Leone. [122669]

Mr. Hoon: United Kingdom Forces deployed to Sierra Leone in early May have done an excellent job. They deployed to get UK nationals out and, in securing the airport at Lungi, they were able to help UNAMSIL while reinforcements flew in. The operation has been a success: hundreds of UK nationals were evacuated; thousands of UN reinforcements have flown in. The arrival of capable, well-equipped reinforcements has helped create a much more stable and secure environment than when UK forces arrived. We expect to be able to have withdrawn the bulk of our troops from Sierra Leone by mid-June. We will, however, continue to provide UK military observers to UNAMSIL and training and advice to the Government of Sierra Leone, as part of our wider programme of assistance.

35. Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects British Forces to leave Sierra Leone. [122674]

Mr. Hoon: We expect the bulk of British forces deployed to Sierra Leone, including 42 Commando, to leave by mid-June. We will, however, continue to provide UK military advice and training in accordance with our wider programme of assistance to the Government of Sierra Leone. We will also continue to work with UNAMSIL.

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his oral statement of 23 May 2000, Official Report, columns 863–65, concerning Sierra Leone, what United Kingdom weapons and ammunition will be issued to any military organisation other than the Sierra Leone army; and how the distribution of such arms will be controlled and monitored. [124055]

Mr. Hoon: Light weapons and ammunition will be distributed to Government of Sierra Leone Armed Forces only. Their distribution will be overseen by UK military personnel in Sierra Leone. We have received firm assurances from President Kabbah that they will only be used by regular Sierra Leone soldiers in accordance with international humanitarian law and human rights standards.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the deployment of British forces in the area of Sierra Leone. [123714]

Mr. Hoon: I refer my right hon. Friend to the statement I gave to the House on 23 May 2000, Official Report, columns 863–74.

RAF (Fast Jet Pilots)

31. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Fast Jet pilots there are in the RAF according to (a) establishment level and (b) actual manning level; and what the percentage shortfall is. [122670]

Mr. Spellar: The position on 1 April 2000, the latest date that figures are available, was as follows:

Number of Fast Jet pilots in RAF

	Requirement[1]	Trained strength	Deficit	Percentage shortfall
All ranks	882	846	36	4.1
Junior Officer Pilot[2]	550	452	98	17.8

[1] Includes non-flying posts for which aircrew experience and knowledge are required. The majority of these non-flying posts require senior officers.

[2] Flight Lieutenant (and Squadron Leader specialist aircrew) and below included in all ranks total. This is the RAF's most critical manning category.

Royal Navy Frigates

33. Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Navy frigates are operationally available. [122672]

Mr. Spellar: 27 Royal Naval Frigates are currently operationally available. The remainder are in extended maintenance or refit.

Peacekeeping

34. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes there have been in the peacekeeping role of United Kingdom forces in the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [122673]

Mr. Spellar: The peacekeeping role of UK forces was set out in the Strategic Defence Review. There has been no change to that role in the last three years. As my hon. Friend will be aware, UK forces have been engaged in a number of peacekeeping and other peace support operations in the Balkans and elsewhere in that period.

The prevention, containment and resolution of conflict is a vital element in the maintenance of international stability and security to which this Government are committed. UK forces will therefore continue to make an appropriate contribution, in concert with others, to both peacekeeping and other peace support operations.

Smart Procurement

36. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what savings have been identified as a result of the Smart Procurement Initiative. [122675]

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what savings have been identified as a result of the Smart Procurement Initiative. [122656]

Dr. Moonie: As part of the Strategic Defence Review we set ourselves a target of saving £2 billion on equipment procurement expenditure over the 10 years to 2007–08 through the introduction of Smart Procurement. We are on track to achieve that target, in that the sum of cost reductions identified and made in successive planning rounds is approaching the £2 billion mark and, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's announcement last month on the Strategic Air Lift and future missile for the Eurofighter aptly demonstrates, we are delivering the programme set out in the Strategic Defence Review.

BVRAAM

37. Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the beyond visual range air-to-air missile. [122676]

Mr. Hoon: I announced on 16 May the Government's intention to procure the METEOR missile, offered by a consortium led by Matra BAe Dynamics, as the beyond visual range air-to-air missile for the Eurofighter aircraft. Our decision will give the RAF the most advanced air to air missile in the world, and will ensure that Eurofighter can combat all projected air to air threats well into its service life.

Surplus Assets (Disposal)

38. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress in achieving the target for disposal of surplus assets contained in the Strategic Defence Review. [122677]

Dr. Moonie: The Strategic Defence review set a £700 million target for gross receipts from the sale of surplus property assets over the period 1998–99 to 2001–02. In 1998–99 £158 million was achieved, with a further £286.5 million being realised in 1999–2000

The Defence Logistics Organisation (DLO) was set a target to reduce the book value of spares holdings by 20 per cent., and is on target to meet this by April 2001.

Kosovo

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the security situation in Kosovo. [122648]

Mr. Spellar: I refer my hon. Friend to the oral answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), Official Report, columns 16–17.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met his colleagues from other NATO member states to discuss the deployment of military forces in Kosovo. [122660]

Mr. Spellar: The situation in Kosovo has been a major subject for discussion among NATO Defence Ministers since the crisis began. The Secretary of State and other Ministers meet colleagues from NATO and other countries regularly on both a bilateral and multilateral basis. The topics for discussion range widely.

The next formal meeting of NATO Defence Ministers is on 8 and 9 June, at which he will discuss a wide range of issues including Kosovo.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of available stocks of (a) precision guided munitions and (c) non-precision guided munitions were used during operation Allied Force. [124316]

Mr. Spellar: The numbers of munitions used during Operation Allied Force were published by the Ministry of Defence last year, in my right hon. Friend, the then Secretary of State, Lord Robertson's account of the Kosovo crisis. Details of the percentage of our stockpile this expenditure represented would assist a potential adversary to assess our operational capability. I am therefore withholding this information in accordance with exemption 1 (Defence, Security and International Relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Medal Awards (Suez)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received calling for the award of a medal for those who served in the Suez Canal zone in the early 1950s. [122671]

Dr. Moonie: Since this Government took office, the Ministry of Defence has received three written Parliamentary Questions calling for the award of a medal for service in the Suez Canal Zone in the early 1950s. We have also received 229 Parliamentary Inquiries from 175 hon. Members, and my officials have dealt with 164 letters from 71 members of the public. Five Early Day Motions have been tabled. In March 1998, my predecessor held a meeting with a delegation of veterans at which he was handed a petition containing some 20,000 names, and in March this year, I held a meeting with two hon. Members with an interest in this subject.

Multipart Tender

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the tender submitted by Multipart, Chorley, for the stock and supply of spare parts for the armed forces. [122678]

Dr. Moonie: Multipart, through an appropriate competitive tendering process, have been appointed the 'service provider' to Vickers Defence Systems (VDS) for the provision, procurement, storage and distribution of Challenger 2 specific consumable spares (Project CRISP). A decision on whether Project CRISP will proceed is expected in late June.

Demining Assistance (Libya)

Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent assistance has been provided to the Government of Libya for humanitarian demining; and if he will make a statement. [124560]

Mr. Spellar: None.

Warships

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many warships have been (a) ordered, (b) laid down, (c) launched and (d) commissioned since 1 May 1997. [122821]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Christopher Gill, dated 5 June 2000:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about the construction of warships since 1 May 1997. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

Since 1 May 1997 no warships have been ordered. In the same period, (that is from 1 May 1997) 10 warships have been laid down, 8 launched and 7 commissioned. A list of these vessels by category is attached. More detailed information on the relevant vessels can be obtained from "Jane's Fighting Ships", a copy of which is held in the House of Commons Library.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many staff from his Department were seconded to private sector companies in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to April 2000; and if he will list in each case the companies to which staff were sent, the names and ranks of the staff involved and the duration of the secondment. [123428]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 24 May 2000]: Information, by financial year, on personnel on secondment to the private sector from my Department is as follows.

Special Investigations Branch

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many investigations have been conducted by the Special Investigations Branch of the Royal Military Police in the past two years; how many and what percentage of investigations have led to disciplinary charges being laid against (a) serving and (b) discharged soldiers; what was the breakdown of those cases by outcome; what was the average time taken to conduct an investigation from complaint to report; who is tasked with responding to a report of the Special Investigations Branch; and what options are available for further action to be taken. [123886]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is as detailed:

(a) In the calendar years 1998 and 1999, the Special Investigations Branch began investigating a total of 3,002 cases world-wide of which 264 are ongoing.

(b) A total of 1,175 persons have been reported for offences to date. Of these:

(i) 1,150 were serving soldiers (records are not held centrally on how many were discharged at the time of the investigation); and

(ii) 25 were civilians subject to military law.

(c) Of the total number of cases investigated:

(i) 876 were resolved;

(ii) in 543 cases, no crime was established;

(iii) 216 remain unsolved;

(iv) 264 are ongoing; and

(v) 1,103 were inquiries in assistance to Home Department Forces.

(d) The average time taken to conduct an investigation from complaint to Report is 62 days.

(e) It is a matter for the Commanding Officer of the reported person to act upon the findings of the SIB investigation, having taken advice from the appropriate Legal adviser.

(f) A Commanding Officer may dismiss charges, deal with them summarily, refer the matter to higher authority, or remand the accused for trial by Court Martial. A Regimental Board Of Inquiry may also be ordered.

Property Disposals

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what guidance he gives to the Defence Housing Executive and Defence Estates concerning the disposal of surplus housing stock. [123873]

Dr. Moonie: The Defence Housing Executive is required to dispose of as much surplus housing stock as is compatible with meeting its principle function of providing housing for entitled and eligible Service personnel and their families at their place of work.

The bulk of Service families accommodation (SFA) in England and Wales was sold to Annington Homes Ltd. (AHL) in 1996. The Ministry of Defence leases back those properties it needs to house Service families. Properties which become surplus to military requirements are handed back to AHL for disposal.

Surplus housing which does not form part of the underlease with AHL, including all that in Scotland, is dealt with by Defence Estates (DE) in accordance with Chapter 32 of Government Accounting.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many MOD properties in Scotland are used for civilian and irregular occupancies; and how many such properties he expects to be disposed of in the next three years. [123914]

Dr. Moonie: Of the total number of 5,728 Service Families Accommodation (SFA) held by the Ministry of Defence in Scotland, 51 are occupied by Irregular Occupants and 136 are let to MOD and other non-entitled civilians. There is no intention to dispose of these properties at present although plans continue to evolve in the light of developing demand and it is possible that such properties may be included in those identified for disposal during the next three years.

A further 173 properties are let to housing associations. Negotiations are continuing for the disposal of 118 let properties at Helensburgh and it is hoped these will be completed within three months. The remaining 55 let properties at Forres have been handed over to Defence Estates for disposal.

MODDEC

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to place the MODDEC contract via the Buying Agency. [123587]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 25 May 2000]: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

HMS Kent

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate HMS Kent's annual cost for (a) fuel, (b) wages, (c) maintenance, (d) general supplies and (e) other outlays; and if he will make a statement. [123960]

Mr. Spellar: The Type 23 Frigate HMS Kent, becomes fully operational at the end of the year; her annual operating costs will depend on her future tasking and the maintenance she requires. The indicative annual cost for a Type 23 Frigate, including manpower, fuel, stores and routine maintenance is in the region of £17 million.

Forms

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123951]

Dr. Moonie: To the best of my knowledge, the Ministry of Defence has no requirement to issue any forms for completion by charities and other voluntary organisations in relation to their charitable functions. However, the Department purchases services from a number of charities, and some forms may need to be completed, for example for invoicing purposes.

Northern Ireland

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the most recent mission statement is of the Army in Northern Ireland. [124101]

Mr. Hoon: The Army's mission in Northern Ireland is to support the Royal Ulster Constabulary in the defeat of terrorism in order to assist Her Majesty's Government's objective of restoring normality.

AWE Llanishen

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 18 May 2000, Official Report, column 204W, on AWE Llanishen, if, when the site is free from contamination, it will be suitable for (a) housing and (b) light industry development; and on what basis he expects the site to be free from contamination by autumn next year. [123781]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 25 May 2000]: Further advice indicates that, while the decommissioning and demolition of buildings is expected to be completed by October 2001, further remedial action will be required on the land. A decision has yet to be made on the future development of the site and it is this which will determine the level of remediation which will be required. The site is expected to be available for redevelopment by the middle of 2002.

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123733]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 25 May 2000]: Eight laptop computers belonging to the Ministry of Defence (including the armed forces) are recorded as having been lost since May 1997, and 59 as having been stolen.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will reply to the question tabled by the hon. Member for Ludlow on 16 May concerning warships (Ref. 122821). [124484]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Christopher Gill, dated 5 June 2000:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence which asked when he would answer your question (Ref. 122821) about warship construction. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

I have written to you today in answer to your earlier question.—Official Report, columns 9–10W.

Northern Ireland Troops

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many troops there were at each garrison in Northern Ireland in (a) 1999, (b) 2000 and (c) 2001. [123964]

Mr. Spellar: The information required is set out in the table. In addition, we have also included Royal Navy and Royal Air Force personnel based in Northern Ireland.

	30 April 1999	Strength as at 30 April 2000
Belfast Garrison[2]	6,591	5,812
Northern Garrison	3,390	3,406
Southern Garrison	3,537	3,437
Royal Air Force	1,150	1,144
Royal Navy	182	179
Total	14,850	13,978

[1] Excludes those forces fully committed to Northern Ireland but rear based in GB.
[2] A number of Force Troop units reside within the Belfast Garrison geographical area but are often called upon to support units within the other garrison areas.

The number of Armed Forces deployed in Northern Ireland in 2001 will depend on the security situation. While we hope the recent momentum in the peace process will be sustained, it is not possible to predict the numbers of Armed Forces that will be stationed in Northern Ireland next year.

Pay-as-you-dine Contracts

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress towards the implementation of the pay-as-you-dine contractorisation of junior mess halls. [123965]

Mr. Spellar: The Pay-As-You-Dine Project Team is currently producing an outline business case for consideration by the Project Board at the end of July 2000. If approval to proceed is given, an announcement will be placed in the Official Journal of the European Communities informing industry of the Department's intention to commence the PAYD procurement process. Dependent upon industry's response, I anticipate that a full Business Case will be submitted to the Equipment Approvals Committee in mid-2001, leading to Invitations to Negotiate for the provision of the PAYD cashless payment system and catering services. While there remain significant procurement strategy issues to be addressed, contracts should be awarded in mid-2003 with the aim of commencing a pilot phase towards the end of that year. The pilot phase will effectively represent the start of full roll-out, which should be completed by December 2004.

Our intention is that a pay-as-you-dine system will be introduced into all Service messes where food charges currently apply, irrespective of rank.

Volunteer Reserve Forces

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the United Kingdom Volunteer Reserve Forces' (including the Territorial Army), (a) establishment and (b) strength in (i) 2005, (ii) 2010 and (iii) 2015. [123966]

Mr. Spellar: The Reserve Forces' establishments are authorised by Parliament in the Ministry of Defence Votes A, and are based on a detailed assessment of the current and future strategic environment the Services are likely to face. The establishments resulting from the Strategic Defence Review are:

	Number
Royal Naval Reserve	3,850
Royal Marines Reserve	1,008
Territorial Army	41,204
Volunteer Reserve Air Forces	2,920

It is not possible to predict the detail of the future framework owing to the changing nature of the international security environment. The restructured Territorial Army was in place by 1 April this year, and it is expected to be able to maintain force levels at establishment. The Royal Naval Reserve and Royal Marines Reserve expect to reach their establishments within the next two or three years. The Reserve Air Forces expect to reach their establishment over the next two to three years and beyond.

Nuclear Reactor Storage

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to find land storage sites for nuclear reactors from redundant submarines. [124390]

Dr. Moonie: No steps have yet been taken to find land storage sites for the nuclear reactors from decommissioned submarines. I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Ms Squire) on 11 May 2000, Official Report, columns 447–48W, which stated that we expect specific sites to emerge during the next phase of our study into the storage of decommissioned nuclear submarines. This phase has just started and is expected to take about three years.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his policy is in respect of research carried out on animals at Porton Down; and what research is carried out there on behalf of other countries, with particular reference to defensive agent testing. [124192]

Mr. Spellar: The Ministry of Defence undertakes limited scientific work involving the use of animals for defence research purposes. This work is carried out on behalf of the Department by the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) mainly at the Chemical and Biological Defence Sector at Porton Down, but also to a lesser extent at the Centre for Human Sciences at Alverstoke. The research programme involving animals is concerned wholly with providing the UK's Armed Forces with safe and effective protection against hazards they may encounter while carrying out their duties. The Ministry of Defence does not use animals in the development or evaluation of weapons and we continue to seek alternatives to the use of animals in experimentation wherever possible.

Research using animals within DERA is conducted strictly in accordance with the requirements of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 under which the Home Office licences and oversees all such activity. In addition, an independent Animal Welfare Advisory Committee was appointed in 1996 in response to public and Parliamentary concern over the use of animals in research. Its purpose is to keep animal care and welfare arrangements under review within DERA. A report by this Committee is published annually and a copy placed in the Library of the House.

The only research involving animals currently being undertaken by the Chemical and Biological Defence Sector at Porton Down on behalf of other countries is a study of the efficacy of prospective vaccines against a potential biological warfare agent. The work is for the US Department of Defense and its successful outcome will also be of direct benefit to the UK and our Armed Forces.

Operation Danish Bacon

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 19 May 2000, Official Report, columns 288–89W, concerning Operation Danish Bacon, how battlefield injuries are simulated in the exercise Operation Danish Bacon. [124243]

Dr. Moonie: The Surgical Training Exercises in Denmark use pigs as surgical models because they are considered to have the closest physiological response to humans and are similar in size and weight. The pigs are deeply anaesthetised and then wounded by Danish Armed Forces' marksmen using weapons of three different calibres. Each animal is then given medical treatment as if it were a human casualty wounded in battle. Throughout, the pigs remain deeply anaesthetised and are humanely killed at the end of the exercise without regaining consciousness. Veterinary staff are in attendance at all times during the exercise and may withdraw an animal at any point for any reason.

Forest Moor Base

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the purpose of the Forest Moor Royal Naval Communications Base; and how many (a) UK and (b) US personnel work there. [124209]

Mr. Spellar: HMS Forest Moor, near Harrogate, North Yorkshire, is part of the Defence Communication Services Agency. Staffed by both UK military and civilian personnel, HMS Forest Moor is the headquarters of the radio services grouping within the Agency which provides Very Low, Low and High Frequency radio communication services for the British Military and NATO. It has an establishment of 84 UK personnel; no US staff are employed at HMS Forest Moor.

British Nuclear Test Veterans

Mr. Martin Bell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to give British nuclear test veterans access to their records. [123963]

Dr. Moonie: I assume the hon. Member is referring to official Service records, including medical records. It has always been the case that ex-Service personnel may request the details contained in such records though it has been usual for medical information to be passed to an individual's GP or legal representative. In the case of nuclear test veterans, they are also entitled to request any information held relating to their exposure to radiation during their participation in the UK's nuclear test programme in the 1950s and 1960s.

Missiles and Ammunition

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the book value of the stock-retained totals of missiles and ammunition in each year from 1989–90 to 1999–2000; in each year, what was the (a) percentage change from the previous year, (b) total stock value expended in operations, training and exercises in that year and (c) proportion devoted to war reserves; and if he will make a statement. [124223]

Mr. Spellar: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Furthermore, a full response would be withheld in accordance with exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, which relates to Defence Security and International Relations.

Defence Fraud Analysis Unit

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the budget of the Defence Fraud Analysis Unit for 1999–2000 and what it will be for 2000–01; how many staff are dedicated to the unit; who heads the unit and to whom they report; what relationship the Defence Fraud Analysis Unit has with the Specialist Procurement Services scrutinisation system; and if he will make a statement. [123968]

Dr. Moonie: The Defence Fraud Analysis Unit (DFAU) has nine staff, is headed by an Assistant Director and forms part of the Directorate of Internal Audit (DIA). In 1999–2000, when the Directorate was being formed the costs of the unit (including set up costs) totalled £312,000. Expenditure for the current year (2000–01) is likely to be some £375,000.

The DFAU has no direct relationship with the Specialist Procurement Services (SPS). However the DFAU can and does call on the services of the SPS and a range of specialist areas including the Ministry of Defence Police fraud squad, internal audit and other such bodies to assist its work.

The DFAU now acts as the focus for all Ministry of Defence (MOD) fraud matters including the promotion of risk awareness. It works closely with all MOD authorities in adopting a proactive response to fraud risk.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the targets of the Defence Fraud Analysis Unit for 1999–2000 stating in each case (a) if the target was achieved, (b) the reason for any target not being met and (c) action taken by the Defence Fraud Analysis Unit to improve target achievement performance in 2000–01; and if he will make a statement. [123967]

Dr. Moonie: The Management of the Defence Fraud Analysis Unit (DFAU) was formed in February 1999 under the Director of Internal Audit (DIA). Targets for the year 1999–2000 included the development of a single fraud reporting point for the department, the creation of an information database, the commencement of a programme of risk awareness presentations, the revision of existing and new guidance on fraud deterrence and detection, the co-ordination of activity with the Ministry of Defence Police Fraud Squad and other related bodies, and the evaluation of suspected cases of fraud or irregularity raised by line management or concerned individuals. All targets were achieved.

DFAU objectives for 2000–01 reflect the continuing development of the unit and new initiatives aimed at improving performance and service. These include regular contributions to MOD and Police publications and a programme of 'no notice' visits to MOD formations and units as part of a pro-active response to fraud risk.

Steps being taken to improve performance in the coming year include investment in staff training and the latest data mining and fraud detection techniques.

Personnel Ratios

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the ratio of officers to enlisted personnel is in the (a) Royal Navy, (b) Royal Air Force, (c) Army and (d) Royal Marine. [124477]

Mr. Spellar: The ratio of Officers to Other Ranks on the trained strengths of the UK Regular Armed Forces, as at 1 April 2000, were:

(a) Royal Navy—1:4.46

(b) Royal Air Force—1:4.23

(c) Army—1:6.56

(d) Royal Marine—1:8.93.

Lynx Helicopter

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the cost to his Department of the technical fault in Lynx helicopters; who will meet the cost and over what timescale; and if he will make a statement. [124673]

Mr. Spellar: The problem with Lynx Main Rotor Heads is currently being managed through better utilisation of our existing stocks of unaffected heads, including faster repair and overhaul times. The cost of this will be contained within existing funds. Urgent discussions are taking place with GKN Westland about buying replacement rotor heads as quickly as possible. It is not yet possible to estimate the cost for these orders, which will be met from the Defence Budget.

RAF Unguided Bomb Enhancement Programme

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the original planned date of completion of the RAF unguided bomb enhancement programme; what is the current estimated in-service timetable for completion; what effect in-year budget changes have had on the in-service timetable; when he expects to place contracts against the programme; and if he will make a statement. [124224]

Dr. Moonie: Staff Target (Air) 1248 seeks to introduce an all weather bombing capability for the RAF. The In Service Date originally assumed in the funded forward programme was 2006. This date has not changed. A contract is expected to be placed in mid-2002.

Regular Forces

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the UK Regular Forces' (i) trained strength and (ii) trained requirement in (a) 2005, (b) 2010 and (c) 2015. [123979]

Mr. Spellar: The long-term aim is to bring the overall trained strength into balance with the trained requirement. By 1 April 2005, both the Naval Service and the Army expect to have achieved this, with their trained requirements anticipated to be about 38,500 and 105,232 respectively. The RAF's forecast trained strength at 1 April 2005 is expected to be about 50,400, against the forecast trained requirement of 50,900.

Although the Strategic Defence Review (SDR) looked into the future as far as 2015, it is not possible to predict, beyond 2005, the detail of the future framework, owing to the changing nature of the international security environment.

Defence Procurement

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of overall spending on defence procurement is allocated to companies in (a) England and (b) Wales; and if he will make a statement. [122653]

Dr. Moonie: Spending on defence procurement is based on value for money, project by project, and is not allocated to companies on a regional basis. I refer the hon. Member to the publication "UK Defence Statistics, 1999" which details (at Table 1.9) the annual defence expenditure on equipment in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. A copy is held in the Library.

MOD Police (Policy and Procedures Manual)

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when Ministry of Defence police officers will receive the new single source document containing their terms and conditions of service. [124353]

Mr. Spellar: The Ministry of Defence Police (MDP) Policy and Procedures Manual will incorporate MDP terms and conditions of service. Initial chapters of the Policy and Procedures Manual including some on terms and conditions of service were distributed in electronic format on 10 May 2000. Further chapters will be distributed as soon as consultation with the Defence Police Federation has been completed.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions since 31 March 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124128]

Mr. Hoon: During the period 1 April 1999 to the end of March 2000, special advisers in this Department travelled overseas on two occasions.

Aircraft Carriers

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when all three of the Royal Navy's aircraft carriers will be operationally available. [121707]

Mr. Spellar: The three Royal Navy aircraft carriers, HMS Invincible, Illustrious and Ark Royal, undertake a rolling programme of operations and maintenance, to ensure that two ships are normally available for operational tasking. On current plans, all three would not be operationally available at the same time.

Andrew Timothy Lea

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the service record of Andrew Timothy Lea. [123557]

Mr. Spellar: In accordance with exemption 8a and exemption 12 of the code of Practice to Government Information, such details are not disclosed without the consent of the individual to whom the information relates.

RAF Feltwell

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 12 May 2000, Official Report, column 513W, if he will state the reasons why RAF Feltwell is designated an RAF base. [123778]

Mr. Spellar: The designation of any Ministry of Defence site depends on which Service is responsible for its administration. For RAF Feltwell this is the Royal Air Force.

Departmental Building Costs

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 17 May 2000, Official Report, columns 162–63W, on the projected costs of reconstructing his Department's building in Whitehall, which five buildings are to be disposed of; and what will be the savings per annum resulting from these disposals. [123586]

Dr. Moonie: The redevelopment will allow MOD headquarters activities to be concentrated in Main Building and the adjoining Old War Office, enabling the MOD to dispose of Northumberland House and Metropole Building in Northumberland Avenue, 3–5 Great Scotland Yard, St. Giles Court in Holborn and St. Christopher House in Southwark. Disposal of these properties is estimated to provide savings of £18 million a year in running costs.

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 17 May 2000, Official Report, columns 162–63W, on the projected costs of reconstructing his Department's building in Whitehall, how many staff are to be relocated as a result of the disposal of the five buildings; and to which locations. [123585]

Dr. Moonie: The disposal of these five buildings is part of an overall reduction in Head Office staff in central London from 6,000 to 4,300 which fulfils one of the aims of the Strategic Defence Review. Some staff have already been relocated to a number of locations in the UK including Defence Logistics Organisation staff to Bath and Defence Vetting Agency staff to York. Work is continuing on the future destination of the remaining staff.

Ro-ro Ferries

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what percentage of time the Government expects to use each of the ro-ro ships shortly to be ordered by his Department. [122987]

Mr. Spellar: [holding answer 19 May 2000]: The Ministry of Defence requires a Strategic Sealift service which is based on the availability of six ships on graduated notice of call-up for Joint Rapid Reaction Forces (JRRF) operations. The Ministry of Defence cannot predict when this requirement may arise. In addition, during those periods when there are no JRRF operations, the Ministry of Defence will need to employ on average about four vessels to carry out routine tasks such as supporting exercises or transporting freight.

HEALTH

Influenza

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average cost to the NHS of (a) a hospital admission caused by influenza, (b) a doctor taking a day off work as a result of influenza, (c) an influenza vaccination and (d) a course of antiviral treatment and protection for influenza. [121963]

Yvette Cooper: Costs per finished consultant episode (FCE) for possible treatments for patients with influenza are given as follows. The cost information is based on the 1998–99 financial year and is based on costs for non-elective inpatients. Influenza features in a number of healthcare resource groupings (HRGs).

Other viral illness (HRG S14)—national average cost per FCE £611

(Patient greater than 69 or wcc[1])—national average cost per FCE £1,269

(Patient less than 70 or w/o cc[2])—national average cost per FCE £806

[2] Without complications and co-morbidities.

The cost of a doctor taking a day off work is not known. The list prices for influenza vaccines and antiviral drugs are given in the British National Formulary, copies of which are in the Library.

Breast Cancer

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the organisations that have appealed against the final appraisal determination on the use of taxanes for the treatment of breast cancer in the NHS, indicating the patient groups among them. [122468]

Yvette Cooper: Appeals against the National Institute for Clinical Excellence's draft guidance on the use of taxanes for the treatment of breast cancer were received from Bristol-Myers Squibb Pharmaceuticals Ltd. and from the patient group CancerBACUP

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when he expects NICE to publish the guidance on the use of taxanes for the treatment of breast cancer in the NHS; [122469]

(2) what reasons underlie the length of time taken by NICE to publish guidance on the use of taxanes for the treatment of breast cancer in the NHS. [122467]

Yvette Cooper: National Institute for Clinical Excellence guidance on taxanes has been delayed because of a successful appeal. The Appraisal Committee will be reconvened as soon as possible to reconsider its guidance on taxanes in breast cancer in the light of the findings of the appeal panel. Interested parties will then have a further opportunity to consider the revised guidance. It is expected that NICE will issue guidance around the end of June.

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the financial impact on health authorities and trusts of NICE guidance supporting the use of taxanes for the treatment of breast cancer; and what plans he has to ensure that sufficient funding is available in the NHS drugs budget to implement such guidance. [122472]

Yvette Cooper: We have not received the National Institute for Clinical Excellence's recommendations on the use of taxanes for breast cancer. The additional £600 million allocated to health authorities following the recent budget is intended, among other things, to enable health authorities to fund recommendations from NICE.

Osteoporosis

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals his Department will be making to the World Congress on Osteoporosis to be held in Chicago in June. [122752]

Yvette Cooper: Neither Department of Health Ministers nor officials have been invited to contribute to this Congress.

Hospital Waiting Times

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average waiting time for a hip replacement operation at a NHS hospital in the Greater London area. [123045]

Mr. Denham: The requested information is not collected by local authority area so the information given is that for the health authority areas covered by the London Regional Office of the National Health Service Executive.

The mean waiting time for a hip operation in a London Hospital in the financial year 1998–99 was 236 days (approximately eight months). The median waiting time for the same period was 191 days (approximately six and a half months).

Race Equality

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimate his Department has made of the percentage of the London ethnic minority population who will have access to the initiatives introduced by the London NHS Race Equality Unit; [123084]

(2) how much funding has been allocated to the London NHS Race Equality Unit in the current financial year. [123086]

Mr. Denham: The National Health Service Executive London Regional Office has established a London NHS Race Equality Group, not Unit. It will not be funding projects or local initiatives, but through its advice to the regional chairman and director it will promote the adoption of good practice on race and health throughout London's NHS, and ensure that the issue of race equality in health and health services remains high on the agenda. The London NHS Race Equality Group's work will aim to ensure that the appropriate services are in place in every health authority, NHS trust and primary care group across London.

The NHS Executive London has also worked with the Association of London Government Race, Health and Social Exclusion Commission during 1999, and contributed to their report 'Sick of being excluded' (about to be published). This report made recommendations on:

Improving access

Better employment practice

Clear leadership

Direct involvement of black and minority ethnic people

Involvement of community organisations and partnership with communities.

The London NHS Race Equality Group is being established in response to the 1999 survey of NHS initiatives addressing black and minority ethnic health in London. The funding to support these initiatives is already included in local health authority allocations and the group's role will be to ensure that black and ethnic minority populations are getting a fair and appropriate share of these resources, in relation to their needs.

Cardiopulmonary Resuscitation

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the adequacy of existing guidance on the use of not for resuscitation orders; and if he will make a statement. [122794]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 22 May 2000]: Clear guidelines on Decisions Relating to Cardiopulmonary Resuscitation were first published in 1993 in a joint statement issued by the British Medical Association, the Resuscitation Council (United Kingdom), and the Royal College of Nursing. A revised version was published in June 1999. The joint statement gives general guidelines on the basic principles within which decisions regarding local policies on cardiopulmonary resuscitation may be formulated. It makes clear that all acute hospital trusts should establish local resuscitation policies, a point which was also emphasised by the Chief Medical Officer of the time to all consultants in England in 1991.

We are committed to ensuring the development of best practice in resuscitation decision-making throughout the National Health Service.

CJD

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions his Department has had with the French health authorities over exchange of information on new variant CJD. [123106]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Department has regular contacts with the French authorities at European Union meetings of the Health Council and its working Groups, and at meetings of EU Chief Medical officers, at which variant creutzfeldt jakob disease issues are, from time to time, discussed. The National CJD Surveillance Unit funded by the Department takes a leading role in co-ordinating the surveillance of CJD in EU member states, including through the EUROCJD group, of which France is an important member. A principal aim of this group is to ensure systematic surveillance is undertaken so that cases of CJD are identified, and then any variant CJD cases arising as a sub-set of these are picked up. In addition, the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee which advises the Government on bovine spongiform encephalopathy and CJD issues has met twice with its French counterpart, the Dormont Committee, in February 1996 and September 1998.

Trainee Doctors

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of whether the number of doctors in training will be sufficient to meet NHS needs and Government waiting list targets, with particular reference to the years from 2001 to 2006. [123300]

Mr. Denham: We aim to ensure through the national workforce planning processes that there will be sufficient doctors in training to meet the future requirements of the National Health Service. Assessments about future staffing needs, including the implications of waiting list targets and other service initiatives, are reviewed annually and the numbers of doctors adjusted accordingly.

On 6 April I announced plans to train almost 400 extra hospital specialists. Added to more specialist doctors already in training, the increase of 393 training places means there should be an additional 13,000 fully trained hospital specialists in the NHS by 2006–07. The additional places will take forward our plans to increase capacity in the NHS, so patients have easier access to faster, fairer and more convenient services.

Teenage Pregnancies

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the level of expenditure in each year since 1997 allocated to projects designed to reduce the number of teenage pregnancies and (b) the actual and forecast impact of this expenditure on reducing teenage pregnancies. [123158]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 23 May 2000]: From 1997 to 1999, funding to reduce teenage pregnancy formed part of the overall allocation to improve the sexual health of young people.

In June 1999, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced a £60 million package over three years, with the goal of halving the rate of conceptions among under-18s by 2010, and getting more teenagers into education, training and employment.

NHS Walk-in Centres

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS walk-in centres have been established; how many are in the North West Region; and if he will make a statement. [123526]

Mr. Denham: A total of 36 National Health Service walk-in centres have been approved nationally; 15 of these were open by the end of May 2000 and the rest by the end of the year. The North West has produced six successful bids, one of which is already open in Liverpool. Walk-in centres are part of a wider plan to modernise and improve access to, and the convenience of, NHS services. They are intended to help people make better use of the health service, help professionals make better use of their skills and respond to modern lifestyles.

Insulin Pens

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many diabetics registered in (a) Shrewsbury and Atcham and (b) Shropshire have received prescribed pen needles; and if he will make a statement. [123794]

Mr. Denham: Insulin pen needles and certain reusable insulin pens were added to the Drug Tariff with effect from March 2000. Figures are not yet available as to how many pen needles have been prescribed since March 1.

Cochlear Implants

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the number of cochlear implants for children which have been undertaken in each health authority area for each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [123657]

Mr. Hutton: The tables show the number of procedures performed on under 16-year-olds who received cochlear implants, treated in National Health Service hospitals in England. This is shown by health authority of residence for the financial years 1996–97 to 1998–99 and district health authority of residence for 1994–95 to 1995–96.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children are waiting for cochlear implants in each health authority area; how many have been waiting for more than a year; and if he will make a statement. [123658]

Mr. Hutton: This information on the number of children waiting for a cochlear implant is not available. Information on the waiting times for cochlear implants for children, based on Hospital Episode Statistics, is shown in the table.

Waiting time statistics from HES are not the same as the published waiting list statistics. HES provides counts and waiting times for all patients admitted to hospital within a given period whereas the published waiting list statistics count those waiting for treatment at a given point in time and how long they have been on the waiting list. Also, HES calculates the waiting time as the difference between the admission and decision to admit dates. Unlike published waiting list statistics, this is not adjusted for self-deferrals or period of medical/social suspension.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to collect statistics on the reason why individuals leave (a) inpatient waiting lists and (b) outpatient waiting lists, separately identifying those who opted for private sector provisions. [123720]

Mr. Denham: We have no plans to do so.

Beta-interferon

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library a copy of the Provisional Finding of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence in respect of beta-interferon at the same time it is made available to those parties who submitted evidence to the Institute. [123912]

Mr. Denham: The National Institute for Clinical Excellence's guidance on beta-interferon will be placed in the Library once it has been finalised by NICE. Consultation on the draft findings will, as with all NICE's appraisals, be on a confidential basis. I understand that NICE is planning to disseminate its guidance to the National Health Service during August 2000.

NHS Messaging Services

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much the NHS has spent on its messaging services on NHS net through BT Syntegra. [124089]

Ms Stuart: A total of £7.1 million has been spent on messaging services on National Health Service net through British Telecommunications Syntegra in the period 1995 to 2000.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the savings to the NHS over (a) one year, (b) five years and (c) 10 years through introducing a messaging service based upon a SMPT Internet Mail system. [124092]

Ms Stuart: None; an SMTP (Internet) mail messaging service is already available on NHSnet.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the cost to the NHS of the recent I Love You virus; and what measures he is taking to ensure that future breaches of NHS messaging services are minimised. [124093]

Ms Stuart: The measures taken by the National Health Service net contractors were at no charge to the NHS. Any costs at NHS trust and health authorities would be largely in the time of personnel as a part of their normal duties to manage local e-mail services and have not been identified separately.

NHSnet provides controls for network access between organisations, including transfer of e-mails between NHSnet and external systems that are passed through a secure gateway between NHSnet and the internet. Management of the gateway is the responsibility of the NHSnet service providers under the supervision of the NHS Information Authority. The NHS Information Authority maintains close liaison with the service providers and users of NHSnet services to ensure that information about virus attacks and appropriate countermeasures are disseminated rapidly.

The management teams remain vigilant and will deal with future threats in the same professional manner in which the "I LOVE YOU" incident was handled.

Forms

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123946]

Mr. Hutton: The forms which the Department issues to charities and voluntary bodies are mainly for those who wish to apply for grants, mainly grants under Section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968. For this scheme, the only form required from applicants is the appropriate application for the type of grant being sought. This has not changed since 1997.

The Department keeps under review the forms it issues to business, charities and the voluntary sector to ensure that they are necessary, easy to understand and as simple as possible to complete.

GP Practices (Patient Access)

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the population lives (a) within one mile of and (b) over three miles from a GP practice in (i) rural and (ii) urban areas. [124530]

Mr. Denham: Information is not available in the form requested. From the information that is available I can say that:

in predominantly urban areas, 99 per cent. of patients live between one and 2.5 miles and 1 per cent. live more than 2.5 miles from a main surgery.

in predominantly rural areas, the figures are 91 per cent. and 9 per cent. respectively.

These figures tend to overstate both the numbers living more than 2.5 miles, and understate how many people live within one mile of a general practitioner's surgery because no account is taken of Branch Surgeries. Branch Surgeries are provided to help improve access for patients often in rural areas.

Waiting Lists (Dorset)

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients in Dorset died while awaiting (a) surgery, (b) cancer surgery and (c) cardiac surgery in the last 12 months. [124512]

Ms Stuart: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients in Dorset there are waiting for kidney dialysis treatment. [124513]

Ms Stuart: There is no waiting list for kidney dialysis treatment in Dorset. Patients requiring this treatment are treated immediately.

Dorset Health Authority has invested an additional £250,000 a year, each year for the last three years in dialysis services.

Medical Schools

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will announce the decision on the establishment of new medical schools. [124495]

Mr. Denham: Responsibility for the allocation of places to individual medical schools in England lies with the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE).

HEFCE have already announced the allocation of approximately 840 new medical school places in England and plan to announce a further allocation of places soon.

NHS Staff (Occupational Health and Counselling Services)

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which NHS trusts provided, as at April, those occupational health and counselling services to their staff which were set out under the White Paper "Working Together—Securing a Quality Workforce for the NHS". [124364]

Mr. Denham: All National Health Service trusts now provide staff with access to occupational health services. 60 per cent. of trusts provide services in-house while 40 per cent. purchase them from neighbouring NHS employers. Information about the number of trusts providing counselling services is not collected centrally but may be held locally.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish guidelines on the provision of counselling services for staff in the NHS. [124363]

Mr. Denham: Guidance on the provision of counselling services for staff in the National Health Service should be available on the Department of Health website later this year.

Homophobia in Schools Video

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if Avon Health Authority has made a video called Beyond a Phase: A Practical Guide to Challenging Homophobia in Schools available to schools in the area. [123573]

Ms Stuart: The video "Beyond a Phase" is available to any school that wishes to purchase it. It is for school governors and teachers, who are responsible for how sex education is taught, to decide whether or not to use material produced by health authorities in a school context. They do so within the framework of guidance (Personal, Social and Health Education) issued by the Department for Education and Employment.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on how many occasions since 30 June 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124115]

Ms Stuart: No departmental or non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity since 30 June 1999.

Triple Heart By-pass Operation

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when a constituent of the hon. Member for Gosport, whose name has been given to him, can expect to be given a firm date for the triple heart by-pass operation for which the waiting time in January 1999 was estimated to be nine months. [124230]

Mr. Denham: I am advised that the Southampton University Hospitals National Health Service Trust is in the process of contacting the constituent to whom the hon. Member refers, to offer a firm date for the triple heart by-pass operation.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Game Bird Imports

Mr. Luff: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) pheasant eggs, (b) pheasant chicks, (c) adult pheasants, (d) partridge eggs, (e) partridge chicks and (f) adult partridges were imported into the UK in each year since 1979. [118966]

Ms Quin: Statistics for the import into the United Kingdom (UK) of pheasant eggs, pheasant chicks, adult pheasants, partridge eggs, partridge chicks, and adult partridges are not available for the period 1979 to 1995.

The following figures are derived from the information messages (ANIMO) which European law requires exporting countries to send to the importing country to inform them of the number of animals certified for export in a given consignment. Imports of poultry are divided into the following commodities; day old poultry, hatching eggs, poultry for breeding and production, poultry for slaughter and poultry for re-stocking supplies of game. In European law pheasants and partridges are included in 'poultry'. However, ANIMOS do not give separate commodity codes for poultry species.

The number of live day-old chicks, hatching eggs and adult poultry imported into the UK in each year since 1996, is given in the tables.

Imports into UK from European Union

	Number of hatching eggs	Number of chicks	Number of adult poultry
1996	12,052,072	4,963,947	121,163
1997	38,458,912	14,992,038	586,629
1998	19,679,634	5,182,966	11,486,664
2000	5,627,282	2,075,152	30,026

Consignments of poultry from third countries are subject to a MAFF import licence. The following figures are derived from licences issued for consignments of live adult pheasants and pheasant chicks into the UK from third countries. Our records indicate that there have been no imports of pheasant eggs, partridge eggs, partridge chicks or adult partridges.

Imports into UK from third countries

	Number of pheasant chicks	Number of adult pheasants
1996	0	26
1998	0	69

The figures given in the tables are provisional and subject to validation.

Woodland Grant Schemes

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to make a decision on the woodland grant schemes amendment applied for by Cotswold Estate Services Ltd., submitted in October last year. [120682]

Mr. Morley: I understand Cotswold Services Ltd. submitted on behalf of their clients an application under the Farm Woodland Premium Scheme. Processing of the application under the Scheme has been delayed pending approval by the European Commission of the England Rural Development Plan, which is expected in the summer.

Broiler Chickens

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what plans he has to commission an independent survey into the incidence of lameness in the United Kingdom broiler chicken flock; and if he will make a statement; [122557]

(2) what steps he is planning to take to persuade the European Commission to propose a directive to address the health and welfare issues raised by the recent report of the Commission's Scientific Committee on Animal Health and Animal Welfare on the Welfare of Chickens Kept for Meat Production (Broilers); and if he will make a statement. [122556]

Mr. Morley: The Government have made clear their wish to improve standards of broiler welfare.

The report from the Scientific Committee on Animal Health and Animal Welfare (SCAHAW) on broiler chicken production usefully identifies and assesses the issues. It should enable the Commission now to bring forward proposals for EU standards, an approach which we much prefer to acting unilaterally: it should bring real welfare improvements without putting British producers at a competitive disadvantage in relation to their continental counterparts. We look forward to seeing proposals from the Commission in the light of the report. In preparation for this we shall carefully study the content of the report and the papers to which it refers.

The report recognises, as do the Government, that leg disorders can be a major cause of poor welfare in broilers. A five-year industry survey in this country on broiler leg health should be nearing completion. The Farm Animal Welfare Council to whom the industry is reporting will carefully consider the survey, together with an independent evaluation of the results. I have written to both FAWC and the industry to make clear my concern that this exercise should be swiftly concluded so that we can determine what should be our next steps on leg health and what provisions we should be looking to secure in the EU negotiation. It is essential that we have FAWC's views before we consult on and determine these matters.

The SCAHAW report also makes clear that the subjective nature of the widely used gait scoring system leads to difficulties in making direct comparisons between different studies employing this technique. As a result, the report suggests the need to develop objective measurement systems and to carry out systematic epidemiological studies. In this context, the Government already have in train a number of research projects on broiler leg health, including the development of other quantitative methods of assessing the extent of lameness in broilers.

Meanwhile, the State Veterinary Service continues to carry out random visits to broiler units to assess all aspects of welfare including lameness, litter quality, and ventilation. We are also in the process of drawing up a new Broiler Welfare Code, which takes on board a number of the recommendations contained in FAWC's 1992 report. This is not a substitute for necessary EU action, but represents an important step we can take nationally in the meantime.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make the transport of circus animals subject to the Welfare of Animals (Transport) Order 1997; and if he will make a statement. [122699]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 18 May 2000]: The Welfare of Animals (Transport) Order 1997 applies to the transport of all animals, including circus animals.

GM Crops

Mr. Breed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what assessment he has made of the effect of the charge for making a submission on the number of organisations making representations as part of the consultation regarding the addition of Chardon LL maize to the national seed list; [122773]

(2) what factors he took into account in determining the level of charge levied on those wishing to make representations as part of the consultation regarding the addition of Chardon LL maize to the national seed list; [122774]

(3) how many representations were received regarding the addition of Chardon LL maize to the national seed list prior to the closing date for the consultation. [122776]

Ms Quin: There is a statutory requirement to pay a fee for making written representations (£30) or requesting a hearing (£60) about the proposal to add Chardon LL to the National List. A substantial number of representations (227) and requests for a hearing (68) have been received which will ensure that Ministers receive a wide range of views and evidence about the proposed decision.

The requirement for these statutory fees is set out in the Seeds (National List of Varieties) Regulations 1982 (as amended) and the level of fees is set in the Seeds (National List of Varieties) (Fees) Regulations 1994 (as amended). These fees were introduced many years ago, prior to the advent of genetically modified plant varieties, to help meet the cost of running the National List representations and hearings system. The representations fee was increased to its current level of £30 from £25 in 1999, and the hearings fee was increased to its current level of £60 from £55 in 1999, in line with general increases in National List fees. They apply equally to GM or conventionally bred varieties.

The National List system does not itself address the safety aspects of GM traits. This is dealt with under quite separate legislation. No GM plant variety may be proposed for addition to the National List until the appropriate GM consents have been obtained and no charge is made to anyone objecting to the DETR or the FSA about the approval of GM crops or foods.

Green Transport Plans

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the key buildings for which his Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122562]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 18 May 2000]: In line with the target set in the Integrated Transport White Paper for the introduction of green transport plans for key Government buildings, by 31 March we had completed all 16 of our plans covering the following key buildings:

Government Buildings, Epsom road, Guildford GU1 2LD

Lion House, Willowburn Trading Estate, Alnwick NE66 2PF

Wessex Regional Service Centre (RSC), Block 3, Government Buildings, Burghill road, Bristol BS10 6NJ

Northern RSC, Eden Bridge House, Lowther street, Carlisle CA3 8DX

North East RSC, Government Buildings, Crosby road, Northallerton DL6 1AD

North Mercia RSC, Electra way, Crewe CW1 6GJ

South Mercia RSC, Block C, Government Buildings, Whittingdon road, Worcester WR5 2LQ

Anglia RSC, Block B, Government Buildings, Brooklands avenue, Cambridge CB2 2DR

South West RSC, Clyst House, Exeter EX5 1DY

Quantock House, Paul street, Taunton TA1 3NX

Central Science Laboratories, Sand Hutton, York YO4 1LZ

Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science (CEFAS), Pakefield road, Lowestoft NR33 OHT

CEFAS, Burnham Remembrance avenue, Burnham on Crouch CM0 8HA

CEFAS, The Nothe, Barrack road, Weymouth DT0 8UB

Veterinary Laboratory Agency and Veterinary Medicines Directorate, New Haw, Addlestone KT15 3NB.

Agri-monetary System

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has made in the EU on the replacement of the agri-monetary system with arrangements that protect British farmers from the effects of a strong pound or weak euro on the value of agricultural subsidies. [122989]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: In December 1998 I successfully negotiated the new agri-monetary system, which is simpler and more transparent than the previous arrangements.

By the end of 2000 we expect to have paid around £418 million in agri-monetary compensation under the new system, with a further £44 million to be paid by the end of next year. This is in addition to the £133 million paid in compensation under the pre-euro system, leading to total expenditure since 1997 on agri-monetary compensation of around £595 million.

Land Values

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what changes took place in the value of agricultural land between (a) 1989 and 1995 and (b) 1996 and 1999. [123474]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 23 May 2000]: Data on sale prices of agricultural land in England are published on the MAFF website, at http://www.maff.gov.uk/esg/statnot/alp.htm. There is a break in the series in 1993 and hence figures before and after that year are not strictly comparable. However, the published series show an increase of 5 per cent. between 1989 and 1995 and an increase of 2 per cent. between 1996 and 1998 (provisional), which is the latest full year for which data are currently available. A spreadsheet giving all the annual figures between 1944 and 1998 is available on the website.

Figures for Wales are published by the National Assembly for Wales.

Hunts (Feedstuffs)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will establish an inquiry into the feeding of specified risk material to the hounds of the Exmoor Foxhounds. [123471]

Ms Quin [holding answer 23 May 2000]: No, because these matters are dealt with by the local authorities who have responsibility for enforcing Specified Risk Material Order 1997.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases there have been of hunts being (a) prosecuted, (b) given a verbal warning and (c) given a written warning over feeding specified risk material to packs of hounds in each of the last three years. [123472]

Ms Quin [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The feeding of SRM to hounds is classified as a Category 1 failure of the SRM controls. Out of 9802 visits to hunt kennels and knackers yards during the past three years, 43 Category 1 failures were noted. It is not possible to determine how many of these relate to feeding SRM to hounds except at disproportionate cost.

All such failures would be notified in writing, unless the enforcement authority expressly requested that this is not done. Prosecution is a matter for the appropriate local authority.

Farming (Diversification)

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he is taking to promote diversification within farming. [123463]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The England Rural Development Plan describes how Government intend to use the European Community co-funded measures in the Rural Development Regulation to support farmers wishing to diversify within farming. Of the £1.6 billion seven-year programme, £152 million will fund a new Rural Enterprise Scheme to encourage diversification; £44 million will fund a new Processing and Marketing Grant Scheme to encourage innovation and achieve added value for primary products and £22 million will go towards providing targeted training to support these and other schemes in the Plan.

In addition, under the Action Plan for Farming, MAFF will be producing a new advisory booklet on farm diversification and farmers who need planning approval for Rural Enterprise Scheme applications will receive free specialist advice.

The arrangements for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are set out in the rural development plans and Single Programming Documents for those countries.

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123730]

Mr. Morley: The Ministry's records show that the numbers of laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in this Department that have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997 are as follows:

MAFF laptops	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000	Total
Stolen	9	2	6	17
Total	10	2	6	18

The data have been extracted from the Ministry's annual return to the Treasury of actual and suspected frauds. The return for 1999–2000 is currently being finalised so the figure for that year is subject to change.

Correspondence

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when a reply will be sent to the letter of 14 March from the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford to the Parliamentary Secretary. [124135]

Mr. Morley: I replied to the letter from the hon. Member on 25 May 2000.

Alcoholic Beverages

Mr. Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information his Department collects on the alcoholic content of beverages. [123597]

Ms Quin [holding answer 25 May 2000]: We do not collect specific information on the alcoholic content of beverages. In order to prevent consumers from being misled, all prepacked alcoholic drinks with an alcoholic strength of more than 1.2 per cent. must be labelled with an indication of their alcoholic strength by volume (abv). In addition, minimum alcoholic strengths for specified spirit drinks above 15 per cent. abv, and for wine, are laid down in EC legislation.

Agriculture Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Brussels on 16 May; and if he will make a statement. [124029]

Mr. Nick Brown: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Wimbledon (Mr. Casale) on 24 May 2000, Official Report, column 551W.

Regional Network

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to close or restructure his Department's regional network. [123970]

Ms Quin: Ministers are currently considering the report of the review of CAP scheme administration, which my right hon. Friend the Minister commissioned from PricewaterhouseCoopers (PwC) last autumn. The report recommends that we should merge the CAP scheme processing functions of MAFF's Regional Service Centres and the Intervention Board Executive Agency to create a new payments agency, taking full advantage of the benefits offered by modern technology. On this basis, PwC consider that it will be possible to deliver a radically improved service for farmers and significant savings to the taxpayer.

My Department is also drawing up plans to align other aspects of its regional activities with the Government Office network. This will ensure that we can further strengthen our regional policy presence.

The future of the Department's Regional Service Centres is being considered in the context of these two reviews. Radical restructuring will be possible only if funding can be made available in the Spending Review 2000.

Right to Roam

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the implications of a right to roam over enclosed land in Scotland for the policing of the right to roam along the England-Scotland border. [123019]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 22 May 2000]: I have been asked to reply.

Responsibility for the proposed new right of access in Scotland rests with the Scottish Executive. Although the Scottish proposals are still at an early stage, I understand officials from the Countryside Agency and Scottish Natural Heritage have recently discussed possible cross-border issues.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Chechnya

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his recent discussions with his Russian counterpart in Moscow, covered allegations of war crimes and human rights violations in Chechnya; and if he will make a statement. [123299]

Mr. Vaz: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary raised reported human rights abuse in Chechnya with Russian Foreign Minister Ivanov during his visit to Moscow on 17 May. He also urged that those responsible for investigating reports of abuse be given the necessary resources and powers. The UK remains deeply concerned over the situation in Chechnya, and particularly about the human cost of the military campaign. We will continue to raise our concerns with Russia at every opportunity.

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent visit to the Russian Federation by the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights to investigate war crimes and human rights violations in Chechnya. [123301]

Mr. Vaz: We welcomed the visit to Moscow and the north Caucasus by Mrs. Robinson from 31 March to 4 April. Her visit, and her report on it to the UN Commission on Human Rights helped to illuminate the deeply disturbing situation in Chechnya. In the light of the visit, the UK, with EU and other partners, co-sponsored a Resolution on Chechnya at the UN Commission on Human Rights, urging Russia to take action to address the reports of human rights abuse in Chechnya.

European Commission Information Directorate-General

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make a statement on the (a) gender balance and (b) budget and (c) role of the Women's Information Section in the Information Directorate-General at the European Commission; [123624]

(2) if he will make a statement on the (a) role and (b) current activities of the Head of Sector, Information for Women, in DGX (Information) in the European Commission. [123650]

Mr. Vaz: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the office of the Commission in London.

Kosovo

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the letter of 4 May 2000 from the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz), to the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames), what estimate he has made of the number of Kosovar Albanians killed in Kosovo by forces of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the year leading up to June 1999; and what the basis is for the figure. [122638]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 25 May 2000]: We estimate that at least 10,000 Kosovar Albanian civilians were killed in Kosovo between June 1998 and June 1999. This figure is based upon a variety of sources, including debriefing of refugees, eye witness accounts, reports from international and non-governmental organisations and the media.

Animal Welfare

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what aspects of the UK's foreign policy relate to the promotion of animal welfare; and if he will make a statement. [124210]

Mr. Hain: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office works to promote British values worldwide. This includes the promotion of acceptable standards of animal welfare. Our overseas posts regularly raise these issues with their host Governments and encourage them to adopt similar standards. We have also taken a number of initiatives such as encouraging agreement at the recent CITES conference on elephant welfare.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures he is taking to ensure that weapons supplied to the Sierra Leone army are not used by child combatants. [124444]

Mr. Hain: We are very concerned at reports that British weapons may be in the hands of child soldiers. This is why we sought and secured from the Government of Sierra Leone assurances that any UK-supplied weapons will be used only in accordance with established human rights principles and humanitarian law; and why the release programme of light weapons to the Government of Sierra Leone, as announced by the Defence Secretary on 23 May, will be carefully supervised by British military personnel on the ground with a view to ensuring that any British weapons only go to adult soldiers of the Sierra Leone army for training or for legitimate operational requirements.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made in respect of the use of child combatants by the Sierra Leone army; and if he will make a statement. [124445]

Mr. Hain: We have raised the issue of child soldiers with President Kabbah. He has assured us that it is not his Government's policy to employ child soldiers, in accordance with Sierra Leonean law and its obligations under the convention of the Rights of the Child, and has issued instructions to his forces to immediately demobilise any child soldiers in their ranks.

British Overseas Territories Bill

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 12 May 2000, Official Report, column 496W, if he will list the principles to be addressed in the Overseas Territories Bill. [123507]

Mr. Battle: The key principles will amend the 1981 British Nationality Act and build on the provisions made in relation to the Falkland Islands by the British Nationality (Falkland Islands) Act 1983. They are:

the automatic acquisition of British citizenship for existing British Dependent Territories citizens (BDTC) from a qualifying territory at commencement of the Act and for those born in an overseas territory after commencement; acquisition by discretionary registration for those acquiring BDTC by registration or naturalisation after commencement;

BDTC status to continue in parallel with British citizenship with provision to renounce British citizenship acquired under the Act in favour of remaining solely a BDTC.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has received from St. Helena proposing changes in the constitution of St. Helena. [123925]

Mr. Battle: I understand that discussion documents are being drawn up in St. Helena to help local consultations about possible changes to the Constitution.

Our position remains the same as set out in my answer to the hon. Member on 3 March 2000, Official Report, column 441W, namely, that we are prepared to consider their specific, detailed and well argued recommendations for the amendment of the 1998 Constitutional Order.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to review the checks and accountability in respect of actions taken by the Governor without reference to the Legislative Council or Executive Council under the constitution of St. Helena. [123926]

Mr. Battle: Where the Governor is required to consult with the Executive Council and act in accordance with their advice but does not do so, he is required under the provisions of the Constitution to obtain the prior approval of the Secretary of State, unless the matter is of such urgency that it is necessary for him to act before obtaining approval, in which case he must then report his actions and reasons to the Secretary of State. Any Executive Councillor can comment on the Governor's reasons to the Secretary of State. Where the Governor acts at his discretion he remains accountable to the Secretary of State.

EU Institutions

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will publish the results of the Ministerial meeting held on 22 May to discuss proposals on EU institutions; [123987]

(2) what items were discussed at the 22 May Ministerial meeting on institutional changes in the EU. [123986]

Mr. Vaz: Ministers discussed issues relating to institutions other than the Council and the Commission. This meant principally the composition and decision making powers of the European Parliament and reform of the European Court of Justice and Court of First Instance. Some delegations also touched on the composition of the Committee of the Regions, the Economic and Social Committee and the Court of Auditors. The meeting did not produce formal results.

Press Officers

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many press officers were employed by his Department in (a) May 1997 and (b) May 2000. [124063]

Mr. Hain: In May 1997 there were nine press officers in the FCO. In May of this year the number was 13. This represents an increase from 0.07 per cent. of the total FCO staff to 0.09 per cent. over the period. Due to the increasing media interest in world events they are constantly busy.

EU Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in the discussions at the Intergovernmental Conference, the Government have ruled out the introduction of a system of double majority voting in the Council of Ministers as an alternative to a reweighting of votes; and if he will make a statement. [124064]

Mr. Vaz: The Government's position is clearly set out in the White Paper laid before the House on 15 February.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library the Commission's list of the 20 Treaty Articles on which a majority of member states wish to extend qualified majority voting, as stated recently by Commissioner Barnier. [124068]

Mr. Vaz: Negotiations at the IGC are still at an early stage. Member states have not yet put forward definitive positions on the range of IGC topics, including extension of qualified majority voting.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made on the Commission's proposal to extend qualified majority voting to Article 13 of the Treaty. [124066]

Mr. Vaz: The IGC is a matter for member states to negotiate and decide. The Government have taken note of the Commission's suggestions for discussion. Our own approach is set out in the White Paper "IGC: Reform for Enlargement".

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the five-page document submitted to the IGC Government representatives group meeting on 2 May on the subject of qualified majority voting. [124071]

Mr. Vaz: I have placed a copy in the Library of the House. The Presidency has also given a commitment to make all discussion documents publicly available on the internet.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the Government have made on the Commission's proposals to extend qualified majority voting to the areas not excluded in the Government's White Paper "IGC: Reform for Enlargement". [124069]

Mr. Vaz: The Commission's views do not set the agenda for discussions at the IGC. Treaty change is a matter for member states. The Government's approach to the discussions is set out in their White Paper "IGC: Reform for Enlargement". We are in regular contact with partners on the extension of QMV, and the issue has been discussed several times in the IGC Preparatory Group and by Ministers in the margins of the GAC.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the discussions to date at the Intergovernmental Conference. [124065]

Mr. Vaz: The Government Representatives group has been meeting on a regular basis to discuss the range of IGC issues. A 'Friends of the Presidency' group of legal experts has also met to discuss reform of the Court of Justice. Foreign Ministers have met four times in the margins of the General Affairs Council. The Presidency will present a progress report to the European Council in Feira on 19 and 20 June.

In the meetings, there has been general agreement that the IGC should focus on issues that need to be tackled before enlargement, especially vote reweighting in the Council, the size and composition of the Commission and the possible extension of qualified majority voting.

Charter of Fundamental Rights

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the discussions to date in the Convention which is drafting the Charter of Fundamental Rights. [124070]

Mr. Vaz: The Charter Convention drafting body has now met 10 times, and has completed its first discussion of the full list of rights. A revised draft of civil and political rights is due for a second discussion at the Charter Convention meeting on 5–6 June. A revised draft of economic and social rights and horizontal clauses is due to be discussed on 19–20 June. These drafts are generally closer to the ECHR and the Treaties than their predecessors. But more work needs to be done to ensure that the end product fulfils the remit agreed by Heads of Government at the Cologne European Council last June. The Government believe that to meet its objectives the Charter should preserve legal certainty, stick to existing rights and be consistent with EU policies and objectives. It should be declaratory in form.

The latest Charter drafts have been placed in the Libraries of the two Houses, together with Lord Goldsmith's comments on the civil and political articles. These papers, as well as contributions from member states' representatives and other interest organisations, are also available on the Charter website (ue.eu.int).

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his answer to the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) on 1 February 2000, Official Report, column 541W, remains the Government's policy towards the incorporation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights into the EU treaties. [124111]

Mr. Vaz: Yes.

European Political Parties

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment the Government have made of the European Parliament resolution of 13 April concerning the state funding of political parties. [124244]

Mr. Vaz: Our view on the state funding of political parties was published in July 1999 as Cm. 4413. This was in response to the Neill Committee report (Cm. 4057, October 1998) which came down against any general system of support from public funds for the general activities of political parties. We agree with this conclusion.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the reference to transnational European political parties in the Treaty of Amsterdam. [124245]

Mr. Vaz: We recognise the importance of political representation at European level as a contribution to democratic accountability in the EU. Currently, MEPs elected from national parties can, if they so choose, join trans-national groupings within the European Parliament. We see no reason to change this practice.

European Judicial System

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the European Commission on the report of the Reflexion Group on the future of the judicial system in the European Communities. [124073]

Mr. Vaz: We are in regular contact with the Commission on the full range of IGC issues. The 'Friends of the Presidency' group on reform of the European Court of Justice is not a Commission group. It is part of the IGC and is made up of member states' representatives. But it has provided a useful forum to discuss proposals for reform of the EC judicial system, including papers from the ECJ itself and from the Commission.

"Your Britain, Your Europe"

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the cost was of the "Your Britain, Your Europe" visit to Leeds on 12 May; and what the budget is for the remaining roadshow events planned for 2000. [124067]

Mr. Vaz: We have minimised costs for the current series of city visits by inviting local councils to organise the programme. The accommodation and transport bill for the "Your Britain, Your Europe" visit to Leeds came to £1,012. The total budget for the remaining city visits in 2000 is £18,000.

European Treaties

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Commission on the report from the Florence European University Institute on the reorganisation of the European Treaties. [124072]

Mr. Vaz: We are in regular contact with the Commission on the full range of issues that have been raised in the context of the current Intergovernmental Conference.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on how many occasions since 24 April 1999, (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124130]

Mr. Battle: For the period 23 April 1999 to 31 March 2000, special advisers in my Department have travelled overseas in an official capacity on seven occasions. The special advisers travelled by both commercial means and by RAF charter flights.

All travel complied with the requirements of the ministerial code and the Civil Service Management code.

WALES

Sterling

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the impact of the value of sterling upon manufacturing in Wales. [124425]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I understand the concerns over the strength of sterling against the euro. But the Government are determined to take the long-term view. The Government's policies are aimed at achieving sustained growth, sound public finances and low and stable inflation. Manufacturers who have suffered from the old boom and bust cycle would not want a return to short-term, quick fixes, which jeopardise long-term stability.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales on how many occasions since 28 February 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124113]

Mr. Paul Murphy: From 28 February 1999 to 30 June 1999, no departmental or non-departmental special advisers travelled abroad in an official capacity on behalf of the Welsh Office.

From 1 July 1999 to date, one special adviser has travelled abroad twice in an official capacity on behalf of the Wales Office, including a visit to Brussels.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what statistics relating to the responsibilities of his Department are collated by parliamentary constituency, indicating the dates covered in each case. [123837]

Mr. Paul Murphy [holding answer 25 May 2000]: My Department does not compile any statistics by parliamentary constituency.

Water Services

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when and for what reasons the safeguards to prevent the takeover of the company undertaking water services in Wales in a manner that is contrary to the public interest have been withdrawn; and if he will make a statement. [122685]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Under the Water Act 1989, the appropriate Secretaries of State were awarded a special share in the privatised water companies, empowering them to prevent anyone owning more than 15 per cent. of a company's shares. All such shares, including that held by the Secretary of State for Wales in Welsh Water, were to be redeemed on 31 December 1994, five years after privatisation, and this duly took place.

In addition, and uniquely, the Articles of Association of Welsh Water plc continued to provide for the 15 per cent. limit on individual voting share rights following redemption of the Golden Share. The removal of this provision required the approval of 75 per cent. of the company's shareholders. At an Extraordinary General Meeting on 21 March 1996, shareholders resolved to remove the 15 per cent. limitation from the company's Articles of Association.

I note that the Assembly has passed representations and comments on public interest principles to the Office of Fair Trading, who are evaluating bids and advising my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Digital Television

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place in the Library a copy of the report produced by Castle Transmission International in respect of increasing the availability of digital terrestrial television in Wales. [121834]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Castle Transmission International were commissioned by the Independent Television Commission (ITC) to research and investigate possible methods of expanding digital terrestrial coverage in the UK. The report was published on 17 March 1999 and is available on ITC's website, www.itc.org.uk.

New Deal

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the First Secretary concerning the New Deal in Wales, with particular reference to (a) the under 25s, (b) the over 25s and (c) the over 50s; and if he will make a statement. [116234]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have regular meetings with the First Secretary and discuss a range of issues including the New Deal.

(a) The New Deal for Young People (18–24 year olds) has been making excellent progress in Wales. Latest figures show that over 12,700 young people have now secured employment from the New Deal (of which 9,500 have been sustained for over 13 weeks) and nearly 8,000 young people are currently still on the programme.

(b) The New Deal for 25 plus (Long Term Unemployed) has been making steady progress since its launch in June 1998. At the latest count (end of December 1999) nearly 2,300 people had secured employment and over 4,800 are currently still on the programme.

(c) The New Deal for 50 plus is currently still in the pilot phase with nine "Pathfinder" areas across the UK (Flintshire and Wrexham in Wales). Full nation-wide implementation is scheduled to start on 3 April 2000.

Aerospace Industry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary concerning the prospects for the aerospace industry in Wales, with specific reference to Airbus, Broughton; and if he will make a statement. [116233]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I am in frequent contact with the First Secretary on a range of issues and we discuss many aspects of industry in Wales. This has included the BAe facility at Broughton.

I was pleased to hear that the first orders have been received for the A3XX Airbus, and also welcome the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence that the United Kingdom will be placing an order for 25 A400M aircraft.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he plans with the First Secretary concerning BAe Systems' application for an regional selective assistance grant; and if he will make a statement. [115202]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have raised the issue during my regular discussions with the First Secretary. As I have stated previously, details of RSA applications are treated as commercial in confidence between the Assembly and the applicant. Any decision on awarding RSA grant is entirely a matter for the Assembly, or the First Secretary in cases involving grant of the magnitude sought by BAe.

Forms

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123941]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Since it was established on 1 July 1999, the Wales Office has issued no forms which charities or other voluntary organisations are required to complete. Figures for Welsh Office forms prior to that date are not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Youth Unemployment

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on youth unemployment in (a) Wales, (b) Flintshire and (c) Deeside. [124424]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Youth unemployment in Wales, specifically North East Wales, has been declining since the General Election. Between April 1997 and April 2000 youth unemployment for Wales as a whole declined by 32.5 per cent., while in Flintshire youth unemployment declined by 23 per cent. over this period. Statistics are not collated on an area basis for Deeside, but for the unitary authority of Alyn and Deeside, youth unemployment declined by 16 per cent. between April 1997 and April 2000.

PRIME MINISTER

Criminal Assets (Compensation)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 24 January 2000, Official Report, column 4W, on confiscation of criminal assets, what decisions have been taken following the Performance and Innovation Unit's report on the pursuit and seizure of criminal assets; how the decisions are to be (a) made public and (b) reported to Parliament; and if he will make a statement. [123776]

The Prime Minister: No decisions have yet been taken. The report is being finalised and will be published shortly. Copies will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Stella Rimington

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 17 May 2000, Official Report, columns 327–28, if, as incoming Prime Minister, he was informed of Mrs. Stella Rimington's CV; and if he will make a statement. [123625]

The Prime Minister (holding answer 25 May 2000): No. As Dame Stella had retired as Director General a full year before I took office there would have been no reason for me to see it.

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Prime Minister since May 1997 how many laptop computers used by officials in his Office have been (a) lost and (b) stolen. [123667]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 May 2000]: None.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister for what reasons he has provided no answers to questions due for answer on 28 February (Ref. 112048 and 112049) to the hon. Member for Lewes. [124375]

The Prime Minister: I have done so today. My answers appear below.

Ministerial Residences

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he will list the residences made available to Ministers in the course of their duties, indicating in each case the location of the residence, the council tax banding and the Minister to whom each residence is allocated; [112048]

(2) if he will list for each residence currently made available to Ministers the sum spent in 1999 on (a) council tax, (b) rent, (c) repairs and maintenance and (d) redecoration. [112049]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 28 February 2000]: The cost to the Government in 1999–2000 of the routine maintenance and rent of Ministers' official residences is estimated at £1 million. In the last year of the previous administration expenditure was £1.2 million.

Numbers 10 and 11 Downing street and Carlton gardens have traditionally been the residences of the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Foreign Secretary. The flats in Admiralty House and the Government House in Pimlico, which have in the past been assigned to a variety of Ministers, are currently occupied by the Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Council, the Minister for the Cabinet Office and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment.

All these properties are in council tax banding H. The level and responsibility for payment of council tax is determined on whether the property is the Minister's main or secondary residence. If a main residence, the responsibility for payment of the tax falls to the Minister. If the property is a secondary residence, responsibility for payment falls to the responsible Department. Two Ministers occupying flats in Admiralty House met their own council tax payments, as did I. Departments met the other payments, which were £350 for each property in 1999–2000.

Rent and capital charges in 1999–2000 on each property were: 10 Downing street (£204,000), 11 Downing street (£287,000), Admiralty House flats (£75,185, £91,013, £94,091), Carlton gardens (£27,300) and Government House in Pimlico (£100,219).

The cost of routine maintenance and repairs in 1999–2000 were: 10 Downing street (£3,664), 11 Downing street (£32,189), Admiralty House flats (£38,442), Carlton gardens (£24,561) and Government House in Pimlico (£2,055).

In addition, during 1999–2000 as part of a repair, maintenance and replacement programme, agreed with English Heritage, £341,000 was spent on the roof, windows and external features of Admiralty House, a Grade 1 listed building.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and other Northern Ireland Ministers have use of accommodation in Hillsborough Castle while on duty in Northern Ireland. In 1999, £12,941 was spent on maintenance and minor works on these properties. Other costs are not separately identifiable.

In addition, the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Scotland also have the use of Chequers, Dorneywood, Chevening and Bute House. None of these is owned by the Government.

The Lord Chancellor has an official residence in the House of Lords which is provided in his capacity as Speaker of the House of Lords. The running costs are met by the House of Lords authorities and do not fall to the Government.

Committee on Standards in Public Life

Mr. Norman: To ask the Prime Minister when he will respond to the recommendations of the Sixth report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life; and if he will make a statement. [124626]

The Prime Minister: The Sixth Report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life, which was published on 12 January, concluded that the process of reform of standards of ethical behaviour in public life that had been set in train following publication of its First Report had been a success.

The Committee made a number of detailed recommendations across a range of issues which the Government are considering. We will present our full response to Parliament in due course.

Staff (Overseas Travel)

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Prime Minister on what dates members of the Policy Unit have travelled overseas on official business since 3 March 1999. [124126]

The Prime Minister: Since 3 March 1999 members of the No.10 Policy Unit have travelled overseas on official business on 71 occasions. All visits have been made in accordance with the rules set out in the Civil Service Management Code.

In addition, members of the No.10 Policy Unit have accompanied me on several of my official visits abroad.

These arrangements follow the practice of successive administrations.

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Prime Minister on how many occasions his (a) Chief of Staff and (b) Chief Press Secretary formed part of the official party accompanying him on overseas visits since 28 February 1999. [124125]

The Prime Minister: Since 28 February 1999 my Chief Press Secretary has accompanied me on all my overseas visits. My Chief of Staff accompanied me on seven occasions.

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Prime Minister on how many occasions since 2 June 1999 special advisers of the Chief Whip and Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124124]

The Prime Minister: None.

Lord Levy

Mr. Maude: To ask the Prime Minister what representations Lord Levy has received from Israeli Governmental organisations, indicating the officials and dates concerned. [119675]

The Prime Minister: Lord Levy has a range of contacts with members of the Israeli government, and with officials in Israeli government organisations.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Rothwell/Desborough Bypass

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to invite tenders for the construction of the A6 Rothwell/Desborough Bypass. [122325]

Mr. Hill: The Highways Agency will shortly be appointing consultants to complete the final stages of preparation and then oversee the construction of the bypass. Subject to the satisfactory completion of statutory procedures, the Agency expects to invite tenders for the construction contract in Spring 2001.

Waste Incineration

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the extent to which the application of the EU waste incineration directive complies with the Government's Better Regulation Guide. [122947]

Mr. Hill: The Better Regulation Guide was published four years after the waste incineration directive was first proposed by the European Commission. The cost-benefit analysis undertaken on behalf of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions to underpin the required Regulatory Impact Assessment by Entec UK Ltd. was carried out in accordance with Part II of the Better Regulation Guide, and the structure of the Entec report (copies of which are in the House Library) reflects this.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what estimate he has made of the (a) average cost of a small incinerator and (b) increase in this average cost consequent upon the application of the EU waste incineration directive; [122951]

(2) what assessment he has made of the average cost to a farm with a small incinerator of the steps needed to comply with the implementation of the EU waste incineration directive. [122950]

Mr. Hill: Full information on the purchase cost of small incinerators is not held, but we believe the cost of a new animal carcase incinerated under 50kg/hr capacity is of the order of £2,000-£10,000. Entec UK Ltd., who undertook cost-benefit analysis work on behalf of my Department in respect of the proposed waste incineration directive (copies of which are in the House Library), have estimated on the basis of a 100kg/hr unit that the capital compliance cost in respect of combustion requirements, abatement plant, monitoring equipment and spillage control for incinerators in the under 50kg/hr capacity category would be approximately £230,000 with annual operating costs of approximately £12,000.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effect of the EU waste incineration directive on UK compliance with the proximity principle of waste disposal. [122948]

Mr. Hill: Our policy on waste is set out in the Waste Strategy 2000, published on 25 May. This emphasises the priority the Government place on tough environmental standards for all types of incineration. It also makes clear that wastes should be disposed of as close to the point of production as possible, consistent with the need for effective environmental controls.

We are looking at ways of complying with the proposed directive which will minimise the burden on small-scale animal carcase incinerators and pet crematoriums while ensuring that there are appropriate environmental safeguards.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what assessment he has made of the number of small incinerators on farms that will close as a result of the application of the EU waste incineration directive; [122952]

(2) what plans he has to introduce a compensation scheme for farmers who may have to close their small incinerators following implementation of the EU waste incineration directive. [122949]

Mr. Hill: As matters stand, the proposed waste incineration directive will not have effect for existing incinerators until autumn 2005. We are currently looking at ways of complying with the proposed directive which will minimise the burden on small-scale animal carcase incinerator operators, including farmers and others, while ensuring that there are appropriate environmental safeguards.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the Government's target is for the amount of residential and commercial waste disposed of through incinerators by 2005. [123501]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The Government have not set targets for waste disposal by incineration. The waste strategy sets a target to recover value from 40 per cent. of municipal waste through recycling, composting or energy from waste by 2005.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the Government's policy is on the importation of rubbish from outside the United Kingdom to be disposed of in incinerators. [123486]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 23 May 2000]: Existing policies on exports and imports of waste are set out in the United Kingdom Management Plan for Exports and Imports of Waste, which came into effect on 1 June 1996.

The Plan does not permit imports of municipal waste for final disposal. However, to be consistent with the EC Waste Shipment Regulation (EEC No.259/93), the Plan cannot prohibit imports for genuine recovery, which could include incineration where the prime purpose was energy recovery. Any such imports of municipal waste would, though, be subject to a prior informed consent procedure; and the available data for 1996–98 show that no such imports occurred over that period.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the place of incineration in the Government's hierarchy of waste management options. [123517]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 24 May 2000]: The waste strategy set out the Government's view that reduction and re-use of waste should be considered before recovery. It emphasised that recycling and composting should be considered before energy recovery through incineration.

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact on farm costs of the implementation of the proposed EU waste incineration directive. [123652]

Mr. Hill: No assessment has be made of the impact of the proposed waste incineration directive on farm costs in general. The cost implications of the proposed waste incineration directive for the sort of small-scale animal carcase incinerators which may be operated on farms was considered by Entec UK Ltd. as part of the cost-benefit analysis work undertaken on behalf of my Department (copies of which are in the House Library). They have estimated on the basis of a 100 kg/hr unit that the capital compliance cost in respect of combustion requirements, abatement plant, monitoring equipment and spillage control for incinerators in the under 50 kg/hr capacity category would be approximately £230,000 with annual operating costs of approximately £12,000. We would expect farmers to look for alternative options rather than paying such sums. We recognise that this will involve some cost, but nowhere near £230,000.

Mr. Prior: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the proposed EU waste incineration directive. [124136]

Mr. Hill: The Government are committed to tough standards for incinerators and therefore welcome the proposed waste incineration directive.

The Council of Ministers is currently considering the European Parliament's amendments to the Common Position agreed in June 1999, including those affecting the scope, at official level. Council's rules of procedure do not allow me to comment on the detail of those discussions. No decisions have yet been taken by the Council in relation to the European Parliament's amendments, and we will keep the House informed in the usual way.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will seek a derogation from the EU waste incineration directive for small incinerators. [124321]

Mr. Hill: We have explored during negotiations on the waste incineration directive proposal various issues concerning the scope. The Common Position text includes an exemption for small experimental plant but it is clear that an absolute derogation for small plant is not available.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the likely shift in consumption of fuels in incinerators as a result of the application of the EU waste incineration directive, with particular reference to LPG and small incinerators. [124318]

Mr. Hill: No assessment has been made of the implications of the proposed waste incineration directive for the consumption of potential incinerator support fuels, such as liquefied petroleum gas.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what assessment he has made of the compliance with the better regulation test of proportionality of the application of the EU waste incineration directive to small incinerators; [124319]

(2) what assessment he has made of the compliance with the small business litmus test of the application of the EU waste incineration directive to small incinerators; [124320]

(3) what assessment he has made of the likely change in emission of pollutants as a result of the application of the EU waste incineration directive to small incinerators. [124317]

Mr. Hill: A Regulatory and Environmental Impact Assessment of the proposed waste incineration directive was undertaken in accordance with the Better Regulation Guide. Copies of the assessment and the consultants' reports underlying that assessment, undertaken for the Department by Entec UK Ltd., are in the House of Commons Library. Entec carried out small business litmus tests for incineration sectors containing small firms.

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received from pet crematoriums in relation to the proposed EU waste incineration directive. [123777]

Mr. Hill: I have received representations originating from six pet crematoriums and one representative organisation expressing concerns about the impact of the proposed directive on their businesses.

As matters stand, the proposed waste incineration directive will not have effect for existing incinerators (including pet crematoriums) until autumn 2005. We are currently looking at ways of complying with the proposed directive which will minimise the burden on small-scale animal carcase incinerator operators, including pet crematoriums, while ensuring that there are appropriate environmental safeguards.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what investigations the Environment Agency has made into irregular emissions from the incinerator at Northwick Park Hospital; and if enforcement action has been commenced. [123581]

Mr. Meacher: Several complaints were made between 1993 to 1995, all of which were investigated by the Environment Agency. Following a complaint in July 1995 the Environment Agency issued an enforcement notice. The operator complied by introducing controls on the blending and checking of waste. These modifications were carried out in November 1998. The Environment Agency is currently investigating a complaint made in April 2000 and will consider appropriate action in line with its Enforcement and Prosecution Policy when the investigation is complete.

Speeding Vehicles

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what data he collects on the percentage of vehicles that break the speed limit in each local authority area; what targets for reducing deaths and serious injuries on roads he sets for each local authority; and if he will make a statement. [123095]

Mr. Hill: Information about the percentage of vehicles breaking the speed limit is not available by local authority. National information was last published in "Vehicle Speeds in Great Britain: 1998", a copy of which is in the Library.

In July local authorities will produce new five-year local transport plans. These plans must include a local target for reducing road accident casualties, set against the national target of an overall 40 per cent. reduction by 2010 for the number of people killed or seriously injured, and a 50 per cent. reduction target for serious casualties to children.

Leeds Supertram

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his Department's evaluation of the proposals for the Leeds Supertram. [123278]

Mr. Hill: Major local transport projects will be considered by the Department as part of an overall strategy through the local transport plans (LTPs) to be submitted to the Department by the end of July.

Lifejackets

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 16 March 2000, Official Report, column 326W, if he will list the ships on the UK Register which have not replaced the lifejackets supplied by Bureau Venitas as directed by the Maritime and Coastguard Agency. [123382]

Mr. Hill: The Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA) issued a Press Release on 27 January 2000, requesting owners and operators of UK vessels to replace all Artica A and Artica B lifejackets, if carried. These were lifejackets manufactured by Messrs Canepa & Campi of Genoa and in respect of which Bureau Veritas had issued a certificate of Type Approval on behalf of the United Kingdom.

Owners were further requested to advise the MCA if their vessels carried these lifejackets and that changes had been made. To date no such reports have been received.

Methyl Tertiary Butyl Ether

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the banning of methyl tertiary butyl ether in the United States of America. [123443]

Mr. Hill: We understand that the US Federal Government's proposal to significantly reduce or eliminate MTBE in petrol—which had been actively encouraged in a number of US States for air quality reasons—has been made because of concerns about MTBE in groundwater. At the same time, the Federal Government have proposed that air quality benefits gained through use of MTBE—primarily reductions in carbon monoxide emissions—be preserved through the use of alternative, renewable fuel additives such as ethanol. This proposal has been made in the light of circumstances pertaining in parts of the United States and which may differ from those in many parts of Europe, including the UK.

For example, MTBE has not been actively encouraged in the United Kingdom, carbon monoxide emissions being controlled by other means. MTBE is used in significantly less quantities than in the United States and there is no evidence to indicate groundwater contamination. We are nevertheless keeping the matter under review and the Environment Agency is currently undertaking a study into oxygenates in groundwater.

Genetically Modified Baculovirus

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the Government have authorised the environmental release of a genetically modified baculovirus; and what assessment they have made of the risks involved in such a release. [122998]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE) assesses all applications for the deliberate release of genetically modified organisms.

Following advice from ACRE that there would be no risk to human health or the environment, the Government authorised the environmental release of insect-specific baculoviruses in netted enclosures under a Part B research and development consent. At the end of each release the enclosures were decontaminated and experimental material destroyed in line with the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 and the Control of Pesticides Act 1986.

Post trial monitoring has confirmed that all experimental organisms were destroyed and there was no harm to the environment.

Jubilee Line

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what contribution to the cost of the Jubilee line extension has been made by the developers of Canary wharf. [122632]

Mr. Prescott [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The Canary Wharf developers have to date made payments in the order of £150 million towards the cost of the Jubilee Line Extension.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what contributions by the developers of Canary wharf towards the cost of the Jubilee line extension remain outstanding; and when they are expected to be paid. [122633]

Mr. Prescott [holding answer 23 May 2000]: Following both scheduled and early repayments made to date, a further, final, payment of £50 million is due on 1 November 2000.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the contribution of the developers of Canary wharf towards the cost of the Jubilee line extension was increased to meet the cost overrun. [122634]

Mr. Prescott [holding answer 23 May 2000]: No.

Ilisu Dam

Mr. Gummer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on the environmental criteria to be applied in assessing the Ilisu Dam project. [123827]

Mr. Meacher: A round of Ministerial correspondence over whether to provide export credit support for the Ilisu Dam project took place in December 1999. This included correspondence between the Deputy Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. Departmental officials have also been in contact over the issues relating to this project since February 1999. Following Ministerial correspondence, it was agreed, as the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced on 21 December 1999, that export credit support for the project would be conditional on the Turkish authorities agreeing actions to address the concerns we have about the environmental and social impacts of the project. As the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry stated, the areas of concern which need to be addressed are:

1. A resettlement programme which reflects international standards and includes independent monitoring;
2. Provision for upstream water treatment plants capable of ensuring that water quality is maintained;
3. An assurance that adequate downstream water flows will be maintained at all times; and
4. A detailed plan to preserve as much of the archaeological heritage of the town of Hasankeyf as possible.

We are now waiting to see the final Environmental Impact Assessment Report of the project and the Turkish Government's proposed Resettlement Action Plan. Following the receipt of these reports the Government will decide whether our concerns have been adequately addressed.

Fair Rents (London)

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what was the average increase in fair rents upon re-registration since 1995 in (a) the Lambeth Rent Office area and (b) London; [123541]

(2) what was the average increase in fair rents since 1992 in (a) the Lambeth Rent Office area and (b) London [123542]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 24 May 2000]: Between 1995 and 2000 the average increase in rents upon re-registration was an estimated 16 per cent. in Lambeth Rent Office Area and 18 per cent. in London. These increases relate to the periods of 27 months on average.

Information on fair rents is collected only when re-registration takes place and comprehensive information on increases in fair rents is therefore not available.

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the average scarcity discount used by the London Rent Assessment Committee in calculating fair rents using market rent comparables since 1998 for (a) re-registered rent appeals in London and (b) re-registered rent appeals from the Lambeth Rent Office area. [123540]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 24 May 2000]: Rent Assessment Committees are required to show for each case they determine the arithmetical calculations used in reaching that determination, including any deduction from the market rent attributable to scarcity of accommodation in the market. However, we do not collect information centrally that would enable the question to be answered. The cost of providing the information requested would be disproportionate.

Waste Disposal (Agriculture)

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to promote the proximity principle for waste disposal in agriculture. [123654]

Mr. Mullin: The Government made it clear in statutory planning guidance "Planning policy guidance note 10: planning and waste management" that future waste management decisions should be based on the proximity principle, which says that waste should be disposed of as near as possible to its place of production, because the transporting of waste itself has an environmental impact.

South Atlantic Medal

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will arrange for the South Atlantic Medal to be awarded to those residents of the island of St. Helena who served on board RMS St. Helena in the war zone during the Falklands War. [123655]

Mr. Hill: The service performed by St. Helena residents on board RMS St. Helena during the Falklands War is much appreciated. Unfortunately the period served was just too short to meet the criterion for issue of the South Atlantic Medal, laid down in MOD Command Paper 544/82.

Byker Heat Station

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what materials were released to air from the Byker heat station in 1995; and if the operating licence imposed a duty to record the nature of the releases. [123899]

Mr. Hill: The Environment Agency's authorisation for Byker Heat Station prescribes annual mass limits for the releases to air of groups of significant materials: Sulphur Dioxide, Nitrogen Oxides, Carbon Monoxide, particulate matter, Hydrogen Chloride, Hydrogen Fluoride, certain aggregates of metals and Dioxins. The authorisation also requires recording and reporting of these releases; this information is forwarded to the Agency and is retained for inspection on a public register in Newcastle. The information is also available via the Environment Agency's website.

Releases of Byker Heat Station, Authorisation AF7690 in 1995

Substance	Limit of release (kg)	Total release (kg)
Carbon Monoxide	25,500	10,160
Hydrogen Chloride	14,000	7,060
Hydrogen Fluoride	600	174
Metals (CR+CU+MN+PB)	1,360	47.72
Metals (AS+NI)	240	4.48
Metals (CD+HG)	60	5.51
Nitrogen Oxides (AS N02)	98,000	53,580
Particulates—Total	8,500	2,060
Polychlorinated Dibenzo-P-Dioxin—all Congeners	0.03	0.117
Sulphur Dioxide	84,000	42,550

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 24 March 2000, Official Report, column 701W, if (a) back-up power for controls was required at the Byker Heat Station during the 1995 failure and (b) back-up is required and available now; for what reason the releases to air following the failure cannot be quantified; and what assessment he has made of the extent to which the failure to quantify such releases constitutes a breach of the operating licence. [123922]

Mr. Hill: In 1995 electrical power was supplied from the national grid and by the plant's own generator. As power is no longer generated on site, the alternative power source is no longer available. The authorisation issued by the Environment Agency does not specifically require back-up power.

The releases could not be quantified, as both the pollutant concentration and their flow rates changed continuously throughout the 15 minute incident. The amount released was non-quantified and did not constitute a notifiable release; the then regulator HMIP took no action. Authorisation conditions normally take account of transient conditions such as unpredicted power failure, and this did not constitute a breach of the authorisation.

Forms

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123949]

Ms Beverley Hughes: There has been no net change.

Wolverhampton-Shrewsbury-Chester Rail Line

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on progress made to make the Wolverhampton-Shrewsbury-Chester rail line a priority Trans-European Network. [123902]

Mr. Hill: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on 22 May 2000, Official Report, column 323W.

Telecommunications Masts

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what powers are available to planning authorities to regulate the siting, appearance and power of mobile phone transmitter masts. [124098]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Government planning policy for telecommunications is set out in Planning Policy Guidance note 8 (revised): Telecommunications, and the Department's Circular 4/99 "Planning for Telecommunications".

The installation of any telecommunications mast in protected areas, such as National Parks, Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty, Sites of Special Scientific Interest and conservation areas, and of masts above 15 metres in height elsewhere, is subject to a planning application for determination by the local planning authority. In the case of masts of 15 metres and below in height, local planning authorities are able to consider the siting and appearance of such development by licensed telecommunications code system operators in accordance with the "prior approval procedure" under Part 24 of Schedule 2 to the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995 (as amended).

Under the prior approval procedure, a local planning authority has the opportunity to say whether it wishes to approve, within 42 days for ground-based masts and 28 days for masts on a building or structure, details of the siting and appearance of the installation. If an authority considers that the development will pose a serious threat to amenity, it is able to refuse approval, although authorities are advised to explore the scope for modifying its siting and/or appearance before doing so.

Planning Authorities are not responsible for regulating the power of mobile phone masts, and have no powers to do so. Telecommunications operators have a duty under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 and the Management of the Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1999 to ensure that their work activities, which would include the operation of their apparatus, do not present a risk to employees and the general public.

In our response to the report of the Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones, issued on 11 May 2000 and placed in the Libraries of both Houses, the Government said that they were minded to introduce a requirement for an application for full planning permission for all new telecommunications masts, but would need to consult widely before doing so, including on the principle and precise scope of any new arrangements. We shall issue a consultation paper on this and related guidance as soon as practicable.

Local Government Conduct Guidelines

Mr. Prior: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if, following the recent issue of a public interest report by the District Auditor, pursuant to an objection to the accounts of Sheringham Town Council for 1996–97, he proposes to amend the national guidelines for local Government conduct, with specific reference to the exemptions contained in section 12(b) and to parish or town councillors who have been appointed to a voluntary body or charity; and if he will make a statement on the status of the guidelines. [124134]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Under the Local Government Bill currently before the House all local authorities, including parish and town councils, will be required to adopt a new Code of Conduct, in line with a new Model Code to be issued by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister. These Codes will replace the existing National Code of Local Government Conduct.

GM Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans there are to conduct a criminal investigation into the planting in spring of this year of an oil seed rape variety after it was discovered to be contaminated with GM seeds. [123755]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 25 May 2000]: The Government are still considering this matter.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the statement by Advanta that cross-pollination between GM and non-GM crops in Canada led to the contamination of rape oil seed planted in the United Kingdom, with particular reference to separation distances between GM and non-GM crops in the UK. [123267]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 23 May 2000]: We are urgently investigating with Advanta the circumstances in Canada that gave rise to the contamination of oil seed rape planted in the United Kingdom.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent discussions he has had with his counterparts in other member states of the European Union about the possible contamination of the European conventional maize crop with GM maize. [124342]

Mr. Meacher: I have not had any discussions with Environment Ministers of other member states about this issue, but I shall raise this at the June EU Environment Council.

My officials have been in contact with officials in other member states where Advanta seeds are known to have been sold.

Coastguards

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to the industrial tribunal decision in the case of Rigden/Hodgson, when he will issue employment contracts to auxiliary coastguards; if he has paid the arrears owing under the legislation on the national minimum wage; and if he will make a statement about the future employment of auxiliary coastguards. [123969]

Mr. Hill: The decision of the Newcastle Employment Tribunal is being considered and legal advice taken on grounds for appeal.

All serving auxiliaries have been paid the arrears of pay due as a result of bringing auxiliary coastguards wages into line with the National Minimum Wage. There have been problems in getting back pay to those who have left the auxiliary service, but contact has been made wherever possible and the arrears will be paid shortly.

Council Tax Discounts (Herefordshire)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many properties in Herefordshire qualify for 50 per cent. council tax discount for second homes; what is the cost to the Herefordshire Council of this discount; and if he will make a statement. [124536]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Herefordshire Unitary Authority has 2,266 properties in 2000–01 that qualify for a 50 per cent. discount. Not all dwellings that receive the discount are second homes, and the Department does not collect separate information on these dwellings. The 50 per cent. discount applies to all unoccupied dwellings and certain occupied dwellings such as those where all of the residents are disregarded, for example households consisting of someone severely disabled and their carer.

If a local authority has a reduced tax base because it has dwellings subject to a discount or exemption, it will receive more grant from the Government.

Aggregates

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the environmental consequences of an aggregates tax. [124442]

Ms Beverley Hughes: An aggregates levy would help to ensure that the environmental impacts of primary aggregates production not already addressed by regulation are more fully reflected in prices. This would be expected to have the following environmental consequences: a reduction in the amount of primary aggregates extracted—and in the associated environmental impacts; an increase in the use of alternative materials which would otherwise be wastes and disposed of; and less wastage of all aggregates.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what were the volumes of recycled/secondary aggregates used in the United Kingdom in each of the past 10 years. [124439]

Ms Beverley Hughes: These data are not available. Because of the difficulty in collecting the information, especially information on construction and demolition waste which arises on a very large number of temporary sites, consultants were asked to devise an appropriate collection system. The recommended system is being implemented.

Included in this is a survey of construction and demolition waste in England and Wales carried out in March by the Environment Agency, supported by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and the National Assembly for Wales. The returns are being analysed at present. Data on other material used as aggregate will be published as part of the report on the Aggregate Minerals Survey 1997. The results of both surveys will be published this summer.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the volume of construction aggregates produced in the United Kingdom in each of the past 10 years. [124438]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The total volume of crushed rock and sand and gravel produced for construction in the UK for each of the 10 years up to and including 1998, the most recent year for which reliable information is available, is set out in the table. The figures are those compiled by the British Geological Society using data from the Office for National Statistics and the Department of Economic Development (Northern Ireland). The figures for crushed rock used in these totals are for Great Britain only because crushed rock produced in Northern Ireland and used for construction is not specifically identified.

1990	285,631
1991	254,371
1992	242,879
1993	249,593
1994	271,176
1995	252,570
1996	229,271
1997	232,170
1998	230,031

Station Platforms

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what powers the shadow Strategic Rail Authority has to make sure the distance between a railway station platform and a train is at a safe level; which railway stations in England and Wales have a gap between the platform and the train exceeding (a) 30 centimetre and (b) 1 metre; what plans have been submitted by Railtrack to re-gauge platform heights at railways stations across Britain; and what action (i) has been taken and (ii) is planned, to implement the proposals. [124455]

Mr. Hill: Responsibility for the safe maintenance of platforms and their interface with trains rests with the infrastructure controller and train operators and not with the shadow Strategic Rail Authority.

The Health and Safety Executive's (HSE's) Railway Inspectorate monitors safety on the railways and enforces safety legislation. HSE has published "Railway Safety Principles and Guidance" (RSPG) which covers the issue of platform gaps for new and altered works. Any infrastructure developed outside this guidance must be agreed with the HSE. Additionally, Railtrack publishes criteria on this subject in the form of Railway Group Standards. Compliance with these Group Standards generally ensures compliance with criteria set out in the HSE Guidance. HSE is aware that historically the stepping criteria set out in RSPG are not complied with at a number of locations. It was this knowledge which led to the HSE criteria being developed. Railtrack is implementing a programme which is intended, among other things, to address the problem of large gaps between trains and platforms at stations. Some work has already been carried out; the programme is risk-based and prioritised. HSE is monitoring progress.

HSE's records are insufficiently detailed to provide information on locations where gaps may exceed particular dimensions. Railtrack's programme is intended to identify problem locations and to develop an action plan to deal with them.

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the current limit for the gap between a train and a railway station platform; what representations his Department has received regarding the dangers of large gaps between platforms and trains; what the Government are doing to ensure that the gap between a railway station platform and the train is at a safe level; who is responsible for ensuring that the gap between a train and a railway station platform is at a safe level; and what recent recommendations he has received from the Health and Safety Executive with regard to the distance between a train and a railway station platform. [124454]

Mr. Hill: Railtrack, as infrastructure controller, is responsible for the safety of its infrastructure. There are no regulations which specify a maximum gap at the train/platform interface. However, the Health and Safety Executive's (HSE's) Railway Inspectorate has published guidance documents entitled "Railway Safety Principles and Guidance" which provide an accepted standard of good practice for new or altered work within the railway industry. "Railway Safety Principles and Guidance Part 2 Section B: Guidance on stations" sets acceptable stepping criteria between trains and platforms, the maxima for these are:

350mm diagonally.

HSE is aware that historically some platforms exist where these dimensions are exceeded. Railtrack is developing a strategy of identifying and dealing with these on a prioritised basis. HSE is following this initiative closely to ensure that there is a satisfactory outcome.

These dimensions may only be exceeded when dispensation has been obtained from the Inspectorate. Warning notices reading 'Mind the Gap' with hatching along the platform edge, or other agreed measures for example, public announcements, may be required. HSE considers that to require the infrastructure controller or station operator to carry out work specifically to rectify platform gaps would not be reasonably practicable. HSE would however expect any planned alteration or new works around the train/platform interface to include a reduction in the gaps at interface.

The Department has received correspondence on this subject from time to time.

Trees

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his Department's policy is in relation to the country of origin of trees planted on its land and that of its agencies. [124624]

Mr. Prescott: My Department follows the guidance in "Towards more Sustainable Construction: Green guide for managers in the public sector" which encourages the planting of native trees and shrubs where this is feasible, and seeks whenever possible to use plants grown in the UK.

London Transport

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) directors and (b) employees of London Transport receive company cars as a part of their remuneration. [124407]

Mr. Hill: London Transport have advised that 22 Directors and 231 employees receive company cars as part of their remuneration.

Local Authority Funding

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the funds which are available to local authorities on application, indicating those for which the Torbay Unitary Authority has successfully applied in each of the last two years. [124195]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Local authorities may apply to this Department for the discretionary grants listed in the table provided they meet the criteria for the particular scheme. Those grants for which Torbay Unitary Authority has successfully applied for funding since April 1998 are indicated in the second column. The table does not include borrowing approvals for capital expenditure, funding that may be available through private finance initiatives or joint ventures with the private sector, or grants from non-departmental public bodies which are funded by this Department or other minor miscellaneous grants. The Department also administers the European Regional Development Fund, for which Torbay Council has received approval for funding in both 1998–99 and 1999–2000.

	Successful application by Torbay unitary authority
Discretionary grant available to local authorities	1998–99	1999–2000

[1] Torbay Council will receive funding in 2000–01 under Rural Bus Challenge Grant.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many occasions since 31 March 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124112]

Ms Beverley Hughes: During the period 1 April to the end of March 2000, Special Advisers in this department travelled overseas on seven occasions.

New Deal for Communities

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) how people from all minority groups will be encouraged to play an active role in the New Deal for Communities; [124383]

(2) how the New Deal for Communities is affecting (a) Irish, (b) Jewish and (c) traveller communities. [124382]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Our guidance for the New Deal for Communities (NDC) places a particular emphasis on involving all elements of the local community from the outset.

We have issued specific guidance on race equality to NDC partnerships, which highlights the needs of 'White' minority groups such as gypsies (and other travellers), Jewish communities and others. It underlines the importance of including groups within a local community which are seen as different; and offers practical advice on how to ensure inclusion and celebrate diversity.

We assess proposals from NDC partnerships for evidence of capacity to work with, and involve, ethnic minority and other minority groups in the neighbourhood renewal process. For the early stages of Round 2 of the NDC programme, we have appointed 'community mentors'—independent organisations whose role is to ensure a wide range of community involvement in the process from the start, and allocated funding to support that role. We also encourage partnerships to adopt approaches which build the capacity of different groups within the community to participate actively in the programme. Throughout the lifetime of the NDC, we will offer partnerships a range of support and advice, including help on maintaining the partnership of all sections of the local community.

Planning Applications

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will list the planning applications for development on land classified as agricultural by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food referred to his Department since 1 May 1997; and if he will give for each one the nature of the application and the outcome of the referral; [124139]

(2) if he will list the planning applications for conversion of farm buildings referred to his Department since 1 May 1997; and if he will give for each one the nature of the application and the outcome of the referral. [124138]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The information requested can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Hackney Carriages

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what steps must be taken by a proprietor in dispute with a hackney carriage driver for whom he holds a duplicate licence; [124559]

(2) if he will issue guidance to magistrates on the conduct of disputes between hackney carriage drivers and proprietors; [124651]

(3) if he will issue guidance to magistrates on the steps to be taken by a hackney carriage driver to secure the return of his duplicate licence which has been deposited at a magistrates court by a proprietor. [124558]

Mr. Hill: The statutory procedure governing disputes between hackney carriage drivers and proprietors about drivers' duplicate licences is set out in the London Hackney Carriages Act 1843.

There are no plans to issue guidance on this issue since the interpretation of legislation is a matter for justices in exercise of their judicial discretion.

Social Exclusion Unit

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Social Exclusion Unit will publish the guide to the ethnic minority aspects of the work it has done which was referred to in its National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal framework document. [124772]

Ms Armstrong: Tomorrow the Social Exclusion Unit will publish a report that summarises the work it has led to date on minority ethnic social exclusion issues.

The Social Exclusion Unit has looked at minority ethnic issues as an integral part of each of the projects that it has done so far, and the 18 Policy Action Teams it commissioned to look at various aspects of deprived neighbourhoods have also done so. The summary brings together the results of mainstreaming those issues. It analyses various aspects of minority ethnic social exclusion; illustrates what the Government are already doing to tackle them and summarises the ideas for further action that are under consideration in the National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal and follow-up to the Policy Action Team reports.

Copies of the report will be available in the Library of the House and in the Vote Office.

Private Hire Vehicles

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions following the case in the Queen's Bench Division between L. Benson and Copeland Borough Council, what plans he has to seek to restore the previous position whereby the spouse of a licence holder could use a private hire vehicle for any purpose other than for hire; when the case was heard; and if he will make a statement. [123875]

Mr. Hill: I hope to make an announcement soon.

TREASURY

Job Creation (Lancashire)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new jobs have been created in (a) Lancashire and (b) Burnley in the past year. [123525]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Peter L. Pike, dated 5 June 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question on employment changes in Lancashire and Burnley (123525). I am replying in the Director's absence.

Information is not available for job gains or losses. However the net change in the number of employee jobs in the latest year for which figures are available is as follows.

Net change in employee jobs (September 1997-September 1998)

Unemployment (Scotland)

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the unemployment rate in each of the areas covered by the pre-1997 travel-to-work areas in Scotland. [123578]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from John Pullinger to Mr. Andrew Welsh, dated 5 June 2000:

The Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) has been asked to reply to your recent question (123578) about the unemployment rate in pre-1997 travel-to-work areas in Scotland. I am replying in the Director's absence.

ONS produces two measures of unemployment. The first is derived from the Labour Force Survey (LFS). It is defined on a consistent and internationally recognised basis set out by the International Labour Organisation (ILO). This counts as unemployed people who are (a) without a paid job (b) available to start work within the next two weeks and (c) have either looked for work in the last four weeks or are waiting to start a job already obtained.

The ONS also publishes the monthly number of people who are claiming unemployment-related benefits also known as the Claimant Count.

The definitions of travel-to-work areas that were used before 1997 are those first used in 1984. LFS data for 1984 travel-to-work areas are not available but figures for the claimant count can be obtained from the Nomis database at the House of Commons Library.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many staff from his Department were seconded to private sector companies in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to April 2000; and if he will list in each case the companies to which staff were sent, the names and ranks of the staff involved and the duration of the secondment. [123416]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 24 May 2000]: Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Education, Health, Public and Private. Interchange is a key component of the reform agenda. The Modernising Government White Paper committed us to increasing interchange, in particular by bringing in more people on secondment and sending more of our people out.

The information required is as follows:

1 May 1997 to 30 April 1998	1 May 1998 to 30 April 1999	1 May 1999 to 30 April 2000

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what statistics relating to the responsibilities of his Department are collated by parliamentary constituency, indicating the dates covered in each case. [123845]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 25 May 2000]: The Treasury uses a very wide range of statistics, many of which are collected by the Office for National Statistics (ONS). Collection by the ONS is not specifically designed to produce statistics at the level of Parliamentary Constituencies, though statistics that the ONS can often provide at this level include economic status (employed, unemployed, inactive), the claimant count, employee jobs, average earnings, and Census data. Other government departments can also supply some statistics by Parliamentary Constituency. However, a comprehensive list of all statistics used by the Treasury that can be collated by Parliamentary Constituency is not held centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Commission Grants

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will deposit a copy of the latest Annual report on Beneficiaries of Part A Commission Grants in the Library. [123093]

Miss Melanie Johnson: This report is freely available via the internet web-page of the Commission. The House of Commons Library will be able to obtain a copy for the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what EU funds are distributed to the Christians for Europe Foundation; what assistance has been provided to the organisation by Community organisations for hosting conferences; what is the United Kingdom's share of the costs of such assistance; and if he will make a statement. [123618]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Commission's funding of such grants is published annually in its Report on Beneficiaries of Part A. This report is freely available via the internet web-page of the Commission, Europa, which can be accessed through the House of Commons Library.

European Integration

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy towards continuation of European Community budget line A-3022, European Integration Activities; and if he will make a statement. [123617]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The activities supported by this budget line are financed from the Commission's administrative budget. The UK seeks to keep such expenditure as low as possible.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the long-term consequences of EMU on further European integration in economic areas not presently covered by (a) QMV and (b) European activities; and if he will make a statement. [123621]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The EC Treaty sets out the legal framework for the operation of Economic and Monetary Union (EMU). Any changes to the Treaty would require the unanimous agreement of all member states.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what economic and tax information he will need to offer the EU prior to seeking to join the Euro. [123829]

Miss Melanie Johnson: As underpinned by Articles 99 and 104 of the EC Treaty, the UK once a year submits a Convergence Programme as part of the Stability and Growth Pact, and twice a year submits government debt and deficit data as part of the excessive deficit procedure.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the next phase of the information strategy for the euro, with particular reference to (a) sensitive groups, (b) opinion formers, (c) information multipliers and (d) children. [123628]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I refer the hon. Member to the second Outline National Changeover Plan, which was published on 9 March 2000. A copy of the Plan is available in the Library of the House.

Tax Rates

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 18 May 2000, Official Report, column 262W, on tax rates, where income tax rates are included in the Table 4.2 on marginal deduction rates in the Budget Red Book (HC 346). [123583]

Dawn Primarolo: Table 4.2 of the Budget Red Book contains estimates of the marginal deduction rates faced by working households in receipt of income-related benefits or the Working Families Tax Credit where at least one person works 16 hours or more a week. Income Tax rates are incorporated into the marginal deduction rate for those households where income tax is paid.

Enterprise Promotion (South-West)

Ms Atherton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures he proposes to promote enterprise within disadvantaged areas and groups in the South West Region. [122900]

Mr. Timms: The Government's aim is to help create a supportive environment for entrepreneurial activity in all sections of society. Long-term unemployed people who want to move into self-employment are being helped with support under New Deal options nationally; while the Employment Zone pilot in Plymouth has been helping long-term unemployed adults aged 25 plus to get back into work, including the opportunity to pool benefits, training and job search funds to help with business start-up costs, since April 2000. We will also be offering New Entrepreneur Scholarships in high unemployment areas, to equip potential entrepreneurs with the management and business skills needed to turn their aspirations into successful businesses. A pilot programme will be running in Cornwall (and London and Manchester) later this year, before a national roll-out in September 2001.

Moreover, the Government announced in November 1999 the creation of a new Phoenix Fund, with £30 million to invest over three years in promoting better access to business support and finance in disadvantaged areas. This includes:

a development fund to promote innovative enterprise support in deprived areas, including incubator units;

a national challenge fund to help resource community finance initiatives, and to evaluate the variety of approaches and distil best practices; loan guarantee support for community finance initiatives borrowing from wholesale sources of finance, so that they can on-lend in disadvantaged areas; and a network of mentors to pre and early phase business start-ups through a new Business Volunteer Mentoring Association, being run on a pilot basis until April 2001.

The Department of Trade and Industry has lead responsibility for the Phoenix Fund, including the disbursal of funding and business support in the South West.

The Government have also instigated a range of measures in recent Budgets, including cuts in capital gains tax and corporation tax, and enhanced capital allowances, which will benefit many of the 65,000 small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) in disadvantaged areas and the wider South West region. Moreover, the Government are currently financing a network of regional venture capital investment funds for early-stage SMEs, and contributing to a regional target of £85 million for the South West. The first steps towards this target are being taken now with the regional venture capital competition being run by the DTI.

The Small Business Service is also tasked with the brief of reaching-out to start-up and existing enterprises in disadvantaged communities, to increase accessibility of business support. These principles will also shape the selection and operation of local SBS franchises, operational from April 2001.

We are also bringing schools and businesses closer together, particularly those in high unemployment areas. We have already provided an extra £10 million nationally to boost enterprise skills in our schools. The new National Enterprise Campaign, launched in May, includes a particular focus on our high unemployment areas.

Investment Services Directive

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 11 May 2000, Official Report, column 477W, on an investment services directive, for what reason (a) it is proposed to upgrade the current directive and (b) a Green Paper is considered necessary. [123895]

Miss Melanie Johnson: This is a matter for the European Commission. The European Commission's Communication "Implementing the Framework for Financial Markets: Action Plan" (COM(1999)232) proposes a Commission Green Paper to review the Investment Services Directive as a basis for an efficient market for investment services.

Aggregates Tax

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the proposed aggregates tax will apply to imports of secondary/recycled and similar materials imported into the UK for use in aggregates markets. [124430]

Mr. Timms: The aggregates levy will apply to imported aggregate at the point of its first sale or use in the UK, on the same basis as domestically produced aggregate. This means that imported recycled aggregate will not be subject to the levy. Certain types of secondary materials—whether imported or of domestic origin—will also be exempted from the levy.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the proposed aggregates tax will apply to imports of products manufactured with aggregate minerals. [124447]

Mr. Timms: The draft legislation does not apply the levy to imports of processed products, given the difficulties inherent in establishing the taxable aggregate content of such products.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much it will cost to reduce national insurance contributions by 0.1 per cent., using revenue from the proposed aggregates tax, over each of the first five years of the operation of the tax. [124435]

Mr. Timms: Budget 2000 announced that an aggregates levy would be introduced from April 2002 with the revenues recycled to business through a 0.1 percentage point cut in employer National Insurance Contributions and a new Sustainability Fund.

The estimated costs of the reduction in employer National Insurance Contributions is around £0.35 billion in 2002–03, around £0.4 billion in each of the following three years and £0.45 billion in 2006–07.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue will be raised by the proposed aggregates tax over each of the first five years of its operation. [124434]

Mr. Timms: Table A1.13 in the FSBR provides a forecast for aggregates levy revenues in 2002–03.

Future revenues from the Levy will depend on future sales of primary aggregate. This will reflect construction sector demand and the extent to which the levy shifts demand from primary material to recycled and waste materials (which are exempt).

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment has been made of the effect of an aggregates tax on the UK's balance of trade in minerals and associated manufactured products. [124431]

Mr. Timms: The effect of the levy on the UK's balance of trade in minerals and associated products will be minimal. The levy will not apply to industrial minerals. The relief for exports of unprocessed aggregate and taxation of imports will help maintain UK competitiveness. International trade in aggregate products is limited by weight and transport cost.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of imported concrete products upon United Kingdom manufacturers of concrete products, following the introduction of the proposed aggregates tax. [124448]

Mr. Timms: Work by Customs economists suggests that the impact of the levy on UK concrete product manufacturers in terms of the treatment of imports and exports of processed aggregate should be small. This is mainly because there are very few imports and exports of concrete products due to the transport costs.

Quarrying Sustainability Fund

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what will be the income of the new Quarrying Sustainability Fund for each of the first five years of its operation; [124436]

(2) if there will be a guaranteed or minimum annual income for the new Quarrying Sustainability Fund. [124437]

Mr. Timms: The Government will be consulting all interested parties shortly on how the new Sustainability Fund can best be used to deliver local environmental improvements.

No decisions have yet been made on the size of the Fund.

Customs Officers

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reason he plans to reduce the number of customs officers, with particular reference to the post of intelligence officer; and if he will make a statement. [124374]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs have no plans to reduce the overall number of front line customs or intelligence officers. In fact, Customs are appointing nearly 1,000 more officers at key ports and inland locations to tackle tobacco smuggling.

Employers National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much it would cost the Exchequer to reduce the rate of employers' national insurance contributions to (a) 10 per cent., (b) 7.5 per cent., (c) 5 per cent., (d) 2.5 per cent. and (e) 0 per cent. for (i) employees aged 16 to 25, (ii) employees aged 26 to 40, (iii) employees aged 40 to 49, (iv) employees aged 50 plus years and (v) all employees. [124523]

Dawn Primarolo: The full year exchequer costs in 2001–02 for making the various reductions in the rate of employers' National Insurance contributions (NICs) for different age groups are set out in the table.

Exchequer cost: £ million

2001–02	Reduce employers' NICs rate to: 10%	7.5%	5%	2.5%	0%
Secondary Class 1
Age Range:
16 to 25	430	1,010	1,580	2,150	2,720
26 to 39	2,520	5,830	9,130	12,440	15,750
40 to 49	1,810	4,200	6,590	8,980	11,360
50 and over	1,570	3,630	5,690	7,750	9,810
Secondary Class 1—all ages	6,330	14,660	22,990	31,320	39,640
Class 1a and 1b all ages	220	520	810	1,110	1,400
Total	6,550	15,180	23,800	32,430	41,050

The estimates are consistent with the March 2000 Budget and rounded to the nearest £10 million.

It is not possible to provide reliable estimates for class 1a or class 1b by age range.

Income Tax

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost to the Exchequer of raising the basic rate limit by (a) £500, (b) £1,000, (c) £1,500, (d) £2,000 and (e) £2,500; and how many people would cease paying any tax at 40 per cent. in each case. [124524]

Dawn Primarolo: The full year costs of increasing the income tax basic rate limit for 2000–01 are given in the table.

Increase basic rate limit by:	Exchequer cost (£ million)	Number ceasing to pay at higher rate (Thousand)
£500	240	130
£1,500	690	350
£2,000	910	450
£2,500	1,110	540

Estimates are based on the Survey of Personal Incomes, projected in line with the March 2000 Budget.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost to the Exchequer of allowing a married person to transfer a wholly or partly unused tax allowance to their earning spouse (a) if they are in receipt of invalid care allowance, or if their youngest child is under the age of five years, (b) if they are in receeipt of invalid care allowance, or if their youngest child is under the age of 11 years, (c) if they are in receipt of invalid care allowance, or if their youngest child is under the age of 16 years, (d) regardless of these or any other responsibilities and (e) if they are in receipt of invalid care allowance. [124522]

Dawn Primarolo: The estimated costs for 2000–01 of allowing a married person to transfer an unused personal allowance to their earning spouse are given in the following table.

Cost of allowing transfer of unused tax allowances to earning spouses

Family type	Cost £ million
(a) Married couples who are either in receipt of invalid care allowance or whose youngest child is under the age of 5	850
(b) Married couples who are either in receipt of invalid care allowance or whose youngest child is under the age of 11	1,200
(c) Married couples who are either in receipt of invalid care allowance or whose youngest child is under the age of 16	1,350
(d) All married couples	2,000
(e) Married couples in receipt of invalid care allowance	30

The estimated cost of allowing a married person to transfer a personal allowance in the way most beneficial to the couple, regardless of whether it would be otherwise used, is £4,250 million.

Taxation (Private Medical Insurance)

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the net cost to the Exchequer of exempting private medical insurance, including that provided by employers for their employees, from insurance premium tax, taking into account changes to corporation tax and income tax liability. [124653]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs and Excise estimate that the net cost to the Exchequer of exempting private medical insurance from insurance premium tax would be around £140 million in 2001–02.

Taxation (I-E Formula)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 24 May 2000, Official Report, columns 524–25W, how much tax was paid in each of the years and in relation to each of the types of investment listed in the table. [124456]

Dawn Primarolo: The information requested is not available. Corporation tax is charged on a company's total income and gains, less allowable losses and reliefs. It is not attributed to specific sources.

Public Sector Pensions

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many members there are of public sector occupational pension schemes; and what is the (a) average and (b) median number of members in such schemes; [124505]

(2) how many public sector occupational pension schemes are (a) in existence and (b) receiving contributions; [124503]

(3) how many people transferred out of public sector occupational pension schemes owing to a change in occupation in each year since 1996; [124507]

(4) what is the (a) average and (b) median length of membership of public sector occupational pension schemes; [124506]

(5) how many public sector occupational pension schemes are funded (a) on a notional or pay as you go basis and (b) in the sense of holding investments. [124504]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Government Actuary's Department estimate that including single-member schemes there may be as many as 30,000–40,000 pension schemes in the public sector. Information is not held centrally on all of these schemes and could be collected only at disproportionate cost.

Limited Liability Partnerships

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultations he has had with the DTI about the tax consequences of plcs changing status to limited liability partnerships under the new limited liability partnership proposals; and what is his estimate of the effect on the public revenue. [124429]

Dawn Primarolo: As my hon. Friend is aware, under the proposals in the LLP Bill, the new Limited Liability Partnerships will be taxed as partnerships rather than as companies. I can confirm that the officials at the DTI have been in close contact with Inland Revenue officials who have been reviewing the draft legislation.

I would also refer my hon. Friend to what was said both in this House, by my hon. Friend the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs on Second Reading, 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 891, and in the other place by my noble Friend Lord McIntosh of Haringey on Report, 6 March 2000, Official Report, House of Lords, column 870. They both said that, because of the possibility that some LLPs might be set up solely because of their tax status as partnerships, officials at the DTI and the Inland Revenue will jointly be looking into the taxation of LLPs. Part of this work is likely to touch on the subject area of this question. And because this work is ongoing I am not in a position to give a more detailed answer at the moment.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has for bringing the tax regime of the proposed new limited liability partnerships into line with that applying to public limited companies; and what estimate he has made of the scale of losses to the Exchequer of public limited companies to register as limited liability partnerships. [124367]

Dawn Primarolo: On Report in the other place my noble Friend Lord McIntosh of Haringey recognised—6 March 2000, Official Report, House of Lords, column 870—the possibility that taxing LLPs as partnerships might make them attractive as a vehicle for a wider range of activities than they were intended for. Because of this, my noble Friend Lord McIntosh announced that work would be carried out jointly by the DTI and the Inland Revenue to look into these issues. Depending on what this work finds we will consider bringing forward further tax legislation in due course.

On second reading of the LLP Bill in this House my hon. Friend the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs referred again to this work—23 May 2000, Official Report, column 891.

Because this work is ongoing I am not currently able to give more detailed information.

Euro II Committee

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals the French Government have made to him about strengthening the role of the Euro II Committee and increasing its powers; and if he will make a statement. [124347]

Dawn Primarolo: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has regular discussions with his EU colleagues, and a wide range of issues are discussed.

PSBR (PFI Projects)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what reduction to the public sector borrowing requirement resulted from PFI projects in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000; and what is his estimate for 2000–01. [124409]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The choice of procurement route is taken only on the grounds of value for money, not on financing arrangements.

Capital expenditure incurred by the private sector in support of the delivery of services under PFI contracts and estimates of payments to be made are shown in tables C14–16 of Budget 2000 FSBR.

CITES

Mr. Randall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to increase expenditure on measures relating to the enforcement of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species by HM Customs and Excise. [124470]

Dawn Primarolo: There are no plans to increase expenditure on measures relating to HM Customs and Excise's enforcement of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species. The current allocation of resources is proportionate to the illegal trade in CITES goods.

Mr. Randall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures HM Customs and Excise are taking to ensure that the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species is enforced. [124469]

Dawn Primarolo: HM Customs and Excise has primary responsibility in the UK for enforcement of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (CITES). Customs' anti-smuggling staff maintain checks on imports and exports liable to CITES regulation as part of their normal duties. In addition, there is a specialist CITES Enforcement Team based at London Heathrow Airport and a regional network of CITES liaison officers specifically trained to advise on CITES cases and to work in co-operation with other interested agencies.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many officers Customs and Excise employ whose (a) sole and (b) primary role is to enforce CITES legislation; and what plans he has to increase their number. [124051]

Dawn Primarolo: HM Customs and Excise have eight officers whose sole role, and two officers whose primary role, is to enforce CITES legislation. There are no plans to increase these numbers.

Films (Writing Down Allowance)

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to remove or reform the 100 per cent. writing down allowance for UK films costing less than £15 million. [124044]

Dawn Primarolo: We have no plans at present to remove or reform the 100 per cent. writing down allowance for British qualifying films before its expiry date of 2 July 2002.

Intellectual Property (Taxation)

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the yield from the proposed abolition of income spreading rules contained in "Reform of the Taxation of Intellectual Property". [124041]

Dawn Primarolo: If income spreading were abolished, the additional tax yield would be negligible.

The Inland Revenue will shortly be publishing a Technical Note on the tax treatment of intangible assets (including intellectual property) and goodwill.

The Note will include further consideration of the income spreading rules.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which other countries operate a tax similar to the exit charge for owners of intellectual property proposed in "Reform of the Taxation of Intellectual Property". [124043]

Dawn Primarolo: A number of countries apply exit charges under certain circumstances.

The proposal for an exit charge included in the 1999 Inland Revenue Technical Note, "Reform of the Taxation of Intellectual Property", was based on similar provisions which already apply in the case of capital gains tax. It was intended to ensure that existing safeguards against abuse remained in place if intellectual property assets became subject to tax as income instead of capital.

The Inland Revenue will shortly be publishing, for consultation, a Technical Note on the tax treatment of intangible assets (including intellectual property) and goodwill. The Note will include further consideration of the safeguards that would be needed under a reformed regime.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the yield from the proposed exit charge on owners of intellectual property contained in "Reform of the Taxation of Intellectual Property". [124042]

Dawn Primarolo: No detailed information is available as to the likely yield from such an exit charge. The aim of the charge would be to protect revenue by discouraging avoidance rather than to target additional yield.

The Inland Revenue will shortly be publishing, for consultation, a Technical Note on the tax treatment of intangible assets (including intellectual property) and goodwill. The Note will include further consideration of the safeguards that would be needed under a reformed regime.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what representation he has received following the publication of the Inland Revenue paper, "Reform of the Taxation of Intellectual Property"; [124040]

(2) which organisations the Treasury has consulted directly with respect to the Inland Revenue paper, "Reform of the Taxation of Intellectual Property". [124039]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue's Technical Note, "Reform of the Taxation of Intellectual Property", was circulated widely and more than 80 responses were received. The Inland Revenue also consulted directly with a number of representative bodies and other interested parties.

The outcome of these consultations will feed into the further Technical Note which the Inland Revenue will be publishing shortly. This further note will seek views on possible reform covering a wider range of intangible assets and goodwill.

Pensioners (Taxation)

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the average cost is to the Exchequer of altering the tax code of a retired individual income taxpayer (a) at the start of the tax year and (b) during the tax year, after the original tax code has been set. [124037]

Dawn Primarolo: This information is not available.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many individual tax codes of people receiving age-related income tax allowances had to be changed by the Inland Revenue in (a) April 1999, (b) May 1999, (c) April 2000 and (d) May 2000. [124036]

Dawn Primarolo: Some 2 million notices of coding were issued to people aged 65 or more in May 2000 to reflect increases in their income tax allowances. Separate figures for this age group are not available for the other dates requested.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) men over 65, (b) men over 80, (c) women over 60 and (d) women over 80 years completed an Inland Revenue self-assessment tax form for the tax years (i) 1996–97, (ii) 1997–98 and (iii) 1998–99; and in each case, what proportion of them had a nil liability for income tax and capital gains tax in that year. [124035]

Dawn Primarolo: If a retired pensioner's income was below the level of their personal allowance in the previous tax year then they should fall outside the criteria for issue of a tax return in all but exceptional circumstances.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has for simplifying the Inland Revenue's administrative rules and practices as they apply to pensioners; and if he will make a statement. [124038]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government are working to ensure that dealing with the Inland Revenue is as simple as possible for taxpayers. That is why last July I announced measures which are taking up to 400,000 people—about half of whom are pensioners—out of self-assessment. The Inland Revenue is committed to supporting pensioners, whether in self-assessment or not, with a high level of customer service.

This Government are spending an extra £6.5 billion on pensioners across the course of this Parliament. We increased the age-related personal allowances for 1999–2000 by up to £200 above inflation, and for 2000–01 maintained them by increasing them by indexation. We have also introduced the 10p starting rate of income tax, extended it to savings and cut the basic rate to 22p.

Farm Averaging Rules

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to abolish or reform farm averaging rules. [124045]

Dawn Primarolo: There are no such plans at present.

VAT (Sports Organisations)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library the correspondence between HM Customs & Excise and the European Commission on VAT exemption for sports clubs and organisations. [123053]

Dawn Primarolo: Correspondence between the Commission and British officials are not usually placed before the House. In concluding the debate on The Value Added Tax (Sports, Sports Competitions and Physical Education) Order 1999 in Standing Committee on 26 October 1999, I offered to keep members informed of progress made by Customs and Excise in resolving issues for commercial sports clubs arising from their VAT position under EU law. I will continue to do so.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action his Department plans to take in respect of the recent Deloitte Touche report on VAT in respect of VAT levied on voluntary and community sports organisations and clubs. [123083]

Dawn Primarolo: It is not clear to which report the question refers. However, non-profit making organisations and clubs do not have to levy VAT on sporting services other than those supplied to non-members.

VAT (British Legion Poppies)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the requirement that the Royal British Legion must pay value added tax on the supply of poppies produced at its poppy factory; and if he will make a statement. [R] [123659]

Dawn Primarolo: There is no question of VAT being applied to poppies given in return for a donation. Customs are now consulting with the Royal British Legion about extending an existing concession so that it will cover materials bought to make up the lapel badge poppies.

Heroin

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of (a) the amount and (b) the proportion of heroin coming to the UK which originates in (i) Colombia, (ii) Burma, (iii) Afghanistan, (iv) Pakistan and (v) other major supplier countries. [124526]

Dawn Primarolo: There are currently no generally accepted estimates of the scale of heroin supply. HM Customs and Excise, along with other drugs enforcement agencies, are contributing to a comprehensive research programme to improve our understanding of the supply of drugs to the UK and Europe.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Drug Cultivation

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what drug reduction programmes are operated by the World Bank in countries where there is illicit drug cultivation. [118511]

Clare Short: The World Bank works in co-operation with the United Nations International Drug Control Programme (UNDCP) in Brazil, tackling prevention of HIV Aids acquired through intravenous drug abuse. Bolivia receives significant World Bank support for infrastructure work in illicit crop-producing regions, where UNDCP is providing support for development of alternative sustainable livelihoods. The World Bank is also working in partnership with UNDCP in Laos on a six-year programme to assist the development of alternative sustainable livelihoods.

Cancer Care Services

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps the Government are taking to assist developing countries improve the quality of their cancer care services; and if he will make a statement. [123796]

Clare Short: We contribute in assisting developing countries to improve the quality of their cancer care services through our support for the World Health Organisation's work in non-communicable diseases and its global role in standard setting, monitoring disease prevalence and advising national Governments on appropriate care. In addition, as reproductive health and safe motherhood is a priority for DFID, we also directly support research into cervical cancer prevention.

Fiji

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development which projects her Department supports in Fiji. [123917]

Clare Short: Our efforts in the Pacific are now concentrated on building up a regional programme focused on the reduction of poverty. This seeks to work with regional organisations and key multilateral organisations, particularly in the areas of education and governance.

The Republic of the Fiji Islands has received assistance through the Regional Rights Resource Team (RRRT) Project and the Governance Fund.

RRRT provides a range of innovative support in legal education, training and technical assistance. A major aim of the project is to have a functional network of Legal Rights Training Officers equipped with participatory teaching and advocacy skills to design and deliver appropriately adapted human rights education and to disseminate information about the law and human rights to women, youth and disadvantaged groups in their communities. RRRT supports two Legal Rights Training Officer positions in the Fiji Islands and has provided technical and training support to the Judiciary, Law Reform Commission, Human Rights Commission, Social Welfare Department and the Police.

The Governance Fund provides small grants aimed at encouraging the development of a culture for good governance and funds activities that raise public awareness and understanding of governance and which encourage meaningful participation through consultations in policy formulation. Assistance has been provided in the Fiji Islands only where activities serve as a model for best practice and have a broader regional impact mainly to Civil Society Organisations and Government.

The Fiji Islands receive assistance through the Small Grant Scheme which is administered by the British High Commission and enables them to provide small development projects which address one or more of DFID's priority objectives.

We will be reviewing our programme in Fiji in the light of recent developments.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development on how many occasions since 31 March 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124109]

Clare Short: Special Advisers from my Department have travelled abroad on official business on three occasions since 31 March 1999.

Ilisu Dam

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she was consulted about human rights and sustainable development issues relating to the Ilisu Dam project in Turkey; and what advice she gave. [124181]

Clare Short: We were consulted about this project, as a part of ECGD's wider Whitehall consultation, in January 1999. We commented on ECGD's terms of reference for an independent review of environmental and resettlement impact reports produced by the project sponsors. DFID has no engagement with Turkey other than our support for emergency relief following the earthquake in August and November 1999. We have therefore had no advisory input into the Ilisu Dam project.

Ethiopia and Eritrea

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement about her development aid policy towards Ethiopia. [124502]

Clare Short: We have reviewed our development relationship with both Ethiopia and Eritrea in the light of the recent renewed conflict.

We have concluded we should maintain only interventions related to food security and activities with civil society. We are pressing the World Bank and EU to follow suit. Our briefing on the situation in Ethiopia has been placed in the Library.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the humanitarian situation of the Eritrean refugees in eastern Sudan. [124075]

Clare Short: The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees confirms that since 18 May up to 50,000 Eritrean refugees have fled from the conflict with Ethiopia and crossed the border into eastern Sudan near Kassala. 41,000 are already registered. The situation in the refugee camps is not critical, but UNHCR say that water, health and sanitation are the main priorities. The World Food Programme is also engaged on the ground as is the European Commission through Oxfam. Other international non-governmental organisations are carrying out further urgent needs assessments. We are ready to respond to proposals arising from these assessments.

Mozambique

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what additional resources she has made available to Mozambique following the recent flooding. [124058]

Clare Short: My Department committed £20 million for emergency humanitarian and rehabilitation assistance to Mozambique following the floods. We also provided £10 million of budget support in March 2000 to help counteract the effect of the floods on the Government of Mozambique's budget.

At the Rome Conference in May this year my Department pledged £6 million so far uncommitted from this year's country development programme for flood reconstruction efforts. We are currently assessing the most effective way to spend this money.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list (a) the projects that her Department is currently funding in Mozambique, (b) their aggregate value and (c) projects postponed or ended as a result of redirection of funding to reconstruction work. [124057]

Clare Short: (a) The projects DFID is currently funding in Mozambique are:

Strengthening of Planning and Budgeting at the Ministry of Planning and Finance

Enterprise Development Project

CRESCE Mozambique: Expansion of Microfinance Programme

Customs Department Reform

Zambezia Agricultural Development Project

National Programme for Agrarian Development

Feeder Roads in Zambezia

Assistance to the NGOs Forum of Zambezia

Demining in Zambezia: HALO Trust

Social Marketing of Condoms

HIV/AIDS Strategic Planning

Support for National Health Planning

Secondary English Teaching Project.

(b) The aggregate value is £53 million. In addition we provide support to Mozambique's budget averaging about £10 million per year, and have committed £20 million to flood relief this year.

(c) No projects have been postponed or ended as a result of redirection of funding to reconstruction work.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the response of the European Community Humanitarian Office to the flooding in Mozambique. [124569]

Clare Short: Reports indicate that ECHO projects were able to progress without delay, despite some claims of delays in transfer of funding. My Department is sending a monitoring team to Mozambique in mid-June. One of their tasks will be to liaise with ECHO officials on the ground to assess the effectiveness of their response.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the humanitarian situation in Mozambique. [123918]

Clare Short: The humanitarian situation in Mozambique has continued to improve as the flood waters have receded and road access has improved. However, the continued provision of emergency assistance to those worst affected by the floods will remain essential while longer term rehabilitation and reconstruction efforts get into full swing. For example, the World Food Programme is continuing to make food deliveries to over 500,000 people, which includes some 10,000 still accommodated in displacement camps and unable to return to their homes due to the residual flooding.

Those who have returned home are beginning to rebuild their houses and plant crops. Many have been provided with materials and tools provided under relief projects. There have been no major outbreaks of communicable diseases and agencies are working effectively with the Mozambican authorities to rehabilitate schools and health units.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to incorporate EU spending on development assistance into her Department's public service agreement figures on the percentage of bilateral programme resources allocated to low income countries. [124562]

Clare Short: UK contributions to EU spending on development assistance are classified as multilateral spending. A revised Public Service Agreement will be published in July.

Nigeria

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations she has received from the Nigerian Government about debt relief. [123972]

Clare Short: There have been frequent exchanges over debt relief with the Nigerian authorities. We have made clear our strong support for a generous rescheduling for Nigeria in the context of an IMF-endorsed economic programme. We have also made clear we would be willing to consider partial debt cancellation if a strong record of reform is established and a debt sustainability analysis shows it to be necessary.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her Department's aid to Nigeria in 1998–99. [124060]

Clare Short: Health, education, water and sanitation and rural livelihoods were the main sectors for our assistance. In addition, we provided support for economic reform and for the election process in the second half of the year.

Uganda

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the decision of the Paris Club not to discuss debt relief for Uganda at their meeting on 16 May. [123973]

Clare Short: Uganda received debt relief of $347 million in 1998 under the original HIPC initiative, and, earlier this year, qualified for a further $656 million relief under the revised HIPC framework. The Government of Uganda was scheduled to come to a meeting with the Paris Club of official bilateral creditors on 16 May to implement this element of their debt relief. However, in the week before the meeting, we, and a number of other Governments, were concerned to receive reports of Uganda's role in fighting at Kisangani in the Democratic Republic of Congo. It was therefore agreed that the implementation of Uganda's debt relief should be postponed. I am pleased that the Government of Uganda are responding to these concerns. We hope that the Paris Club meeting will be rescheduled soon. Uganda continues to receive interim relief on its debt service payments to the IMF and World bank.

Departmental Staffing and Costs

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the numbers of staff employed directly by her Department on (a) 1 May 1997 and (b) 1 May 2000. [124571]

Clare Short: Our Department employed the following:

Date[1]	Number of staff
(a) 1 April 1997	1,001
(b) 1 April 2000	1,322

[1] The figures are compiled on a quarterly and annual basis. We have therefore quoted the position on 1 April because we do not hold exact figures for 1 May.

Note:

These figures do not include staff employed on contract terms in the UK and overseas.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the administration costs of her Department on (a) 1 May 1997 and (b) 1 May 2000. [124572]

Clare Short: Information on DFID's administrative (running) costs for each of the last six financial years is provided in Table 3, page 130, of the latest version of the Departmental Report, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many press officers there were in her Department in (a) May 1997 and (b) May 2000. [124570]

Clare Short: The number of press officers was four on both occasions.

British Council

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list (a) British Council grant-in-aid funded by her Department and (b) the value of contracts awarded to the British Council in each year from 1979 to 2000 [124566]

Clare Short: (a) in 1998–99 it was agreed that the management of the British Council by two Departments was unnecessarily cumbersome. Responsibility was passed to the FCO along with the funds earmarked for this purpose.

(b) The total value of consultancy and Technical Co-operation Training contracts that DFID have awarded to the British Council in each of the following financial years are:

1999–2000	23.3
1998–99	52.8
1997–98	42.2
1996–97	62.0
1995–96	27.3

We introduced a new computerised contract monitoring system early in 1996, and we are unable to provide accurate data prior to this period.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development to what extent the supply of arms to the Sierra Leone police and army is funded by her Department. [123971]

Clare Short: None of the arms supplied have been funded by my Department.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what aid programmes her Department is currently funding in Sierra Leone. [123924]

Clare Short: DFID has allocated resources in support of the following projects in Sierra Leone:

Support to the Government of Sierra Leone's National Programme for Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration

Emergency support to Lungi Demobilisation Camp

Security Sector Project (SILSEP)

Support to the Commonwealth Police Development Taskforce (includes Police Humanitarian Fund and Public Order support)

Provision of an Inspector General of Police

Military Reintegration Plan (MRP)

Commonwealth Community Safety and Security Project

Support to Civil Society (Campaign for Good Governance)

Support for the return of Paramount Chiefs

Law Development Project (including Legal Draftsman)

Media Development Project

Governance Assistance Programme: managed by British Council

Support to the President's Office

Humanitarian Relief and reconstruction

Budgetary Support for essential services/repayment of debts

Provision of a ferry

DFID is also a significant contributor to the programmes of the World Bank, African Development Bank, European Commission and United Nations.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with the World Food Programme concerning farming and food security in Sierra Leone. [124056]

Clare Short: Discussions were held with World Food Programme representatives during a recent visit to Sierra Leone by humanitarian specialists from my Department. They established that there were adequate food stocks available within the country to cope with current needs. Hunger and cases of malnutrition have been reported some two months ahead of the usual pattern. The situation is particularly bad in rebel-held areas of the north and east where food stocks have been severely depleted through looting. Humanitarian agencies are constrained from assisting until access becomes possible.

Basic Education Projects

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many basic education projects were funded by her Department in (a) Bangladesh, (b) Bolivia, (c) Burkina Faso, (d) Cambodia, (e) Colombia, (f) Ethiopia, (g) Gambia, (h) Ghana, (i) Guatemala, (j) India, (k) Kenya, (l) Malawi, (m) Mozambique, (n) Myanmar, (o) Nepal, (p) Niger, (q) Nigeria, (r) Pakistan, (s) Peru, (t) Philippines, (u) Russian Federation, (v) South Africa, (w) Southern Africa, (x) Sri Lanka, (y) Sudan, (z) Tanzania, (aa) Uganda, (bb) Zambia and (cc) Zimbabwe; and what was the aggregate cost of each one. [124567]

Clare Short: Our bilateral aid programme is currently financing the following projects and programmes which support basic education:

County	Number of projects	Aggregate commitment (£ million)
Bangladesh	4	26.8
Bolivia	0	—
Burkina Faso	0	—
Cambodia	0	—
Colombia	1	0.1
Ethiopia	0	—
The Gambia	1	0.6
Ghana	2	61.8
Guatemala	0	—
India	9	129.4
Kenya	4	22.7
Malawi	4	64.4
Mozambique	1	0.1
Myanmar	0	—
Nepal	1	0.2
Niger	0	—
Nigeria	2	4.1
Pakistan	4	50.4
Peru	1	1.4
Philippines	0	—
Russian Federation	0	—
South Africa	4	13.4
Southern Africa (Botswana)	1	1.7
Southern Africa (Namibia)	1	5.7
Sri Lanka	0	—
Sudan	0	—
Tanzania	5	11.9
Uganda	6	89.9
Zambia	5	23.7
Zimbabwe	0	—

DFID also supports the development of basic education in many of the countries given in the table through its multilateral aid programme and grants to UK NGOS.

Our aim is to help build and sustain effective and equitable education systems which give priority to primary education for all. This requires a shift from the traditional projects-based approach to a sector-wide approach to education, with development agencies working together around a focused, agreed strategy drawn up by the Government of the country concerned. Uganda is a good example. In collaboration with five other donors and the Government of Uganda, DFID has played a key role in the establishment of a sector-wide approach to education, resulting in 1998 in its largest ever commitment to a programme in Africa (£67 million) towards the education sector support programmes. This will provide flexible budget support to the Government for five years.

Angola

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the current humanitarian situation in Angola. [124563]

Clare Short: The situation in Angola is serious. The UN estimate that about 3.7 million civilians are affected by the civil war.

The UK has provided over £2.5 million bilateral humanitarian assistance since the beginning of 2000. A lasting peace is desperately needed to enable Angolans to rebuild their lives.

Debt Relief

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list (a) each country that had received 100 per cent. debt relief from Her Majesty's Government by 23 May and (b) how much aid has been cancelled in each case. [124059]

Clare Short: The Government announced in December 1999 that they will provide 100 per cent. relief for qualifying HIPC countries on their remaining debts owed to the ECGD. Aid debts have already been cancelled. This relief will be available, on a conditional basis, from Decision Point until Completion Point, when it will become irrevocable. By 23 May, Uganda, Bolivia, Mauritania, Tanzania and Mozambique had reached their Decision Point under the revised HIPC framework, and so qualified for full relief on their debts to ECGD.

The amount of debt that will be relieved under the 100 per cent. policy for each country will not be known until it reaches Completion Point. So far, only Uganda has reached Completion Point, and all of its remaining ECGD debt will be cancelled under the HIPC framework.

This assistance is additional to the aid provided under our existing bilateral programmes with HIPC countries.

Disaster Response

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to improve the way that the international community responds to natural disasters. [124568]

Clare Short: My Department has been working since 1997 to strengthen and improve the three main elements of international disaster response. Firstly, we are working with the Red Cross Societies to improve their preparedness and response to disasters, specifically in poor countries. Secondly, we are working with United Nations organisations such as the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, the World Food Programme, United Nations Children's Fund and United Nations High Commission for Refugees, to improve their coordination and improve the speed and effectiveness of their responses. And, thirdly, we are working with the international non-governmental organisations to agree minimum standards of assistance that those affected by disasters can expect to receive.

Our aim is to build a better international humanitarian system but until that is achieved there is a role for donor Governments, such as the UK, to fill gaps in rapid direct response. Therefore my Department maintains an extensive capacity to respond to emergencies around the clock. The decision on whether an operational response is justified and, if so, in what form, is based on assessed needs on the ground and the operational resources available locally or regionally.

Seychelles

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development, pursuant to her answer of 29 March 2000, Official Report, column 185W, on the Seychelles, how financial assistance provided by her Department for the Seychelles was spent in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98 and (c) 1998–99. [123962]

Clare Short: Our financial assistance to the Seychelles during this period was as follows:

	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99
Technical Cooperation[1]	96,263	61,038	37,158
Heads of Mission Small Projects/Gifts	283,542	249,274	163,717
Financial Aid[2]	22,026	18,018	15,449
Disaster Relief	4,659	0	0
Total	406,490	328,330	216,324

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Millennium Dome

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the sponsors of corporate hospitality events at the Dome. [119309]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 17 April 2000]: In the year to date, the official sponsors of the Millennium Experience account for the majority of bookings (47 per cent.) for corporate hospitality events. The bulk of the remaining bookings (30 per cent.) are made through NMEC's corporate hospitality partners: Business Pursuits; Cavendish Hospitality; Langston Scott Limited; Letheby & Christopher and Mark Butler Associates. A smaller number of one-off bookings (23 per cent.) from within NMEC and from charities and other third parties, such as the TUC, account for the remainder of the total. A significant number of this latter category of clients requested that details of their bookings remained private.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the minutes of the meeting of the Millennium Commission at which it was decided to grant an additional £29 million to the Millennium Dome. [124480]

Mr. Chris Smith: This is a matter for the Millennium Commission. I will write to the right hon. Member in my capacity as Chairman of the Commission, and place copies of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

Digital Broadcasting

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the number of relay stations in Wales which will require conversion to deliver a comprehensive digital terrestrial service; and what estimate he has made of the cost of conversion. [123287]

Janet Anderson: The present digital terrestrial television transmitter network comprises 81 transmitter sites, of which nine are located in Wales. The Government will ensure that all viewers in Wales who presently receive analogue television will be able to receive the main free-to-air channels digitally, before the analogue transmissions are fully switched to digital. The ITC, BBC and the digital broadcasters are planning jointly the development of digital terrestrial television coverage across the UK. However, the joint project has not estimated how many analogue transmitters would have to be converted, or the associated cost, to replicate analogue terrestrial coverage in Wales or elsewhere in the UK.

Tourism (East Lancashire)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to promote tourism in East Lancashire. [123523]

Janet Anderson: The North West Tourist Board (NWTB) will receive £383,845 for tourism projects in the region from the English Tourism Council in 2000–01—an increase of 32 per cent. on the previous year. These projects include a series of research initiatives at both the regional and pan-regional levels that will provide an enhanced level of intelligence to the tourism industry of the region. East Lancashire, in common with all parts of England, also benefits from the promotion work of the British Tourist Authority (BTA), which promotes Britain as a visitor destination in overseas markets. The BTA is receiving £37 million from my Department this year.

Tourism and culture in Lancashire have also benefited, both directly and indirectly, from the National Lottery (2,300 projects in the county have received awards totalling £468,716,329 according to the Department for Culture, Media and Sport's National Lottery Awards Database which uses information supplied by the distributing bodies).

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many staff from his Department were seconded to private sector companies in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to April 2000; and if he will list in each case the companies to which staff were sent, the names and ranks of the staff involved and the duration of the secondment. [123429]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 2000]: The information for staff seconded from my Department to private sector companies for the periods specified is as follows:

(a) For May 1997 to April 1998, one Grade A (Grade 7 equivalent) secondment since September 1997 which is still on-going.

(b) For May 1998 to April 1999, two Grade C staff (EO equivalent) secondments since May 1998 for two years and six months respectively.

(c) For May 1999 to April 2000, one Grade A secondment since May 1999 for a period of 3 years.

All secondments were to the New Millennium Experience Company.

Information on secondments of staff into the Department was provided in my answer to the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) on 28 February 2000, Official Report, column 100W.

Dome Loan

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when the latest Millennium Commission allocation of funds to the Dome will be repaid. [123849]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 25 May 2000]: This is a matter for the Millenhium Commission. I will write to the hon. Member in my capacity as Chairman of the Commission, and place copies of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

Dome Sale

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport to which body or bodies proceeds of the sale of the Millennium Dome site will be payable. [123799]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 25 May 2000]: The proceeds from the sale of the Millennium Dome will be split between the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC), as the owners of the Dome structure and contents, and English Partnerships, the Government agency that owns the Dome site and the surrounding land, to reflect the value of the assets for sale.

Film Classification

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what external legal advice he has taken on the classification of films shown at a cinema as (a) goods and (b) services for the purposes of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995; and if he will make a statement. [123871]

Janet Anderson: My Department has not sought external legal advice on this issue. The view of the Government's legal advisers is that the films shown in cinemas are not covered by Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (DDA) (the provisions relating to goods, facilities and services). However, cinema proprietors have the same responsibilities under Part III of the Act as other providers of services to the public. These provisions make it unlawful for service providers to discriminate against disabled people by: refusing them service; providing them service on worse terms; or providing a lower standard of service. In addition they must make reasonable adjustments when their services are impossible or unreasonably difficult for disabled people to use.

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123732]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 25 May 2000]: Since May 1997, five laptops have been lost. None have been stolen or reported stolen. None of the laptops were used by Ministers or special advisers.

Free Television Licences

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many pensioners over the age of 75 years are eligible for free TV licences in Cleethorpes constituency, broken down by electoral ward. [123876]

Janet Anderson: I would refer my hon. Friend to my answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) on 2 March 2000, Official Report, column 350W.

Millennium Commission

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the minutes of the Millennium Commission meeting on 22 May. [124061]

Mr. Chris Smith: This is a matter for the Millennium Commission. I will write to the hon. Member in my capacity as Chairman of the Commission, and place copies of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will set out the distinction between his role as Chairman of the Millennium

Commission and his role as Secretary of State, with particular reference to the avoidance of conflicting interests. [124062]

Mr. Chris Smith: The roles of Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (previously National Heritage) and Chairman of the Millennium Commission are separate and distinct, but have run in tandem since the Millennium Commission was established in 1994. The Millennium Commission is an independent body, with the status of a body corporate. Each of the nine Commissioners, including myself as Chairman, have equal status.

Both roles are governed by strict rules covering conflicts of interest—namely the Ministerial Code: A Code of conduct and Guidance on Procedures for Ministers; and the Code of Conduct for members of the Millennium Commission.

Leisure Centres and Libraries (Access)

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what definition he uses of a reasonable distance when determining access to (a) a leisure centre and (b) a library. [124644]

Kate Hoey: No specific definition of distance is used to determine access to leisure centres. Sport England have established a Facilities Planning Model to help assess the extent of under provision of different kinds of sports facility. That model currently uses driving time rather than distance. It is currently being updated to take greater account of other modes of transport.

In respect of libraries, there is no generally agreed definition of reasonable distance from a library and information about the distance of people from their nearest library is not available. However, we launched a consultation paper, on 15 May, setting out draft standards for public libraries, and proposed there that "all service points (i.e. central, branch and mobile libraries) should be located within reasonable travelling time for the majority of intending users regardless of their method of travel".

We further proposed as a draft standard that a reasonable travelling time would be 20 minutes. National measurements to assess performance against this standard are not currently available, but we will, during the coming year, be drawing on information from library authorities' work towards clarification of a reasonable travelling time, and its assessment.

Convicted Foreign Sportsmen

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received concerning the consequences for the staging of international sporting events in the United Kingdom of foreign sportsmen and women who have been convicted of a serious criminal offence being refused entry into the United Kingdom. [124460]

Kate Hoey: Neither I nor my right hon. Friend have received any representations on this particular matter.

This Government are committed to attracting major international sporting events to the UK and, in the usual way, we have signed undertakings to a number of international sports governing bodies on the entry of athletes and officials to the UK as part of the bidding process. These undertakings do not offer carte blanche entry to the UK for those associated with events, and cases will continue to be judged on an individual basis.

National Lottery (Computer Failures)

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received from (a) Camelot, (b) OFLOT and (c) the National Lottery Commission on the failure of the National Lottery's computer system to award accurate payouts to prize winners; if he will ensure that the National Lottery operator makes good losses of prize money caused by computer failure; and if he will make a statement. [124358]

Kate Hoey: The National Lottery Commission (which took over OFLOT's functions on 1 April 1999) has a statutory duty to ensure that the National Lottery is run and promoted with all due propriety, and to protect the interests of players. It has kept officials and, through them, Ministers informed of the defect in the National Lottery software and of its on-going investigations. It will determine the appropriate course of action once all the facts have been established and fully considered, and make a further statement at that time.

I understand that Camelot has already said that it will reimburse the full amount not paid to winners. Where it can identify winners it will pay them direct and, where it cannot, it will liaise with the Commission over the best course of action.

New Opportunities Fund

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much money from the New Opportunities Fund has been allocated to Wales (a) in total and (b) as a percentage of total funding. [124463]

Kate Hoey: New Opportunities Fund money is allocated to England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland on the basis of population levels and is weighted to reflect the level of deprivation in each country. The total amount allocated to Wales under the Fund's health, education and environment programmes is £91.4 million. This amount represents 6.5 per cent. of all UK funding (with the exception of the Information and Communications Technology (ICT) training programmes for teachers and librarians where slightly different proportions are used).

The Funding available to Wales under each of the programmes is as follows:

ICT training for teachers and school librarians	12.65
ICT training for public library staff	0.870
Out of School Hours Child care	14.3
Out of School Hours Learning	13.3
Cancer prevention, detection, treatment and care	9.45
Healthy Living Centres	19.5
Community Access to Life Long Learning	13
Green Spaces and Sustainable Communities	8.12

To date, grants totalling £3.795 million have been made to 65 health and education projects applying from Wales. This includes 50 out of school hours child care projects, costing some £670,000 and creating 5,798 new child care places, and 15 out of school hours learning projects totalling £3.125 million. In addition, ICT training to the value of £2.972 million has so far been provided to school teachers and librarians in Wales.

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when the money from the New Opportunities Fund for cancer equipment will be available in Wales. [124464]

Kate Hoey: The £9.75 million of Lottery Funding available to Wales under the New Opportunities Fund's cancer detection, prevention, treatment and care programme will be distributed on the basis of applications, which will be invited in the autumn. The Fund's Board will consider these applications in November and the funding should be available to support agreed projects shortly thereafter.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport on how many occasions since 31 March 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124129]

Mr. Chris Smith: During the period 31 March 1999 to the end of March 2000, Special Advisers in this Department travelled overseas on five occasions.

Lottery-funded Projects

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what action he is taking to encourage lottery-funded projects to use energy from renewable sources. [124679]

Kate Hoey: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has issued policy directions to all distributors which require them to take into account the need to further the objectives of sustainable development in awarding grants. Distributors therefore expect projects to be sensitive to the needs of the environment and the use of natural resources.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on how many occasions since 31 March 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124114]

Mr. Rooker: During the period 31 March 1999 to the end of March 2000, Special Advisers in this Department travelled overseas on two occasions.

Occupational Pension Schemes

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are in (a) defined benefit private sector occupational pension schemes and (b) defined contribution private sector occupational pension schemes. [124508]

Mr. Rooker: The latest figures that are available are for 1995.

It is estimated that there are 4.7 million active members in defined benefit private sector occupational pension schemes and about 1.1 million active members of defined contribution private sector occupational pension schemes. Additionally, there are about 0.3 million active members of private sector occupational pension schemes which have elements of both defined benefits and defined contributions.

There are an estimated 5.2 million former members with preserved pension rights in private sector occupational pension schemes. A breakdown between defined benefit and defined contribution schemes is not available. Some former members may now also be active members in another occupational pension scheme.

Additional Pension Entitlement

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if additional pension entitlement based on earnings will be calculated automatically; or if each pensioner will be requested to claim individually; [124200]

(2) how many pensioners in receipt of basic rate state pension are awaiting re-assessment of additional pension entitlement based on earnings; [124199]

(3) when additional pension processing will be completed; and if there will be retrospective payment of additional pension based on earnings. [124201]

Mr. Rooker: The additional pension (SERPS) component of a State Retirement Pension is calculated automatically by the National Insurance Recording System (NIRS) computer. There is no need for a pensioner to request separately payment of SERPS—completion of one claim form suffices for all components which can make up a pension with the exception of a claim for a dependency increase when a separate claim form must be completed.

Most people who are entitled to both basic pension and additional pension (SERPS) have that entitlement available to receive in time for their first pension pay day. There are however about 60,000 claims a year where NIRS has not been able to supply the SERPS rate. The principal reason for this is the existence on the person's National Insurance account of a discrepancy regarding the time they were contracted out of SERPS. That discrepancy must be resolved before NIRS can provide the SERPS rate. Putting right the discrepancy falls to the Inland Revenue's Contracted Out Employments Group (COEG) but the delayed implementation of NIRS2 has meant they have not until recently been able to do this. As a result the Benefits Agency and COEG have carried out clerical calculations to ensure that as far as possible pensioners receive their SERPS entitlements on time. There are 22,000 claims waiting for a clerical calculation. The Benefits Agency expects to complete its recovery from the effects of the delayed implementation of NIRS2 by the end of this year including cases where there has been a delay in processing the additional pension (SERPS). All clerical calculations will be compared with the NIRS2 calculations. Any which are wrong will be revised and full arrears paid if there has been an underpayment along with any compensation if all the conditions of the DSS Special Payments Scheme are satisfied. Any overpayments incurred will not be recovered although the awards will have to be revised.

Winter Fuel Allowance

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of men aged 60 to 65 years in Cleethorpes constituency who are entitled to winter fuel allowance. [123877]

Angela Eagle: The Department does not hold sufficient data to enable us to determine the number of men aged between 60 and 64 years in the Cleethorpes constituency.

We are not able to identify all those people between 60 and 64 who may not have had any need to contact the Department and who are not receiving a Social Security benefit. However, claim forms are in the process of being issued to those people whom we think may be eligible and whom we can identify from the Department's records. A publicity campaign will run to ensure that those people who do not get a claim form are encouraged to claim.

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what advice leaflets have been issued to (i) DSS offices and (ii) the general public in relation to the operation of the winter fuel scheme as revised by the announcement of 11 April. [123718]

Angela Eagle: Departmental local offices have been kept up to date with changes to the winter fuel payment scheme by means of a series of internal bulletins issued between January and May. The public are being kept informed through a number of means. We are in the process of contacting people who we think are eligible for backdated payments, and whom we can identify. In addition, information and advertising started in April and will run until Christmas. The campaign will aim to ensure that newly eligible people know what the arrangements are for claiming backdated payments resulting from the revised eligibility rules. It will also provide information about the operation of the scheme next winter.

The provision of a leaflet for the general public will be timed to ensure that it has the maximum possible impact on their awareness in the period prior to next winter's qualifying week. Current thinking is that the best time to issue the leaflet will be in either late August or early September.

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which categories of women aged 60 or over during the week ending 24 September 2000 who are living in their own houses and are not subject to immigration control will not be included in the winter fuel scheme. [123719]

Angela Eagle: All households where there is someone with the characteristics set out in the question will receive an appropriate payment. For administrative reasons, in the case of older couples receiving Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance, the winter fuel payment of £150 is paid to the claimant in the same way as weekly payments of benefit. So partners of Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance claimants who are aged 60 or more do not receive an individual payment. Partners in couples receiving Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance are the only group to whom this arrangement applies.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners in Crosby received winter fuel payments in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000; and how much was paid in total. [123530]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Pensioners in receipt of winter fuel payments in Crosby and Great Britain

	Crosby		National
	Number of recipients	Amount (£)	Number of recipients	Amount (£)
1998–99	14,812	283,690	10,191,367	198,549,440
1999–2000	14,892	1,114,500	10,224,698	773,890,550

Notes:

1. Pensioners are defined as women over 60 and men either over 65 or over 60 and in receipt of Income Support or Jobseeker's Allowance.
2. Constituency boundary as at May 1997.

SEMA

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for what reason the Benefits Agency does not publish the standards and scope of services required in its contract with SEMA. [120694]

Mr. Bayley: The contract with SEMA remains confidential for commercial reasons. However, I have placed in the House of Commons Library a document setting out the standards and scope of services required by the Benefits Agency in the contract. A periodic report issued by the Medical Quality Surveillance Group, chaired by the Department's Chief Medical Adviser, will also be published. This report will describe SEMA's performance against these standards.

State Earnings-related Pension

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the cost of exempting all persons who have already reached pensionable age from the reduction in SERPS entitlements contained in the provisions of the Social Security Act 1986. [123575]

Mr. Rooker: The estimated cost of exempting all persons who had reached pensionable age by April 2000 from the change in the rate of SERPS inheritance that was due to have taken effect at that time is estimated at £7,100 million. This excludes the effect of other changes to SERPS also introduced by the 1986 Act.

The cost was estimated by the Government Actuary's Department (GAD) and is expressed as the net present value of the annual figures from 2000–01 to 2050–51 in 1999–2000 prices, discounted at an annual real rate of 6 per cent. It has been prepared on a basis which is consistent with the latest GAD Quinquennial Review.

Research Projects

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list those research projects funded by his Department at the (a) Bologna Centre, (b) College of Europe and (c) European University Institute; and what the cost of each such project is. [123605]

Angela Eagle: The Department is not funding any research projects at the Bologna Centre, the College of Europe or the European University Institute.

Northern Region (Relocations)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the executive agencies, non-departmental public bodies and local public spending bodies for which his Department is responsible that have been transferred since 1992 or are planned to be transferred (a) to and (b) from the Northern Region. [123410]

Mr. Rooker: The Headquarters and some central financial/accounting functions of the Child Support Agency were transferred to Newcastle upon Tyne in May 1997.

The Occupational Pensions Board, based at Newcastle, was dissolved in March 1997 and the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority (OPRA) established in Brighton. Responsibility for the Pensions Scheme Registry was transferred to OPRA but remains sited in Newcastle.

Note:

"Northern Region" is defined as the area covering the Government offices for the North-East and Cumbria.

Pain Management (Funding)

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what discussions he has held with the Secretary of State for Heath regarding the impact of pain management funding decisions on social security expenditure. [124359]

Mr. Bayley: We frequently discuss issues concerning health and disability with colleagues in the Department of Health and elsewhere as appropriate.

Single Room Rent

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 14 March 2000, Official Report, column 147W, on the single room rent, when the single room rent was introduced (a) what was the methodology used to estimate the yearly savings, (b) whether these savings have been achieved and (c) what estimate has been made of the likely cost of abolishing the single room rent. [123531]

Angela Eagle: The Single Room Rent restriction was introduced in October 1996 by the previous Administration. The reasons, rationale and assumptions for making the change were set out by them in Command Paper (Cm 3225). The estimated savings have been achieved.

The estimated cost of abolishing the Single Room Rent can only be given as a range, because the figures depend on behavioural changes by young people and landlords which are difficult to quantify. For example we need to include the effects of additional household formation. Subject to these caveats, we estimate it could cost up to £160 million. Based on current data, we estimate that the cost of removing the Single Room Rent restriction in 2001–02 would be £140 million.

CABINET OFFICE

Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when she will announce the membership of the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission. [124371]

Marjorie Mowlam: I am pleased to announce that the Agriculture and Environment Biotechnology Commission (AEBC) is being launched today with Professor Malcolm Grant, Department of Land Economy, University of Cambridge as Chair.

The Commission will provide the Government with independent strategic advice on biotechnology issues that have an impact on agriculture and the environment, including ethical and acceptability issues. It will report to me and to my colleagues in the Devolved Administrations. Its members have a breadth of backgrounds and skills, ranging from experience of consumer and green issues to farming, science, ethics and industry. A complete list of the members and the Commission's terms of reference have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office on how many occasions since 31 March 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124122]

Mr. Stringer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) on 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 315W.

Opinion Research

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) how much her Department spent on opinion research in the financial year 1999–2000; [123073]

(2) if she will list the opinion research projects undertaken on behalf of her Department in the financial year 1999–2000, broken down by (a) focus group research, (b) quantitative surveys and (c) other market research surveys, listing in each case when and in what form the results were published. [123074]

Marjorie Mowlam: During the 1999–2000 financial year, my Department let contracts for opinion research with a total value of £316,000 (excluding VAT). The table gives the subject and publication details of each piece of research.

Subject	Type of research	Publication date	Publication details

Research Studies, Audits and Surveys

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will list the title of research studies, audits and surveys (a) being undertaken and (b) commissioned by her Department for completion within 2000, stating in each case when the results are due to be published; and when she will publish the Government's response to the Sixth report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life. [122116]

Marjorie Mowlam: The information relating to research studies, audits and surveys is not held centrally and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The Government's response to the Sixth Report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life is being prepared and will be presented to Parliament before the summer recess.

Drugs Trade

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what assessment the UK Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator has made of the extent to which nightclub security firms (a) are involved in the drugs trade and (b) restrict the trade in drugs; and if she will make a statement. [124099]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The UK Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator has not made any such assessments. The Police Research Group report, "Clubs, Drugs and Doormen" published in 1998, highlighted how serious a problem drugs could be in clubs when door staff are involved in drug dealing. The Co-ordinator has held meetings with parties involved in this sector and has encouraged the work of industry bodies such as the British Entertainment and Discotheque Association and partnerships between local authorities, the police, Drug Action Teams, venue managers and owners to disrupt the selling of drugs in venues, improve the standard of security staff and club mangers, and challenge the corrupting influence which drug dealing can have on door supervision, and supported their efforts to ensure that dance events are as safe and well organised as possible. The Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator supports the Government's proposed legislation to regulate the private security industry, including the licensing of security staff employment in night clubs and similar premises.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what plans she has for legislation to (a) vet employees, managers and directors of nightclub security firms in respect of involvement in the drugs trade, (b) require cancellation of their contract if drugs are brought into nightclubs by them or their employees and (c) counter the drugs trade in nightclubs in other ways; and if she will make a statement. [124100]

Mr. Ian McCartney: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary last year published a White Paper, "The Government's Proposals for Regulation of the Private Security Industry in England and Wales". This proposed that people employed in the private security industry, including those in managerial and supervisory positions and directors, should require a licence from a new Private Security Industry Authority. The licensing process would include a criminal record check. These proposals specifically included security staff employed in night clubs and similar premises. Responses received to the White Paper have been under consideration and my right hon. Friend will announce his conclusions shortly. We have made it clear that we intend to introduce legislation to regulate the private security industry as soon as parliamentary time permits.

Government Service Dismissals

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many people have been dismissed from Government service in each of the last five years, broken down by principal cause of dismissal; and what proportion of total Government employees this represents in each year. [122514]

Mr. Stringer: The numbers and proportion of staff dismissed from the non-industrial Civil Service over the last five years, by principal cause of dismissal are set out in the table.

Dismissal/discharge 1994–95 to 1998–99 by cause of dismissal

	Number of staff dismissed/discharged			Proportion of staff dismissed/discharged (percentage)
Year	All	Inefficiency	Disciplinary	All	Inefficiency	Disciplinary
1994–95	880	550	330	0.18	0.11	0.07

Performance and Innovation Unit

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when the report of the Performance and Innovation Unit on the pursuit and seizure of criminal assets, following the recommendation of the Third report of the Home Office Working Group on Confiscation was completed; what action she proposes to take following the report; what discussions (a) she, (b) Ministers in her Department and (c) her officials have had with (i) the Secretary of State for the Home Department, (ii) the hon. Member for Norwich, South, (iii) the Prime Minister and (iv) officials in the Home Department regarding the report; if she will place a copy of the report in the Library; and if she will make a statement. [123790]

Marjorie Mowlam: The Prime Minister commissioned the Performance and Innovation Unit to carry out a study into the "Pursuit and Seizure of Criminal Assets" last year. This was announced on 21 October 1999, Official Report, column 630W, by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney). My right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office is sponsor Minister for this study.

The study, which is now nearing completion, has had the strong support of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the Minister of State, Home Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke). Home Office officials have been closely involved, as have officials of other Government Departments.

The final report will be published shortly and copies will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Cosmetics (Marketing Ban)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reasons the UK voted in favour of a postponement of an EU marketing ban on cosmetics tested on animals on 5 May. [124052]

Dr. Howells: The Government are very serious about animal welfare, and already have a voluntary ban on testing on animals of cosmetic products and cosmetic ingredients. However, Government policy is to ensure not only a strong commitment to animal welfare but that our regulatory framework is in full compliance with our WTO obligations. Internal advice has confirmed the European Commission's assessment that a marketing ban would risk challenge under World Trade Organisation (WTO) rules. In addition, there were concerns that the 6th Amendment would be legally and practically unenforceable.

A 7th Amendment to the cosmetics directive has recently been transmitted to the Council and European Parliament by the European Commission. This Amendment aims to introduce a ban on animal testing in the EU rather than a marketing ban and is WTO compatible. The two-year deferment of the entry into force of the 6th Amendment should allow sufficient time to enable the 7th Amendment to be adopted. I believe that the 7th Amendment will offer a better level of animal welfare in the EU as a marketing ban would have offered as it will introduce a total ban in the EU on animal testing (in relation to cosmetic products and the ingredients contained therein).

On 5 May EU member states voted unanimously (one member state abstained) in favour of deferring the entry into force of the 6th Amendment of the cosmetics directive.

European Young Consumer Competition 2000

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the (a) purpose and (b) funding of the European Young Consumer Competition 2000. [123604]

Dr. Howells: (a) I fully support the purpose of the competition to encourage young people to become more enlightened consumers and communicators so that they can play an effective part in the community at home and abroad. That said, it is up to individual schools and teachers to decide whether to take part.

(b) The competition is funded by the European Commission.

Daewoo Technical Centre

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the discussions his Department has had on the Daewoo Technical Centre in Worthing. [124458]

Mr. Caborn: The Government are keeping closely in touch with developments affecting Daewoo Motors given its significant investment in the UK, in particular at the Worthing Technical Centre. Decisions about the future of the Centre are a commercial matter for the company, but my officials have had regular contact with the Centre as a part of their sponsorship responsibilities.

Coalfield Regeneration

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will utilise part of the share of surpluses generated by the Mineworkers' Pension Scheme and British Coal Staff Superannuation Scheme, taken by the Government, to help regenerate coalfield community areas. [123461]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 23 May 2000]: Surpluses in the former British Coal pension schemes are split 50/50 between the membership of the schemes and the DTI, in its role as guarantor to the schemes.

In accordance with the Coal Industry Act 1994 (Sch. 5, paragraph 2(10)), all surpluses received by the Secretary of State must be paid into the Consolidated Fund. The DTI has no statutory powers to divert pension surpluses for regeneration.

The Government are already providing substantial funds to meet the commitments made in response to the Coalfields Task Force Report and indeed we announced in December 1998 a comprehensive investment package for coalfield areas worth £354 million over three years. In addition, the Secretary of State announced on 17 April the intention to make substantial sums available to the coal industry in the form of subsidy.

Ilisu Dam

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is taking to ensure that those people who will be displaced by the Ilisu Dam project in Turkey will be consulted beforehand. [124180]

Mr. Caborn: The process of consultation of the local population, by consultants appointed by the Project Owner DSI, commenced in December 1999 and this process is continuing. We await the production of a Resettlement Action plan.

In order to provide additional professional assistance to DSI in the planning of resettlement and compensation, the Swiss Export Credit Agency, as the leader of the eight agencies involved of which the UK is one, has recruited Dr. Ayse Kudat for an initial period of two years. Dr. Kudat is an eminent environmental sociologist, and was until this month a senior staff member at the World Bank.

The expertise of Dr. Kudat will help ensure that the resettlement programme will reflect internationally accepted practice, which is the first of the four requirements set out in the announcement made by my hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 21 December 1999.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) which Departments of Government were consulted on (a) human rights and (b) sustainable development issues relating to the Ilisu Dam; and on what dates; [124183]

(2) when the Foreign and Commonwealth Office was consulted about the human rights implications of providing ECGD cover for the Ilisu Dam in Turkey; and what advice it gave; [124184]

(3) which Departments of Government were consulted about the advisability of providing ECGD cover for the building of the Ilisu Dam; and on what dates. [124182]

Mr. Caborn: The following Departments have been consulted about relevant aspects of the proposed Ilisu Dam project: H.M. Treasury, Department of Trade and Industry, British Trade International, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Department for International Development, Department of the Environment, Transport and Regions and Department for Culture, Media and Sport. These exchanges began in January 1999, although DCMS were not involved until later. ECGD continues to maintain regular contact with FCO, DTI, DETR, DCMS and British Trade International. DFID has not been involved since July 1999, as Turkey is not one of their key partner countries.

There were intensive exchanges of correspondence between the Ministers most concerned during November and December 1999 prior to the announcement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 21 December 1999.

Research Councils

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) for which areas of research covered by each Research Council the budget has contracted in each year since 1994; [122134]

(2) what the breakdown was of the funding of each Research Council by main programme of activity in each year since 1994. [122132]

Ms Hewitt: The evolving nature of the Research Councils' programmes makes it impossible to provide consistent expenditure figures for all programme areas over the period requested. In particular, the Economic and Social Research Council established a new set of themes in 1995–96 and the Medical Research Council made major changes to the structure of its portfolio in 1995–96 and again in 1999–2000. The available information for each of the six Councils is set out, in cash terms, in the table.

Strictly speaking, there are no programme areas where the expenditure has diminished in each year over the period, although the Councils have increased the budgets for high priority programmes at the expense of certain others. For example, the Biotechnology and Biosciences Research Council has significantly enhanced its support for biomolecular science over the period, while keeping some other programmes broadly level in cash terms.

The uneven spend on PPARC particle physics is largely due to the timing of payments of the UK subscription to the CERN laboratory in Geneva.

Further details of individual programmes can be found in the Councils' Annual Reports, copies of which are in the Library.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) of 28 February 2000, Official Report, column 49W, on ECGD, what types of goods are covered, broken down by category of equipment, by ECGD guarantee issued in respect of a defence-related contract with Saudi Arabia in 1997–98 and 1998–99. [123828]

Mr. Caborn: All ECGD guaranteed defence business with Saudi Arabia in these years is included against the "aircraft" heading in the table to which my hon. Friend refers.

Business Links

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the (a) number of additional jobs created, (b) increase in turnover, (c) increase in profits, (d) growth in net assets and (e) growth in exports, as a result of Business Links since 1994. [123536]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 24 May 2000]: The most recent estimation we have of Business Link impact is from the Business Link Value for Money Evaluation, which relates to the period 1994 to 1997. This study was carried out in 1998 by independent consultants and is available from the House of Commons Library.

It estimated that, during this period, the support provided by Business Links was responsible for generating more than 8000 jobs, £1 billion extra turnover, £30 million extra profits, £145 million extra net assets and £400 million extra exports nationally.

Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans there are to integrate the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme into the Enterprise Fund. [123551]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 24 May 2000]: The Enterprise Fund consists of a number of discrete individual elements, one of which is the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme. The Scheme, which continues to run as before, became an integral part of the Enterprise Fund when the Fund was launched in December 1998.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many small loans have been guaranteed by region and as a percentage of all businesses in each region in each year since the inception of the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme. [123549]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 24 May 2000]: The total number of loans guaranteed under the Small Firms Loan Guarantee Scheme, by region, and as a percentage of all VAT registered businesses in each region in each year since inception are shown in the tables.

1. Large increases in the VAT registration threshold in 1991 and 1993 mean figures before and after these years are not wholly comparable.
2. SFLGS figures are financial year, VAT figures are calendar year.
3. Regional split reflects reporting requirements for the Industrial Development Act 1982 Annual Report.

Websites

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 21–23W, on websites (1) if he will name (a) the websites delivering the objectives of the Department but run and financed by private sector companies and (b) the companies running those sites; if he will estimate the market value of the services rendered to his Department by the companies running these websites; if the companies running the sites have their services acknowledged on the site; what his estimate is of the market value to the companies of such acknowledgement; and what mechanisms are in place to ensure that his Department does not seem to endorse any inappropriate advertisers on such sites; [122744]

(2) if he will name (a) the websites prepared in partnership with private sector organisations in return for acknowledgement of this sponsorship on the site and (b) the companies helping to prepare those sites; and if he will estimate the market value of (i) the services rendered to his Department by the companies in the preparation of these websites and (ii) the acknowledgement of sponsorship. [122745]

Ms Hewitt: The Department of Trade and Industry has not entered into any significant partnership or sponsorship deals that part fund or completely fund any DTI websites in exchange for advertising revenue, brand identify or acknowledgement. DTI may consider such arrangements in the future provided they fall within the Central IT Unit's guidance that I quoted in my previous answer on 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 21W.

There are only three DTI websites that have some element of private sector involvement or presence all of which are of negligible benefit by value to the DTI.

These sites are:

1. The Auto Industry website (www.autoindustry.co.uk);
2. The TradeUK service (www.tradeuk.com);
3. The ISI/Interforum E-Commerce Awards Website (www.ecommerce-awards.co.uk).

Fuel Market

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who has responsibility for ensuring that fairness and reasonableness pertain in the contractual relationship between oil suppliers and retailers in respect of non-competition issues. [122944]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 24 May 2000]: The general responsibility for all sale of goods legislation in the UK rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. In the event that a specific contractual dispute arises between an oil supplier and a retailer which relates to unfair or unreasonable terms, the matter would have to be resolved in a Court of Law.

RDX Exports

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what decisions have been taken on the applications that were pending on 7 March for the export of RDX in its raw form to (a) Oman, (b) Spain and (c) Turkey. [123725]

Dr. Howells: A Standard Individual Export Licence (SIEL) was issued in respect of the application covering the export of RDX in its raw form to Oman on 7 March 2000. A decision has not yet been taken on an application for an Open Individual Export Licence covering exports to a number of destinations including Spain. A decision has not yet been taken on the application for a SIEL to Turkey.

Electricity Generation

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate his Department has made of the likely proportion of electricity generated from (a) gas, (b) coal, (c) nuclear power and (d) renewables in (i) 2003, (ii) 2005, (iii) 2010, (iv) 2012, (v) 2020 and (vi) 2030. [120106]

Mrs. Liddell: My Department has recently prepared estimates of future energy use, covering selected years. Estimates have not been made for any other years. These have been made available in the form of a working paper, representing work in progress, entitled: "Energy Projections For The UK—Working Paper".

Copies of this document have been placed in the Library of the House. The following tables are extracted from Annexe D of the Working Paper. These set out the amounts of generation by type of fuel for two of the six scenarios examined in the Working Paper. As an example, in 2010, coal's share of generation varies between 10 and 22 per cent., that of gas between 45 per cent. and 59 per cent., while nuclear's share varies between 18 per cent. and 19 per cent.

Astra Holdings

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will indicate the chapters in the report on Astra Holdings plc published by his Department to which the contents of file bundles (a) 120, (b) 121, (c) 140 and (d) 141 relate; and whether there is any part of the contents of the bundles which is not dealt with in the report. [123896]

Dr. Howells: I refer my hon. Friend to the answers I gave him on 22 March 2000, Official Report, column 611W, and 13 April 2000, Official Report, columns 273–74W.

Solid Oxide Fuel Cells

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the letter from the Minister of State for Energy, of 17 April to the hon. Member for Linlithgow, when he will announce a call for research and development proposals for the stationary and transport applications of work on copper and cerium oxide catalysts for solid oxide fuel cells. [122497]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 25 May 2000]: A Call for Proposals on the DTI's New and Renewable Energy (NRE) Programme was issued on 17 April 2000. As part of this Call, outline proposals were sought for research and development into fuel cells of all types, and particularly for stationary and transport applications. The Call itself, and guidance for proposers, may be found on the DTI's web pages at www.dti.gov.uk/renewable/renew.htm. The closing submission date for this call was 1 June 2000. Notwithstanding this deadline, potential proposers are welcome to investigate other options for funding research and development projects relevant to fuel cells by contacting the Programme Manager of the DTI's Advanced Fuel Cells Programme (part of the New and Renewable Energy Programme) at ETSU.

Miners (Compensation)

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many cases have been lodged by former miners living in Amber Valley for compensation for vibration white finger. [123939]

Mrs. Liddell: The Department's claims handling agents have registered 880 claims from former miners living in the Amber Valley region, centring on the towns of Alfreton, Heanor and Ripley, for vibration white finger. Of these the Department has settled 102 claims and made interim payments to a further 80, totalling over £900,000.

Pylons

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will impose a moratorium on the construction of pylons. [123905]

Mrs. Liddell: Such a policy would not be justified. All but the most minor overhead electric lines already need development consent from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. All relevant matters are considered in this process.

Small Businesses

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce an employer's charter to assist small businesses to deal with the complexities of employment legislation; and if he will make a statement. [123867]

Ms Hewitt: The Small Business Service has been set up, among other things, to help to make regulatory information, including employment legislation, more comprehensible and accessible to small firms. The SBS is looking at a number of ways in which this might be done including the possibilities presented by information technology. For example, they are piloting a new service on the internet called Small Business Start-Up Service (www.sbssonline.org/sbss/) which guides people wanting to start a business to relevant information including employees' rights. They have also recently published a guide to the regulatory requirements relating to employing staff which can also be accessed on the internet (www.dti.gov.uk/COMMS/employ?index.htm). The Department provides a wide range of information and guidance on the requirements of employment law, including through its website (www.dti.gov.uk/er), and is currently developing further internet and interactive services. These will be made available by a number of routes, including through the SBS general advice and information service (www.businessadviceonline.org).

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to exempt small businesses from (a) new and (b) existing regulations; and if he will make a statement. [123869]

Ms Hewitt: The Government are always ready to consider exemptions as a policy option in relation to or existing regulations, but each case would need to be carefully looked at on its merits.

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures are being taken by the Small Business Service to reduce the administrative burden on small businesses. [123868]

Ms Hewitt: The Chief Executive of the Small Business Service (SBS) is a member of the Panel for Regulatory Accountability which is reviewing new and existing regulations in Government Departments.

The SBS has a particular duty on behalf of small businesses to examine regulatory proposals put forward by Government Departments to ensure that they do not impose an unnecessary or disproportionate burden on the small businesses community, that compliance is made easier through the provision of comprehensible and accessible guidance, and that the enforcement regime is appropriate.

The SBS will also undertake research to establish a Regulation Index showing the cumulative burden of regulation on small businesses and to inform priorities for simplifying existing regulations.

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in enabling (a) consumers and (b) small businesses to have access to their credit reference files. [123870]

Dr. Howells: The rights of individuals and sole traders to access financial information held by credit reference agencies have now been consolidated under the Data Protection Act 1998. The Consumer Credit Act 1974 continues to contain rights to challenge the accuracy of such information. The Data Protection Commissioner is now responsible for supervising these rights. Partnerships and other unincorporated bodies have rights to this information under the Consumer Credit Act 1974 and the Director General of Fair Trading supervises their rights.

We have also simplified the statement of rights on correcting wrong information which the agencies must provide in the Consumer Credit (Credit Reference Agency) Regulations 2000.

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures the Government are taking to ensure that Britain provides an environment in which SMEs can flourish. [124406]

Ms Hewitt: The Government have set in place a policy framework, which is delivering macro-economic stability and helping to promote long-term investment and productivity; public finances are under control; inflation is historically low and expected to remain close to target.

Following Budget 2000, the business climate has never been better. Since 1997, the Government have cut the average corporation tax bill for small companies by nearly 25 per cent. Britain now has its lowest ever corporation rates for small companies and—with the 10p starting rate from April—the lowest starting rate in the EU.

We are also looking further to improve the infrastructure and ensure that small firms get the support they need. That is why we established the Small Business Service (SBS)—a key part of our strategy to create an entrepreneurial Britain. The SBS will act as a strong voice for small businesses at the heart of Government; help small firms meet the demands of regulation; and achieve a step change in the quality and consistency of advice and information available to small and medium-sized enterprises.

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to improve (a) access to and (b) the quality of advice services for small businesses. [124684]

Ms Hewitt: The Small Business Service, which became an executive agency of the Department of Trade and Industry in April 2000, is undertaking two significant activities aimed at improving access to, and quality of, advice services for small business.

The first is to provide an internet enabled network of knowledge and information for use by small businesses, business advisers and the local Business Link network.

The second activity is a radical redevelopment of the Business Link network including refocusing the remit of the Business Links so that they concentrate on delivering high quality solutions to their customers' needs; widening the customer base of the local network to include those who are at a disadvantage, for whatever reason, in starting up or running a business; and a rationalisation from 81 to 45 Business Links. Only organisations which can meet rigorous assessment criteria and successfully complete business plans will be awarded contracts from April 2001.

Rolls-Royce

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what conditions were attached to the most recent tranche of launch aid for Rolls-Royce; and if he will make a statement. [124097]

Mr. Alan Johnson: In November 1997 the Department agreed to provide launch investment of £200 million to Rolls-Royce to assist with the development of the Trent series of large aeroengines. The conditions attached to the agreement are commercially confidential.

Launch Investments is a risk and revenues sharing Government investment in the design and development of specific civil aerospace projects in the UK. The investment is not a grant and is repayable to the Government at a real rate of return, usually via levies on sales of the product developed.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met representatives of Rolls-Royce to discuss the aeroengine industry, with particular reference to employment levels. [124096]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I visited Rolls-Royce's main production facilities at Derby on 9 May 2000 and discussed a range of issues of importance to the competitiveness of the company. We discussed the implications for employment levels of Rolls-Royce's current review of its strategic operations.

Transatlantic Business Dialogue

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which (a) ministers and (b) officials in his Department are involved in the transatlantic business dialogue; and who was present from his Department at the TABD meeting in Brussels on 23 May. [124048]

Mr. Caborn: No officials from this Department attended the TABD meeting in Brussels on 23 May. The European Commission were represented but as this is a business-to-business forum they did not directly contribute. This Department's Trade Policy Directorate is responsible for relations with the TABD and attends the annual conference at the invitation of TABD officials.

GM Seeds

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what reports he has received concerning the sale of Advanta Seeds UK's Hyota oil seed rape seeds found to be contaminated with GM herbicide-tolerant seeds; and what action he plans to take. [123756]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 25 May 2000]: The UK Government were informed on 17 April that stocks of oil seed rape seed sold by Advanta might contain low levels of GM material. In line with Government priorities to protect public health and the environment, the Department of Health and the Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions sought urgent advice from the Food Standards Agency and the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment respectively. The advice was that there were no risks to human health or the environment. Contamination of seed stocks is a MAFF responsibility, and last week the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced measures that the Government will take. DTI has no specific responsibility for any of the issues involved.

Nuclear Reprocessing

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what quantities of (a) Canadian-owned and (b) Spanish-owned plutonium are in store at Sellafield. [121982]

Mrs. Liddell: In accordance with the internationally agreed format for publishing such information, my Department publishes each year figures for the total amount of plutonium held in the UK in unirradiated separated form as well as the total amount of plutonium estimated to be contained in spent civil reactor fuel. The figures include details of the total amount of plutonium held in the UK in unirradiated separated form belonging to foreign bodies. This total is not further broken down into separate figures for individual countries.

Details about amounts of plutonium held at Sellafield on behalf of particular customers and about the timing and arrangements for returning the plutonium to the country of origin are commercial and operational matters for BNFL and its customers. I understand from BNFL, however, that there is no longer any Canadian owned plutonium in any form held at Sellafield.

Oil and Gas

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list by field the number of licences issued by the Government for North Sea and Atlantic oil and gas exploration where no development has taken place; [122832]

(2) if he will make a statement on his Department's policy on the inspection and enforcement in respect of fallow fields in the United Kingdom Continental Shelf. [122837]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 19 May 2000]: The Department of Trade and Industry classifies as "fallow" any block on the UKCS which is currently licensed and not in its initial term but which has seen no drilling activity for six years or more. A "fallow" discovery is one that was made six years or more ago but which has not yet been developed. (Acreage that has been determined as a field would not generally be classified as "fallow".)

193 significant discoveries made up to 31 December 1999 have not yet been developed. The definition of "significant" discoveries used here is based on flow rates achieved during well tests. It makes no attempt to take account of commercial viability. Work is proceeding on some of these discoveries to bring them to development, but in each case no Development Plan has yet been approved. These discoveries are not necessarily the same as those that are the subject of the Fallow Discoveries Initiative because many are less than six years old. They are as listed.

I am withholding details of four recent discoveries at the request of the operators for reasons of commercial confidentiality.

Timeshare House Boats

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to introduce a statutory cooling off period for the purchase of timeshare house boats; and if he will make a statement. [124511]

Dr. Howells: Implementing a commitment in their Consumer White Paper "modern markets; confident consumers", the Government published a consultation paper on 25 April reviewing whether aspects of UK timeshare legislation need updating. Among the aspects under review is timeshare in floating vessels.

Copies can be viewed in the House of Commons Library or at the DTI website address: www.dti.gov.uk/cacp/ca/consulta.htm

The deadline for responses to the consultation is 31 July 2000.

Post Office Advisory Committee

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the future of local Post Office advisory committees. [124498]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Postal Services Bill is going through Parliament and the new Consumer Council for Postal Services (CCPS) is expected to be in place by 1 January 2001. It has been widely accepted that the existing arrangements for consumer representation in postal services should be reviewed as part of the process of forming the new Council. In April, Peter Carr, Chairman of the Post Office Users' National Council (POUNC) and Chair designate of the CCPS, issued a consultation document that sought views from interested parties on the new regional structure for CCPS.

It would be premature to make a statement until Peter Carr has had an opportunity to examine all the views he has received and has formally submitted his proposals to the Secretary of State for him to consider and approve.

Wind Energy

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce a new programme of support for offshore wind energy projects; and if he will make a statement. [124680]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government fully recognise the importance of offshore wind in reaching the target of providing 10 per cent. of the UK's electricity from renewable energy by 2010.

As I mentioned in the "Conclusions in Response to the Public Consultation" on renewable energy, the Government are looking at the possibility of some limited additional support for offshore wind (and energy crops). The renewable energy industry has also been consulted as part of the DETR-led consultation on the Energy Efficiency Measures under the Climate Change Levy package, on how a part of the £50 million Levy Fund might be used to promote renewables.

Sierra Leone

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received concerning the Foyle Airline's involvement in carrying arms to Sierra Leone; and if he will make a statement. [123555]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 24 May 2000]: None.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on how many occasions since 31 March 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124117]

Mr. Byers: During the period 31 March 1999 to the end of March 2000, Special Advisers in this department travelled overseas on one occasion.

Telecommunications Masts

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the (a) Latvian and (b) University of Berne Schwarzenberg studies on populations residing in the vicinity of radio telecommunications masts; and what is his planned programme for the further review by the Stuart Committee. [123891]

Ms Hewitt: The Latvian study is of populations residing in close proximity to a military radio location station that operates a high power pulsed radar installation. The University of Berne study examined the local population residing in the vicinity of a high power short wave broadcast transmitter located at Schwarzenburg in Switzerland. Although the Schwarzenburg installation is also used for air radio and wireless telecommunications, the authors of the study note that these operate at far lower levels and suggest that they can be neglected. Thus neither study is directly relevant to radio telecommunications. I have nevertheless asked the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) for advice about these studies.

The Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones (IEGMP), chaired by Sir William Stewart, recommended a further review of possible health effects of mobile phone technology in three years time, or earlier if circumstances demand it. The Government response confirmed we are keen to maintain the momentum of reviewing the health effects of mobile phone technologies and recognises that the IEGMP recommends a further review in three years' time. We will be asking for further research in this area to be kept under continual review by the National Radiological Protection Board, and we expect a report on progress with both national and international research activities to be produced in three years' time, or when significant information becomes available.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Early Years Education

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the accuracy of forecasts of pre-school learning places made by (a) his Department and (b) the Pre-school Learning Alliance since 1997. [123101]

Ms Hodge: My Department collects information about pupils in maintained and independent schools in the Annual Schools Census. Information about Government-funded places in private nursery schools, pre-schools and playgroups, and independent schools, which are registered with Early Years Development and Childcare Partnerships, is obtained from the Early Years Census.

I understand that the Pre-school Learning Alliance (PLA) does not collect information about pre-school places, but it does conduct an annual survey of a sample of pre-schools asking whether they think their group is threatened with closure. The PLA's most recent survey published in March was based on a sample of 722 pre-schools and playgroups.

We commissioned an independent review of pre-schools and playgroups last summer to look at what further steps could be taken to help pre-schools and playgroups play their full part in the expansion of early education and child care services, and have responded positively to its recommendations. We also announced a further scheme to assist pre-schools and playgroups facing financial difficulties.

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many places in pre-school education for three-year-olds have been funded by the Government in each local education authority; what proportion of this age cohort this represents for each local education authority; and if he will make a statement. [122239]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 16 May 2000]: The Government provided specific funding for new, free early education places for three-year-olds for the first time in 1999–2000, although some local education authorities did provide free places before that. The following table shows the number of free early education places for three-year-olds funded by means of Nursery Education Grant in spring term 2000, the latest period for which figures are available. 65 local education authorities received grants for the spring term. From the summer term 2000, all will do so. In 1999–2000, 80 per cent. of the new Government-funded places were in the private and voluntary sectors. £100 million is being provided for 2000–01 which will fund an additional 83,000 places.

These figures do not include funding for provision for under-fives in the maintained sector made through the Standard Spending Assessment. We will shortly be publishing data from the annual Schools Census on the number of children receiving free early education places in the maintained sector, and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Population estimates for individual years of age are not sufficiently robust, at local education authority level, to enable the calculation of participation rates.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many three-year-olds had free early-years education places providing five or more sessions of education per week (a) in 1979, (b) in 1990 and (c) for each year from 1992 to 1999 (i) in England and (ii) in each local education authority in London. [122709]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 19 May 2000]: The information is not available in the form requested. Up to September 1999, 'free' places for three-year-olds were available only in maintained nursery and primary schools funded directly by local education authorities. Since September 1999 specific funding by the Government for three-year-olds has been extended to private, voluntary and independent providers via the Early-Years Development and Childcare Partnerships in 65 local education authorities, including 18 London authorities. From summer 2000 this extra funding will be available in all local authority areas.

The available information on the numbers of three-year-olds in early-years provision for England and in each local education authority in London is shown in the following tables. Table 1 gives the number of children in free early-years education places from 1996 to 2000. Table 2 shows the number of new funded places for three-year-olds being created in all sectors over the next year, including projected figures for summer 2000, autumn 2000 and spring 2001.

The new places are supported by £100 million of funding. Half of all three-year-olds will have access to a free place by spring 2001, and the Government are well on track to meet the 2002 target of expanding overall nursery provision to 66 per cent. of three-year-olds.

[1] Estimates based upon an analysis of Early-Years Development and Childcare Partnership Plans

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how much his Department has spent on the provision of nursery places; and what estimate he has made of the number of nursery places created by this funding in each year since 1997 and in 2000–01; [122529]

(2) how much has been spent by his Department on the provision of nursery places since 1997; [122605]

(3) what estimate his Department has made of the number of nursery places in each year since 1997. [123021]

Ms Hodge [holding answers 17 May 2000, 18 May 2000 and 22 May 2000]: The following table shows the number of early education places for three and four-year-olds that have been taken up in each year since 1997. It also shows the amount of funding the Government have made available to fund these places through either Nursery Education Grant or the Under Five's Education Standard Spending Assessment (SSA) sub block, which has been increased by £253 million from £1,089 million in 1997–98 to £1,342 million in 2000–01, and on current plans is estimated to increase to £1,430 million in 2001–02. The 1998 figure represents an increase of 25 per cent. in the number of free, early education places taken up in 1992.

Estimated take up of 3 and 4-year-old places for each year between 1997–98 and 2001–02 with associated funding

	Funding £ million	Places
1997–98	1,189	787,976
1998–99	1,299.7	800,560
1999–2000	1,441.9	858,944
2000–01	1,567.4	908,085
2001–02	1,805	1,015,000

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many pre-school learning places have (a) ceased to exist and (b) been created in each year since April 1997. [123100]

Ms Hodge: Information is not available in the form requested. The Department does collect information on playgroups and other day care facilities, which is published in Statistical Volume "Children's Day Care Facilities" (as at 31 March) which is available from the Library. This shows that the total number of places in pre-schools and playgroups fell from 383,700 in 1997 to 347,200 in 1999, a reduction of 36,500. This was due to the introduction of vouchers by the previous Administration. However, since 1999, information from Early Years Development Plans indicates that an extra 33,000 places will have been created in playgroups and the voluntary sector by Spring 2001 as a result of the introduction of early years development partnerships.

The number of funded early education places for three and four year olds that have been taken up in each year since 1997 are as follows:

Year	Number
1997–98	787,976
1998–99	800,560
1999–00	858,944
2000–01	908,085

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what reviews he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated of the funding mechanism for the provision of pre-school learning places. [123103]

Ms Hodge: The independent review of pre-schools and playgroups, commissioned by the Government last year, included several recommendations concerning funding for early years. The main recommendation called for consultation on the feasibility of a funding system to replace the nursery grants and child care grant, which would allow greater flexibility to meet local needs, and greater stability for pre-schools and playgroups. The progress report, published last week, set out the current position: the Department will, as part of its own spending review, evaluate whether changes can be made to the current arrangements to further assist those nursery settings outside the maintained sector. We expect to complete this by the end of the year.

In response to other funding recommendations in the report, we have announced funding of £500,000 for a further scheme to assist pre-schools and playgroups facing financial difficulties, to give them a further breathing space as policy initiatives work through to individual groups, and £250,000 for projects to help pre-schools and playgroups develop, in partnership with others, as the early education and care places expand.

Further Education

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average length of a post vacancy for a further education college lecturer in England; and how many posts are vacant in further education colleges in England. [124176]

Mr. Wicks: Each college in the further education sector is responsible for the recruitment of its staff. Information on vacancies and the duration of posts for further education lecturers in England is not held centrally.

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the reasons why the further education sector has been excluded from the South-West transition group for the local learning and skills councils; and if this is the case in other regions. [124174]

Mr. Wicks: The role of the South West task groups is to collect information from current funding bodies (such as TECs, FEFC, and local education authorities) on the range and volume of provision currently being funded in each Learning and Skills Council area. The aim is to ensure that sufficient funds will be available in each area to at least maintain current levels of provision and to avoid any disruption to learners from the introduction of the new arrangements.

There is no requirement for further education colleges to be represented on task groups since they are not funding bodies. However, a representative of the Association of Colleges is a member of the Regional Transition Steering Group, which oversees the transition to the new arrangements in the South West. Similar arrangements apply in other regions.

National Curriculum (History)

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the textbook entitled Minds and Machines—Britain 1750–1900, published by Longman, is an approved text for Key Stage 3 of the National Curriculum. [122348]

Jacqui Smith: It has always been for governing bodies and teachers to decide which books best meet the requirements of the National Curriculum in their school. In history at Key Stage 3, the curriculum requires the study of Britain 1750–1900 including how worldwide expansion, industrialisation and political developments combined to shape modern Britain.

Child Care

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what has been the annual cost of the National Child Care Strategy to date; and what his estimate is of the annual impact of this policy on the provision of child care places in each year since its establishment and in 2000–01. [122530]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 16 May 2000]: The annual costs of the National Child Care Strategy in England and related new child care places are as follows:

In 1998–99 £46 million was spent and 66,000 new child care places were created; this includes £5 million to the Further Education Funding Council who created 11,000 places for students in Further Education.

In 1999–2000 a total of £58.25 million was spent, £17 million of which was from the New Opportunities Fund (NOF) on out of school hours care, and £5 million was through the Further Education Funding Council on places for 0–4 year olds. Forecasts indicate that at the end of March 2000, 120,000 new places will have been created; this includes 5,000 through the FEFC.

In 2000–2001 £63 million has been allocated to provide 135,000 new child care places; this includes £5 million for FEFC to provide 5,000 new places for 0–4 year olds. NOF do not allocate resources on an annual basis as this is a rolling programme, but £170 million is available from 1999–2003 to support the creation of new out of school places.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many claimants were refused unemployment benefit because they declined to take an available job in 1997, 1998 and 1999. [122389]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 16 May 2000]: Unemployment Benefit was replaced by Jobseeker's Allowance (JSA) in October 1996. The following figures, which we collect on a quarterly basis within operational years, include JSA sanctions imposed as a result of jobseekers refusing offers of employment, and a small number of Unemployment Benefit disqualifications relating to refusal of employment doubts arising before JSA was introduced.

Operational year	Refusal of employment disqualifications/sanctions
1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998	22,738
1 April 1998 to 31 March 1999	11,442
1 April 1999 to 31 December 1999	13,530

Figures for the final quarter of the 1999–2000 operational year, from 1 January 2000 to 31 March 2000, have not yet been published. Information on the numbers and types of decisions given by Employment Service Decision Makers on JSA labour market questions are published in the "Analysis of Sector Decision Making" (formerly known as the "Analysis of Adjudication Officers' Decisions"), copies of which are held in the House of Commons Library. The figures for the quarter ending March 2000 will be published by the end of May and placed in the Library.

PGCE Courses

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to the oral statement of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment of 16 May 2000, Official Report, columns 252–53, how many applications for PGCE courses in secondary teaching in (a) maths, (b) modern foreign languages, (c) science and (d) technology have been received since 30 March; and how many were received in the corresponding period in the previous year. [123037]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Government announced on 30 March that training salaries would be introduced for postgraduate trainees starting initial teacher training courses from September 2000. Applications for PGCE courses in England and Wales for secondary teaching in maths, modern foreign languages, science and technology received since 30 March together with comparative figures for the previous year are given in the table.

Notes:

1. For the first time, applications for PGCE primary courses in 1999–2000 had a deadline of 15 December 1998 for guaranteed consideration by their first choice institution. The 15 December deadline has continued for 2000–01.

2. The above figures are for applications as entered on the GTTR computer system.

3. Primary includes Middle (Key Stage 2/3).

Graduate Teacher Training Registry (GTTR).

The Government announced on 30 March that training salaries would be introduced for postgraduate trainees starting initial teacher training courses from September 2000. Since that date 502 (22 per cent.) more applications have been input on the Graduate Teacher Training Registry computer system than for the equivalent period last year.

Public Bodies (Relocation)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the executive agencies, non-departmental public bodies and local public spending bodies for which his Department is responsible that (a) have been transferred since 1992 and (b) are planned to be transferred (i) to and (ii) from the Northern Region. [123409]

Mr. Wills: There has not been any transfer of executive agencies, non-departmental public bodies or local public spending bodies for which the Department is responsible to, or from, the Northern Region since 1992. Similarly, there are no plans for any transfer.

Skills Shortages

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what additional help has been provided to small and medium-sized enterprises since May 1997 to help them tackle skills shortages. [123460]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 23 May 2000]: Much of the support provided to help small and medium-sized enterprises tackle skills shortages is distributed through Training and Enterprise Councils. In particular, the Department provides the Councils with a flexible local competitiveness budget to help support local firms. In the last three financial years this budget has totalled £180 million.

In autumn this year, I expect the Government's plans for a university for industry to come to fruition, when learndirect becomes fully operational. Small and medium-sized enterprises are a priority for learndirect, and it will introduce new and more flexible ways for small firms to meet their skills needs, through the internet and a range of high quality on-line learning materials. Last year the Government made some £50 million available to develop this important new initiative and have just announced funding of £84 million for this year.

The Department also funds the Small Firms Enterprise Development Initiative (SFEDI) to share good business practice and to help small firms survive and thrive. It provides support to small businesses from sole traders to companies with up to 20 employees.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is in the process of establishing a new Small Business Service to provide comprehensive support to small and medium-sized enterprises, including support for the development of their workforces. The full local network is expected to be in place by April 2001.

Sixth Forms

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent research he has commissioned on pupil performance in small sixth forms; and if he will make a statement. [123508]

Mr. Wicks: Our most recent statistics show that, in 1998–99, average GCE A-level points scores for 17-year-olds attempting 1+ A/AS level (excluding General Studies) in maintained school sixth forms were as follows:

	Points scores
Average	15.3
50 pupils or less	9.2
201 pupils or more	16.6

Socrates Programme

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the objectives of the youth element of the Socrates Programme in the UK concerning the Building of Europe and Strengthening of Sense of Solidarity; what specific European (a) social and (b) political model is envisaged; and if he will make a statement. [123603]

Ms Jowell: The EU Socrates Programme supports education co-operation between member states and does not support youth activities. These are covered by the EU Youth Programme which principally supports exchanges of young people between member states. Article 2.1 (a) and (b) of the European Council Decision[1] under which the Youth Programme operates states that the objectives of the programme are:

(a) "to promote an active contribution by young people to the building of Europe through their participation in transnational exchanges within the Community or with third countries so as develop understanding of the cultural diversity of Europe and its fundamental common values, thus helping to promote respect for human rights and to combat racism, anti-semitism and xenophobia;

(b) to strengthen their sense of solidarity through more extensive participation by young people in transnational community-service activities within the Community or with third countries, in particular those with which the Community has concluded co-operation agreements".

The Council Decision does not envisage or promote any specific European social or political model.

[1] Decision No. 1031/2000/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 April 2000 establishing the "Youth" Community action programme (Official Journal L 117, 18.5.2000, p. 1).

Education and the Euro

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the (a) mandate and (b) activities to date of the European Community Working Group on Education and the Euro, with particular reference to its planned activities in the UK. [123614]

Ms Jowell: This Commission working group was set up to exchange experience and good practice about euro information activities for schools. It has met three times to date. The group does not have the power to propose activity in the UK or any other member state.

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123734]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 25 May 2000]: Since May 1997, 17 laptop computers have been reported as stolen in the Department for Education and Employment. None has been reported as lost. In order to counter future incidents of theft, laptop computers are now electronically tagged.

Student Financial Support

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what financial support is available to students in the first 28 weeks of leave of absence for the purpose of medical treatment or therapy. [123761]

Mr. Wicks: Under the Education (Student Support) Regulations, full-time students in England and Wales who are absent from their course because of illness are entitled to continue to receive student support for the first 60 days of absence. Before academic year 1998–99 this was only 28 days. Local education authorities have the discretion to decide whether such students continue to receive support after the first 60 days' absence. Among the factors they will consider in coming to a decision is the possibility of financial hardship.

Additional assistance for students studying in the UK who are absent from their course due to illness may be available through the Access Funds. These allow universities and colleges to provide discretionary support for students in particular need; and a total of £76.4 million has been made available in England for the 1999–2000 academic year.

British Sign Language

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what representations he has received calling for the official recognition of British Sign Language; and if he will make a statement; [123770]

(2) what plans he has to grant official recognition to British Sign Language. [123783]

Ms Hodge: The Government have received a number of representations about recognition of British Sign Language, particularly since they announced their intention to ratify the Council of Europe's "European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages". The Charter contains what appears to be a fairly specific definition of what constitutes a regional or minority language. It is clear that those who drafted the Charter did not intend that sign languages come within its terms. We understand that of the 22 member states which have signed the Charter, nine have ratified it and none of these countries has specified their indigenous sign language. We have concluded that consideration of sign languages should not impede signature and ratification but the issue should be explored with other parties once we have ratified the Charter. The Charter has been signed and ratification is currently subject to Parliamentary procedures. Our understanding is that, after ratification, representations on sign languages could be considered by the Charter's Committee of Experts in about 18 months' time when the UK would be submitting its report on the implementation of its obligations under the Charter.

Deaf Children

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the adequacy of specialist nursery provision for children who are deaf; and if he will make a statement. [123772]

Jacqui Smith: Inspection of specialist and mainstream early education provision is carried out by Ofsted. The inspectors check whether staff in the settings are following the Desirable Learning Outcomes (to be replaced with the new Early Learning Goals in September 2000) and are having regard to the Code of Practice on the identification and assessment of special educational needs (SEN).

Where settings cater mainly for children with SEN, the inspection is undertaken by an inspector who is specially trained by Ofsted to inspect SEN provision, using additional guidance developed by Ofsted for this purpose.

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will place copies of the results of all market and opinion research carried out by his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies since May 1997, in the Library. [123806]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 25 May 2000]: Results of some of the market and opinion research projects commissioned by the Department since May 1997 are already held in the House of Commons Library. I will arrange for the results of the other projects commissioned in this period to be sent to the Library.

New Deal for Schools

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 8 May 2000, Official Report, columns 291–93W, if he will list those New Deal for Schools allocations, about which information is held by Shropshire LEA, which do not relate wholly to Shrewsbury and Atcham; and if he will make a statement. [123911]

Jacqui Smith: The following table shows all allocations made to Shropshire local education authority through the New Deal for Schools programme.

Forms

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123950]

Mr. Wicks: In its monitoring of regulatory impact, DfEE does not distinguish the numbers of forms issued exclusively to charities and voluntary organisations which they are required to complete. The collation of this data could be done only at disproportionate cost. However, I am unaware of any requirement placed on charities or voluntary organisations as such, over and above what applies equally to any other providers of education, training or employment.

Part-time Employees (Pension Rights)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has carried out of the costs to the further education sector of the recent European Court judgment retrospectively extending pension rights to part-time employees. [123976]

Mr. Wicks: This is a complex ruling which needs careful consideration. It also has to be referred back to the House of Lords for their judgment.

College Fees

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent representations he has received in connection with the funding of college fees for graduates in receipt of financial support from a research council. [124538]

Mr. Wicks: The Secretary of State has received no recent representations on this issue.

Higher Education Research

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance he has issued to those conducting the current review of the higher education research assessment exercise in connection with reduction of the administration requirements of the system. [124539]

Mr. Wicks: The Higher Education Funding Council for England, in collaboration with the other funding bodies in the United Kingdom, is carrying out its own fundamental review of research policy and funding. This includes an examination of the research assessment exercise and its continuing fitness for purpose. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has given no guidance to the Funding Council on how to carry out this review, which is expected to result in a report for consultation later this summer.

Investors in People

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which Careers Service contractors hold (a) a Charter Mark, (b) an Investors in People award and (c) an International Standards Organisation registration. [120779]

Mr. Wicks [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 2000, c. 218–20W]: Three of the careers companies were inadvertently omitted. The correct response is as follows.

Connexions Service

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proposals he has for the remuneration of learning mentors and Personal Advisers in the Connexions Service. [119266]

Mr. Wicks: Connexions Service Personal Advisers will be employed by partner organisations. Appropriate professional structures are being developed to support this emergent profession. As the role develops full account will be taken of the relevant structures, terms and conditions and labour market conditions in allied professions.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Northern Ireland Bar

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to the answer of 2 February 2000, Official Report, column 639W, on the Northern Ireland Bar, if he will (a) make a statement on dates of correspondence with the Lord Chief Justice and (b) place copies in the Library. [124104]

Mr. Lock: Since January 1997 there have been 16 letters between the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice about appointments to the Northern Ireland Senior Bar.

Two letters between the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice relating to appointments to the Senior Bar have already been disclosed in proceedings before the High Court in Northern Ireland (in the matter of an application by Seamus Treacy and Barry Macdonald) and will be placed in the Library. All of the remaining correspondence was conducted on a confidential basis and much of it relates to individuals' suitability for appointment to the Senior Bar or ministerial responsibility for such appointments. It will not, therefore, be placed in the Library.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to the answer of 2 February 2000, Official Report, column 640W, on the Northern Ireland Bar, if he will make a statement on (a) consultation procedures, (b) responses made and (c) conclusions reached. [124103]

Mr. Lock: This related to the Report of the Committee (the Elliott Committee) established by the Bar Council in November 1996 to investigate and report on all aspects of the appointment of Senior Counsel in Northern Ireland. That Committee reported to the Bar Council the following year and a copy of the Report was provided to the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland in May 1997. The Bar Council did not, however, provide a copy of the Report to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (who was responsible for matters relating to Queen's Counsel at that time) nor to the Lord Chancellor who subsequently assumed those responsibilities. Copies of the Report were, however, provided to the Northern Ireland Office and the Lord Chancellor by the Lord Chief Justice.

I am not in a position to know what responses the Bar Council received following publication of the Elliott Report. Although the Secretary of State and the Lord Chancellor had been invited to comment by the Elliott Committee as part of the Committee's original consultations, neither of them were invited to comment on the recommendations of the final report.

The Lord Chancellor is presently considering the effect of the judgment in the case brought by Seamus Treacy and Barry Macdonald. It would be premature to comment on the Declaration to be made by new Queen's Counsel and the Lord Chancellor's conclusions concerning the Elliott Report until final decisions have been reached concerning the issues raised in that case.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on how many occasions since 24 March 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124120]

Mr. Lock: The Special Adviser in the Lord Chancellor's Department has not travelled overseas in an official capacity since being appointed.

Young Offenders

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the length of time taken to bring young offenders before the courts in each Metropolitan police authority area; and what were the corresponding figures for 1997. [123802]

Jane Kennedy: Information on the time taken in magistrates courts proceedings is collected by the Lord Chancellor's Department's Time Intervals Survey. The accompanying table shows the average number of days from charge or laying of information to first listing for Youth Court defendants in June 1997, June 1999 and February 2000. The only survey to cover all Youth Court defendants in 1997 was the June survey, and the most recent results available are from the February 2000 survey.

Average number of days from charge or laying of information to first court listing for all criminal defendants dealt with at Youth Courts in Metropolitan police authority areas[1]

	June 1997[2]	June 1999	February 2000
Greater Manchester	30	23	12
Merseyside	30	23	8
Metropolitan[3]	38	20	18
Northumbria	31	20	13
South Yorkshire	29	14	9
West Midlands	29	16	13
West Yorkshire	29	24	18

[1] From the start of 1999 analysis of the Time Intervals Survey has included certain longer cases than were previously excluded. In this table however the results presented are calculated on the pre-1999 basis for comparability. On the new basis of calculation the only figure in the table that would be different is the February 2000 figure for Merseyside which would be 9 days.

[2] In the June 1997 survey the sample sizes for Youth Court cases were less than 100 in Merseyside, South Yorkshire, the West Midlands and West Yorkshire and due to these small sample sizes these figures should be treated with added caution.

[3] Includes youths apprehended by City of London Police and proceeded against in London Youth Courts. Youth Courts are not held at the magistrates court in the City of London.

Judges

Ms Keeble: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to her answer of 12 April 2000, Official Report, column 222–23W, when she will make a further statement on part-time judicial appointments to tribunals. [124542]

Jane Kennedy: On 12 April 2000, the Lord Chancellor announced that he and the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for Social Security had agreed with the Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales and the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland, new arrangements for part-time judicial appointments. Similar arrangements have now been put in place for an additional range of part-time Tribunal appointments for which the Lord Chancellor is responsible and for appointments made by the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the Secretary of State for Health, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the President of the Council and the Home Secretary.

The Lord Chancellor has also agreed with the Lord President of the Court of Session that for those Tribunals which sit in Scotland, but where appointments remain wholly or partly the responsibility of Westminster Ministers, the Lord President will assume the role that the Lord Chief Justices have already agreed to for appointments in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. In practice, this will mean that the Lord President will have to concur in all decisions to remove or not to renew an appointment.

Where Scottish Ministers and the National Assembly for Wales are now consulted on appointments to Tribunals in accordance with the relevant Statutory provisions or Devolution Concordats, they will also be consulted on removals from office, and decisions not to renew appointments.

These changes will come into effect immediately.

I am placing in the Library of the House a joint statement signed by the Lord Chancellor and the Lord President setting out the arrangements for the following Tribunals, which may sit in Scotland:

Part-time Immigration Adjudicators

Part-time members of the Immigration Appeal Tribunal

Part-time members of the Income and Corporation Taxes Tribunal

Deputy Special Commissioners for Income Tax Commissioners

Part-time members of the unified appeals service

Deputy Social Security and Child Support Commissioners

Part-time President and Chairmen of the Transport Tribunal

Deputy Traffic Commissioners.

I am also placing in the Library of the House joint statements signed by the specified Minister and by the Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales covering the following fixed-term appointments to Tribunals:

Lord Chancellor

Part-time President and Chairman of the Transport Tribunal

Part-time President and Vice President and Chairmen of the Rent Assessment Panels

Part-time Commons Commissioners

Arbitrators for the Motor Insurance Bureau

Part-time Agricultural Arbitrators

Secretary of State for Education and Employment

Part-time members of the Special Educational Needs Tribunal

Secretary of State for Health

Part-time members of the National Health Service Tribunal

President of the Council

Part-time members of the Registered Homes Tribunal

Home Secretary

Part-time members of the Betting Levy Appeal Tribunal

Part-time members of the Misuse of Drugs Tribunal.

I am also placing in the Library of the House joint statements signed by the specified Minister and by the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland covering the following fixed-term appointments to Tribunals:

Lord Chancellor

Part-time Chairmen and members of the Appeal Tribunals

Part-time Chairmen of the Fair Employment Tribunal

Part-time members of the Tribunal established under Section 91 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998

Part-time members of the Reserve Forces Appeal Tribunal

Part-time Chairmen and members of the Mental Health Review Tribunal

Part-time Chairmen of the Registered Homes Tribunal

Part-time President and Chairmen of the Special Needs Tribunal

Secretary of State for Northern Ireland

Part-time Chairmen and Commissioners of the Sentence Review Commission.

The First and Deputy First Ministers of the New Assembly for Northern Ireland are being invited to agree that the new arrangements be brought before the Executive Committee with a view to an announcement being made to the Assembly by the relevant Northern Ireland Ministers.

Kenneth Noye

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department for what reason the Lord Chancellor has not replied to the letter of 30 April from the parents of the late Stephen Cameron about the award of legal aid to Kenneth Noye; when he plans to do so; and what the circumstances are in which such an award can be made. [124033]

Mr. Lock: The Lord Chancellor replied to Mr. and Mrs. Cameron on 1 June. An award of legal aid is made in a criminal case where the court considers that it is in the interests of justice to do so and that the defendant needs help to meet his or her legal costs.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Errol Flynn

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, columns 76–77W, on intelligence records, if he will make a statement on the timetable for reviewing and releasing historical records relating to the (a) inter-war period and (b) Second World War, with special reference to film stars of that era. [123825]

Mr. Straw: As stated in my reply of 2 May 2000, Official Report, columns 76–77W, the Security Service is currently reviewing and releasing records from its archive covering the Second World War. The next period to be covered by the review will be the inter-war period.

This is a systematic process of review and there are no specific procedures for particular categories of people such as film stars.

Economic Migration

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his policy is on ending specific skill shortages by permitting economic migration; and if he will make a statement. [123728]

Mrs. Roche: Equipping people in the United Kingdom through education and training is key to addressing specific skill shortages. Enhancing access for skilled people from overseas is also important. The Home Office's formal aim for immigration explicitly recognises regulation of entry to and settlement in the United Kingdom in the interests of social stability and economic growth. Within the European Union, freedom of movement means that there is in effect a free market for employment. For non-European Economic Area nationals, the Immigration Rules provide for people seeking to enter or remain in the United Kingdom for specified employment and business purposes, subject to the conditions in the Rules. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has responsibility for the work permit service which is specifically designed to enable employers in the United Kingdom to recruit skilled people from abroad, and recently announced measures aimed at further developing this service.

Criminal Cases Review Commission

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the backlog of cases awaiting examination at the Criminal Cases Review Commission; and what was the backlog on the same date in each year since its establishment. [123602]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that, at the end of April this year, the Criminal Cases Review Commission had 921 cases awaiting review. The number of cases awaiting review at the end of April in 1997, 1998 and 1999 were 412, 860 and 1,198 respectively.

Criminal Assets

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) of 2 February 2000, Official Report, columns 599–600W, on criminal assets, when he plans to publish the White Paper on financial crime. [123774]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We will announce our plans when the Performance and Innovation Unit report is published.

ACPO Crime Committee Survey

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the forces which responded to the survey by the Association of Chief Police Officers Crime Committee, indicating those which (a) (i) had carried out or (ii) were then carrying out investigations into institutional child abuse during the period covered by the questionnaire and (b) had previously been involved in similar investigations. [123292]

Mr. Charles Clarke: For operational reasons the information was sought and supplied in confidence and I am therefore not in a position to answer the question to the level of detail requested. The information is now 12 months old and will be out of date because the situation is changing on a daily basis.

Alcohol Abuse

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much funding his Department allocated to measures for informing people of the dangers of alcohol abuse in the last three years. [123433]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Home Office has had no specific funding allocated to informing people of the dangers of alcohol abuse.

However, the Home Office is active in tackling alcohol-related crime and has in place several measures to do so. A series of seminars on Alcohol and Crime have been established by the Home Office which draw together representatives from other Government Departments, the licensed industry, the voluntary sector and the academic community with the aim of establishing the nature of the problem and developing good practice.

There is also a programme of research under way examining the policing of alcohol-related crime in city centres, the potential of alcohol interventions in the criminal justice system and the alcohol consumption of young people.

The Targeted Policing Initiative within the Crime Reduction Programme has funded one project to tackle alcohol-related crime in Cardiff and is expected to fund a further three in its current funding round.

Kenneth Noye

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reason he has not replied to the letter of 30 April from the parents of the late Stephen Cameron about the award of legal aid to Kenneth Noye; and when he plans to do so. [124034]

Mr. Straw: The reason for not having replied to Mr. and Mrs. Cameron's letter of 30 April was because either the letter was not received in the Home Office or it was received and mislaid. I was grateful to the hon. Member for sending me a copy of Mr. and Mrs. Cameron's letter under cover of his own of 23 May.

My reply to Mr. and Mrs. Cameron will be despatched on 5 June, and will be copied to the hon. Member.

Asylum Seekers (Voucher Scheme)

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those retail firms which have agreed to accept asylum seekers' vouchers as payment. [123901]

Mrs. Roche: As of 25 May 2000, in excess of 19,000 retail firms have agreed to take part in the asylum seeker support voucher scheme. This number includes both large retail chains and smaller retailers.

Forms

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123945]

Mr. Straw: Charities and other voluntary organisations make an important contribution to many aspects of Home Office work. No central record is kept of all the Home Office's contacts with those bodies and the information sought could be collected only at disproportionate cost. The Home Office remains committed to modernising administration, including making greater use of electronic transfers and seeking to minimise the burdens on charities and voluntary organisations.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many officers currently serving in the Special Branch of the Metropolitan police have served on the force for (a) less than five years, (b) more than five and less than 10 years, (c) more than 10 and less than 15 years, (d) more than 15 and less than 20 years and (e) more than 20 years. [123959]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is given in the table provided by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Length of service profile—Special Branch

	Number
(a) Less than five years	19
(b) More than five years and less than 10 years	71
(c) More than 10 years and less than 15 years	159
(d) More than 15 years and less than 20 years	126
(e) More than 20 years	180

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many officers currently serving in the Criminal Investigation Department of the Metropolitan police have served on the force for (a) less than five years, (b) more than five and less than 10 years, (c) more than 10 and less than 15 years, (d) more than 15 and less than 20 years and (e) more than 20 years. [123958]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is given in the table, provided by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Length of service profile—serving criminal investigation department officers

	Number
(a) Less than 5 years	17
(b) More than 5 years and less than 10 years	410
(c) More than 10 years and less than 15 years	960
(d) More than 15 years and less than 20 years	1,067
(e) More than 20 years	1,441

Europol

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the functions of the (a) board of management and (b) joint supervisory body of Europol; what representation the United Kingdom has on both bodies; and how many of its staff are seconded from United Kingdom police forces. [123893]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The functions of the Europol Management Board and the Joint Supervisory Body are set out in Articles 28 and 24 of the Europol Convention, a copy of which has been placed in the Library. The United Kingdom is represented on the Management Board by the Director General of the National Criminal Intelligence Service, and on the Joint Supervisory Body by the Director and Deputy Director of the Office of the Data Protection Registrar.

Four members of the National Criminal Intelligence Service are at present on secondment to Europol as Liaison Officers under Article 5 of the Convention. 17 other United Kingdom nationals are employed by Europol on contract terms under Article 1 of the Staff Regulations applicable to Europol Employees.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the proposed contributions of each member state of the European Union to Europol for (a) 2000 and (b) 2001, indicating the basis for such payments, and the main items of planned expenditure in each year. [123894]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Europol's draft budgets for the years 2000 and 2001 are in European Union Council documents EUROPOL 41, 11030/99 and EUROPOL 8, 7695/00, copies of which are in the Library. These show that member states' contributions are as follows.

Euro

	2000	2001
Austria	620,254	754,533
Belgium	759,021	896,461

Children and Young Persons Act 1933

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were sentenced under section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 in each year since 1997; and what were their (a) ages and (b) gender. [123936]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information is given in the table.

Number of persons sentenced, at the Crown court, under section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 by sex and age, England and Wales, 1997–99[1]

Total	692	30	573	20	575	26

[1] Provisional

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reduce the number of offences which may attract a sentence under section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933. [123938]

Mr. Charles Clarke: It is essential the courts have the powers they need to deal with children and young persons convicted of serious offences. The Government have no current plans to reduce the number of offences contained in section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933.

Correspondence

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 20 April 2000, Official Report, column 592W, when a reply will be sent to the letter from the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford to the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), of 24 January. [124142]

Mrs. Roche: A full reply to the letter of 24 January from the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford was sent on 23 May.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the letter from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Central of 9 May concerning issuing of letters to asylum seekers notifying refusal but delaying the issue of the removal notice; what consultation he has had with the Secretary of State for Social Security regarding its impact on benefits; if he will make it his policy to discontinue the practice; and if he will make a statement. [123865]

Mrs. Roche: I replied to my hon. Friend on 23 May. There was no need to consult the Secretary of State for Social Security about the content of the interim letters to asylum seekers, because the relevant paragraphs were concerned with support from the National Asylum Support Service (NASS) which is part of the Home Office. There was never any intention to cut off support before the asylum seekers had the opportunity to appeal against the refusal of their claims, but I accept that the wording used in the interim letters may have caused some confusion. In order to avoid this in future, the paragraphs about NASS support have now been removed from the interim letter. Where appropriate, they are now included in the letter which provides full reasons for the refusal of the asylum claim.

Fire Service

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each fire authority, grouped into (a) London area, (b) metropolitan areas, (c) shire counties and (d) shire unitary authorities for each year from 1992 to date, (i) the number of fire call-outs, (ii) the average call out time for urban areas and rural areas, (iii) the number of fatalities and injuries, (iv) the number of fatalities and injuries per head of population and (v) the totals of (i) to (iv) for each grouped fire authority (a) to (d); and if he will make a statement. [123903]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Information is not available in the exact form requested as statistics are compiled by brigade area. Tables showing the following information for fires attended by local authority fire brigades in England and Wales during the period 1992 to 1998: (i) the total number of fires and the number of fires involving property and/or casualties (primary fires). The figure for total fires (comprises property fires and those involving casualties (i.e. primary fires), small outdoor fires (i.e. secondary fires) and chimney fires); (ii) the average response time in minutes from receipt of the first call to the brigade to time of arrival, split by urban and rural areas within the brigade; and (iii) the number of fatal and non-fatal casualties involved in fires and rates per million head of the population have been placed in the Library.

Water Cannon

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his oral statement of 22 May 2000, Official Report, column 656, if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the use of water cannon against crowds (a) comprised entirely of adult males, (b) comprised of adult males and adult females and (c) comprised entirely of adult females. [124361]

Mr. Straw: Water cannon are not currently in use for public order purposes in England and Wales.

The possibility of providing the police with water cannon to deal with serious public disorder was carefully considered by a joint police and Home Office working party in the 1980s. Tests were conducted into all aspects of the water cannon's operational capabilities. Models in use on the continent were examined and a wide range of tests were carried out using custom-built British prototypes, as a result of which a number of operational problems emerged.

Water cannons cannot be mobilised quickly in order to deal with spontaneous disorder and when mobilised are slow and difficult to manoeuvre, particularly in narrow streets. When water cannon were used in Northern Ireland in the early 1970s they were not found to be effective and, in fact, they became prize targets for rioters.

For these reasons, chief police officers in England and Wales have not been persuaded that water cannon would be of operational value in dealing with public disorder in this country.

Police Service Strength

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the most recent breakdown of the Police Resources Unit projections of total police service strength in England and Wales from 31 March 1999 to 31 March 2003. [123975]

Mr. Charles Clarke: There were 126,096 police officers on 31 March 1999. On the basis of projections made by police forces earlier this year, total police numbers for 31 March 2000 were estimated at 124,800. Actual figures should be available by the end of June. For projections for 2000–01 and 2001–02, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary gave to the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) on 22 May 2000, Official Report, columns 655–58W.

Police force projections indicate that for 31 March 2003 there would be 125,900 police officers, as cited in the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Southwark North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) on 15 March 2000, Official Report, columns 177–79W. Chief Officer's projections were made on the basis of the Comprehensive Spending Review settlement which extends to 2001–02, but in the absence of any information about funding levels for the police service in 2002–03. Funding levels from 2002–03 will only be known when the outcome of the 2000 Spending Review is announced in the summer, when more realistic projections can be made.

Child Curfew Orders

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many local child curfew orders have been issued in Dorset. [124514]

Mr. Charles Clarke: No applications have been received from local authorities to establish child curfew schemes under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. Local authorities should consider the contribution such schemes could make to tackling problems of anti-social behaviour by children identified in their local crime and disorder reduction strategy.

Police Recruitment (Dorset)

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what discussions he has had with the Chief Constable of Dorset regarding police recruitment; [124527]

(2) what share of the Crime Fighting Fund for Police recruits will be allocated to Dorset. [124517]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have not had any discussions with the Chief Constable of Dorset Police regarding police recruitment.

Dorset Police were allocated 46 police officers (29 officers in 2000–01 and 17 in 2001–02) under the accelerated recruitment scheme of the Crime Fighting Fund. The funding for each force will be determined once we have received a profile of their planned recruitment during the first year.

Persistent Young Offenders

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in reducing the time taken between arrest and sentence for persistent young offenders. [124516]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, to the right hon. Member for Maidstone and The Weald (Miss Widdecombe) on 12 May 2000, Official Report, column 523W.

Drug Treatment and Testing Orders

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drug treatment and testing orders have been issued in Dorset. [124515]

Mr. Charles Clarke: None: the order was piloted in three areas: Croydon, Liverpool and Gloucestershire.

As announced by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, in a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) on 15 May 2000, Official Report, columns 63–64W, Drug Treatment Testing Orders (DTTOs) will be rolled-out to all areas in England and Wales from 1 October 2000.

Dogs (Scientific Tests)

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the oral statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the hon. Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) on 14 December 2000, Official Report, columns 250–54, on animals, when the Government introduced a ban on the use of dogs in scientific tests; and how this ban was announced. [124422]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Dogs are used in regulated procedures where their use is justified under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. There are no current plans to change the legislation.

The oral statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 14 December 1999, Official Report, columns 250–54, stemmed from a misleading newspaper report in the Sunday Times on 12 December 1999. This report appeared to be based on a misreading of the Breeding and Sale of Dogs (Welfare) Act 1999, which came into force on 30 December 1999. The Act tightens controls over commercial breeding establishments supplying dogs for the pet trade. It is designed to raise standards of care in puppy farms and stipulates tighter controls on the sale of dogs by dealers and pet shops and stiffer penalties for breeders who flout the law.

Establishments breeding animals for laboratory use are exempt from the Breeding and Sale of Dogs (Welfare) Act 1999 and will continue to be regulated by the provisions of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 which requires Home Office inspection and close veterinary supervision.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food wrote on 2 February 2000 to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) about correcting the error. A copy of his letter was placed in the Library.

Police Helicopters

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 62W, on police helicopters, and his letter of 18 May, what is the total cost of the air package; and what items it covers. [124658]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The total contract cost to South Wales Police for the air support package is £542,988 for the financial year 2000–01. The contract is placed with Veritair Ltd. and covers the costs of the provision of a role-equipped helicopter, maintenance, fuel, four pilots, pilot training and base facilities.

Hunting with Dogs

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 18 May 2000, Official Report, column 217W, on hunting with dogs, what steps the Government plan to take to assist the passage through both Houses of Parliament of a Private Members' Bill designed to secure a ban on hunting with dogs. [124074]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The precise steps which may be needed in terms of Government time and assistance to secure the opportunity of a free vote on a hunting Bill will depend upon the circumstances at the time. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has already indicated our broad approach on it.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions since 27 April 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124118]

Mr. Straw: During the period 27 April 1999 to the end of March 2000, special advisers in this Department have not travelled overseas in an official capacity.

2 Marsham Street

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what purposes the former Environment Department building in Marsham street is now used. [124241]

Mr. Straw: Pursuant to my reply to the hon. Member for West Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer) of 6 December 1999, Official Report, column 391W, the only occupier of this otherwise vacant building is a temporary shelter for the homeless, currently scheduled to close on 31 July. Other casual issues are permitted on a short term basis from time to time.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the annual cost of maintaining the former Environment Department offices in Marsham street. [124239]

Mr. Straw: Pursuant to my reply to the hon. Member for West Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer) of 6 December 1999, Official Report, column 391W, the budgeted figure for the financial year 2000–01 is £392,000 excluding VAT.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement regarding the future of the former Environment Department offices in Marsham street. [124238]

Mr. Straw: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) on 20 January 2000, Official Report, column 558W.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated value of the former Environment Department site in Marsham Street. [124240]

Mr. Straw: The site belongs to Property Advisers Civil Estate (PACE). As it is the subject of disposal action through my Department's Central London Accommodation Strategy disclosure of the current valuation could be prejudicial until the sale is completed.

Crime (Greater Manchester)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what data he has collated on recent crime trends in respect of (a) Greater Manchester and (b) the centre of Manchester for (i) robbery, (ii) theft from persons, (iii) theft from cars, (iv) theft of cars, (v) total crime, (vi) violent crime and (vii) sexual assaults. [123800]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The latest available data on crime trends in the centre of Manchester and Greater Manchester compare the periods April 1998 to September 1998 and April 1999 to September 1999 and are shown in the table.

	North and South Manchester			Greater Manchester
	1 April 1998 to 30 September 1998	1 April 1999 to 30 September 1999	Percentage change	1 April 1998 to 30 September 1998	1 April 1999 to 30 September 1999	Percentage change
Total crime	45,676	46,954	2.8	182,433	185,955	1.9
Violent crime	7,009	8,540	21.8	23,114	26,428	14.3
Violence against the person	4,897	6,142	25.4	18,368	21,039	14.5
Robbery	1,781	2,022	13.5	3,611	4,095	13.4
Sexual offences	331	376	13.6	1,135	1,294	14.0
Theft from the person	1,044	1,099	5.3	2,232	2,266	1.5
Theft from a vehicle	5,706	5,105	−10.5	23,477	22,317	−4.9
Theft/unauthorised taking of a vehicle	4,653	4,599	−1.2	19,237	19,698	2.4

Notes:
Violent crime comprises violence against the person, robbery and sexual offences.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with Greater Manchester Police on the setting of operational targets with respect to (a) crimes of violence and (b) overall crime. [123801]

Mr. Charles Clarke: All police authorities in England and Wales have been provided with statutory guidance under the Best Value regime (Section 5 of the Local Government Act 1999) which requires that specific five year targets should be set by all police authorities for domestic burglary and for vehicle crime. In addition, five police authorities, including Greater Manchester, are required to set a target for robbery. The targets are a matter for individual police authorities and those set by each police authority are contained in their Best Value Performance Plan which they were required to publish before 31 March 2000.

The five year targets set by the Greater Manchester Police Authority are:

to reduce domestic burglary by 25 per cent.;
to reduce vehicle crime by 34 per cent.; and to reduce robbery by 10 per cent.

Pedlars Act 1871

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the outcome of his review of the Pedlars Act 1871. [123582]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Home Office has considered the scope for reforming street trading and pedlars legislation in the light of the previous Government's deregulation reviews. We intend to discuss shortly with interested parties the deregulatory possibilities for street trading. Reform or repeal of the Pedlars Acts would, we believe, require primary legislation. We are ready to listen to views on pedlars but have no present plans to change the law.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Salmon

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice he has received from the Environment Agency on a possible extension of the salmon netting season in North-East England. [124985]

Mr. Morley: Following a debate in the House on 10 November 1999, I undertook to obtain advice from the Environment Agency on the implications of extending the salmon netting season by 20 days in North-East England. I emphasised that I would not wish to proceed with any measure that was not in the interests of salmon conservation. I also sought the Agency's advice on whether additional measures were needed to conserve large salmon in river fisheries in the autumn, particularly in the North-East.

I have now received the Agency's advice, which I have accepted. I am placing a copy in the Library of the House. In summary, the Agency has advised that such an extension would substantially increase the level of exploitation of both multi-sea-winter salmon and grilse and would not be in the interests of salmon conservation. The Agency does not believe at present that there is an immediate need for further measures to restrict exploitation by either rods or nets in North-East England, and notes that half of the rod catch in North-East England in 1999 was released. Nevertheless, it will continue to keep the position under review.

Farming (Financial Assistance)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much financial assistance has been given to the farming industry from European and UK sources in each year since 1990–91. [123988]

Ms Quin: The figures are set out in the table. Most but not all will be transferred to the farming industry. The farming industry also benefits from higher food prices as a result of the CAP, which are paid for by consumers.

EU and UK expenditure under the CAP and on national grants and subsidies, 1990–91 to date

Over-30-months Scheme

Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of claims under the over-30-months slaughter scheme for the period between 29 April and 25 May 1996 remain unresolved. [123435]

Ms Quin: In July 1999, the Agricultural Departments put in place arrangements for the Intervention Board Executive Agency to make ex gratia payments in respect of certain bovine animals, referred to as "Early Casualty Cases". These were casualty animals requiring emergency slaughter on welfare grounds, and which could not be presented onto the Over-30-months Slaughter Scheme between 29 April and 24 May (9 June in Scotland) 1996 solely due to the limited casualty processing facilities then available under the scheme.

Applications for Early Casualty Case payment were invited during the period 23 July to 31 August 1999. The Intervention Board received claims for payment on 132 animals put down during the relevant period in 1996, and a written response has been provided to each of these. Therefore, no cases remain unresolved.

Payment was made in respect of 115 animals. Eleven were found to be not payable, and six did not respond to requests for further information.

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what payments were made under the over-30-months scheme in each month during the past two years. [123411]

Ms Quin: The number of animals slaughtered under the OTMS and the amounts of compensation paid in each month over the period are set out in the table. It is not possible to relate directly the compensation paid to the number of animals slaughtered in any month mainly because payments are generally made up to five weeks after the date of slaughter. Apart from the compensation payments, expenditure totalling about £115 million in 1998–99 and £130 million in 1999–2000 was incurred for services such as slaughtering, rendering, incineration, storage and transport.

Beef Exports

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what contact Ministers or officials have had during the last 12 months with the United States Department of Agriculture with the aim of lifting the ban on UK beef exports. [123136]

Ms Quin [holding answer 22 May 2000]: My right hon. Friend the Minister raised the issue of the lifting of the US import ban on UK beef during his visit to the USA in February. The Chief Veterinary Officer and officials from our Embassy in Washington DC have also lobbied for the lifting of the US ban. The USA currently bans the import of beef from all European Union countries.

Pig Industry

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to introduce the outgoer and ongoer elements of the pig industry restructuring scheme; and what projection has been made of the funds to be allocated to each element in each of the three years of the overall scheme. [122990]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 22 May 2000]: Under state aid rules, the European Commission must approve the Pig Industry Restructuring Scheme (PIRS) before it can be introduced. To begin that process, the scheme was formally notified to the Commission on 30 March. The Commission has since carried out its initial study of the scheme and raised a number of questions; my officials have already answered these. The outgoers element of the scheme will be introduced as soon as possible following Commission approval. At present we are working towards introducing the ongoers element in early autumn. The outgoers scheme will operate using a sealed bid system, with the expectation that a good proportion of the £26 million plus the additional funds for which bids have been made will be available for the ongoers element.

GMOs

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his oral statement on GMOs and conventional crops of 18 May 2000, Official Report, column 473, whether any of the genetically-modified seeds contained the terminator gene. [123543]

Ms Quin [holding answer 24 May 2000]: The genetically modified oilseed rape variety in question (RT73) does not contain the terminator gene.

Correspondence

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will reply to the letter dated 21 February from the hon. Member for Stafford concerning Alex Nixon. [123773]

Ms Quin: I replied to the letter from my hon. Friend on 11 May 2000.

Farm Incinerators

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the number of small incinerators used on farms. [123653]

Mr. Morley: My Department has made no such estimate. I understand that the National Farmers' Union considers the number to be somewhere between 2,000 and 3,000, but precise information is not available.

Bovine TB

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what studies his Department is conducting into the relationship of cattle movements to the possible spread of bovine TB. [123909]

Ms Quin: The risk factors which may increase the likelihood of TB infection in cattle herds, including any relationship between cattle movements and the spread of the disease, is being studied through the analysis of epidemiological data. These data are being collected by MAFF through a detailed survey of farms with TB outbreaks.

Statistics

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what statistics relating to the responsibilities of his Department are collated by parliamentary constituency, indicating the dates covered in each case. [123841]

Ms Quin [holding answer 25 May 2000]: Statistics from the annual June Census of Agriculture and Horticulture have recently been collated by parliamentary constituency. Our intentions are to place the information in the House of Commons data library.

Staffing

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what conclusions he has reached about the future of the regional service centres and the Intervention Board Agency; and what are the resulting changes in location and employment. [123897]

Ms Quin: No decisions have been made on the future of the Ministry's Regional Service Centres (RSCs) or the Intervention Board Executive Agency (IBEA) following the recent review of CAP scheme administration.

The review concluded that we could offer a radically improved service to farmers and significant savings to taxpayers by merging the payment functions of MAFF's RSCs and IBEA and making better use of available technology. The case for restructuring, which will require new funding, is being considered in the context of the Spending Review 2000.

My right hon. Friend the Minister has made it clear that he will not implement the recommendations of the review unless he is satisfied that we will be able to deliver clear benefits to public administration and to our client groups.

Aspartame

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what monitoring the Food Standards Agency has undertaken of the number of people suffering an adverse reaction to aspartame; and how many cases have so far been reported of such a reaction, broken down by symptoms suffered. [124085]

Ms Stuart: I have been asked to reply.

The Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products, and the Environment will be publishing shortly a review of adverse reactions to food and food ingredients, including food additives. Their report discusses the difficulties in establishing the true incidence and prevalence of these reactions and attributing an adverse reaction to a specific food or food ingredient. Additionally, the Food Standards Agency has recently commissioned a feasibility study of methods to monitor potential adverse reactions to novel foods and the outcome of this will help to establish whether, and if so in what form, a practical monitoring system might be established. A copy of the COT's report will be placed in the Library as soon as it becomes available.

DEFENCE

Departmental Estate

Ms Christine Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he plans to publish his Department's Estate Strategy. [124931]

Dr. Moonie: "In Trust and On Trust", the Strategy for the Defence Estate, will be published tomorrow, meeting the commitment made by my Department following the outcome of the Strategic Defence Review (SDR). Copies will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses and it will also be placed on the worldwide web.

The Ministry of Defence has consulted closely with voluntary sector organisations who have an interest in the defence estate and with the Government's statutory advisers. The Strategy will deliver a more efficient and effective estate and will serve to ensure that Ministry of Defence targets resources to the estate in the most effective way. This is a far-reaching document which will be of benefit to all those with an interest in Ministry of Defence's estate.

CHOTS Project

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his letter of 25 January, D/US of S/PK PQ0057K/00/M, what are the total life revenue and capital costs of the CHOTS project since conception, including upgrades one through eight; what further upgrades have been planned since March 1999; what are their estimated costs and completion dates; and if he will make a statement. [123647]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Communication Services Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from A. J. Roper to Mr. Paul Keetch, dated 6 June 2000:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question concerning the costs of the Corporate Headquarters Office Technology System (CHOTS) programme. As Chief Executive of the Defence Communication Services Agency, the CHOTS programme falls within my area of responsibility.

The total life costs of the CHOTS programme since its conception in 1984, including upgrades, is estimated at £848.8M at current prices. This cost remains within existing Treasury approvals which cover the period until 2006.

The last upgrade, known as CSV8 (CHOTS System Version 8), was completed on schedule in March 1999. Whilst no further major upgrades are currently planned, estimates include an assessment for ongoing technology refreshment of the system and a likely enhancement to cover the introduction of the Windows 2000 operating system. Beyond this, it is anticipated that CHOTS will form part of the Department's wider requirements for information delivery, to be met under a new Defence Information Infrastructure project managed by the Defence Procurement Agency under smart procurement principles.

Iraq (No-fly Zones)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions coalition aircraft patrolling the northern no-fly zone in Iraq released ordnance between 1 April 1991 and 16 December 1998 and (b) 20 December 1998 to date, stating in percentage terms (i) the nature of the threat, (ii) the category of the target attacked and (iii) the tonnage of ordnance released on each category of target in proportion to the overall tonnage released in those periods. [122846]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 23 May 2000]: I am withholding detailed information on the activities of other allies in accordance with Part II Section 1.c of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

The UK has never released ordnance over the northern no-fly zone.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions coalition aircraft patrolling (a) the northern and (b) the southern no-fly zone in Iraq hit targets other than the intended target between (i) 1 April 1991 and 16 December 1998 and (ii) 20 December 1998 to date, stating what percentage this formed of overall attacks during those periods. [122848]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The coalition only ever targets, in self-defence, Iraqi military facilities that pose a threat to its forces carrying out legitimate patrols of the no-fly zones. The coalition goes to exceptional lengths to ensure that the right target is hit, including the employment of very strict target clearance procedures and precision guided munitions. We conduct painstaking battle damage assessment after every bomb is dropped. For these reasons we are confident that, in the vast majority of cases, released ordnance by coalition aircraft lands on, or very close to, its intended target.

I am withholding detailed information on the activities undertaken by other allies in accordance with Part II Section 1.c of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

The UK has never released ordnance over the northern no-fly zone.

Between 1 April 1991 and 16 December 1998 UK aircraft released ordnance on two occasions. On both occasions all of the ordnance hit the intended targets. Since 20 December 1998, there have been two occasions when ordnance from UK aircraft appears to have hit unintended targets. The weapons released on these occasions represent 1 per cent. of the total tonnage of ordnance released by the UK over this period.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total tonnage of ordnance released by coalition aircraft in operations to maintain (a) the southern and (b) the northern no-fly-zones in Iraq between (i) 1 August 1992 and 16 December 1998 and (ii) 20 December 1998 to date; and what is the monthly average in each of these periods. [122844]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 23 May 2000]: I am withholding detailed information on the activities of other allies in accordance with Part II Section 1.c of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Between 1 August 1992 and 16 December 1998, UK aircraft released 2.5 tons of ordnance over the southern no-fly zone at an average of 0.025 tons per month. We do not have sufficiently detailed records of coalition activity over this period to estimate what percentage of the coalition total this represents.

Between 20 December 1998 and 17 May 2000, UK aircraft released 78 tons of ordnance over the southern no-fly zones, at an average of 5 tons per month. This figure represents approximately 20 per cent. of the coalition total for this period.

The UK has never released ordnance over the northern no-fly zone.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the number of Iraqi civilians killed as a result of coalition aircraft responding to threats in (a) the northern and (b) the southern no-fly-zone in Iraq between (i) 1 April 1991 and 16 December 1998 and (ii) 20 December 1998 to date through (A) collateral damage, (B) attack on an unintended target and (C) malfunction of ordnance; and what percentage of attacks in the no-fly-zones resulted in civilian casualties in those periods. [122845]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The coalition only ever targets, in self-defence, Iraqi military facilities that pose a threat to its forces carrying out legitimate patrols of the no-fly zones. The coalition goes to exceptional lengths to ensure civilian casualties are kept to the absolute minimum possible, including the employment of very carefully controlled targeting procedures and precision guided munitions.

In practice, it is extremely difficult to give estimates of civilian casualties, despite the painstaking battle-damage assessment (BDA) that the coalition routinely carries out every time ordnance is released. However, we can demonstrate categorically that many of the Iraqi claims of civilian casualties are either exaggerated or wholly untrue. On a number of occasions the Iraqis have claimed that coalition aircraft have caused civilian casualties when allied aircraft have not released any munitions, or even been flying. The most recent example of this was on 17 May this year, when it seems very probable that the civilian casualties which the Iraqis claimed were caused by coalition activities, were in fact caused by an Iraqi air defence weapon. There have also been many instances when the Iraqis claimed civilians have been killed, where our BDA has clearly indicated that only military facilities were attacked.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions coalition aircraft patrolling the southern no-fly-zone in Iraq released ordnance between (a) 1 August 1992 and 16 December 1998 and (b) 20 December 1998 to date, stating in percentage terms (i) the nature of the threat, (ii) the category of the target attacked and (iii) the tonnage of ordnance released on each category of target in proportion to the overall tonnage released in those periods. [122847]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 23 May 2000]: I am withholding detailed information on the activities undertaken by allies under Part II Section 1.c of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Between 1 August 1992 and 16 December 1998, UK aircraft released ordnance over the southern no-fly zone on two occasions. The nature of the threat on both occasions was hostile electronic activity. In both cases, ordnance was directed against elements of Iraq's Ground Based Air Defence Systems, posing a direct threat to coalition forces.

Between 20 December 1998 and 17 May 2000 coalition aircraft were directly threatened by the Iraqi air defence forces on over 320 occasions. Aircraft responded in self-defence on 74 occasions against Iraqi military facilities posing a direct threat to coalition forces. Details of these threats, broken down by percentage, are as follows:

	Percentage
Nature of threat
Aircraft violations of southern no-fly zone	51
Anti-aircraft artillery/surface to air missile firings	45
Hostile electronic activity	4
Category of target attacked
Ground based air defence system	95
Other military systems posing a direct threat to coalition forces	5
Tonnage of weapons released
Ground based air defence system	92
Other military systems posing a direct threat to coalition forces	8

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions the Commander for British Forces in charge of (a) Operation Bolton, (b) Operation Warden and (c) preceding operations to maintain the no-fly zones in Iraq has requested authority from his Department to attack a target between (i) 1 April 1991 and 16 December 1998 and (ii) 20 December 1998 to date, stating in each case (A) the date of request, (B) the category of the target, (C) whether authority was given and (D) whether the target was attacked. [122849]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 23 May 2000]: Commanders of British Forces operating over the Iraqi no-fly zones receive a directive from CJO that gives them highly detailed levels of delegated authority for target clearance.

(a)(i) Between 1 April 1991 and 16 December 1998, the Commander of British Forces for Operations over the southern no-fly zone referred to the UK for authority to attack targets beyond his delegated authority on one occasion. This approval was granted. I am withholding further details of this operation under Part II Section 1.a of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

(a)(ii) Between 20 December 1998 and 17 May 2000, the Commander of British Forces for Operation Bolton formally sought approval to attack targets beyond his delegated authority on four occasions. On each occasion approval was granted. I am withholding further details of this operation under Part II Section 1.a of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

(b) The UK has never released ordnance over the northern no-fly zone.

Training and Logistics Support

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what request his Department made to the US Government on the sale of training and logistics support to back up the lease of four Boeing C17 Transport Aircraft; what is the cost to his Department of this support and over what time it would run; and if he will make a statement. [124555]

Mr. Hoon: Further to my statement of 16 May 2000 in which I announced that it is our intention to lease four C-17 Globemaster aircraft to meet the Royal Air Force short to medium term airlift requirement: following termination of the original Short Term Strategic Airlift competition on 5 August 1999, the Ministry of Defence explored a number of options. These included discussions with Boeing and the US Government on ways of reducing the cost of meeting the RAF's requirement with a possible C-17 lease package. These discussions focused on the most cost-effective means of providing training and logistic support. Following our decision to lease four C-17 aircraft, a UK/US Government agreement has now been signed to provide C-17 training and training support services for the programme at an approximate cost of £8 million. A similar agreement will be put in place to cover the logistic support for the aircraft, but the details, including final costs, have yet to be agreed. Both agreements are expected to run for the full term of the aircraft lease.

Army Cadet Death

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what persons are to be disciplined as a result of the events surrounding the death of Army cadet Claire Louise Shore; [124356]

(2) what assessment he has made of (a) the report of the Health and Safety Executive and (b) the Army Board of Inquiry into the death of Army cadet Claire Louise Shore; [124354]

(3) if he will ensure that the parents of Army cadet Claire Louise Shore receive a detailed personal de-brief of the Army's Board of Inquiry proceedings. [124355]

Mr. Spellar: There has been a thorough investigation into this tragic incident by the Ministry of Defence Police, the Army's Training Accident Investigation Team and the Health and Safety Executive. The evidence from these investigations has been considered by the Crown Prosecution Service and by the Army chain of command and it has been found to be insufficient to support a prosecution under civil or military law, nor do they reveal any grounds for disciplinary action against any individual. They do, however, make criticisms of the organisation of the cadet camp and the training safety procedures. The Army accepts these criticisms and will accept the formal censure to be issued later this month. Action is in hand to improve these procedures.

The Army's Board of Inquiry has not yet been completed. On completion, the Army will be happy to give a copy to Claire Shore's parents and to de-brief them in person.

Military Bases (Foreign Personnel)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the military bases in the United Kingdom where foreign nationals are based, indicating in each case, the (a) nationality and (b) number of individuals involved. [123759]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 5 June 2000]: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Bonus Payments (Overseas Deployment)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel have qualified for the bonus payments for overseas deployment under the recently introduced procedures; what delays in making these payments to service personnel there have been, and for what reason; how many claims are outstanding; and if he will make a statement. [124476]

Mr. Spellar: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Advanced Composite Armoured Vehicle Platform

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost to date of the work carried out to develop the Advanced Composite Armoured Vehicle Platform; what was the total budget provision and completion date for development and trials; and if he will make a statement. [124540]

Dr. Moonie: The total cost to the MOD of the Advanced Composite Armoured Vehicle Platform is expected to be £6 million, which is within the total budget provision when the programme started in 1993. The initial automotive trials have been successful and the development and trials process is expected to be complete in October 2000.

Mr. Liam Clarke

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 462W, concerning the Metropolitan Police investigation of Mr. Liam Clarke, what were the times and occasions when complaints were made by him to the Metropolitan Police Service concerning alleged breaches of the Official Secrets Acts following the publication of articles in The Sunday Times concerning interviews by Liam Clarke and Martin Ingram. [124678]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 5 June 2000]: At a meeting with the Crown Prosecution Service on 8 September 1999 my Department raised its concerns that a breach of the Official Secrets Act may have been committed by Martin Ingram. Subsequent investigations have been a matter for the police.

Wireless Transmitter Station, Stubbington

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what price the site of the former wireless transmitter station at Stubbington was sold. [124682]

Dr. Moonie: The price was £2.085 million.

WALES

Magistrates Courts

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the Lord Chancellor's Department concerning the future of rural magistrates courts; and if he will make a statement. [124426]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have had no such discussions with the Lord Chancellor.

The Government consider that magistrates courts are best managed locally by magistrates courts committees under the provision of the Justices of the Peace Act 1997. Decisions concerning the future of magistrates courts in Wales, whether rural or urban, are for the relevant magistrates courts committee to determine, in consultation with the paying authority or authorities.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Pakistan

Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on her plans for provision of bilateral development assistance to Pakistan. [124773]

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress has been made towards restoring the bilateral aid programme to Pakistan. [124564]

Clare Short: I have agreed to provide technical assistance to assist the Administration to prepare some of the key reforms which would enable the UK and multilateral institutions to re-engage in Pakistan.

PRIME MINISTER

OSPAR Convention, Copenhagen

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister which (a) Departments and (b) Ministers will represent the Government at the forthcoming OSPAR convention in Copenhagen on 26 June. [124242]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The annual meeting of the OSPAR Commission for the Protection of the Marine Environment of the North East Atlantic will be held on 26 to 30 June. It is a meeting of officials from the Contracting Parties to the OSPAR Convention, which Ministers would not normally expect to attend.

Although the exact composition of the UK delegation has yet to be finalised, I understand it is likely to comprise officials from DETR and DTI.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Schengen Agreement

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact of Greek participation in the Schengen Agreement on the future level of illegal immigration to Western European states by Albanian nationals; and what recent representations he has made on this issue. [123629]

Mrs. Roche: The evaluation of Greece's readiness to participate in Schengen arrangements was made by the existing Schengen states, which did not include the United Kingdom. That evaluation covered the question of security of Greece's external frontiers. The Schengen arrangements, as incorporated within Treaty structures, provide for a continuing process of evaluation by participating states of adherence to the Schengen acquis, including the maintenance of the external frontiers of the Schengen area. The United Kingdom's participation in the Schengen agreement does not include external frontier arrangements and our participation in the evaluation process is limited to those areas in which we will ourselves participate. We shall continue to operate our own controls to tackle illegal immigration in the way that best suits our national circumstances. The Government have not, therefore, made any representations on this issue to European Union partners.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department will compile a list of those (a) elements of acquis, (b) working documents and (c) reports, pertaining to Schengen, to which his Department has to date not had access. [123622]

Mrs. Roche: We have had access to all the Schengen acquis as defined in Council Decision 1999/435/EC. Since the incorporation of the acquis into the Treaty on European Union, the United Kingdom as a member of the Council sees all Council working documents and reports.

Kosovar Asylum Seekers

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people from Kosovo came to the United Kingdom under the United Nations humanitarian and medical evacuation programmes; how many are still in the United Kingdom; how many have claimed political asylum; and if he will make a statement. [123791]

Mrs. Roche: A total of 4,346 evacuees from Kosovo arrived in the United Kingdom under the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees Humanitarian Evacuation Programme from Macedonia between 25 April and 25 June 1999, including 19 medical evacuees and their families. A further 109 Kosovans (26 patients with their immediate family members) have, so far, arrived on subsequent medical evacuation flights from Kosovo.

As of 1 June, 1,527 of the evacuees had returned permanently to Kosovo under the voluntary return programme from the United Kingdom which began on 26 July 1999.

Since March 2000, 241 principal applicants have sought an extension of exceptional leave to enter, 79 have applied for asylum and 90 have applied for both exceptional leave and asylum. These applications are currently under consideration.

Immigration Rules

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for clearance to the United Kingdom there were in each of the last three years; and, of these, how many were (a) granted, (b) rejected on the grounds of Rule 320(18) of the UK Immigration Rules and (c) accepted despite the individual having relatively serious criminal convictions which would normally result in the application being rejected under Rule 320(18) of the UK Immigration Rules. [123584]

Mrs. Roche: Information on total grants and refusals of entry clearance applications overseas is given in Table 1. I regret that the other entry clearance information requested is not available centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Only some nationalities and categories of person need to obtain entry clearance prior to arrival in the United Kingdom. Information is available on persons refused leave to enter at United Kingdom ports and removed where the principal reason for the decision was taken under paragraph 320(18) of the Immigration Rules, and is given in Table 2. Information is not available on cases where the discretion allowed under the Rule is exercised, either with regard to applications for entry clearance or leave to enter.

Anti-terrorism Powers

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures have been taken to assess the number of persons detained at ports under anti-terrorism powers for less than an hour and variations year by year in the frequency of stops that fall short of the minimum duration required for the purposes of the formal recording process; if the Independent Assessor has powers and resources available to advertise his address in the Irish community press to facilitate making contact with individuals who may have relevant experiences to relate; and what measures he will take to form an independent assessment of the effect and perceptions of emergency legislation among the travelling public and Irish community in particular. [123957]

Mr. Straw: The Independent Review of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 has access to and speaks to the National Co-ordinator of Ports Policing who oversees the exercise of police port powers including any variations in the number of people examined.

Resources are available to the Reviewer to conduct his annual review in the manner he thinks best, which can include placing advertisements in the Irish community press. It will be for any future Reviewer of the counter-terrorist legislation to decide the most appropriate consultation process and whether to invite specifically the travelling public to make known their particular experiences at ports.

Children and Young Persons Act 1933

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offenders were serving sentences under section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 on 1 April for each year since 1997; and how many of them were serving their sentences in (a) local authority secure accommodation, and (b) Young Offenders Institutions. [123937]

Mr. Boateng: The available information for offenders serving sentences under section 53(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1993 in Prison Service accommodation is for the end of June each year. It is as follows:

Year
1997	759
1998	856
1999	862
2000	873

Note:
End March—provisional

The available information for offenders serving sentences in local authority secure accommodation has been supplied by the Department of Health and is for 31 March each year. The numbers are as follows:

Year
1997	96
1998	113
1999	88

Note:

Liam Grogan

Mr. Temple-Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when a decision will be made on the repatriation of Liam Grogan to the Republic of Ireland, to serve the remainder of his sentence there. [123913]

Mr. Boateng: A decision regarding Mr. Grogan's application for repatriation to the Republic of Ireland will be made as soon as possible.

Obscene Publications Acts

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reform the Obscene Publications Acts 1959 and 1964. [124177]

Mr. Straw: The Government keep the obscenity laws under general review and are determined to ensure that they remain effective in protecting the rights and freedoms of different people to have access to, and to be protected from, certain types of material. The Obscene Publications Act 1959 continues to provide a flexible regulatory tool, applying equally now to material published on the internet as it does to other media. Data for 1998 show that the Act continues to be effective with 196 prosecutions under the Act, 176 of which led to convictions.

Video Classification

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has (a) to review the effectiveness of the Video Recordings Act 1984 and (b) to ensure the public accountability of the British Board of Film Classification and the Video Appeals Committee. [124178]

Mr. Straw: The Video Recordings Act 1984 requires that all videos, apart from a small category of exempt works, must be submitted to the British Board of Film Classification (BBFC) for classification. I am satisfied that, in general, the Act provides an effective means of regulating material released on video. I am concerned, however, about the implications of a recent High Court judgment for the small category of videos classified as suitable for sale only in licensed sex shops to those aged 18 and above (Restricted (18) videos).

On 16 May, the High Court dismissed the BBFC's application for Judicial Review in respect of appeals against their decision not to classify seven sexually explicit videos in the Restricted 18 (R18) category. The Board had focused their application for Judicial Review on the possible harm which the videos might cause to potential viewers, particularly children. I am considering the implications of the Court's decision and intend to publish a Consultation Paper shortly to seek views on whether there are any additional steps that can be taken to protect children from exposure to sexually explicit material.

Under the Video Recordings Act 1984, I am responsible for designating the authority responsible for classifying videos. I have so designated the President and the two Vice-Presidents of the BBFC. The designated authority is required to submit an annual report to me, which is then laid before both Houses of Parliament. I laid the report for 1999 on 24 May. Since his appointment as President of the BBFC, Andreas Whittam Smith has held two series of 'roadshows' in cities around the country as part of a dialogue with the public on classification policy. The Board is also conducting separate research surveys about its classification policy with members of the public.

The Video Appeals Committee is responsible for considering appeals by distributors against the decisions of the BBFC. It contributes to the Board's Annual Report which contains a section on the appeals they have considered together with a list of all its members. Appeal hearings are also open to members of the public.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Class Sizes (Kingston)

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the average class size in secondary schools in the Royal Borough of Kingston upon Thames for each year since 1979. [123133]

Ms Estelle Morris: The information requested is shown in the following table. The latest provisional estimates for January 2000 show that as few as 0.9 per cent. of pupils were in one teacher classes of over 35 pupils in maintained secondary schools in Kingston upon Thames local education authority area.

Provisional national estimates of class sizes in maintained secondary schools in England were published in Statistical First Release "Class sizes in maintained schools in England: January 2000" on 14 April 2000. Information by local education authority area has been placed in the Library.

The element within the Kingston upon Thames SSA which relates to secondary pupils of compulsory school age has risen from £19.44 million in 1997–98 to £22.70 million in 2000–01. Over the same period, funding per secondary pupil of compulsory school age in the local education authority has increased in real terms from £3,010 to £3,300. It is open to Kingston upon Thames to use some of these increased resources to employ extra teachers.

In addition, schools in Kingston upon Thames received a total of £791,000 in direct grants in May 2000 as their share of the £290 million funding increase that was announced in the Budget of 21 March 2000.

Further Education

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many further education college lecturers transferred from the further education sector to the maintained schools sector in 1999–2000. [124173]

Mr. Wicks: Data on the movement of teachers from the further education sector to the maintained school sector are not available for 1999–2000.

Teachers of the Deaf

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if he will list (a) the funding made available in each of the last five years through the Standards Fund to help LEAs with the costs of training teachers of children with special educational needs, including training leading to the mandatory qualifications and (b) the amount and the proportion of that funding spent on mandatory training for teachers of the deaf for each of the last five years; [124466]

(2) what guidance his Department gives to the Standards Fund to ensure adequate resources are available for mandatory training for teachers of the deaf; [124467]

(3) what mechanisms are (a) in place and (b) planned, to monitor the amount and proportion of Standards Fund money allocated to support mandatory training for teachers of the deaf. [124468]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Expenditure supported under the Standards Fund relating to training teachers and others in special educational needs over the last five years has been as follows.

Year	£ million
1996–97	20
1997–98	17
1998–99	18
1999–00	21
2000–01	26

Note:

Total supported expenditure by English local education authorities, against which DfEE pays grant

The Standards Fund circular makes it clear to local education authorities that support is available for courses leading to mandatory qualifications but the actual decisions as to how the funding is deployed are made by individual LEAs according to local needs. A breakdown for the period in question is not available. As to monitoring of expenditure, LEAs are asked to report on the overall number of teachers and others trained with the benefit of Standards Fund support.

Teacher Recruitment

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the effect of the new financial arrangements on teacher recruitment in 2000–01; and if such arrangements will be available next year. [124510]

Ms Estelle Morris: Since the announcement of the new financial arrangements for teacher training, there have been 4,004 applications for courses of postgraduate initial teacher training, 27 per cent. more than in the same period last year.

Expenditure plans for 2001–02 and beyond are dependent on the outcome of the current Spending Review.

Guillain-Barré Syndrome

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many school pupils suffering from Guillain-Barré Syndrome have statements of special educational needs. [124625]

Jacqui Smith: This information is not available. However, a medical diagnosis of Guillain Barré Syndrome would not necessarily imply that the child has special educational needs. For most children with this syndrome, education provision will be made in line with the Department's guidance on the education of sick children, through to recovery. Special Educational Needs provision would, of course, be made for any child with significant learning difficulties caused by relapsing Guillain Barré Syndrome.

Education Action Zones

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will place in the Library audited accounts of education action zones to date. [124662]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Comptroller and Auditor General has so far placed audited financial accounts for the 1998–99 financial year in both Libraries of Parliament for 15 of the first round zones.

Primary Schools (Access)

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of the population lives (a) within one mile of and (b) over three miles from a primary school in (i) rural and (ii) urban areas. [124670]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 5 June 2000]: It is not possible to answer the question as there are no centrally held data available.

Performance Targets (Employment Service)

Ms Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what performance target levels will be set to ensure that the Employment Service achieves its aims and objectives in 2000–01. [124920]

Mr. Blunkett: The Aim of the Employment Service is to help people without jobs to find work and employers to fill their vacancies. The Service makes a major contribution to an efficient and flexible labour market and to the Government's objectives of high and stable employment and growth, equality of opportunity and social inclusion. Its chief priority is to help individuals facing particular difficulty in the labour market to move from welfare and economic inactivity into sustainable employment. During the coming year it will be taking forward an ambitious programme of technological change and business improvement and will be preparing for the merger with the Benefits Agency in 2001.

I am today announcing the targets I have set the Employment Service for 2000–01, which relate to its four key objectives.

Vision and Purpose

The Employment Service aims to make a major contribution to an efficient and flexible labour market and to the Government's objectives of high and stable employment and growth, equality of opportunity and social inclusion. ES works closely with employers and with its private, voluntary and public sector partners to provide a quality service for all people without a job and to promote employment opportunities for all who can work. It aims to attract a diverse range of vacancies and to fill those vacancies quickly by matching the right people and skills with the right jobs. Its chief priority is to help individuals facing particular difficulty in the labour market to move from welfare and economic inactivity into sustainable employment. It does this through correct application of the JSA regime, delivery of the New Deals and the pilot ONE service, and provision of appropriate information, advice, training and support. The Agency has achieved much over the past three years. The challenge and opportunity now facing it is to sustain continuous improvement in its services to jobseekers and employers and to make those services more accessible and relevant to customer needs, through effective use of modern technology and close working with a wide range of partners.

Aim

To help people without jobs to find work and employers to fill their vacancies.

Objective A

To help all people without jobs, and particularly those on welfare and at a disadvantage in the labour market, to find and keep work by providing appropriate information, advice, training and support and by encouraging employers to open more opportunities to them.

Targets

1. To help 178,000 participants in the New Deals and all Employment Zones into work, directly or in partnership with others
2. To help 100,000 people with disabilities into work, directly or in partnership with others
3. To help 295,000 disadvantaged jobseekers into work, directly or in partnership with others
4. To help 735,000 people from welfare into work, directly or in partnership with others
5. To help 1,325,000 jobless people into work, directly or in partnership with others

Objective B

To ensure that the rights and relevant labour market responsibilities of people on JSA and other benefits are fulfilled, while helping to combat fraud and abuse of the benefit system.

Target

To ensure that the relevant labour market responsibilities of people on JSA are fulfilled in 90 per cent. of cases checked.

Objective C

To harness new technology, the pursuit of excellence and continuous improvement to deliver effective, efficient and accessible services to all people without jobs and to employers in Jobcentres and, increasingly through other locations and means of communication.

Targets

1. To achieve a 90 per cent. customer service level for jobseekers

Milestone Targets

1. To introduce the Learning and Work Bank, new Labour Market System, touch-screen kiosks and a single national telephone number for employers by March 2001.
2. To achieve a successful transfer of Work Based Learning for Adults to ES in England by April 2001.

Objective D

To deliver services to all ES customers in a way which respects individual differences, helps to overcome disadvantages due to ethnicity, gender, age or disability and achieves the best possible outcome for each of them.

Two additional targets, for employer service and sustainable employment will be announced in July.

Target levels for the Employment Service in Scotland and Wales, derived from the national targets, will be announced shortly.

Learning and Skills Council

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the progress being made on the appointment of a Chair for the Learning and Skills Council. [124919]

Mr. Wicks: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has today appointed Bryan Sanderson as the Chairman (designate) of the Learning and Skills Council. Mr. Sanderson is currently Group Managing Director of BP Amoco plc and Chief Executive of BP Amoco Chemicals. Subject to the successful passage of the Learning and Skills Bill in Parliament, the appointment will be confirmed in July.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Industry Council

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the outcome of the Industry Council held in Brussels on 18 May; and if he will make a statement. [123439]

Mr. Caborn: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Competitiveness in Europe represented the UK at the EU Industry Council held on 18 May.

The Council had a debate on competitiveness, focusing on the follow-up actions from the Lisbon European Council and broad consensus was reached on the challenges ahead. There was agreement that the new Multi-Annual Programme should concentrate resources where they could benefit SMEs generally and should be adopted by the end of this year. There was also widespread support from member states for adoption at the Feira European Council on 19–20 June of a European Charter for Small Firms with concrete targets and actions.

Several delegations pointed out the need to benchmark Europe's performance against the best in the world to foster a new enterprise policy and the need for greater co-ordination of all the current EU benchmarking exercises.

The Commission introduced the results of the second report on the situation in world shipbuilding, highlighting the continued problems faced with Korea, and progress made on the "Agreed Minutes" with Korea in an attempt to address this situation. It was agreed that discussion should continue with Korea as a matter of urgency on unfair trade practices and that continuation of operating aid beyond the end of this year in the EU would not resolve these problems. The Council asked the Commission to make a further report by the end of September.

The Commission reported on follow up to the conclusions on integrating sustainable development into EU policy which were agreed at the Helsinki European Council last year and its recent communication on integrating sustainable development into the EU non-energy mining industry.

The Commission gave progress reports on the modernisation of competition rules, the impact of electronic commerce on the automotive industry and the future of the European Observatory for Textile and Clothing. It also presented its: eighth survey of state aid; twenty ninth report on competition; monitoring report on restructuring aid to the steel sector.

The Council adopted conclusions on: information and communication technologies and traditional sectors; the state of competitiveness of the steel industry in the EU; and concerted action with the member states in the field of enterprise policy.

Advertisements

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to strengthen the arrangements in place to protect consumers from fraudulent claims made in advertisements, with particular reference to the penalties which can be brought to bear on those making such claims; and if he will make a statement. [124084]

Dr. Howells: I am satisfied that the 1988 Control of Misleading Advertisements Regulations, together with the self-regulatory system operated by the Advertising Standards Authority for advertisements in the non-broadcast media, are effective in controlling misleading advertising in the United Kingdom.

In respect of false or misleading claims more generally, the White Paper "Modern Markets: Confident Consumers" announced that the Government are considering strengthening the Trade Descriptions Act 1968—which applies to both advertisements and on-pack claims—by making misleading claims about services an offence of strict liability, as is already the case for goods, and by introducing new provisions to cover the future supply of services and false or misleading statements made by traders about a consumer's own property—for example the need for remedial work. The Trade Descriptions Act includes criminal penalties.

Research (Gender Balance)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his policy towards promoting gender balance in research, with particular reference to those areas funded by European Community moneys, following the ETAN report of the European Parliament. [123649]

Mrs. Liddell: The Government are very keen to increase the participation of women in research. The Promoting SET for Women Unit, within the DTI works with the Research Councils, the Higher Education Funding Councils, the Wellcome Trust and the Committee of Vice Chancellors and Principals to encourage more women to apply for research funds and for membership of the Framework programme expert and advisory bodies. The Unit Head is a member of a Commission working group to help achieve these aims.

OECD Convention on Bribery

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the OECD peer group review of the UK concerning the OECD convention on bribery. [123974]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The Phase 1 evaluation report of the UK under the OECD Convention on Combating the Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions will be made public, along with the reports of all other countries so far reviewed, at the OECD Ministerial meeting at the end of June, as agreed by OECD members.

Ethnic Minority Business Forum

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how the Ethnic Minority Business Forum will address the needs of the ethnic minority business community. [124384]

Mr. Byers: My Department is setting up an ethnic minority business forum so that we can find out at first hand the particular needs and concerns of ethnic minority entrepreneurs. With the benefit of the experience of members of the Forum, we hope we will be able to better tailor our policies and support to overcome these concerns and improve the competitiveness of this important sector of our economy.

Late Payment

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans the Government have to introduce legislation on late payment of accounts by companies. [124749]

Ms Hewitt: The Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998 was introduced on 1 November 1998 and provides businesses with a statutory right to claim interest on late payment of commercial debt. The legislation is phased and for the first two years—1 November 1998 to 31 October 2000—small businesses can claim interest from large businesses and the public sector.

The Government propose to extend the right to claim interest from 1 November 2000 to 31 October 2002, so that small businesses will also be able to claim interest from other small businesses on debts incurred under contracts agreed after that date. From 1 November 2002 it is proposed that all businesses and the public sector will be able to claim interest from all businesses and the public sector on debts incurred under contracts agreed after that date.

Fire Safety

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the Furniture and Furnishings (Fire Safety) Regulations 1988; and if he will make a statement. [124674]

Dr. Howells: My Department is undertaking research to evaluate whether the Furniture and Furnishings (Fire Safety) Regulations 1988 have been successful in reducing the number of lives lost and serious injuries suffered as a result of furniture fires.

I plan to publish this research at the end of June 2000 and copies will be placed in the House of Commons Library.

Miners Compensation Schemes

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the second stage tests to be available in the North East of England for chronic bronchitis and emphysema under the miners compensation schemes. [123760]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The two spirometry centres based in Newcastle and Durham have been converted to carry out in full the Medical Assessment Process and the first MAP appointments have now been made.

Research Funding

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has to increase funding for research leading to innovation in public bodies and private companies. [124494]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The Government's first Comprehensive Spending Review resulted in an additional £1.0 billion support over three years for the public science and engineering base. A unique partnership with the Wellcome Trust increased this to £1.4 billion, of which £0.75 billion has been used to renew university research infrastructure through the Joint Infrastructure Fund. In addition the DTI's Innovation Budget is being increased by some 20 per cent. over three years to fund a number of programmes designed to drive forward a fundamental change in innovation performance in the UK. This includes for example the Smart scheme which supports R&D activities in private small and medium-sized companies and is being expanded and extended over the period 1999–2002, and the technology transfer scheme known as TCS, for which DTI is doubling its expenditure.

These and other relevant schemes are being considered in the current Spending Review. The Government are also working toward publishing a Science and Innovation White Paper later this year, which will set out our policies in this area.

Nuclear Fuel (Reprocessing)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his policy is in respect of the reprocessing of spent nuclear fuel. [124232]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The Government's policy on spent fuel management is set out in United Kingdom Civil Nuclear Policy Including Plutonium, which was presented to the House in January 1998.

Performance Targets (Employment Tribunals Service)

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what targets he has set the Employment Tribunals Service for 2000–01. [125066]

Mr. Byers: I have set the following targets for the Employment Tribunals Service for 2000–01:

to bring to a first hearing at least 85 per cent. of single employment tribunal cases within 26 weeks of receipt;

in relation to the above target, all employment tribunal offices to achieve at least 75 per cent.;

to issue at least 85 per cent. of decisions within four weeks of the final hearing; to reduce administrative unit costs in the employment tribunals by 5 per cent. in real terms;

at least 85 per cent. of employment tribunal users to express satisfaction, in surveys, with the service offered by ETS;

at least 90 per cent. of appeals registered by the Employment Appeal Tribunal for preliminary hearing to be ready for listing within six weeks.

Postal Services Commission

Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce the membership of the Postal Services Commission. [125067]

Mr. Byers: Mr. Robin Aaronson, Mr. Tony Cooper, Ms Julia Kaufmann OBE, Ms Janet Lewis-Jones, and Mr. Ken Olisa are being appointed as members of the Postal Services Commission. They start work immediately. It is anticipated that they will be appointed as members of the statutory body of the same name that is expected to be created following the passing of the Postal Services Bill currently before Parliament. The appointment of the Chairman of the Commission, Mr. Graham Corbett CBE, was announced on 16 March and that of the Chief Executive, Mr. Martin Stanley, on 15 January. This completes the membership of the Commission.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Clean Technology

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what use he has made of the report entitled "Cleaning Up? Stimulating Innovation in Environmental Technology", produced by POST in respect of his Department's support for the Joint Environmental Market Unit's work on promoting British clean technology commerce; and if he will circulate the report to British Embassies. [122816]

Mr. Hain: As the report has only just been published, my officials will consider with other Departments its implications for the promotion of UK exports of environmental technology. More generally, I am keen to make full use of our Missions overseas in promoting such exports.

Single Currency

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the single currency games shown in InfEuro Number 14, the Commission newsletter, were created with the assistance of the European Community; and if he will make a statement. [123619]

Mr. Vaz: The single currency games referred to by the hon. Member were the result of the work of the children and teachers of the "Nos Enfants" school in Brussels, as well as the "Informer et Enseigner L'Europe et la Democratie", the "Orrizonti" company and the Economic and Social Committee. The project received funding from the Commission, Generale de Banque, Instituto Bancario San Paolo die Iorino and Mouvement E Leclerc, as well as the support of the European Parliament, Credit Mutuel, and the Fondation du Credit Mutuel pour la Lecture.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what representations he made during discussions on the agreement of the Lomé Peace Accord on Sierra Leone, with respect to the (a) freeing of, (b) participation in politics of and (c) rescinding the death penalty passed on Foday Sankoh; [123608]

(2) if he will make a statement on his role in the establishment of the Lomé Peace Accord on Sierra Leone. [123606]

Mr. Hain: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) on 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 413W.

Qualified Majority Voting

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which three member states, referred to in the document, "Treaty of Amsterdam: What has Changed in Europe", have indicated a preference for extension of QMV before enlargement. [123616]

Mr. Vaz: "Treaty of Amsterdam: What Has Changed In Europe" was published by the Education and Culture Unit of the Commission. Therefore, I refer the hon. Member to the office of the Commission in London.

EU Working Groups

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs further to his answer of 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 30W, on EU working groups, if he will make it his policy to ensure the maximum transparency for (a) draft documents without negotiating position commentary and (b) issues under discussion at European Union working group level. [123631]

Mr. Vaz: We will ensure that all documents being prepared in European Union working groups for decision by the Council will be submitted to Parliament in accordance with the established procedures for Parliamentary scrutiny.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many European Community documents were examined by EU working groups in the last 12 months; and, of these, how many were advanced as draft legislation. [123610]

Mr. Vaz: There is no comprehensive record of European Community documents examined in 1999. However, there were 43 pieces of legislation enacted by the Council and European Parliament in 1999. In addition, 284 legislative instruments were adopted by the Council, and 1,413 by the Commission. Draft versions of all of these will have been discussed either by Council working groups or Comitology committees.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his policy on democratic accountability within European Community working groups. [123609]

Mr. Vaz: Working groups are attended by national civil servants, who work within policies established by Government Ministers, who are themselves directly and democratically accountable.

European Community (Lobbying Organisations)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is his policy to endorse the funding from European Community funds of organisations which exist to lobby the European Community; and if he will make a statement with particular reference to budget line A-3021. [123607]

Mr. Vaz: The funding supported by this budget line is financed from the Commission's administrative budget. This funding is long established and is supported by the European Parliament and individual member states where the organisations are located. The UK, however, seeks to keep such expenditure as low as possible.

European Institute of Public Administration

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 48W, if he will define Management of European Integration, with reference to the inclusion or otherwise of political education on the future shape of the EU. [123630]

Mr. Vaz: As stated in my previous reply, the EIPA supports the practical management of European integration through the provision of training, applied research and consultancy at a European level. The EIPA provides training, research and consultancy services for national and local governments to assist them in the implementation of EU legislation and guidance. Courses are either issue-specific (covering such issues as implementing better procurement practices or internal market legislation) or generic (for example, examining the European legislative process). Courses are practical and do not include political education.

EU Enlargement

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those opinion formers who received free copies of Cm 4595; if they were sent copies without requesting them; what (a) deputations and (b) correspondence he received from opinion formers following receipt of Cm 4595; and if he will make a statement. [123612]

Mr. Vaz: Copies of Cm 4595 have been sent to numerous opinion formers in the UK. Posts overseas have also distributed copies as appropriate.

Friends of Europe

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs further to his answer of 11 May 2000, Official Report, columns 452–53W, on Friends of Europe, if the Friends of Europe event charged for admission; and if he will make a statement on his policy towards the subsidising of fund raising events by such bodies. [123633]

Mr. Vaz: Admission to the Friends of Europe event referred to was free. This was not a fund-raising event but a joint event aimed at widening discussion on contemporary European policy.

European Commission DG Newsletters

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will deposit copies of European Commission DG newsletters in the Library in a readily accessible format. [123627]

Mr. Vaz: Those Commission newsletters intended for outside distribution are already readily accessible on the Commission's website (www.europa.eu.int).

Informer et Enseigner l'Europe et la Democratie

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the (a) activities and (b) public funding arrangements of Informer et Enseigner l'Europe et la Democratie, with particular reference to its role in the UK. [123620]

Mr. Vaz: We have no involvement with this organisation.

European Federation of Retired and Elderly Persons

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what EU funding is awarded to the European Federation of Retired and Elderly Persons. [123651]

Mr. Vaz: The Commission's funding of such grants is published annually in its "Report on Beneficiaries of Part A Commission Grants". This report is freely available on the Commission's website www.europa.eu.int.

India

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy on India's gaining a permanent seat on the United Nations Security Council; for what reasons this policy has changed; and if he will make a statement. [123727]

Mr. Hain: We are committed to early enlargement of both the permanent and the non-permanent membership of the UN Security Council, including the creation of a new permanent seat for the Asian regional group. We continue to maintain that it would be for the Asian group to decide who would occupy any permanent seat allocated to them. India would clearly be a strong contender. Our policy on this is unchanged.

Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 16 May 2000, Official Report, column 111W, on the Intergovernmental Conference, how many copies of Cm 4595 have been distributed free; and how many were available for sale. [123908]

Mr. Vaz: My Department has distributed numerous free copies to opinion formers. The Stationery Office Ltd., who publish Command Papers under a contract administered by HMSO, are responsible for fixing the total print run. Initially, they printed 800 copies for sale but have since reprinted a further 200 copies to meet demand.

Visit Visas

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for visit visas made in (a) India and (b) Pakistan were refused from 1 January to 30 April; and how many of the refused applications gave the reason for seeking entry as (i) attending a family funeral, (ii) attending a family wedding and (iii) visiting a seriously ill relative. [124462]

Mr. Vaz: The number of visit visa applications refused between 1 January and 30 April 2000 were as follows:

	Number
India
Bombay	1,820
Calcutta	32
Madras	449
New Delhi	3,251
Pakistan
Islamabad	2,224
Karachi	1,392

Detailed information on the nature of these applications is not centrally held and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Ethiopia and Eritrea

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last held discussions with representatives of the Governments of (a) Ethiopia and (b) Eritrea about the war between these two countries; and if he will make a statement. [124499]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 5 June 2000]: As I told the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) on 25 May 2000, Official Report, column 577W, I last spoke to the Ethiopian Ambassador on 23 May about the conflict between Ethiopia and Eritrea, when I strongly criticised Ethiopia's resumption of fighting with Eritrea.

I will discuss the conflict with the recently arrived Eritrean Ambassador when he makes his introductory call on me on 8 June. I will reiterate our strong belief that only a negotiated settlement will bring a lasting peace to the region.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about his arms policy towards (a) Ethiopia and (b) Eritrea. [124501]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 5 June 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell and Wishaw (Mr. Roy) on 18 May 2000, Official Report, column 223W.

Grand Cayman

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received about environmental degradation of the mangrove swamp in the central area of Grand Cayman. [123000]

Mr. Hain: I have received a copy of a recent report from the Cayman Islands National Trust to the Governor of the Cayman Islands. This expresses concern that the Environmental Protection Fees have not been used to purchase areas of the central mangrove wetlands. It also raises the issue of an area of mangrove recently removed as part of a hotel development project. I have asked the Governor to send me a report on both issues and will write to my hon. Friend when that report is received.

SCOTLAND

Green Transport

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the key buildings for which his Department (a) submitted and (b) did not submit green transport plans by March. [122609]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 18 May 2000]: Key buildings are those with more than 50 staff where the Department is the main occupier. My Department has no buildings in this category and has not submitted green transport plans. We shall however be considering transport arrangements for the buildings we occupy.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Methyl Tertiary Butyl Ether

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what reports he has received about the United States Government's proposals to ban the use of methyl tertiary butyl ether as a petrol additive within three years; and if he will make a statement; [123446]

(2) what recent discussions his Department has held with counterparts in the United States on methyl tertiary butyl ether; and if he will make a statement. [123447]

Mr. Hill: No reports have been received from the United States Government. However, officials are in regular contact with their US counterparts and discuss issues such as MTBE. We are aware of the issues surrounding its use in the United States.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the EU's policy is on the use of methyl tertiary butyl ether. [123441]

Mr. Hill: There is no overall EU policy on MTBE use other than to restrict quantities of oxygenates that may be added to petrol. In particular EU directive 98/70/EU sets a limit of 15 per cent. on ethers containing five or more carbon atoms per molecule—which includes MTBE. Finland are carrying out a full life cycle risk assessment of MTBE under the European Communities Existing Substances Regulation (793/93/EEC) in order to decide whether any further measures are necessary to protect human health and/or the environment. The draft risk assessment is due to be discussed in depth for the first time by the EU technical experts in June this year.

Dagenham Ford Plant

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has held with the Greater London Authority regarding the future of the Dagenham Ford plant. [123513]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 23 May 2000]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who has lead responsibility within Government concerning the Dagenham plant, announced on 12 May a 10-point plan for regeneration, based on high quality training, support for setting up small businesses, developing modern manufacturing and attracting inward investment. The Employment Service is working closely with Ford to support Dagenham workers and to ensure that the effects on the local economy are minimised.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry had earlier met the Mayor of London on 8 May. They agreed to work closely together to secure the best possible outcome for the workforce at Dagenham and for the wider community.

Incinerators

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with building contractors about the future construction of incinerators in the United Kingdom. [123485]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The Government have not held discussions with building contractors about the future construction of incinerators. The development and construction of energy from waste and incineration plant is a matter for local authorities and the waste management industry.

Registration Numbers

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his policy is on displaying registration numbers on plates marked with the European Union sign and GB; and if he will make a statement. [123726]

Mr. Hill: Following two consultation papers, the Government announced on 30 March that motorists could, if they wished, display the insignia of the European Union together with the letters GB on their number plates, in which case vehicles would no longer have to display the "GB sticker" when travelling in Europe. Regulations to bring this into effect from 1 March 2001 will be laid shortly.

Social Housing (Colchester)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much has been invested in social housing in the Colchester constituency in each of the last five years for which figures are available; how much will be provided for the current financial year; and if he will make a statement. [123656]

Mr. Mullin: Details of the capital allocations for housing investment in Colchester Borough Council area in the current and previous five years are set out in the table. The allocations are additional to any housing investment financed from the authorities own resources.

[3] Allocations for the Capital Receipts Initiative and support for private sector renewal grants are included within the housing Annual Capital Guideline allocation for 2000–01.

CITES-listed Animals

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make representations to other EU member states on recording seizures of CITES-listed animals and their products by weight and number; and if he will make a statement. [124049]

Mr. Mullin: Following the CITES Adjournment debate on 21 March 2000 in Westminster Hall, when I was asked to examine whether ivory seizures should be recorded by weight as well as number, I wrote to my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith) to let her know that the Government would ensure that future seizures were so recorded. I also informed her that Her Majesty's Customs and Excise had already taken steps, in response to other requests, to ensure that seizures of other high profile endangered species goods such as coral or caviar are also recorded by weight.

Although the CITES Convention is implemented within the European Community by way of EU Regulation, the specific method employed to record CITES seizures is a matter for Member States to determine individually. However, since it certainly makes sense for the European Union to employ uniform, or at least similar, reporting regimes, we will raise this issue at the next meeting of the EU's CITES Enforcement Working Group in September.

Hydrocarbon Gases

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what safety standards are in place to regulate the use of hydrocarbon gases in refrigeration systems; when they were introduced; and what the safety record has been since their introduction. [122858]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 25 May 2000]: There is no safety legislation that applies exclusively to the safety of hydrocarbon gases in refrigeration systems. Employers using such a system would have duties under general legislation, such as the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 (HSWA), the Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1999 and the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations 1999 to ensure the health and safety of anyone who may be affected by their undertaking. In addition, employers and others may have duties specifically in respect of risks from equipment or dangerous substances in other legislation including:

the Provision and Use of Work Equipment Regulations 1992

the Pressure Equipment Regulations 1999

the Pressure Systems (Safety) Regulations 2000

the Highly Flammable Liquids and Liquefied Petroleum Gases Regulations 1972

the Control of Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1999

the Confined Spaces Regulations 1997.

A British Standard 4434:1995 "Specification for safety and environmental aspects in the design, construction and installation of refrigerating appliances and systems" is intended to minimise possible hazards from all types of refrigerating appliances, systems and ancillary equipment. The first part of a European Standard (PREN 378) "Refrigerating systems and heat pumps: Safety and environmental requirements" has come into force and partially replaces BS:4434.

British Standard BS EN60335–2-24 "Safety of household and similar electrical appliances" published in November 1999 covers all safety aspects of refrigerators, freezers and certain ice-makers intended for use in domestic and similar applications, including camping, touring caravans and boats for leisure purposes.

Statistical information is not sufficiently detailed to determine whether any reported incidents in the home or at work involved hydrocarbon gases in refrigeration systems.

Byker Heat Station

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will list the sites at which toxic ash from Byker Heat and Transfer Station, Newcastle, was spread in contravention of the operating licence; when this contravention was first reported to the Environmental Agency and when action was taken to correct it; and if the remedial action has been completed at all locations; [123748]

(2) what investigations have been made, and what conclusions have been reached, by the Environment Agency about soil, plant and animal contamination at Byker City Farm, Newcastle; what caused those investigations to be made; and when they started. [123851]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 25 May 2000]: The Byker Reclamation Plant is the subject of two Integrated Pollution Control (IPC) authorisations issued by the Environment Agency under Part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. While the IPC authorisation for the Heat Station provides that landfill is the preferred waste disposal option for ash from the plant, disposal by another means is not in contravention of the authorisation. This is because the disposal of waste is subject to the duty of care and the waste management licensing provisions of Part II of the 1990 Act, and section 28 of the Act provides that no condition shall be attached to an IPC authorisation to regulate the final disposal of waste.

The possibility that ash from the plant might have been used for the construction of footpaths and other purposes was first raised by a local resident during discussions with the Environment Agency on another mater in August 1999. At a public meeting organised by Newcastle City Council on 19 January 2000, it was confirmed by the City Council that sampling would be undertaken to establish the composition of the ash. The Environment Agency then wrote to the City Council's direct works contractor, "Cityworks", on 2 February to request details of the dates, locations and quantities of ash used for the construction of footpaths etc. The sites which have identified as receiving ash from the Heat Plant, and the estimated tonnages, are as follows:

Newcastle City Council has undertaken the removal of the ash from these sites and its disposal is being supervised by the Environment Agency. I have been informed that the removal of the ash from all of these sites has now been completed but that further investigations will be carried out by the City Council to ascertain whether any further remedial action is required.

The Environment Agency is conducting an investigation to establish whether the waste management controls of Part II of the 1990 Act have been contravened and, if there is evidence of contravention, action will be taken in line with the Agency's published Enforcement Policy.

To date, no investigations have been carried out by the Environment Agency into possible contamination at Byker City Farm.

Newcastle Great Park Scheme

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment the Environment Agency has made of the likelihood of storm flow and storm sewer overflow, into Jesmond Dene and Ouseburn, Newcastle; and what the likelihood will be if the Newcastle Great Park scheme in its present form is fully developed. [123852]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 25 May 2000]: I understand from the Environment Agency that improvement work has been carried out to intermittent discharges that can, under storm conditions, discharge diluted sewage to the Ouse Burn. These improvements are at Acomb Crescent on the Red House Farm Estate and Three Mile Inn at Gosforth. Further improvement works on the Lower Ouse Burn at Byker are at the design stage. Other sources of contamination include the de-icing run-off from Newcastle Airport which has affected the entire length of the Ouse Burn. The Agency has developed a scheme with the Airport and Northumbrian Water that now conveys the run-off to Howden sewage works for treatment, with notable water quality improvements.

Potential sources of pollution from Newcastle Great Park have been pre-empted by the Agency at the planning stage. The developers have been encouraged to incorporate Sustainable Urban Drainage Systems (SUDs) into their proposals which will mean that water quality will be maintained or perhaps even improved if the development goes ahead. However, the Agency will not hesitate to take the appropriate enforcement action should pollution arise from any aspect of the development.

Welland Valley

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he intends to designate the Welland Valley up and down stream from Market Harborough an area of outstanding natural beauty; and if he will make a statement. [123904]

Mr. Mullin: Designation of Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty (AONBs) is the responsibility of the Countryside Agency, subject to confirmation in each case by the Secretary of State. I am not aware of any plans by the Agency to designate the Welland Valley as an AONB.

Bilateral Aviation Agreements

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the Government's policy on reciprocity in bilateral air service negotiations with the United States of America. [123931]

Mr. Mullin: Bilateral air services agreements are based on the principle of fair and equal opportunity, and this requires that rights are granted reciprocally. The UK-US negotiations are conducted in accordance with this same principle.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action he is taking to remove distortions of competition as part of a bilateral airline agreement with the United States of America. [123932]

Mr. Mullin: We have consistently pressed the US Government for effective access to the US domestic market for UK airlines so that there can be fair competition on UK-US routes.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what methodology the Government are adopting in seeking to secure wet leasing rights for British airlines in the US market (a) as part of bilateral aviation negotiations and (b) through international agreements. [123933]

Mr. Mullin: We take every opportunity to press the United States Government to relax the restrictions that they impose on the wet-leasing of UK-registered aircraft by US carriers.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how the Government intend to achieve reciprocal access to the US aviation market for British charter passenger airlines and cargo carriers for whom alliances with scheduled US airlines are not an option. [123934]

Mr. Mullin: UK charter passenger airlines already have reciprocal rights under the Bermuda II arrangements, and dominate the UK-US charter market. We continue to press the US Government to open up their domestic market to UK cargo carriers.

GM Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the consents under which the genetic transformation RT73 has been released in the UK. [123758]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 25 May 2000]: Genetic transformation event RT73 is associated with glyphosate tolerant oil seed rape. Consents which contain RT73 are listed as follows. Copies are available from the GMO Deliberate Release Public Register in DETR's offices at Ashdown House, 123 Victoria Street, London SW1.

Southern Water

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many successful prosecutions the Environment Agency has undertaken against Southern Water; and what fines have been imposed. [123752]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 25 May 2000]: Listed are details of the successful prosecutions carried out against Southern Water by the Environment Agency since July 1990 and the fines imposed by various Magistrates and Crown courts:

Date	Court	Offence	Fine (£)
10 July 1990	Hailsham MC	Causing sewage to enter a stream at Willingdon	1,200 and 1,070 costs

Cleaner Vehicles Task Force

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Cleaner Vehicles Task Force will publish its final report. [124520]

Mr. Hill: The Cleaner Vehicles Task Force, which was set up by my Department in 1997 to look at practical ways of reducing vehicle emissions, is publishing its final report, "The way forward—the final report of the Cleaner Vehicles Task Force", today. The report covers five main areas:

Transforming the market and achieving lower environmental impacts from vehicles in use through Government incentives, development of technology, and through better public awareness;

The role of fleets in improving environmental performance of current and new vehicles;

Cleaner fuels and technologies—both conventional and alternative fuels and technologies;

The role for low emission zones; and Making sure everyone plays their part—the importance of enforcement in maintaining improvements.

There has already been progress on the Task Force's interim recommendations, published in the 1999 report "Driving the Agenda". For instance, we announced in March that we would be spending £6 million this year on a Cleaner Vehicles Programme to take forward the Task Force's recommendations on retrofitting. Industry has acted too, with the motor industry adopting a label providing information about emissions on all new cars. We look forward to seeing rapid progress on the recommendations contained in this report.

Copies of the final report, along with a background paper published by the Task Force on the environmental impacts of vehicle production and disposal and the reports of the Technology and Testing and Alternative Fuels sub-group, are available in the House Library.

Air Services

Sir Paul Beresford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the decision-making process outlined in the Appraisal

Framework for Airports in the South-East will allow for public consultation on the options examined during the sifting process. [124628]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 5 June 2000]: We shall ensure that the process of sifting will be open to public scrutiny during public consultation on the shortlisted options following completion of the study.

A very large number of options will be considered during the sifting process, which is designed to reduce the options to a manageable number, so that those can be appraised in sufficient detail to support a meaningful public consultation.

To attempt earlier consultations would greatly expand the work required and the length of the overall process; and would result in substantial and prolonged blight, uncertainty and anxiety.

The approach adopted in this study is entirely consistent with my Department's Code of Practice on the Dissemination of Information during Major Infrastructure Developments.

Sir Paul Beresford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the timetable is for decisions to be taken after completion of the South-East and East of England Regional Air Services Study in April 2001. [124627]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 5 June 2000]: It is expected that the South-East and East of England Regional Air Services Study will be completed by spring or summer 2001. This will be followed by a public consultation on the options arising from it.

The results will feed into an Air Transport White Paper, which will also take account of the Government's decisions in response to the Inspector's report on the Heathrow Terminal 5 Inquiry.

Sir Paul Beresford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the South East and East of England Regional Air Services Study will examine the effects of an increase in employment in the South East on (a) local businesses and (b) the environment. [124629]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Yes—the study will examine and appraise the effects of airport development options on local employment markets and other urbanisation impacts.

Sir Paul Beresford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effect of the construction of a new southern-aligned runway at Gatwick Airport on people within the 57 LEQ noise contour, and of the number of people within that contour who would be affected. [124630]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 5 June 2000]: As I made clear in my answer to the hon. Member of 30 March 2000, Official Report, column 228W, it is premature to comment on what options are being considered in the South-East and East of England Regional Air Services study.

I can confirm the draft appraisal framework for airports in the South-East and Eastern Regions of England makes provision, during full assessment, for the calculation of population within the 57 LEQ noise contour (16 hour day, average mode) as well as night noise. A simpler assessment will be used in the earlier stages of this study.

Rents

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what has been the average increase in (a) council, (b) housing association and (c) private rents in each year since 1990–91. [123982]

Mr. Prescott [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Estimated average annual rent increases from 1991 to 2000 are as follows:

Annual percentage change in average rents

	Housing association rents	Local authority rents	Private sector rents
1991–92	n/a	15.3	n/a
1992–93	15.1	11.8	n/a
1993–94	10.5	9.3	n/a
1994–95	8.1	6.2	4.8
1995–96	7.6	7.3	7.7
1996–97	7.0	4.6	8.6
1997–98	6.2	2.5	3.9
1998–99	4.0	2.8	5.1
1999–2000	n/a	3.8	n/a

Water Meters

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of the introduction of water meters in higher rateable value properties on charges for customers in lower rateable value properties. [124650]

Mr. Mullin: This is a matter for the Director General of Water Services. He has set out his position on the balance between measured and unmeasured water charges in "Tariff structure and charges: 2000–01 report", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the current estimated cost of installing water meters in all domestic properties. [124647]

Mr. Mullin: There are no plans to meter all domestic properties, so no estimate has been made of the cost of doing so. Under the Water Industry Act 1999, companies in England and Wales must install a meter in any home when requested by the consumer, free of initial charge. The number of meters installed will depend on consumer choices. In his determination of water company price limits, the Director General of Water Services has allowed for £202 million capital and £53 million operating expenditure for the costs of installing optional meters in 2000–05.

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of domestic properties are (a) fitted with water meters and (b) pay by volume. [124646]

Mr. Mullin: The Director General of Water Services publishes an annual report on "Tariff structure and charges", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. This report gives details of the percentage of domestic properties who pay for water supplies according to volume. The figure for 2000–01 is estimated to be 19.6 per cent., based on forecast data provided by water companies. The equivalent figure for 1999–2000 was 17.1 per cent.

In some instances a property may be fitted with a meter, but be charged on an unmetered basis. The Director General of Water Services collects only information relating to the number of meters that are installed and used as the basis for charging.

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent representations he has received regarding the implications of water metering for low-income households where there are (a) children, (b) elderly and (c) people with disabilities and illnesses that require them to take frequent baths. [124649]

Mr. Mullin: The Government published "Water Industry Act 1999: Consultation on Regulations" on 12 October 1999, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Fifty-three responses were received relating to the proposals for assisting low-income households who pay by meter.

Following that consultation, the Government laid the Water Industry (Charges) (Vulnerable Groups) Regulations 1999 on 22 December 1999, and made minor clarificatory amendments in the Water Industry (Charges) (Vulnerable Groups) (Amendment) Regulations 2000, which were laid on 3 March 2000. Both came into force on 1 April 2000.

The Regulations offer assistance to low-income households with water meters, who might face hardship as a result of high water use for basic household purposes. To qualify for assistance, a member of the household must be entitled to received income related benefits or tax credits; and either be responsible for three or more children under the age of 16; have (or have a child with) a qualifying medical condition which requires significant extra use.

The response to consultation is contained in "Water Industry Act 1999: Delivering the Government's Objectives" which was published on 3 February 2000. This also included a copy of the main Regulations. A copy is in the Library of the House.

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many properties in each of the council tax bands are fitted with a water meter. [124648]

Mr. Mullin: No information is available on the proportion of properties in each of the council tax bands fitted with a water meter.

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what options he is considering to replace rateable values for calculating water charges. [124645]

Mr. Mullin: Under the Water Industry Act 1999, companies must produce charges schemes, which include details of the basis on which they wish to charge for water and sewerage services to homes. Schemes are subject to approval by the Director General of Water Services.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has issued guidance to the Director General on the approval of schemes for companies operating wholly or mainly in England. In considering whether or not to approve a new basis of unmeasured charging, key factors are the transitional effects of any change, any proposals for managing such effects and the impact of the new basis of charging on different groups, particularly vulnerable customers. Because of the potential social impacts on customers, the Director should not approve the widespread introduction of new unmeasured charging arrangements, without full consultation with the Secretary of State. The Government will continue to consider any proposals that come forward provided that they address the key factors.

The Secretary of State's guidance under the 1999 Act and other background on water charging policy is set out in "Water Industry Act 1999—Delivering the Government's Objectives" published on 3 February, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Water Bills

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those water companies that charge for the payment of bills at post offices. [124657]

Mr. Mullin: Water companies do not charge their customers for payment of bills at post offices. Post Office Counters Ltd. levy a handling charge (currently £1 per transaction) for paying bills at post offices. This charge does not apply to GiroBank account holders.

There is significant variation in the policy of water companies in England towards payment of water bills at Post Offices. Information available from water companies indicates that five companies currently subsidise all of any Post Office handling charge on behalf of their customers:

Cambridge Water

Folkestone and Dover Water

North West Water

South Staffordshire Water

Southern Water.

Customers of a further six companies can pay their bills free of charge if they use a payment card (obtainable free of charge from the water company):

Essex and Suffolk Water

Northumbrian Water

Severn Trent Water

South West Water

Thames Water

Yorkshire Water.

Customers of Wessex Water and South East Water can pay bills free of charge at Post Offices if they use an instalments book, and customers of Bristol Water can pay bills free of charge if they pay in cash.

Payment arrangements for the other companies vary. Such arrangements include part-subsidising the Post Office handling charge, or fully subsidising it for certain groups of customers (such as pensioners). All companies which do not offer an option to pay free of charge at Post Offices offer alternative locations (such as banks and shops) where free payments can be made.

Under the Water Industry Act 1999, water companies have to submit their charges schemes to the Director General of Water Services for approval. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has issued guidance to the Director General of Water Services on the approval of schemes, which encourages companies to offer a range of payment options to customers, particularly those on low incomes, which they can take up at no extra cost. In approving schemes for 2000–01, the Director required all companies to ensure that charges schemes made provision for making cash payments free of charge at reasonably accessible locations.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will give a list of the 10 largest grants awarded by each of the regional development agencies in England since their inception. [124237]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The 10 largest grants awarded by each of the regional development agencies since their inception are as follows:

Air Cargo

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions under what conditions he would liberalise the UK/USA aviation agreement for air cargo; and if he will make a statement. [124535]

Mr. Mullin: The liberalisation of cargo as well as passenger services will be discussed at air services talks with the United States commencing on 13 June. We will press the United States to allow greater access to the US domestic market for UK carriers.

Forest of Dean

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will make a statement on the progress of granting special status for the Forest of Dean; and what advice he has given to local planning authorities concerning the Forest of Dean and the local minerals plan; [124168]

(2) if he has instructed the local planning authorities and the Mineral Planning Authority to treat the Forest of Dean as if it were an Area of Outstanding Natural Beauty. [124169]

Mr. Mullin: The Countryside Agency decided in November last year not to pursue the designation of the Forest of Dean as an Area of Outstanding Natural Beauty at this time but instead to devise a package of regeneration measures to deliver integrated rural development in the Forest.

The Government Office for the South West has submitted comments to Gloucestershire County Council on the initial and revised deposit drafts of the Minerals Local Plan, with a request that they be drawn to the attention of the Inspector at any public local inquiry and be made public. We are still considering a proposal from the Countryside Agency that we should advise the Council to treat the Forest of Dean as if it were an Area of Outstanding Natural Beauty for the purposes of the Minerals Local Plan.

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has agreed to the funding of the post for the Countryside Agency Co-ordinator for the project in the Forest of Dean to develop special status. [124170]

Mr. Mullin: This is a matter for the Countryside Agency. The Agency's approved budget of £55.1 million for this year has been set against its main objectives as agreed with my Department. The Agency is responsible for the allocation of moneys within the budget to individual projects. I understand that a project officer has been appointed to take forward the delivery of integrated rural development in the Forest of Dean.

Energy Conservation

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reason the publication of proposed changes to Part L of the Building Regulations, concerning the conservation of fuel and power, has been delayed; and if he will make a statement regarding the timetable for publication. [123509]

Ms Beverley Hughes: When the review of Part L of the Building Regulations was announced in February 1998 it was indicated that this would be a very open process with full consultation on what might be included in the review in advance of the development of the proposals by the Building Regulations Advisory Committee. This open process has been widely welcomed, but has raised a number of issues that have had to be explored before fully considered proposals for public consultations could be published. However, it is expected that the proposals will be published shortly with responses requested by the end of September.

Beach Safety

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what systems of flag symbols are used on bathing beaches to signify the safety level of swimming conditions. [124248]

Mr. Mullin: The Maritime and Coastguard Agency understands that there are three levels of flag symbols used to signify the safety level of swimming conditions on bathing beaches.

1. Red and Yellow flags signify that Lifeguards are on patrol and that Swimming or Boogie Boarding should only take place in the area between the flags.
2. A Red Flag means that it is dangerous to bathe or swim and the water should not be entered.
3. A quartered black and white flag indicates the area is zoned for surf craft and Malibu boards. This flag indicates that the area is not safe for swimmers and bathers.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his Department's policy is in relation to the provision of life protecting and saving services around the shoreline of the UK (a) on recognised recreational bathing beaches and (b) elsewhere. [124249]

Mr. Mullin: The then Secretary of State for Transport announced in Parliament on 9 March 1992, Official Report, columns 409–10W, that following acceptance of the recommendations of the coastal review that the role of Her Majesty's Coastguard needed to be clearly defined and promulgated and that by the authority given to him by the Coastguard Act 1925 it had been agreed that:

> Her Majesty's Coastguard is responsible for the initiation and co-ordination of civil maritime search and rescue within the United Kingdom search and rescue region. This includes the mobilisation, organisation and tasking of adequate resources to respond to persons either in distress at sea, or to persons at risk of injury or death on the cliffs or shoreline of the United Kingdom.

Thus, in response to incidents on or to seaward of recognised recreational beaches, HM Coastguard can mobilise, task and co-ordinate search and rescue helicopters, RNLI inshore and all-weather lifeboats, Coastguard Rescue Teams and Beach Lifeguard Units where provided by local authorities. Elsewhere on the coast the same search and rescue units can be mobilised and tasked though Beach Lifeguard Units are not normally found other than on recreational beaches.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the possible correlation between the age of fishing vessels and accidents involving fire, explosion, foundering and loss of life for (a) over 12 metre and (b) under 12 metre vessels. [124485]

Mr. Hill: The Marine Accidents Investigation Branch (MAIB) has examined all reported accidents to UK fishing vessels, irrespective of length, involving fires and explosions, and floodings and founderings from 1992 to September 1999. No examination has been made of the correlation between the age of fishing vessels and the fatal accidents.

The MAIB's figures show that the accident rate for floodings and founderings, for under 12 metre vessels up to 10 years old, and for over 12 metre vessels up to 20 years old, is unremarkable but deteriorates thereafter. For all vessels more than 40 years old, the rate improves. For fires and explosions the correlation is similar to floodings and founderings for vessels over 12 metre vessels, but there is no meaningful correlation for under 12 metre vessels as the number reported to the MAIB is small.

The MAIB concludes generally that the accident rate increases for all vessels in the 20 to 40 bracket largely because maintenance does not reach the level required to prevent these types of accidents. However, the rate improves for vessels more than 40 years old because the worse performing vessels have been removed from the fleet, and the remainder have been extensively refurbished.

Trust Ports

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the advantages and disadvantages of continuance of the trust port election system; and if he will make a statement. [124575]

Mr. Hill: Officials have examined these issues in detail and discussed them with the trust ports concerned.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received on his Department's plans to reform trust ports, specifically with regard to plans to abolish the present trust port election system. [124574]

Mr. Hill: Our plans for reform of trust ports are set out in "Modernising Trust Ports—A guide to good governance" published in January. This guidance, drawn up with the assistance of trust ports and the Scottish Executive, includes advice on the appointment process in trust ports. In a few trust ports appointments are made by local election. We have not proposed to abolish these arrangements but we have offered further advice on improvements to ensure that elections are held in a more open and accountable manner. We have only received representations from two Scottish ports, which are being considered by the Scottish Executive.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what account he has taken of democratic accountability in his proposals for changing the election system in trust ports. [124576]

Mr. Hill: Our proposals seek to improve democratic accountability by ensuring that local elections for trust port boards reflect current electoral standards and are more representative of each port's community of stakeholders. Such improvements are also intended to deliver candidates with the skills required for governance of the ports.

Petition (Boddam)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to investigate the loss of a petition from the residents of Boddam, Aberdeenshire, regarding the Boddam Foghorn, which was received by recorded delivery at his Department on 19 April; and if he will make a statement concerning the circumstances surrounding the loss and his Department's policy on dealing with petitions from members of the public. [124251]

Mr. Mullin: After an extensive search within the Department, we have been unable to find the original correspondence. A copy of the petition was received on 1 June and will be dealt with as a matter of urgency.

Petitions from members of the public are dealt with by officials in my Department unless they are sent via their MP. All correspondence is logged and passed to the appropriate division for a response.

Health and Safety

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will publish the new strategy to revitalise health and safety; and if he will make a statement. [124918]

Mr. Meacher: The Government and the Health and Safety Commission (HSC) will publish their "Revitalising Health and Safety" Strategy Statement tomorrow, and copies will be placed in the Libraries of the House. The strategy is about improving health and safety conditions in all of Britain's workplaces.

The Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 was a landmark in making Britain's workplaces safer. The Act provides for good, effective regulation of health and safety and has transformed Britain's workplaces. We can see the results—the number of deaths at work today is a quarter of the 1971 level. Britain is now one of the safest countries in which to work. But in today's modern economy, it is unacceptable that hundreds of people still die in workplace accidents, and 25,000 more leave the workforce never to return as a result of being injured, or made ill, by their work.

This Government are determined to build a fair and decent society for everyone, not just the few. A better deal for working people is central to that vision—safe and healthy working conditions are at the core of that vision. Tomorrow, the Government and the HSC will embark on a new 10 year programme of improvement. For the first time ever, the Government and the HSC will set national targets to cut work-related deaths, injuries and illnesses. We will implement 44 separate measures to that end. These will include motivating employers to raise their game, giving further support to the important work done by safety representatives, and giving more help to small firms in their management of health and safety. Above all, we will inject new impetus into the health and safety system to prevent accidents and ill health causing misery to thousands of people.

Housing Corporation

Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the Finance Management and Policy Review of the Housing Corporation. [124921]

Mr. Raynsford: On 14 December 1999 I announced that, as part of the Government's programme of regular five-yearly finance, management and policy reviews of non-departmental public bodies, my Department would be conducting a thorough review of The Housing Corporation in 2000.

The "Prior Options" stage of the review has been completed and I have placed a copy of the report in the Library.

The purpose of the Prior Options stage was to assess the extent to which The Housing Corporation's functions were necessary for the achievement of the Government's policies, and whether there was scope for contracting out or transferring all or part of its functions to another body.

The Government's Housing Green Paper "Quality and Choice: A decent home for all" affirms the Government's commitment to improving the quality of social housing and its management, supporting the transfer of up to 200,000 homes from the local authority sector to Registered Social Landlords (RSLs) and to the continuing allocation of funding to RSLs for new social housing. There is therefore a continuing need for a mechanism to regulate the RSL sector to protect public investment, to promote improved performance in the sector and to allocate funding for new social housing. Against this background, the Government accept the Prior Options Review conclusions, that the Housing Corporation should continue to be responsible for registration and regulation of RSLs in England; should continue to allocate funds for new social housing; and that its status as a non-departmental public body remains appropriate to the Corporation's functions.

The Housing Corporation is already taking forward a number of recommendations in the report. In particular it is: strengthening its regulatory skills, especially in business and finance; working to establish a full Best Value regime to promote improved performance in the RSL sector; will set up an inspection process to support this regime; and will continue developing its funding arrangements and processes for making investment decisions.

The report identifies a number of issues to be examined in the second stage of the FMPR, including a review of the Corporation's organisational framework; exploring the options for an appeals mechanism for dealing with disputed regulatory judgments; the case for strengthening the Corporation's powers; agreeing a concordat between the Department and the Corporation for joint working on policy development; and reviewing targets set for the Corporation.

I am grateful for contributions received in the course of the Review from The Housing Corporation, National Housing Federation, local authority associations, Chartered Institute of Housing, Audit Commission, Council of Mortgage Lenders, individual RSLs and numerous other bodies and individuals. The report contains a list of those who contributed. Copies of written responses are available through the Library.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the County Councils and Unitary Councils ranked in order of the volume of waste disposed of in each of their areas. [123384]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 23 May 2000]: The table shows County Councils and Unitary Authorities ranked in order of the amount of waste collected for recycling, composting and disposal. This list is based on the data provided by the authorities in response to the Department's Municipal Waste Management Survey for 1997–98 and excludes authorities which did not provide a complete response to the questionnaire.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Compensation Agency

Mr. Darvill: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he will publish the future plans of the Compensation Agency; and if he will make a statement. [124917]

Mr. Ingram: The Compensation Agency will publish today its Corporate Plan and Business Plan. I have set the Agency the following nine Key Performance Targets for the coming year:

1. To process criminal injuries claims for an average unit cost of £295.
2. To process criminal damage and emergency provisions claims for an average unit cost of £147.
3. To maintain the average time taken to reach decisions on criminal injuries claims at 45 weeks for claims received from 1 April 1999.
4. To maintain the average time taken to reach decisions on criminal damage claims at 19 weeks for claims received from 1 April 2000.
5. To reduce the average time taken to reach decisions on emergency provisions claims to 35 days for claims received from 1 April 2000.
6. To reduce by 85 per cent. the number of criminal injuries claims in hand at 31 March 1999 on which no decision had been reached.
7. To reduce by 85 per cent. the number of criminal damage claims in hand at 31 March 2000 on which no decision had been reached.
8. To reduce by 95 per cent. the number of emergency provisions claims in hand at 31 March 2000 on which no decision had been reached.
9. To manage the Agency's workload in 2000–01 within a running costs budget (to cover salaries and administrative expenditure) to cover salaries and administrative expenditure) to financial limits agreed with the Department (including in-year adjustments).

Benefit Payments (Costs)

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the annual cost of his Department's and its agencies administration of benefit payments (a) in total and (b) as a percentage of spending on benefit payments. [124254]

Mr. George Howarth: The estimated cost of administering the social security benefit system in Northern Ireland in 1998–99, the latest year for which information is available, was £125.6 million. This equates to 4 per cent. of benefit expenditure which amounted in total in that year to £3,168.8 million.

Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Departmental Staff (Technology)

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what staff and technology are shared between his Department and its agencies and the Department of Social Security and its agencies; what work is undertaken (a) on behalf of the DSS and its agencies by his Department and its agencies and (b) by the DSS and its agencies on behalf of his Department or agencies in the last year; and what payments have been made in each case. [124255]

Mr. George Howarth: The Department for Social Development in Northern Ireland does not share staff with the Department of Social Security (DSS) in Great Britain. The Department's Child Support Agency provides child support services for those DSS clients living in Eastern England. The Department receives £25.5 million from DSS in respect of this business. The Social Security Agency also provides benefit processing and administration services to DSS for clients living in the Lewisham, Neasden and Brixton areas of London, for which it receives an annual payment of £10.4 million from DSS. The Department also provides a storage and retrieval service to DSS for social security order book foils for which it receives an annual payment of £4.9 million.

The Department for Social Development uses the DSS computer systems to administer social security benefits and to deliver Child Support services. The Department pays DSS £7.7 million for the use of these systems and for the installation and maintenance of the equipment on which they run.

The DSS also provides the Department with a number of other ancillary services, such as publishing and distribution, fraud inspection, work measurement and Child Support decision making. DSS receive £510,000 for these services.

Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Leisure Centres and Libraries (Access)

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what percentage of the population lives (a) within one mile of and (b) over three miles from (i) a leisure centre and (ii) a library in (A) rural and (B) urban areas. [124497]

Kate Hoey [holding answer 5 June 2000]: This information is not available. For leisure centres, analysis carried out by Sport England in 1998 using the Facilities Planning Model developed in association with the Scottish Sports Council and Edinburgh University estimated that 96.6 per cent. of people living in England live within 15 minutes drive of a sports hall with at least three courts, and 85.1 per cent. of people in England live within 15 minutes drive of an indoor swimming pool. I have placed a copy of the Facilities Planning Guide published by Sport England in the Library.

No information on travelling distances or travel times is available in respect of libraries.

Millennium Experience (Ticket Sales)

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if his Department will conduct an internal review under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information into the non-provision of the information requested by the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central on regional ticket sales to the Millennium Experience. [124365]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 5 June 2000]: My hon. Friend the Minister for Tourism, Film and Broadcasting wrote to my hon. Friend on 6 December 1999. Following an investigation by the New Millennium Experience Company into the pattern of ticket sales, it was discovered that most were purchased from central sales points, including the Dome call centre, and it is therefore impossible to provide any meaningful statistical breakdown of visitors by region. I am satisfied that the reason for the non-provision of information in this respect is that the information does not exist, rather than that it is being deliberately withheld.

Local Authority Funding

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the funds which are available to local authorities on application, indicating those for which the Torbay Unitary Authority has successfully applied in each of the last two years. [124193]

Mr. Chris Smith: The following funds are available to Local Authorities on application:

DCMS/Wolfson Public Libraries Challenge Fund—£3 million a year to enhance facilities and services of English Public Libraries, of which DCMS makes available £2 million and the Wolfson Foundation £1 million.

English Heritage—Grants are available to local authorities for the conservation of Grade I and II* listed buildings and scheduled ancient monuments. Funding is also available to local authorities under EH's Heritage Economic Regeneration Scheme (HERS), under which a three year programme of grant aid is targeted at heritage-based economic regeneration.

Arts Council of England—Local authorities can have access to project funds from Regional Arts Boards.

National Lottery

Arts Council of England—A number of capital and revenue schemes for which organisations can apply with a view to developing and sustaining access to, and participation in, the arts.

Lottery Sports Fund—Lottery Sports Fund provides grants for sports facilities and sports provision.

Heritage Lottery Fund—Grants for works to buildings, structures and areas that are of historic or architectural importance and for action to widen and enhance popular access to the heritage. HLF also supports improvements to the housing and presentation of collections in museums and galleries.

New Opportunities Fund

The Information Communication and Technology for Librarians—a £50 million programme that aims to digitise a wide range of material to support lifelong learning needs and education in its broadest sense.

Out of School Hours Learning—a £205 million grant programme that aims to create regular out-of-school hours learning activities, and new summer school places.

Community Access to Lifelong Learning Programme—a £200 million grant programme that aims to improve access to lifelong learning for adults through the use of ICT with a particular focus on socially excluded adults and those in disadvantaged communities.

Successful Awards to Torbay Council

English Heritage

A grant of £150,000 has been offered by EH under the HERS towards conservation work in the Paignton Conservation Area between April 2000 and March 2003.

New Opportunities Fund

An award of £408,500 through the Out-of-School Hours Learning Programme. The Fund has also allocated funding to schools in Torbay amounting to £421,234 under a programme for ICT training for teachers and school librarians.

Arts Council of England

Over the last two years there has been one Grant in Aid award from the Arts Council to Torbay Borough Council:

a grant of £2,500 as part of the Capital Art Strategy.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the letter of direction for the payment of £29 million to the Dome. [123980]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 5 June 2000]: This is a matter for the Millennium Commission. I will write to the right hon. Member in my capacity as Chairman of the Commission, and place copies of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

Tourism Summit

Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he will report on the outcome of the first Tourism summit held in London on 1 March. [124922]

Mr. Chris Smith: Copies of a full report on the summit, and of other documents tabled at the meeting, have been deposited in the Libraries of the House. A further summit will be held next year to review progress and decide further action.

Welsh Assembly

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he expects to publish the bilateral concordat between his Department and the Cabinet of the National Assembly for Wales. [124923]

Mr. Chris Smith: I am pleased to announce that the Concordat between the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Cabinet of the National Assembly for Wales has now been agreed. Copies of the Concordat have been placed in the Libraries of the House, and the text will also be available on the Department for Culture, Media and Sport's website http://www.culture.gov.uk.

TREASURY

EU Stability Pact

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy on the application of the EU Stability Pact to the UK. [123830]

Miss Melanie Johnson: As set out in Articles 99 and 104 of the EC Treaty, the UK once a year submits a Convergence programme as part of the Stability and Growth Pact.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what obligations are imposed on him in respect of public spending by the EU stability pact; and what contribution these have made to ensuring that divergences in the economic cycle between the UK and Europe are reduced. [124349]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Under Council Regulation (EC) No. 1467/97, the UK should > endeavour to avoid excessive deficits.

Sterling Deposits

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the change in 1998 and 1999 in (a) foreigners' holdings of sterling deposits and (b) UK residents' deposits overseas, including the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. [124346]

Miss Melanie Johnson: This information can be found in tables 5A, 5B, 6A and 6B of the "BIS Quarterly Review", and table B8 of "Bank of England Monetary and Financial Statistics".

Exchange Rate

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what commitments have been made by the UK to the EU convergence programme; how far these have been breached; and what contributions they have made to ensuring more stability in the Sterling-Euro exchange rate. [124350]

Miss Melanie Johnson: In line with the Stability and Growth Pact, the Government submit a Convergence Programme to the European Commission and the Council, which provides an annual update of our economic performance. The economic forecasts and fiscal projections for the 1999 Convergence Programme are those given in the Pre-Budget Report.

Inflation Target

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the benefits and consequences of including asset prices in the Bank of England's inflation target; and if he will make a statement. [124348]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Bank of England Monetary Policy Committee (MPC) is required to meet the Government's clear inflation target of 2.5 per cent. RPIX inflation. Dual target systems have in the past led to macroeconomic instability for example, in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The MPC takes into account all relevant information, including asset prices, in making its judgment on interest rates to achieve the Government's inflation target.

National Insurance

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the additional annual revenue from raising the ceiling on employees' national insurance contributions to (a) the level at which taxpayers became liable for higher rate income tax and (b) £1,000 a week. [124250]

Dawn Primarolo: The full year yields from increasing the Upper Earnings Limit (UEL) and Upper Profits Limit (UPL) in 2001–02 are given in the table.

2001–02	Exchequer yield
Increase the UEL/UPL to:
higher rate threshold	840
to £1,000 per week	2,560

The estimates are consistent with the March 2000 Budget.

Census

Barbara Follett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will publish the proposed forms of questionnaire that will be required to be completed in next year's census of population in England and Wales. [124924]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I have today laid before the House the Census Regulations 2000 (Statutory Instrument 2000–1473) which include facsimile copies of the forms to be completed by householders, individuals and persons in charge of communal establishments in respect of the next census of population in England and Wales, to be taken on 29 April 2001. The Regulations also provide for the appointment of persons to carry out the field operations and the detailed arrangements for the conduct of the census. Pending the progress of the Census (Amendment) Bill these forms do not currently contain a question on religion.

Corresponding Regulations covering the Census in Scotland were laid before the Scottish Parliament on 5 April. Similar Regulations covering the Census in Northern Ireland were made on 25 May.

National Statistics

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will publish the Framework Document relating to National Statistics. [124930]

Miss Melanie Johnson: National Statistics will be launched tomorrow. The Framework Document and the list of statistics for initial inclusion in National Statistics will be laid before both Houses tomorrow morning. Copies will be available in the Vote Office.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of independent appeals on Disability Living Allowance cases have resulted in a decision being amended (i) upwards and (ii) downwards in each of the last five years. [124708]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the table.

Disability Living Allowance appeals

Appeal decisions	1995–96	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000

As percentage	41.8	37.5	33.3	33.2	35.0

Note:
The following categories were also included to provide a complete picture of outcomes on DLA appeals:
1. Award varied is where the length of award changes or the monetary value remains the same but components change.
2. Allowed is where Lay Review/Appeal is determined in favour of the claimant.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the (a) net cost and (b) number of beneficiaries of abolishing Attendance Allowance and removing the upper age limit for Disability Living Allowance in each of the next five years. [124416]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the table:

Estimated cost and number of gainers from abolition of upper age limit for Disability Living Allowance

	2001–02	2002–03	2003–04	2004–05	2005–06
Cost (£ billion)	2.8	3.0	3.1	3.2	3.4
Gainers (million)	1.4	1.4	1.4	1.45	1.5

Notes:
1. Costs are in cash prices and rounded to nearest hundred million and number of gainers rounded to the nearest 50,000.
2. Estimates derived from model of entitlement based on 1996–97 Disability Survey and forecast case loads.
3. Estimates are subject to a significant margin of error reflecting underlying uncertainties of modelling entitlement from available survey data.
4. Estimated costs include effects on income related benefits.

Widows Pension

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people claim the widow's pension in (a) Scotland, (b) Dumfries and Galloway and (c) Galloway and Upper Nithsdale parliamentary constituency. [124715]

Mr. Rooker: At 31 March 1999 there were 29,000 recipients of Widows' Benefit living in Scotland. Information is not available below national level.

Notes:

1. The figure is the total recipients of Widow's Pension and Widowed Mother's Allowance.
2. The figures are rounded to the nearest thousand.

Minimum Income Guarantee

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the extra total cost of the minimum income guarantee for pensioners over and above the cost of income support for which pensioners were previously eligible. [124344]

Mr. Bayley: During the lifetime of this Parliament the extra total cost of the minimum income guarantee and associated benefits for pensioners over and above the cost of Income Support for which pensioners were previously eligible is estimated to be £2.2 billion in real terms.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what methods he uses to measure the annual increase in earnings for the purpose of uprating the minimum income guarantee. [124393]

Mr. Bayley: In line with the Government's commitment to provide security in retirement for the poorest pensioners, the minimum income guarantee has been increased by 4.6 per cent., in line with the increase in average earnings. This measure of earnings growth reflects the 12-month headline rate and is based on a three-month average up to July 1999, published in The Stationery Office's "Monthly Digest of Statistics".

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what circumstances a pensioner with income above the minimum income guarantee level who claims all the benefits to which they are entitled can be worse off than if they were receiving the minimum income guarantee. [124391]

Mr. Bayley: We are not aware of a situation where an individual with weekly income above the minimum income guarantee (MIG) level would be worse off, in terms of weekly cash income, after claiming all the benefits to which they are entitled.

Receipt of the MIG does provide a pensioner with access to certain additional services, such as free school meals and social fund budgeting loans, that are not available to those not entitled.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the level of fraud by (a) number of claimants and (b) value (i) in total and (ii) as a percentage of total benefit payments for each benefit in (1) the UK and (2) Scotland. [124252]

Mr. Rooker: The information requested is available in the last Government Statistical Service report on the Area Benefit Reviews, "Results of the Area Benefit Review April 1998–99 and measurements for the public service agreement", which was published on 28 January. A copy is available in the Library.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the (a) cost and (b) number of beneficiaries of extending entitlement to invalid care allowance to people who would otherwise be entitled but (i) earn less than the national insurance lower earnings limit, but whose earnings exceed the earnings limit for ICA, (ii) are aged over 65 years and (iii) are aged over 65 or earn less than the national insurance lower earnings limit in each of the next five years. [124417]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Estimated cost of the abolition of the upper age limit for claiming Invalid Care Allowance (ICA)

	Cost (£ million)	Gainers (Thousand)
2001–02	25	40
2002–03	25	40
2003–04	25	40
2004–05	25	40
2005–06	30	40

Notes:

1. Costs are given in cash prices. Costs rounded to the nearest 5 million, gainers to the nearest 10,000.
2. Estimates are based on Family Resources Survey 1997–98 and 1998–99, and caseload forecasts.
3. As estimates are based on survey data, the above will be subject to sampling error. The limitations of modelling entitlement from available survey data on the number of hours that individuals spend providing care mean that the above are subject to a significant margin of error.
4. It is assumed that all existing ICA entitlement rules remain in place after any abolition of the upper age limit for new claims. Costs include the effects on Income Support carer premium.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the (a) cost and (b) number of beneficiaries continuing to pay for invalid care allowance (i) after the person cared for dies, (ii) after the person cared for enters permanent residential care and (iii) after care ends, for (1) four weeks and (2) eight weeks in each of the next five years. [124415]

Mr. Bayley: No information is available on the numbers/costs of an Invalid Care Allowance run-on when the disabled person enters residential care. Information on the other questions is shown in the tables.

Pensions

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 18 April 2000, Official Report, column 439W, what the national insurance fund balance would be, and how far above the minimum level recommended by the Government Actuary, at the end of each of the years 2002–03 and 2003–04, if the basic pension and linked benefit rates remained at their present level in 2000–01 and were uprated in line with prices thereafter. [124257]

Mr. Rooker: As I said on 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 484W, precise long-term forecasts of any excess on the Fund reserves would be misleading given the sensitivity of the difference between forecasts of receipts and expenditure to the variables involved.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick) on 11 April 2000, Official Report, column 144W, if the cost of uprating on the basis of earnings the basic pension shown there, including the cost of uprating the linked benefits on the same basis; and what would be the cost for each year from 1998–99 to 2001–02, if the uprating, including the linked benefits, was based on the average earnings index for the three months to July of the previous year. [124392]

Mr. Rooker: The information is in the table.

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02
Winter fuel payment (a)	200	200	760	1,380	1,210
Minimum income guarantee (b)	—	—	410	700	1,090
Total (c=a+b)	200	200	1,170	2,080	2,300
Retirement pension earning-uprated since April 1998 (d)	—	160	590	1,610	2,080
Extra spending (c-d)	200	40	580	480	220
Cumulative extra spending	200	240	820	1,300	1,520

Notes:
1. Rounded to the nearest £10 million.
2. Costs are in 1999–2000 terms.
3. Some figures do not appear to sum. This is due to rounding.
4. Average earnings assumptions for both (b) and (d) are based on an average of seasonally adjusted figures for the three months to July of the previous year, as originally published.

Benefits Administration

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the annual cost of his Department's administration including its agencies (a) in total and (b) as a percentage of total spending on benefit payments. [124253]

Mr. Rooker: The cost of administration, in total and as a percentage of benefit expenditure for the period 1994–95 to 1999–2000, is shown in figure 41 of the Social Security Departmental Report (Cm 4614).

Winter Fuel Payments

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the estimated cost is in (a) 2000–01 and (b) 2001–02 of extending entitlement to winter fuel payments to men under 65 years; and how much of the cost in each year represents arrears for previous years. [124256]

Angela Eagle: In light of the Taylor ruling by the European Court of Justice in December 1999, we decided to extend eligibility to Winter Fuel Payments to include men aged 60–64. To do so it was also necessary to remove the qualifying benefit as an eligibility condition. This brought some newly eligible women, as well as men, into the scheme.

The estimated additional programme costs of extending the scheme in 2000–01 and 2001–02 are in the table and take into account the increase in the Winter Fuel Payment to £150 for eligible households from winter 2000–01. The cost of payments for past winters go back to the beginning of the scheme in the winter of 1997–98.

£ million

Additional costs	2000–01	2001–02
Annual costs	130	130
Cost for payments in past winters	150	0

Notes:
1. These costs are based on assumptions about take-up. The precise cost will vary depending on the level of take-up among the client group concerned.
2. Costs are in cash terms and are rounded to the nearest £10 million.

HEALTH

NHS Drugs Budget

15. Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the reform of the NHS drugs budget. [122876]

Ms Stuart: By introducing unified budgets for health authorities, primary care groups and primary care trusts we have given them the flexibility to manage the growing National Health Service budget, including spending on medicines in the way that they consider best for their patients.

Elderly People

16. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on NHS treatment of the elderly. [122877]

Mr. Hutton: We are determined that older people should have high standards of care from the National Health Service based on clinical need and no other factor. Our National Service Framework for Older People, to be published in the autumn, will set national standards in health care for older people. Our plans to develop Intermediate Care Services will play an important part in promoting the independence of older people.

Worcester Royal Infirmary

17. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the proposal to transfer services from Kidderminster hospital to Worcester and Redditch prior to the completion of the new Worcester royal infirmary; and if he will make a statement. [122878]

Yvette Cooper: When Worcestershire Health Authority's strategy "Investing in Excellence" was approved, the Secretary of State was satisfied that appropriate evidence and advice had been taken into account. Proposals for the early relocation of services from Kidderminster General Hospital are operational details and as such are the responsibility of the Worcestershire Acute Hospitals NHS Trust.

Drug Rehabilitation Programmes

18. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking to improve the delivery of drug rehabilitation programmes. [122879]

Ms Stuart: The Government are committed to a robust strategy to tackle drug misuse and we are backing it with extra resources: more than £200 million over three years. It is one of the Department's 13 key priorities. Through better performance management and guidance on optimum models of care we will ensure that more people benefit from treatment which is effective, including residential rehabilitation.

Skin Cancer

19. Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the increasing incidence of skin cancer among young people. [122880]

Yvette Cooper: There are signs of increasing incidence of skin cancer among young people but it seems that any increase may be levelling off. This year the Government will be using posters, factsheets, websites and weather forecasts in a determined effort to provide accessible information enabling young people to make informed choices.

Asthma

20. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are suffering from asthma; what action his Department is taking to combat asthma; and if he will make a statement. [122881]

Yvette Cooper: The estimated prevalence is 4–6 per cent. in children and 4 per cent. in adults; approximately 2–3 million people in the United Kingdom. We are supporting a range of initiatives to combat the effects of asthma. Collaboration with the National Asthma Campaign, active involvement of the Chronic Disease Management Programme and over £3.5 million of Government-funded research reflect this.

Diet and Exercise

21. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the relationship between poverty and diet and exercise. [122882]

Yvette Cooper: The Government fully recognise the links between social deprivation, poor diet and physical inactivity. The Acheson report commissioned by the Government highlighted the phenomenon of food poverty as a very important consideration within public health. The link is confirmed by the recently published National Diet and Nutritional Survey for young people. This shows that, for example, among manual social groups only 22 per cent. of boys consume fruit compared with 39 per cent. in non-manual classes. A similar picture also emerges in the case of girls in manual classes, with only 29 per cent. consuming fruit compared to 43 per cent. among their non-manual counterparts.

The social class patterns for physical activity are less clear. Lower levels of leisure time exercise seem balanced by more active jobs for those on the lowest incomes. Based on these and other indicators like the National Diet and Nutrition Survey for young people, we are examining these issues as part of the development of the National Plan.

Camden and Islington Health Action Zone

22. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the progress of the Camden and Islington health action zone. [122883]

Mr. Denham: We expect Camden and Islington health action zone to achieve significant results in reducing health inequalities and modernising services over its seven year life. Both the independent evaluation and the performance monitoring process report good early progress in Camden and Islington and the other HAZs. We are due to receive an end of year performance report on the HAZ initiative later in the summer and a national report on progress will be published in the autumn.

Cancer Treatment

23. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made on reducing waiting times for cancer treatment. [122884]

Yvette Cooper: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby) today, Official Report, column 141.

HIV/AIDS

24. Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the timing of the announcement of special allocations to health authorities for HIV/AIDS prevention, treatment and care. [122885]

Yvette Cooper: We announced special allocations for HIV/AIDS treatment and care for 2000–01, totalling £184.3 million on 18 May. This is an increase of £21 million over the baseline or 13 per cent.

£54.8 million was allocated last December for HIV Prevention.

Mental Health

25. Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the provision of advocacy to people subject to compulsory treatment under the Mental Health Acts. [122886]

Mr. Hutton: All mentally ill people subject to compulsory care should have access to good advocacy. As we announced in our Green Paper on the reform of the Mental Health Act, we are commissioning work to determine and develop models of good practice. I hope to have the results of the study by early next year.

Primary Care Groups

26. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the average number of hours per week used by GP members of primary care groups on PCG-related work. [R] [122887]

Mr. Denham: We estimate that on average a typical board member of a Primary Care Group would need to spend between two and 2½ days per month on board business. However, the actual time commitment which each Primary Care Group member makes will depend on his or her role, responsibilities and personal commitment.

Teenage Pregnancies (South Yorkshire)

27. Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to reduce the number of teenage pregnancies in the South Yorkshire area. [122889]

Yvette Cooper: All four South Yorkshire districts have comprehensive strategies in place to reduce teenage pregnancy and support teenage parents. They have received funds totalling £345,000 for this financial year, to boost local projects. Each health authority has appointed a co-ordinator to drive forward the strategy in their area. This follows the launch last year by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister of the Government's strategy to halve the rates of conceptions among under-18s by 2010.

CJD

28. Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the assistance offered by the Government to CJD victims and their families. [122890]

Yvette Cooper: We will shortly be publishing some new guidance for health care professionals on caring for CJD patients. Among other things, it will stress the important role a named 'key worker' plays in ensuring the response properly meets the patient's and family's needs.

A national care co-ordinator has recently joined the Government-funded National CJD Surveillance Unit in Edinburgh to provide specialist expertise in CJD for professionals and carers.

The Department of Health also funds the CJD Support Network, a voluntary organisation providing help and support to patients and families affected by all types of CJD, to employ a case co-ordinator to help local service providers respond appropriately to patients' and families' care needs. In addition, the Human BSE Foundation are funded by the Department to provide help and support specifically to patients and families affected by variant CJD.

Finally, negotiations are underway to ensure the funding of the London Prion Unit at St. Mary's Hospital, which specialises in treating vCJD patients, and also offers information, advice and support for patients, families and professionals on all types of CJD.

Treatment Inconsistencies

30. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress he has made on eliminating inconsistent provision of treatments between health authorities. [122892]

Mr. Denham: We are setting standards through the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and the National Service Frameworks. We are ensuring local delivery through clinical governance and monitoring delivery through the performance assessment framework and the Commission for Health Improvement. We are working with relevant parties, utilising the record increases in National Health Service funding announced in the Budget, to improve NHS performance.

34. Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how he plans to fund the elimination of wide variations and discrepancies between local areas in health service provision. [122896]

Mr. Denham: We allocate funding to health authorities on the basis of the relative needs of their populations. A weighted capitation formula is used to determine each health authority's target fair share of available resources, to enable them to commission similar levels of health services for populations in similar need.

It is for health authorities in partnership with primary care groups and other local stakeholders to determine how best to use their funds to meet national and local priorities for improving health, tackling health inequalities and modernising services.

Tackling unacceptable variations in performance and treatment is one of the key challenges we have set the National Health Service. We are working with key professionals and frontline staff to see how we can improve NHS performance and productivity so that we make the best use of the record increases in NHS funding announced in the Budget.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he proposes to take to ensure uniformity in the availability of complex and expensive medical treatments. [122870]

Mr. Denham: The availability of complex and expensive medical treatments is achieved through the work of the National Specialist Commissioning Advisory Group (for services with a national caseload) and the new regional commissioning arrangements introduced in April 1999.

In addition, national standards are being set by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and the National Service Framework programme, local delivery is ensured through Clinical Governance, and services are monitored through the Performance Assessment Framework, the Commission for Health Improvement and national patient surveys.

Gene Technology

31. Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the impact of gene technology on the delivery of health services. [122893]

Yvette Cooper: We are aware of the rapid advances being made in gene technology. However, much research is still needed to determine the clinical utility of any developments. A strategy project is considering the implications for health services and the new Human Genetics Commission will keep this under review.

Podiatry Services

32. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will issue guidance to primary care groups on foot care and podiatry services for elderly and disabled people and their carers. [122894]

Mr. Hutton: Guidance on the provision of podiatry services is contained in "Feet First", the report of a joint Department of Health and NHS Chiropody Task Force published in 1994. A steering group has conducted a review of "Feet First" and we shall consider carefully its recommendations.

Audiology Services

35. Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about his plans to improve audiology services in the NHS. [122897]

Mr. Hutton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Henley) today, Official Report, columns 143–44.

NHS Reform

36. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what budget has been set for the public consultation on the future of the NHS. [122898]

Mr. Denham: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) on 18 May 2000, Official Report, column 240W.

Children's Hospices

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ensure that children's hospices receive the same level of national health service funding as other hospices. [122864]

Ms Stuart: Unlike hospices for adults, children's hospices provide mainly respite care for children with complex needs and their families. To be worthwhile, such care needs to be convenient and flexible to the needs of the family, so a number of different models, including respite at home or in hospices or hospitals, are available in different localities. Where there is a hospice, I know these services are highly valued by users and by the local health economy

Health authorities must use their recurrent funding to meet the assessed health needs of their resident population, including the need for palliative or respite care for children or adults. Precise levels of funding are a matter for local discussion and agreement, based on local health needs assessment as set out in Health Improvement Programmes.

Hospital Waiting Lists (Southend)

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in reducing hospital waiting lists in Southend-on-Sea. [122891]

Mr. Denham: Since the fourth quarter of 1996–97, Southend Hospital NHS Trust has reduced the total number of patients on their in-patient waiting lists by 959. Out-patient long waiters are currently falling, and Southend Hospital NHS Trust has achieved its locally agreed target for reduction in the number of long waiting out-patient for 1999–00.

NHS Funding (Colchester)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ensure that NHS services in Colchester receive at least the national average per capita funding. [122895]

Mr. Denham: We allocate funding to health authorities on the basis of the relative needs of their populations. A weighted capitation formula is used to determine each health authority's target fair share of available resources, to enable them to commission similar levels of health services for populations in similar need.

For 2000–01, North Essex Health Authority's allocation per weighted head of the population is £687, compared to the average for England of £688.

Health authorities allocate resources direct to their primary care groups in accordance with national guidelines. The formula used to set targets for primary care groups is essentially that used for health authorities. Health authorities determine the pace of change at which individual primary care groups within their area move towards their fair share targets.

North Essex Health Authority is currently calculating Colchester Primary Care Group's budget for 2000–01.

Osteopaths

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many trained osteopaths have been compelled to cease practising since the introduction of the provisions of the Osteopaths Act 1993; what assessment he has made of the operation of the personal and professional profile process; and if he will make a statement. [121111]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 8 May 2000]: Under the provisions of the Osteopaths Act 1993, the General Osteopathic Council is responsible for the development, promotion and regulation of the profession of osteopathy. During the transitional period of registration, which ended on 8 May 2000, the Council decided to require all applicants to complete an extensive 'professional profile and portfolio' as evidence that they meet its criteria for the safe, lawful and competent practice of osteopathy. In some cases the registrar may also request an interview or a test of clinical competence before making a decision.

We were not involved in the development of the 'professional profile and portfolio', but it appears to be based firmly on the principles of determining competence and could form a basis for professional lifelong learning. It is an innovative and comprehensive approach which should go a long way towards giving the public the assurance they deserve that all registered osteopaths are able to practice osteopathy safely and competently.

It is an inevitable consequence of an effective professional self-regulatory scheme that, either at its inception or subsequently, some practitioners will not meet the standard required for safe and competent practice and will either have to take remedial training or find alternative employment. From information provided by the General Osteopathic Council, of the 1,911 practitioners whose applications for registration have been decided so far only 80 have been refused.

NHS (Financial Assistance)

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people his Department estimates are eligible to claim financial help with (a) NHS prescriptions, (b) NHS dental treatment, (c) NHS wigs and fabric supports and (d) travel to hospital for NHS treatment. [122780]

Mr. Denham: In England, it is estimated that the following are eligible to claim financial help when they incur costs for:

(a) National Health Service prescriptions

10 million children under 16

1 million young people aged 16–18 who are in full time education

10 million people aged 60 or more

5 million people under 60 on low income grounds

up to 0.3 million war pensioners where treatment is for their pensionable disability

0.8 million people holding an exemption certificate because they are suffering from specified medical conditions

0.7 million women holding an exemption certificate because they are pregnant or who have had a child in the past 12 months;

(b) NHS dental treatment

10 million children under 16

1.2 million young people aged 16 and 17 plus 0.2 million aged 18 who are in full time education

6.5 million people on low income grounds

0.9 million women who are pregnant or who have had a child in the past 12 months up to 0.3 million war pensioners where treatment is for their pensionable disability

(c) NHS wigs and fabric supports

10 million children under 16

1 million young people aged 16–18 who are in full time education

6.5 million people on low income grounds

up to 0.3 million war pensioners where treatment is for their pensionable disability

(d) Travel to hospital for NHS treatment

6.5 million people on low income grounds. In addition to this figure, their children and dependent young people will also be entitled to help.

Up to 0.3 million war pensioners where treatment is for their pensionable disability

(e) There is no charge for prescribed contraceptives.

In addition, around 0.3 million people may be eligible for financial assistance on a sliding scale with the costs of (b), (c) and (d) because they are named on an NHS charges certificate for limited help.

The figures cannot be totalled as there will be overlap between the groups; for example, women who have had a child in the past 12 months might also be on a low income, many war pensioners will be entitled to free prescriptions on age grounds.

NHS Messaging

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what the average cost is of sending externally a 1Mb message from an NHS organisation; [124090]

(2) if his Department has estimated the cost of sending externally a 1Mb message from an NHS organisation using an alternate SMPT Internet Mail system. [124091]

Ms Stuart: From 1 April 1999 the full cost of messaging is now met directly by the National Health Service Information Authority and financed by money from health authority annual allocations. The current tariff and discount structure is negotiated centrally with the service providers and is based on overall volume of traffic, so that incremental costs per individual message are not calculated. The average cost per message at current use and discount rates is 1.2p.

Chief Executive (Eastbourne)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 16 December 1999, Official Report, column 309W, what was the work undertaken at Mid Kent Healthcare NHS Trust in Maidstone by the former Chief Executive of Eastbourne Hospitals NHS Trust; what was the total cost of this work; and which part of the NHS funded the work. [124370]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The former chief executive of Eastbourne Hospitals National Health Service Trust contributed towards the preparation of an outline business case for the proposed relocation of ophthalmology services at Maidstone and Tunbridge Wells National Health Service Trust.

The total cost of the work amounted to six months of the former chief executive's salary. Costs were met by the Eastbourne Hospitals National Health Service Trust.

Food Labelling

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his policy is on the use of the word pure in connection with food. [124491]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The Food Advisory Committee has issued guidelines on the use of the word "natural" and similar terms such as "real", "genuine" and "pure" in the labelling and advertising of foods. The Committee is currently considering the need for further action and is expected to make recommendations to the Food Standards Agency, which has responsibility for food labelling, later this year.

The Food Safety Act 1990 already makes it an offence to describe any food in a way that is false or likely to mislead as to its nature, substance or quality.

Abdominal Scans

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average waiting time for abdominal scans is (a) nationally, (b) in Sheffield, (c) in Doncaster, (d) in Barnsley and (e) in Rotherham. [124573]

Mr. Denham: Data on the length of the waiting list and how long people are waiting are not collected at the level of individual diagnostic procedures.

MRSA

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on measures taken to deal with MRSA. [122865]

Yvette Cooper: Control of infection in hospitals, including MRSA, is a subject that the Government take very seriously, and one on which we are determined action will be taken. Tackling it has been set as a "must-do" for the National Health Service. A timetabled programme of action is under way to strengthen infection control arrangements and deliver improvements.

Mobile Phones

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research he has (a) undertaken and (b) commissioned into the potential health effects of chemical leakage from mobile phone handsets. [122814]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

We have not undertaken or commissioned any research in this area. The most likely potential health effects from leakage would be from the battery. All batteries in mobile phones should comply with the appropriate CENELEC or IEC standards.

DEFENCE

Defence Intelligence and Security Centre Agency

Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Defence Intelligence and Security Centre Agency for the financial year 2000–01. [125247]

Mr. Spellar: The role of the Defence Intelligence and Security Centre is to train the Armed Forces and other Intelligence agencies in intelligence and security disciplines and conduct after capture; to maintain an operational capability; and to contribute to effective and timely advice to the Armed Forces on appropriate intelligence and security matters. The Key Targets for the Agency for the 12 months from April 2000 are:

Key Target 1:

To satisfy 100 per cent. of operational taskings required by the Department to the standard specified by the tasking authority.

Key Target 2:

To deliver at least 90 per cent. of a training programme endorsed by the Defence Intelligence Training Policy Group within agreed resources.

Key Target 3:

To meet a 100 per cent. standard of quality for all training courses where there is a validated statement of customer training requirement, and a Systems Approach to Training (SAT) mechanism for measuring quality.

Key Target 4:

To reduce the real terms cost of delivering the average training place made available by the DISC by 2 per cent. in Financial Year 2000–01.

Defence Procurement Agency

Mr. Anthony D. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Defence Procurement Agency for the financial year 2000–01. [125248]

Dr. Moonie: Five Key Targets have been set for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency for the Financial Year 2000–01. The first three Key Targets apply to projects covered by the Major Projects Report which have passed their Main Gate approval, and prior to their In-Service Date. The Key Targets are:

Key Target 1:

Predicted achievement of customers' core requirements for projects: 91 per cent.

Key Target 2:

Average cumulative slippage of In-Service Dates at 31 March 2001: not to exceed 20.9 months.

Key Target 3:

Average cumulative cost variation at 31 March 2001: not to exceed 4.9 per cent.

Key Target 4:

Customer Satisfaction Rating: 65 per cent.

Key Target 5:

While continuing to meet the demands of the procurement programme, reduce the operating costs of the DPA in relation to the 1997–98 costs of the Procurement Executive by: 19 per cent.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions in the past three months UK military or diplomatic personnel have been confronted in Sierra Leone by persons purporting to be United Nations personnel but who were not; if he will give details of such instances where United Nations insignia or colours were being worn; and if any such incidents involved the discharge of firearms. [124837]

Mr. Hoon: None.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions are given to United Kingdom service personnel when they are required to communicate or collaborate with soldiers of the Sierra Leone Army whom they suspect are below 18 years of age; if those instructions provide specifically for cases where the child soldier is armed; and if he will make a statement. [124832]

Mr. Hoon: It is the policy of the Government of Sierra Leone not to employ children under 18 in the Sierra Leone Armed Forces. Instructions were issued recently by President Kabbah that anyone under 18 currently serving in those forces should be disarmed and demobilised.

Should UK personnel come into contact with any suspected child combatant in the course of their duties, they are instructed to inform the most senior Sierra Leonean Army Commander on the scene and draw his attention to the Government of Sierra Leone's stated policy. This instruction applies whether the suspected child combatant is armed or not.

Precision Bombing

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what options are being considered by his Department to ensure aircraft are able to bomb with precision in all weather conditions; when a decision will be announced on the preferred option; and if he will make a statement. [124222]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 5 June 2000]: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the right hon. and learned Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Menzies Campbell, dated 7 June 2000:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about what options are being considered by his Department to ensure aircraft are able to bomb with precision in all weather conditions and when a decision will be announced on a preferred option. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

The Ministry of Defence is considering procuring Precision Guided Munitions to improve the accuracy with which the RAF can deliver free fall bombs in all weather conditions. A Request For Information was sent to industry and seven responses were received.

These propose a variety of technological solutions including the use of Inertial Navigation Systems augmented by information from Global Positioning System equipment.

An Integrated Project Team has formed within the Defence Procurement Agency to conduct technical and commercial assessments of the solutions available. A decision announcing the preferred option is expected in mid 2002.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Specialist Operations

Mrs. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the report by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary on specialist operations. [125250]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have today placed in the Library a note of the recommendations from the report, together with responses by the Commissioners and comments by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in his capacity as police authority for the Metropolitan Police Service. The Metropolitan Police have accepted all 12 recommendations in the report. From 3 July, it will be the responsibility of the new Metropolitan Police Authority to monitor progress on implementation of the recommendations.

Police Costs

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the average cost per police officer for each police force in England in the last financial year. [124400]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The average estimated net expenditure per police officer for 1999–2000 is set out in the table. The figures include pay and all other revenue expenditure.

Contracts

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 21 December 1999, Official Report, column 492W, concerning contracts, if he will list the companies concerned; and whether these contracts were subject to a competitive tendering process. [124814]

Mr. Straw: Further to the reply I gave the hon. Member on 21 December 1999, Official Report, column 492W, the named companies and tender processes undertaken are given in the table.

Year	Name of consultant(s)	Tender action
May 1997 to March 1998	NM Rothchild and Son Ltd.	Competitive
April 1998 to March 1999	PA Consulting	Competitive
April 1999 to date	Brian Farrington	Competitive
April 1999 to date	MMM Consultancy Group Ltd.	Competitive

Mike Tyson

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if Steve Fitch has applied to enter the UK with Mike Tyson; [124389]

(2) if he will list the names of the personnel seeking to enter the UK with Mike Tyson as part of his support team; [124388]

(3) what checks are being made on personnel seeking to enter the UK with Mike Tyson as part of his support team with regard to establishing previous convictions for serious offences. [124387]

Mr. Straw: We do not at present know who will be applying for entry to the United Kingdom as part of Mike Tyson's support team. But the question of whether entry may be granted to those accompanying him will be considered by the Immigration Officer on arrival in the normal way.

It would be open to Immigration Officers to question them about any relevant matters, including their criminal convictions. However, they are likely to do so only if there is reason to believe that any of them has a relevant conviction. This is to ensure consistency with existing practice. Proposals in our consultation paper would introduce the requirement for all non-European Union passengers to declare convictions resulting in imprisonment. It would be premature to implement those proposals while the consultation process is still ongoing.

In the case of Steve Fitch, we are aware that he has relevant convictions. In January, Mr. Fitch was granted entry for an extremely limited period, and he observed the conditions imposed on his stay. If he is part of Mr. Tyson's entourage on this occasion, his application for entry will be considered separately in accordance with the Rules.

Community Penalties

Mr. Lepper: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the final report on the Norfolk and Greater Manchester pilot schemes in community penalties for fine defaulters and persistent petty offending; and what proposals he has to extend these schemes to other parts of the country. [124683]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 provides courts with additional sentencing options for dealing with fine defaulters, persistent petty offenders and others. The provisions were piloted in Norfolk and Greater Manchester and the final report evaluating the trials was published as a Home Office Occasional Paper on 29 February this year. A decision will be taken in due course on whether to bring these measures into effect throughout England and Wales.

Football Hooliganism

Mrs. Fiona Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to restrict the rights of fans to travel abroad to football matches in cases where they have been identified as being involved in incidents of hooliganism but have not been successfully prosecuted. [123717]

Mr. Straw: Only convicted football hooligans who are subject to international banning orders can be prevented from leaving the United Kingdom. The Dutch and Belgian authorities have extensive powers to refuse entry to any individual or group who they consider may pose a risk to public order. This includes people subject to domestic bans. The National Criminal Intelligence Service has provided their Dutch and Belgian counterparts with details of the 506 people currently subject to football banning orders and another 500 or so names of suspected hooligans have also been passed on. Police will be monitoring all England supporters at every United Kingdom exit point throughout the period of the tournament and the information gathered will be shared with the Dutch, Belgian and French police teams and United Kingdom police operating in these countries.

I have placed in the Library a report prepared by the Euro 2000 Co-ordinating Group on measures which have been taken in preparation for the tournament.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Dioxin Emissions

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the five largest producers of dioxin emissions in the UK. [123484]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 23 May 2000]: Estimates of dioxin emissions from those industrial processes that are regulated by the Environment Agency are published in the Pollution Inventory on the Agency's website. The latest data published for 1998 list the top five as follows:

Company	Dioxins emission to air Grams of toxic equivalents (1-TEQ) (per year)
Corus (formerly British Steel), Llanwern Works	13
Corus (formerly British Steel), Port Talbot Works	10
Corus (formerly British Steel), Brigg Road	9
Calder Industrial Materials Ltd.	8
Allied Steel and Wire Ltd., Tremorfa Works	7

The Environment Agency are working with those industries to identify ways to reduce their emissions.

GM Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what non-departmental technical advice he has sought, and what action he will take in respect of the farm-scale evaluation of GM herbicide-tolerant crops pending his review of separation distances between the crops. [123757]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 25 May 2000]: When the separation distances relate to risks to human health or the environment, for example for small-scale experimental releases. I seek non-departmental technical advice from the independent Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment, chaired by Professor Alan Gray. These distances are kept continually under review.

When the separation distances are for agronomic or commercial reasons, for example to protect crop integrity, which is the case for the farm-scale evaluations, they are a matter for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who consult appropriate bodies representing, for example, organic farmers and honey producers.

I am seeking further meetings between the Soil Association and SCIMAC (the body representing agricultural industries involved in the farm-scale evaluations) to examine case-by-case criteria for minimum separation distances for the farm-scale evaluations.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what GM crop trials are being conducted within Shrewsbury and Atcham; and if he will make a statement. [124473]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 5 June 2000]: There are currently no GM crop trials authorised under Part B of Directive 90/220 within Shrewsbury and Atcham. There are trials taking place in Shropshire near Ash Parva, Beckbury, Eyton and Prees Heath. Further details of these trials are available on the Public Register held in the Department.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on what date his Department was informed (a) by telephone, (b) by e-mail and (c) in writing by Advanta Seeds UK that a batch of Hyola oilseed rape seed had been found to be contaminated with GM oilseed rape seed. [124322]

Mr. Meacher: Officials from my Department and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food were first informed of the contamination when they met with representatives from Advanta on 17 April. At that meeting, Advanta informed them that some Hyola oilseed rape in Germany had been found to be contaminated with GM oilseed rape. Since then officials were in regular contact with Advanta to establish the facts of the case and in particular to determine which GM variety was involved and the extent to which the contamination extended to seeds in the UK.

Roadside Memorials

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what procedures exist for the erection of roadside memorials to commemorate the lives of those killed in accidents; and if he will make a statement. [123874]

Mr. Hill: Although Britain has a good road safety record there are still far too many people killed and injured in road traffic accidents. It is for local highway authorities to ensure that any roadside memorials to commemorate the lives of those killed in accidents comply with the provisions of the various Highways Acts and Road Traffic Acts and do not themselves become a road safety hazard either through obstruction of the highway or a distraction to road users.

New Millennium Village

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to use solar voltaics and small-scale wind power as part of the sustainable energy strategy at the New Millennium Village in Greenwich. [124046]

Ms Beverley Hughes: In winning the competition to select a developer for the Millennium Village at Greenwich, the consortium now known as Greenwich Millennium Village Ltd. proposed to include energy from both wind and solar sources. It is for the developers to decide how to incorporate such features, but I am keen that opportunities in this area should be fully explored. Photovoltaic cells and solar panels are both being considered, and the position in respect of wind power is being reviewed.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what consultations were held with (a) urban sociologists and (b) anthropologists on assessing ways to optimise social cohesion in the New Millennium Village in Greenwich. [124047]

Ms Beverley Hughes: No consultations were held with professional anthropologists or urban sociologists. However, social cohesion is a key objective of the Millennium Village, and is being pursued through its design, through the provision of affordable housing, education and health facilities, along with other community facilities, and through physical and other linkages with existing communities.

Cap de la Hague (Radioactive Gases)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the concentrations of radioactive gases detectable above East Sussex which can be identified as having originated from Cap de la Hague. [124236]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Under Article 37 of the Euratom Treaty, the European Commission must be satisfied that no contamination of another member state will result before any routine releases of radioactivity can be authorised; this is the case in respect of Cap de la Hague.

Environmental monitoring programmes carried out in southern England have detected no elevated levels of radioactivity above normal background. Any evaluation in the levels of ambient gamma dose rate in the UK would be immediately detected by the RIMNET network of continuously operating monitors, several of which are located along the South Coast of England.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent discussions he has had with the French authorities in respect of emissions from Cap de la Hague. [124217]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 5 June 2000]: There have been no recent discussions between my Department and the French authorities in respect of emissions from Cap de la Hague.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent data he has obtained in respect of emissions from Cap de la Hague. [124218]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 5 June 2000]: No recent data on emissions from Cap de la Hague have been received.

Rail Safety

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the policy of each train operating company towards (a) automatic train protection and (b) train protection and warning system. [124204]

Mr. Hill: The Railway Safety Regulations 1999 require all passenger lines, and all trains operating on them, to be fitted with a form of train protection equivalent to the train protection and warning system by the end of 2003. Each Train Operating Company has supplied to the Health and Safety Executive an action program to comply with these regulations. Where reasonably practicable, the Regulations require more advanced automatic train protection to be fitted, similar to that in service on Great Western, Chiltern, and Heathrow Express Trains.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent discussions he has had with (a) Railtrack and (b) all train operating companies on reducing the number of signals passed at danger. [124203]

Mr. Hill: During their normal enforcement duties, the Health and Safety Executive's Railway Inspectorate have regular and frequent meetings and discussions with both Railtrack and Train Operating Companies on reducing the number of signals passed at danger (SPADs). All SPADs, are required to be reported to the Railway Inspectorate, who investigate the more serious ones. A summary of these activities is given in the Health and Safety Executive's monthly report on SPADs, a copy of which is placed in the House Library.

The Deputy Prime Minister highlighted the issue of SPADs at his recent rail summit with the industry.

Departmental Properties

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 24 May 2000, Official Report, column 537W, what proposals he has for the disposal of Landau Cottage, Upton Lovell, Warminster; how the disposal will be effected; and for what reasons. [124634]

Mr. Hill: I have asked the Acting Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Peter Nutt, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Kerman to Mr. David Faber, dated 7 June 2000:

The Transport Minister, Keith Hill, has asked the Acting Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Peter Nutt, to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the Agency's proposals for the disposal of Landau Cottage, Upton Lovell, Warminster. I am replying in the absence of Peter Nutt.

The Highways Agency has no current proposals for the disposal of Landau Cottage.

The route of the withdrawn A36 Codford to Heytesbury scheme remains protected whilst the Government Office for the South West carries out a study of the A36/A46 route which, between the M4 and the M27 motorways, is currently part of our non-core network. Disposal is ruled out while protection remains in place.

Departmental Initiatives

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 20 April 2000, Official Report, column 612W, on departmental initiatives, if he will list the amounts originally budgeted for in (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000, stating for each year what funds budgeted for were not spent, and if they were carried forward. [124413]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The budgets and underspend of the regeneration initiatives for which my Department is responsible are listed in the tables.

Under an agreement with the European Commission, the Department carries forward underspend on the European Regional Development Fund programmes from year to year. Where the carry forward of unspent resources by the Department has been permitted under the Treasury's End Year Flexibility arrangements for the other regeneration programmes, it has been for the Secretary of State to determine to which departmental programmes such resources should be allocated, and to obtain Treasury agreement and parliamentary authority in Supplementary Estimates for increases on the Department's Votes. Entitlements to end year flexibility to be carried into 2000–01 have yet to be agreed.

Holistic regeneration programmes

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000
Single Regeneration Budget:
Budget	481.6	567.3	707.6
Underspend	22.8	6.4	15.3
New Deal for Communities:
Budget	0	12.5	100.0
Underspend	0	12.3	51.5

The budget for New Deal for the Communities was reprofiled to reflect the pattern of actual spend which has emerged from the implementation of this innovatory programme which places communities at the heart of regenerating their neighbourhoods.

The budget for the Coalfields Regeneration Trust is being reprofiled to reflect the launch date of September 1999.

Home Seller's Pack Trial

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many people have participated in the seller's pack trial in Bristol; and how many transactions have been completed to date. [124635]

Mr. Mullin: The table gives the current number and status of people participating in the Bristol Seller's Information Pack.

	Number
Number of sellers in scheme	180
Of which, offers accepted	54
Of which, contracts exchanged	34
Of which, reached completion[1]	12

[1] The number of completions is an estimate, as participating sellers are not required to use the solicitor who assembles their pack to go on and complete their transaction.

Rail Franchises

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects a decision to be announced in respect of the rail franchise for the south-east of England presently held by Connex. [124636]

Mr. Hill: Connex currently operate two franchises in the south of England—South Central (which serves Eastbourne) and South Eastern. The Franchising Director is currently evaluating two proposals—from Connex and GoVia—for a replacement South Central franchise. The preferred bidder will be announced when that evaluation process is complete. No date has been set for when that will be as this will depend on the progress of negotiations. The Franchising Director will take opportunities as they arise to replace the longer-term franchises, of which Connex South Eastern is one.

Secondments

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many employees of private companies are seconded to his Department; and what is (a) the length of their secondment and (b) the subject of their work. [124788]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Department currently has 11 secondees from private companies. They are all envisaged to last for a period of 12 months and the areas of work covered are as follows:

Construction Industry Sponsorship (7)
Export Promotion and Construction Materials
Housing Care and Support
Integrated Transport Task Force
Environmental Protection Strategy.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 9 February 2000, Official Report, columns 158–59W, concerning secondments, which of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124830]

Ms Beverley Hughes: From the organisations cited in the answer of 9 February 2000, Official Report, columns 158–59W, secondments of 12 months or less were agreed with the following companies:

Kvaerner Construction
OVE Arup
Crown House Engineering
Bovis Construction
Kvaerner Cementation Foundations
Geoffrey Reid Associates
Marks & Spencer
Bellway Urban Renewal
KPMG
OPM
Institute for Fiscal Studies
Buro-Happold
Christiani and Nielson.

Secondments and attachments are part of the Interchange Initiative which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Education, Health, Public and Private. Interchange is a key component of the reform agenda. The Modernising Government White Paper committed us to increasing interchange, in particular by bringing in more people on secondment and sending more of our people out.

Building Regulations

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reason the publication of proposed changes to Part L of the Building Regulations, relating to the conservation of fuel and power, has been delayed from Autumn 1999; when he intends to publish the proposed changes; and if he will make a statement. [124331]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 6 June 2000, Official Report, column 209W.

Bulk Hazardous Cargoes

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will introduce a mandatory operating scheme for vessels carrying bulk hazardous cargoes through the Pentlands Firth. [124685]

Mr. Hill: A mandatory reporting scheme is under consideration by the Maritime and Coastguard Agency.

Currently, a voluntary reporting scheme is being used by vessels, and MCA are also looking at methods to encourage vessels to further participate in this scheme.

Discussions at IMO are nearing a close concerning the carriage of transponders by vessels in the near future. This carriage requirement will automatically provide reporting and tracking information to the MC, which will be used in future operating schemes in the Pentland Firth.

Rough Sleepers

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what initiatives the Government are putting in place in Oxford to tackle rough sleeping. [124395]

Ms Armstrong: In 1999, £621,412 funding under the homelessness action programme was allocated to projects in Oxford for the three years from April 1999. This provided support for co-ordination, outreach and resettlement work and to staff working in hostels for rough sleepers.

In addition, the Department of Health provided £52,500 in 2000–01 under the homeless mentally ill initiative for working with rough sleepers with mental health problems.

We are currently working with all local authorities with a rough sleeping problem to revise their rough sleeping strategies. Following this review process additional homelessness action programme and drug and alcohol specific grant funding may be allocated to support the revised strategies.

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportion of rough sleepers in the UK are from ethnic minority groups. [124396]

Ms Armstrong: Surveys and research from a wide range of sources consistently find that less than 10 per cent. of rough sleepers in England are from ethnic minority groups, with 90 per cent. or more being White UK or Irish. Tackling rough sleeping and related research in Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales is the responsibility of the devolved Administrations.

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the number of rough sleepers in Oxford in 1999. [124397]

Ms Armstrong: A single night street count was carried out in accordance with DETR guidelines in Oxford on 20 October 1999 during which 16 people were found sleeping rough across the city.

Teesside Development Corporation

Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the report on inquiries into allegations against the former Teesside Development Corporation will be completed; and if he will make a statement. [125244]

Ms Armstrong: I have today placed in the Libraries of the House copies of the report prepared by officials of my Department.

They sought to establish whether there was any firm evidence which would support various allegations that had been made against the former Development Corporation. In the event, insufficient documentary evidence was found that would definitively prove or disprove the allegations.

However, some evidence emerged suggesting that a grant paid by the Corporation to a local company had been diverted. The police were informed and I understand that they are making further investigations.

Community Strategies

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will publish guidance dealing with the preparation of community strategies; and if he will make a statement. [125356]

Ms Armstrong: I am today publishing draft guidance to local authorities on the preparation of community strategies. This will be the subject of wide-ranging consultation over the course of the summer. We aim to issue final guidance to authorities in the autumn.

The draft guidance, "Preparing Community Strategies", recognises that the key to any effective community planning process lies in engaging local communities, listening to their concerns and addressing their needs and priorities.

Community strategies will represent a significant shift in the way local organisations work together and the way that they relate to local people. Strategies should bring together public, private and community sector organisations, and focus their activities on responding to local needs articulated by local people.

Councils must fully involve local residents, business people and voluntary groups in the preparation of strategies which:

Establish an agreed vision for the area—setting out the sort of communities that, in the longer term, people want to live in;

identify the priorities for action that will help realise that vision; and secure the commitment of the various partners to specific actions to help meet those priorities.

Community strategies must be holistic. They should look at all the needs of local communities—jobs and wealth creation, social conditions and the quality of the built and natural environment. They must plan for sustainable, inclusive communities which promote economic, social and environmental aims and contribute to a better quality of life for all.

I have placed copies of the draft guidance in the Libraries of both Houses.

HEALTH

HC1 Forms

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many HC1 forms are incorrectly filled in each year. [122781]

Ms Stuart: Where an HC1 claim form provides insufficient information for the calculation of entitlement to remission of National Health Service charges, the Prescription Pricing Authority seeks further information or clarification by telephone wherever possible. For 1999–2000, around 169,000[1] HC1 claim forms had to be returned because the matter could not be resolved in any other way.

[1] These are in respect of GB as figures are not collected separately for England.

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people apply each year for financial help with NHS health costs using an HC1 form. [122782]

Ms Stuart: In England for the year 1999–2000, the Prescription Pricing Authority received around 903,000 applications for help with NHS Health costs on an HC1 claim form. The number of people covered by the applications is not collected.

Photodynamic Therapy

Mr. Ivan Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those health authorities which have agreed to fund the cost of drugs for use within the photodynamic therapy trials currently being conducted in Liverpool. [123892]

Ms Stuart: None of the drugs on trial in Liverpool have yet been licensed in this country. In line with normal practice for any clinical trial, all supplies at this stage are funded by the drug companies concerned. It is unlikely that health authorities will yet have considered or discussed possible future funding arrangements.

Cancer Services (Dorset)

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the National Health Service's ability to ensure that cancer patients in Dorset will be seen by consultants within two weeks of referral. [124518]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Dorset patients with suspected breast cancef who have been referred as urgent by their general practitioner have all been seen within two weeks of referral. The South West Regional Office of the National Health Service Executive has assessed Dorset Health Authority's plans and is satisfied that they have the capacity to meet the two week target for urgent referrals in other cancers.

Non-English Speaking Patients

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his Department's estimate of the extra cost to the NHS of (a) interpretation services and (b) other costs resulting from providing services for patients who do not speak English in each of the last five years. [124398]

Mr. Denham: Information on the costs of interpretation services and other services for patients who do not speak English is not collected centrally.

NHS Executive

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his Department's estimate of the annual savings resulting from the location of NHS Executive staff in Quarry House, Leeds rather than in London. [124399]

Ms Stuart: The outturn review of the financial appraisal for the relocation of the National Health Service Executive carried out in July 1995 estimated net annual savings of £10.1 million from 2000–01 onwards (at 1993–94 prices).

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 8 February 2000, Official Report, column 119W, concerning secondments, which of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124828]

Ms Stuart: Secondees from Hempsons, Dickinson Dees, Addleshaw Booth and Company, Berwin Leighton, Herbert Smith and one from Private Finance Panel Executive were appointed for a period of 12 months or less.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 11 February 2000, Official Report, columns 313–16W, concerning secondments, which of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124821]

Dr. Howells: Giving the information in the same format as set out in my answer of 11 February, the details of those secondments that were for a period of less than 12 months are:

1 May 1997 to 30 April 1998

British Telecom plc
Littlejon Frazer
The Institute of Exports
Mobil
EPSRC
Reuters Ltd.
Westcountry Development Corp.
Hydro Technologies Ltd.
Delamore Associates Ltd.

1 May 1998 to 30 April 1999

Lloyds TSB Group plc
British Telecom plc

Contracts (Bribes)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Government intends to introduce (a) legislative and (b) other steps to meet the United Kingdom's treaty obligations in respect of prosecuting British businesses and individual business personnel who offer bribes and other unlawful inducements to obtain contracts abroad; and if he will make a statement. [124839]

Mr. Caborn: The Government are already able to comply with their relevant treaty obligations. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary plans however to set out the Government's proposals for the reform of the law of corruption shortly. The Government will look to introduce legislation as soon as a suitable opportunity arises.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations Her Majesty's Government have received from other Governments about United Kingdom action to combat the offering by British businesses and individual business personnel of bribes and other unlawful inducements in order to obtain contracts abroad; and if he will make a statement. [124838]

Mr. Caborn: The Government have received a number of representations about this issue. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary plans to set out the Government's position as part of its wider proposals for the reform of the law on corruption shortly.

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will be in a position to announce his decisions on those applications for gas-fired combined heat and power stations that are awaiting determination. [125246]

Mrs. Liddell: I have today announced the following decisions:

Tullis Russell Papermaking Ltd. and Scottish Power plc

Clearance has been given under section 14(1) of the Energy Act 1976 to Tullis Russell Papermaking Ltd. and Scottish Power plc to build a 49MW gas-fired combined heat and power station at the Tullis Russell works, Markinch, Fife.

Alcan Chemicals Europe and Scottish Power plc

Clearance has been given under section 14(1) of the Energy Act 1976 to Alcan Chemicals Europe and Scottish Power plc to build a 13MW gas-fired combined heat and power station at the Alcan works, Burntisland, Fife.

Tioxide Europe Ltd.

Clearance has been given under Section 14(1) of the Energy Act 1976 to Tioxide Europe Ltd. to build a 24MW gas-fired combined heat and power station at the Huntsman Tioxide works, Grimsby, North Lincolnshire.

The decisions to give clearance to these proposals on energy policy grounds are without prejudice to any decision that may be taken on whether or not planning permissions are granted.

These decisions have been taken in accordance with the policy set out in the White Paper entitled "Conclusions of the Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation and Government response to fourth and fifth Reports of the Trade and Industry Committee" (Cm 4071).

Copies of the Press Notice and clearances are being placed in the Library of the House.

Information and Communication Technologies

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his Department is doing to help the United Kingdom manufacturing sector, with particular reference to small and medium-sized enterprises, to maximise the potential benefits from the use of information and communication technologies. [125068]

Ms Hewitt: I have today announced the launch of the Information and Communication Technologies (ICT) Carrier Programme.

The ICT-Carrier Programme is valued at £12,000,000, including industrial contributions of £6 million.

The programme aims to improve the use of information and communication technologies (ICT) in engineering industries by adapting and transferring examples of good practice in the use of ICT from one sector to another. It forms part of the Department's drive to improve the competitiveness of manufacturing industry in a knowledge driven economy.

Internal Market Council (Brussels)

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the outcome of the Internal Market Council held in Brussels on 25 May; and if he will make a statement. [124666]

Mrs. Liddell: I represented the UK at the Internal Market Council in Brussels on 25 May.

The Council discussed the Commission's first review of the Internal Market Strategy and broadly endorsed its priority actions, although I emphasised that the UK could not endorse every action, such as some of those relating to tax. The Commission presented the latest version of the Single Market Scoreboard and France and Sweden outlined their priorities for the Single Market for their Presidencies in the context of the Joint Work Programme of the Three Presidencies. The Council approved the draft Conclusions on the review of the Simpler Legislation in the Internal Market (SLIM) initiative, which took full account of input from the UK. The Council also endorsed the report of discussions of the Commission's White Paper on Food Safety. The Commission's draft *e*Europe Action Plan, which is to be implemented by the end of 2002 and is intended to enhance European competitiveness by accelerating e-commerce, reducing internet access costs and promoting skills and training, was welcomed.

The Council reached political agreement on the Winding up of Insurance Undertakings Directive (with Greece, Ireland and Luxembourg abstaining) and the Clinical Trials Directive, which will harmonise the procedures and standards of clinical trials for medicine (with Austria abstaining). The Honey Directive (with UK and Belgium abstaining) and the Chocolate Directive (with Belgium voting against) were agreed as "A" points.

The Commission presented its proposals for amending the Directives on public procurement and reported progress on the Community Design and on its proposals for making permanent its temporary ban on the use of phthalates in toys and child care articles. The Commission announced that it had decided not to carry out further work on international exhaustion of trademarks, though a number of member states, including the UK, argued that the issue needed further consideration; the Council agreed to revert to the subject at a future session.

There was no agreement on the Copyright in the Information Society Directive, which updates the framework of EU copyright law to take account of digital technology and the internet. The Council attempted to resolve issues relating to exceptions to copyright and made good progress in identifying the likely framework for a deal. Discussions will continue at Coreper, with the Portuguese intending to achieve political agreement during their Presidency.

Over lunch, the Council discussed the follow-up to the Lisbon European Council.

Limited Liability Partnerships

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations he has had with the Insolvency Service about the potential for disqualified and failed directors creating limited liability partnerships for new operations. [124451]

Dr. Howells: The Insolvency Service have been closely involved at every stage in the development of limited liability partnerships. The Government's proposals include the application, by secondary legislation, of existing safeguards and sanctions relating to disqualified directors. This will ensure that those who have been disqualified on the basis of unfit conduct under any of the provisions of the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 will also be prohibited from being a member of, or being in any way, whether directly or indirectly, concerned with taking part in the formation or management of a limited liability partnership, unless they obtain leave of the court to so act.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations he has had with the (a) FSA, (b) Competition Commission and (c) Office of Fair Trading about their role in regulating limited liability partnerships. [124450]

Dr. Howells: There have been discussions at official level with other Departments and the FSA. To date we have not discussed the detail either with the Office of Fair Trading or the Competition Commission.

The Limited Liability Partnerships Bill creates a new legal entity, the limited liability partnership. Other Departments will consider the limited liability partnership in the context of their policy areas and decide what, if any, amendments to existing legislation are required. Clause 15 of the Bill contains regulation-making powers which may be used to apply to LLPs any law relating to companies, other corporations and partnerships. Clause 16 contains a power to make consequential amendments. Other Departments will give consideration to whether it is appropriate to make amendments to their primary legislation under these powers or under any other legislation which the relevant Department is itself bringing forward.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has for stopping (a) convicted fraudsters, (b) directors censured by his Department and (c) directors of failed companies setting themselves up as limited liability partnerships; what regulatory framework such partnerships will operate under; and what sanctions can be operated against such partnerships. [124368]

Dr. Howells: We will be applying to limited liability partnerships, under powers contained in clauses 14 and 15 of the LLP Bill, large portions of the Companies Act 1985 and the Insolvency Act 1986, with appropriate modifications. This will provide the general regulatory framework.

In addition, the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986, which provides for the disqualification of a person from being a director of a company in certain circumstances, will also be applied to the members of an LLP.

The Company Directors Disqualification Act gives the court a power to disqualify persons on a variety of grounds, including on conviction of an indictable offence, persistent breaches of companies legislation, fraud in a winding up and participation in wrongful trading. In addition, the court will be under a duty to disqualify a person where it is satisfied that his conduct as a member of an insolvent LLP renders him unfit to so act. Simply being a director of a failed company (or, in future a member of a failed LLP) will not, though, necessarily result in disqualification—the intention is to punish abuse of limited liability, not the mere fact of failure.

The application of the Company Directors Disqualification Act to LLPs will ensure that any director who is disqualified under the provisions of the CDDA would not be eligible to be a member of an LLP or take part in the promotion, formation or management of an LLP. In a similar way a member of an LLP may be disqualified from acting as a director of a company.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations he has had with (a) the Consumers Association and (b) trading standards authorities about the possibilities of fraud arising from (i) fraudsters and (ii) disqualified and failed directors setting up limited liability partnerships. [124449]

Dr. Howells: No such consultations have taken place. Secondary legislation will apply to LLPs appropriately modified parts of the Insolvency Act 1986 and the Companies Act 1985. This will include the wrongful and fraudulent trading provisions, and powers of investigation. The Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 will also apply, such that disqualified directors will not be eligible to be members of an LLP and vice versa. In these cases the regulation of an LLP will be the same as that of a company.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has for ensuring that limited liability partnerships set money aside for legal claims against the partnership. [124366]

Dr. Howells: After considerable consultation, and taking account of the views of the Trade and Industry Committee, the Government concluded that LLPs would not be required to maintain any kind of fund or insurance to protect against claims. The main reasons for reaching this conclusion were:

the lack of justification for requiring a higher level of funding than is required of private companies;

the difficulty of setting an appropriate level which is high enough to safeguard the interests of third parties, but does not discourage firms from either setting up in business or trading through difficulties;

the general availability of LLPs makes it difficult to design a regime which could adequately distinguish between the many types of business which might become LLPs and the different liabilities they might face; it is more appropriate to regulate an activity, rather than an entity, so as to tailor the regulation effectively. For example, where professions require professional indemnity insurance, the level of insurance required will vary depending on the profession. A general requirement made of LLPs would conflict with any existing requirements.

More detail on this matter is set out in the Government Observations on the Fourth Report from the Trade and Industry Committee (Session 1998–99) on the draft Limited Liability Partnership Bill (HC 529).

Premium Rate Telephone Services

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to review the regulatory framework governing the promotion by businesses of premium rate telephone services so as to improve consumer protection. [124677]

Ms Hewitt: The Independent Committee for the Supervision of Standards of Telephone Information Services (ICSTIS) has responsibility for regulating premium rate services. ICSTIS enforces an effective Code of Practice which has provisions to ensure that consumers are given adequate information to enable them to take informed decisions about the use of premium rate services. ICSTIS and Oftel are reviewing the regulatory framework for Premium Rate Services to ensure that consumers continue to benefit from the right level of protection.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Fair Funding

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the net effect on school budgets of the new Fair Funding arrangements for schools during the financial year 1999–2000 for (a) England and (b) each local education authority; and if he will make a statement. [124689]

Ms Estelle Morris: In 1999–2000, 82.4 per cent. of the Local Schools Budget was delegated to schools, compared with 79.2 per cent. of a broadly comparable figure in the previous year. This increase of 3.2 per cent. in the delegation rate represents an extra £634 million delegated to schools. Fair Funding will result in a further increase in delegation in 2000–01, since it is being implemented in two stages. Comparisons between individual local education authorities for change from 1999–2000 to 2000–01 will appear in expenditure tables to be available shortly.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what contribution the Government are making to the United Nations Conference, Women 2000: Gender, Equality, Development and Peace for the Twenty-first Century. [125249]

Ms Jowell: We published yesterday and have placed in the Library two documents: "Equality in practice" and "Women and Men in the UK: facts and figures 2000".

"Equality in practice" is a short, practical and lively document which shows how the UK Government are improving women's lives at home and overseas by focusing on five vital areas: women and the economy, making equality happen, education, health and the resolving of crime and violence. It also describes some of the work being carried out with partner countries and organisations in Asia, Africa, Latin America and the Caribbean and Eastern Europe.

"Women and Men in the UK: facts and figures 2000" tells the story of women and men's changing position in society. It highlights both change and continuity with facts and figures. It is a celebration of women's achievements and a reminder of what more still needs to be done. The UK Government are working to create a more just society, one in which women and men are equal. To achieve this, we have to understand what has and has not changed. These facts and figures are vital to inform our thinking and policy making.

Class Sizes

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) schools have expanded their published roll, (b) extra teachers have been recruited and (c) additional classrooms have been built, as a result of implementing the class size initiative. [124076]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 5 June 2000]: We are making available £620 million to local education authorities to deliver our pledge to reduce infant class sizes to 30 pupils or fewer. This will allow authorities to provide some 6,000 extra teachers and to build over 2,000 additional infant classrooms. We do not keep information on the number of schools which have adjusted their standard numbers in order to meet the infant class size limit. However, we estimate that around 12,000 additional places are being provided in popular schools as a result of our initiative to eliminate large infant classes.

Primary Schools (Access)

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what definition he uses of a reasonable distance when determining access to a primary school. [124668]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 5 June 2000]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State does not determine access to primary schools for school admissions. School admission authorities may, however, use distance when determining how to allocate places if the school is oversubscribed. If a pupil is attending his or her nearest suitable school, and that school is beyond statutory walking distance, the local education authority must provide free transport. Statutory walking distances are two miles for pupils aged up to seven and three miles for those aged eight and over.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

National Lottery

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport for each year since the National Lottery began, how many Lottery funding applications from organisations in (a) Dumfries and

Galloway, (b) Galloway and Upper Nithsdale parliamentary constituency were (i) successful and (ii) unsuccessful, broken down by National Lottery good cause category. [124723]

Kate Hoey: We have contacted the Scottish Arts Council, the National Lottery Charities Board, the New Opportunities Fund, Sport Scotland, the United Kingdom Sports Council, the Heritage Lottery Fund and the Millennium Commission to request the information required, and I will write to the hon. Member as soon as it is available, placing copies of my letter in the Libraries of the House.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the projects funded by capital expenditure from his Department in each of the last six years, indicating the nature of the project, its start date and its value. [124706]

Mr. Chris Smith: My Department has funded the following capital projec

Project	Year of start	Year of completion	Total cost (£ million)
British Library: St. Pancras	1978–79	1999–2000	512.8
Windsor Castle: Fire restoration	1992–93	1999–2000	10.65

In addition, my Department has spent the following administration capital expenditure mainly on office refurbishment, IT equipment and office furniture:

Year	£ million
1994–95[1]	2.131
1995–96[1]	1.197
1996–97[1]	1.110
1997–98[1]	0.643
1998–99[1]	0.701
1999–2000[2]	1.128

[1] Outturn

[2] Provision

The above expenditure is for my Department only; capital expenditure by my Department's NDPBs is not recorded centrally and has therefore been excluded.

Forms

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123952]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Department for Culture, Media and Sport has not required charities or other voluntary organisations to complete any such forms since May 1997. Various returns are, however, required of non-departmental public bodies funded by the Department, and of these 22 have charitable status, most of which are national museums and galleries.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Conservation Projects (Africa)

8. Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the impact of her Department's aid programme on conservation projects in Africa. [123177]

Clare Short: We have recently completed a major evaluation of our environmental work in Africa and elsewhere. This concluded that we have been focusing too much on screening development projects to prevent environmental damage. Our future efforts will be focused on promoting better livelihoods for people and sustainable development of their economies.

Romania

9. Ms Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had on the condition of Romanian orphans. [123178]

Mr. Foulkes: My Department and our Embassy in Bucharest are in close touch with the Romanian authorities and other key players to support ongoing efforts to improve care for Romanian orphans. Progress has been disappointingly slow. Romania is only now starting to take the problem seriously. I will be visiting Romania on 19–20 June and will press for faster progress.

Ethiopia and Eritrea

10. Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the current humanitarian situation in Ethiopia and Eritrea. [123180]

Clare Short: The situation in Ethiopia and Eritrea is a tragedy. Two of the poorest countries in the world have spent considerable resources in prosecuting a border war over the past two years where it is estimated that over 100,000 people have died. The Government of Ethiopia estimate eight million people will need humanitarian assistance this year. The UN are currently assessing the numbers of people in Eritrea displaced by the war. The international community will provide humanitarian relief for those affected by drought and displaced by war. But what the people of both countries need is peace and development.

Customs Officers (Caribbean)

11. Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what the changes will be in the next two financial years in her Department's funding of training for customs officers in (a) St. Lucia and (b) other parts of the Caribbean. [123181]

Clare Short: We are currently funding Customs Reform and Modernisation projects in St. Lucia and Grenada at a cost of £1.1 million. The projects aim to enhance the organisational, operational and management capacity of the Customs Departments in those islands and are scheduled for completion in December. We also provide support for the Caribbean Customs Enforcement Council in this provision of training for Customs Officers.

Sub-Saharan Africa

12. Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what resources she is devoting in her aid programmes to support for school infrastructure and equipment in sub-Saharan Africa. [123182]

Clare Short: We are committed to the International Development Target of achieving universal primary education by 2015. This is the priority for our education assistance to Sub-Saharan Africa, where over the last two years we have committed over £150 million to support the development of universal primary education programmes, which include support for primary school infrastructure and equipment. Our aim is to help African countries build and sustain effective and equitable education systems which give priority to primary education for all. This requires a shift from the traditional projects-based approach to a sector-wide approach to basic and primary education, with development agencies working together around a focused, agreed strategy drawn up by the Government of the country concerned. Uganda is a good example. In collaboration with five other donors and the Government of Uganda, we have played a key role in the establishment of a sector-wide approach to education, resulting in 1998 in our largest ever commitment to a programme in Africa (£67 million) towards the Education Sector Support Programme. This will provide flexible budget support to the Government for five years.

Southern Africa

13. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent assessment she has made of the extent of hunger in southern Africa. [123183]

Clare Short: There have been good rains across southern Africa this year and prospects for the grain harvest are good. Given recent floods, there are likely to be pockets of food insecurity in some countries. Food security is being monitored carefully within the Southern Africa Development Community region and our representatives participate in donor/Government consultation groups and receive regular reports from national and regional production forecasting organisations.

EU Aid Programmes

14. Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what reforms she will propose to the European Union to increase the effectiveness of its whole aid programme. [123184]

Clare Short: We have published an 18-point strategy to improve the poverty focus and effectiveness of EC development assistance. The new European Commission has taken several positive steps, including the reduction of the number of Commissioners responsible for European Community development programmes from five to two, the establishment of poverty reduction as the overarching objective of the successor to the Lomé Convention and the restructuring of the European Development Fund, including the recent publication of a draft development policy statement and of proposals to reform the administration of EC external programmes. However, most of the proposed changes have not yet been implemented. We are pressing the Commission to draw up clear action plans to put the proposals that have been made into practice. We will continue to work closely with the Commission and other member states to improve the poverty focus, effectiveness and efficiency of EC programmes.

27. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she last met her EU counterparts to discuss EU aid programmes; and what subjects were discussed. [123197]

Clare Short: I last met my EU counterparts to discuss EC aid programmes at the Development Council on 18 May. The following subjects were discussed:

- Sierra Leone, Côte d'Ivoire and Guinea Bissau
- EC development co-operation policy
- Action Plan to implement the May 1999 conclusions on the evaluation of EC development assistance
- Reform of the management of Community aid
- Operational co-ordination between the Community and member states
- Structural adjustment
- Integrating the environment and sustainable development into EC development policy
- HIV/AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis
- Zimbabwe
- Great Lakes (Rwanda/Burundi)
- Ethiopia/Eritrea
- AIDS
- Evaluation of humanitarian aid
- Crisis and conflict situations in developing countries (emergency, rehabilitation, development and unstable situations)
- New procedures for legislative acts in the field of development
- Preparation for the third UN conference on Least Developed Countries
- Development aspects of the 6th Conference of the Parties of the UN Convention on Climate Change
- Support to development education.

A copy of the report on the outcome of the Development Council is in the Library of the House.

Climate-related Disasters

15. Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of Christian Aid's recent reports on the impact of climate-related disasters on developing countries. [123185]

Clare Short: I share many of the concerns for developing countries expressed in Christian Aid's recent reports. The impact of climate change is likely to constitute one of the biggest global environmental problems for the 21st century. It is likely to affect developing countries and particularly poor people disproportionately, since they are both more vulnerable to disaster and less able to cope in its event.

Our objectives in assisting countries to deal with disasters are to save lives through emergency relief, to protect and rebuild livelihoods and communities, and to reduce vulnerability to future disasters. We are working to improve understanding of the possible impacts of climate change on developing countries in order to help them take account of these in their development planning and so reduce their future vulnerability. We also work with developing countries to help improve their energy efficiency and reduce their own greenhouse gas emissions.

Women (Developing World)

16. Mr. Geraint Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action her Department has taken to improve the education and productivity of women to reduce poverty in the developing world. [123186]

Clare Short: Educating girls and the economic empowerment of women are top priorities in our international development programme. The evidence shows that educating girls is the single most effective way of promoting development. We are committed to helping achieve the international development target of closing gender gaps in primary and secondary education by 2005. Our bilateral and multilateral programmes are placing increasing emphasis on this work.

The pursuit of gender equality in all areas of development lies at the heart of our programme. A good deal of effort is being directed towards improving women's livelihood security, productivity, and economic independence.

Mozambique

17. Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the effectiveness of development moneys provided to Mozambique to remedy flood damage. [123187]

Clare Short: We have a permanent office in Mozambique, which was strengthened following the floods to allow constant monitoring and ensure effective use of funds. All reports to date indicate that the UK-funded relief and rehabilitation activities are being well managed.

In May, the Government of Mozambique held a conference to present to the international community reconstruction needs following the floods. Donors responded by pledging over USD453 million to support these efforts. We have provided support to the United Nations Development Programme for a project to assist the Mozambican authorities with the effective prioritisation and channelling of donor reconstruction contributions. We will continue to monitor progress over the coming months.

Sierra Leone

18. Mr. Salter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the humanitarian situation in Sierra Leone. [123188]

Clare Short: Humanitarian specialists from my Department have just returned from a week-long assessment mission in Sierra Leone. Chronic humanitarian problems are being exacerbated by the conflict, which is also restricting access to those in need. We are currently looking at the most effective way to provide further humanitarian assistance.

28. Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on British aid to Sierra Leone. [123198]

Clare Short: We have been strongly engaged in supporting the development of Sierra Leone since the return to democratic Government there in March 1998. In the period since then we have allocated almost £70 million to programmes and projects which are designed to help restore peace, stability and promote good governance on a sustainable basis. Some projects will need to be revised in the light of recent events. Others, including humanitarian assistance, will continue as soon as access is possible to those areas where they are to be implemented.

Debt Relief

19. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations she has received from voluntary organisations and charities regarding the debt reduction initiative in advance of the G8 summit at Okinawa. [123189]

Clare Short: I continue to receive many letters from Church and other voluntary organisations on debt relief, many referring to the G8 Summit in Okinawa in July. When the Prime Minister met the Japanese Prime Minister last month, they agreed the importance of discussing debt issues in Okinawa.

The Government are committed to keeping up the momentum on the implementation of the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative in the run up to the Summit, and beyond.

22. Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement about debt relief in southern Africa. [123192]

Clare Short: Mozambique, Malawi and Zambia are all Heavily Indebted Poor Countries, and in need of the exceptional debt relief provided under the HIPC Initiative. Mozambique received debt relief totalling $1.72 billion in June 1999, and will receive a further $250 million under the enhanced HIPC Initiative. Following the flooding there multilateral and bilateral creditors took special action to free up resources for reconstruction. The World bank and the IMF agreed to provide 100 per cent. relief on debt service payments in the first year, and the Paris Club has suspended all payments until Mozambique reaches its Completion Point under the revised HIPC framework, which is expected to be early next year.

Malawi and Zambia are both working towards qualifying for debt relief under the enhanced HIPC Initiative. To do so they need to maintain progress on economic reform and to develop national poverty reduction strategies.

23. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she expects the targets on debt relief for HIPC countries to be reached. [123193]

Clare Short: So far, only five countries have qualified for debt relief under the enhanced Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative. This is disappointing. But at the recent Spring Meetings of the IMF and World bank, it was agreed to establish a joint World bank/IMF committee to oversee the implementation process, as the Chancellor and I had suggested. The committee has now begun its work, and should provide a focus for efforts towards meeting the commitment that three quarters of eligible countries will start to receive debt relief before the end of 2000.

Globalisation

20. Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she expects to publish the White Paper on globalisation. [123190]

Clare Short: The Government intend to publish their White Paper on Globalisation and Development in the autumn.

Plan Colombia

21. Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's response to the Plan Colombia proposals made by the Colombian Government. [123191]

Clare Short: Plan Colombia is a first step in efforts to bring peace to Colombia. Much remains to be done. The UK is discussing with its EU colleagues how best to respond to the Plan.

On-line Communications

24. Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to promote the development of on-line communications in the developing world. [123194]

Clare Short: Over the next decade these new technologies have the potential significantly to improve poor people's access to information, markets and other services, but also the very real potential to increase the gap yet further between the rich and the poor. We intend to play a significant role in helping to bridge this emerging digital divide. Our new Development White Paper will specifically address the issue of information and communication as one of the key factors in globalisation. The White Paper will outline what role the UK can play, both directly and indirectly, to promote widespread access to information and communication in developing countries.

Zimbabwe

25. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on aid programmes for Zimbabwe. [123195]

Clare Short: Our country strategy paper for Zimbabwe was published in April 1999. It outlines the case for economic reform and land redistribution in order to improve the life opportunities of poor Zimbabweans. It makes clear our willingness to provide resources up to £36 million for this purpose. Unfortunately there has been no such reform and the economic and political situation is very worrying. Our programme is therefore focused on HIV/AIDS, water and rural livelihoods. Our spending is £12 million.

Biotechnology

26. Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions (a) she and (b) her officials have held with the Governments of countries in receipt of aid on the use of biotechnology. [123196]

Clare Short: My officials and I hold many discussions with partner Governments on issues in which the use of biotechnology may be raised.

The kinds of biotechnology most likely to benefit the world's poorest are processes which improve crop yields, vaccine production, water treatment and contraceptive technologies, antibiotics and diagnostic techniques.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development, pursuant to her answer of 23 May 2000, Official Report, columns 408–09W, if the Comparative Study of air and sea access to and from St. Helena will consider emergency medical evacuations. [124801]

Clare Short: The Comparative Study will consider health issues including emergency medical evacuations from the island.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much of the aid to St. Helena in (a) cash and (b) constant terms was spent on the island itself in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available. [124811]

Clare Short: The figures for aid to St. Helena for the period 1988–89 to 1998–99 in current and constant (1998–99) prices are:

£000

	Current prices	Constant prices
1988–89	18,652	27,760
1989–90	24,170	33,570
1990–97	11,636	14,988
1991–95	7,910	9,594
1992–93	8,658	10,165
1993–94	8,603	9,838
1994–95	7,786	8,778
1995–96	8,695	9,528
1996–97	7,781	8,261
1997–98	8,385	8,661
1998–99	8,587	8,587

The figures for the period 1988–89 to 1990–91 include construction costs for the RMS St. Helena. Disaggregated figures for offshore and local expenditure are not readily available.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will give details of the visits made to each Overseas Territory by Ministers in her Department since 1 May 1997. [124831]

Mr. Foulkes: I have visited Montserrat on two occasions. The first was from 31 August until 2 September 1997, and the second from 12 January to 13 January 1999. Neither the Secretary of State nor I have made other visits to Overseas Territories during this time.

Aid Programmes (Religious Affiliation)

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what account she takes of religious affiliation in the planning of aid programmes. [124565]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development does not take account of religious affiliation in planning development programmes. All our work places a strong emphasis on human rights. Freedom of worship is a fundamental freedom. Persecution of people for their religious belief is a breach of international human rights conventions.

Where we support civil society organisations which have an evangelising role, we make it clear that our support is for programmes and activities which contribute to the elimination of poverty and which are delivered without religious or sectarian bias.

Opinion Research

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much her Department spent on opinion research in the financial year 1999–2000. [123923]

Clare Short: As announced in our "Building Support for Development" strategy paper, we are committed to regular monitoring of public and young people's attitudes to development in order to inform and monitor the impact of the public education work of the Department. Studies were undertaken in July 1999 on general public attitudes and in March 2000 on young people's attitudes. The results are available on DFID's website and copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. In 1999–2000 we spent £42,625 on this research. In addition, we spent £1,804 on a readership survey of "Developments" magazine, in order to test the impact and reach of the magazine. The results of this are available through the website.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Crop Contamination

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what reports he has sought from Canada as to how the contamination of oil seed rape with GM produce occurred. [123766]

Ms Quin [holding answer 5 June 2000]: One of my officials has visited the Canadian Authorities in Ottawa to seek information on possible sources of the contamination. Further investigations are being carried out by the Canadian Authorities.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with the Swedish Board of Agriculture concerning their action on contaminated oilseed rape seed; and what action he intends to take as a result. [124352]

Ms Quin [holding answer 5 June 2000]: MAFF has discussed the recent Advanta incident with the Swedish Board of Agriculture and took account of the position in Sweden and elsewhere in the EU in deciding on appropriate action in the UK.

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what reports he has received about conventional maize seed which was contaminated by GM maize being grown in this country. [124341]

Ms Quin [holding answer 5 June 2000]: We have received no such reports. Suggestions have been made in the press that some GM seeds of maize may be present in stocks of non-GM maize seeds. I announced on 17 May 2000, Official Report, column 173W, an urgent study of the risk of GM seeds in imported conventional seeds.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what implications planting of oil seed rape contaminated with GM produce has for (a) the separation policy for GM crop trials and other crops and (b) the regulations governing GM crops. [123762]

Ms Quin [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The Government have initiated a review of separation distances for GM crops and are pressing for new international seed purity standards relating to the presence of GM seeds in conventional seed stocks.

EU Regulations (Appeal Procedures)

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to introduce appeal procedures in cases where farmers incur penalties for what they conceive to be genuine errors in filling in paperwork to comply with EU regulations. [124676]

Ms Quin [holding answer 5 June 2000]: We are well aware of the industry's strength of feeling on this issue which was reflected in the recommendation of the IACS and Inspection Working Group that an appeal mechanism is set up and that industry be consulted on proposals. We expect shortly to be in a position to consult on possible options, in addition to the existing provisions, that might be of benefit to the industry. We are keen to ensure that any mechanism we decide to introduce is streamlined, efficient and not an additional burden in terms of cost and time to all parties that are involved in the process.

Forms

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123953]

Ms Quin: With one exception for the activity and expenditure of one organisation, the Department does not issue any forms which are required to be completed specifically by charities or other voluntary bodies. If organisations within these sectors wish to apply for schemes operated by the Department they would be subject to the same requirements as other applicants.

Animal By-products

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what procedures are in place to provide authority to a contractor to dispose of animal by-products under the Animal By-Products Order 1999. [124082]

Ms Quin: The Animal By-Products Order 1999 requires any person who has in his possession or under his control any animal by-product to dispose of it in accordance with that Order. Such disposal must usually be by rendering or incineration; no prior authority is required.

However, in certain circumstances, for example if there is a lack of capacity at rendering premises or incinerators, the appropriate Minister may serve a notice on the person in charge of animal by-products requiring those by-products to be disposed of by burning or burial.

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what monitoring his Department undertakes of the implementation of the Animal By-Products Order 1999 requiring disposal of animal by-products by incineration or rendering. [124102]

Ms Quin: Members of the State Veterinary Service visit premises registered or approved under the Animal By-Products Order 1999, regularly to monitor compliance with the provisions of the Order. It is a requirement of the Order that detailed records of despatch and receipt of animal by-products are kept.

Bovine TB

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what controls his Department has put in place in order to monitor any threat from the importation of cattle suspected of bovine TB. [123910]

Ms Quin: Under EU legislation, all cattle imported from another member state must come from a herd which is officially free of TB. They must be tested for TB within 30 days prior to import unless the member state is officially recognised as being free of TB. Once the cattle are imported, they are subject to random non-discriminatory inspections and to our TB monitoring programme, which is also governed by EU legislation. Cattle imported from countries outside the EU have to enter via an approved Border Inspection Post where they are subjected to clinical inspection immediately upon arrival. Such cattle must also have had a pre-export TB test and originate from a TB-free herd.

Flood Plains (Northamptonshire)

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the proposals for development on flood plains in Northamptonshire. [124140]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 5 June 2000]: I have been asked to reply.

Local planning authorities in Northamptonshire are conscious of the need to avoid increasing the risk of flooding and exercise a precautionary approach in considering planning applications for development that is either in the flood plain or likely to increase surface water run-off. They take into account advice from the Environment Agency in deciding whether or not planning permission should be granted. A Northampton Liaison Group including representatives from the Environment Agency, local authorities, developers and local groups meets regularly to consider development proposals.

The draft replacement Northamptonshire Structure Plan contains a policy which provides that development will not be permitted in areas at direct risk from flooding, or where flood risk would be increased, unless satisfactory mitigation measures are proposed. This issue was debated at the Examination in Public of the Plan in February and the Report of the Panel is awaited.

TREASURY

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 27 March 2000, Official Report, column 47W, concerning secondments, which of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124818]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Eleven.

Pension Funds

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what initiatives he has launched to attract new sources of finance, including pension funds, to the risk investment sector. [124758]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Risk capital is a vital source of finance for small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) with the potential for rapid growth. The Government have introduced a number of measures to encourage individuals, institutional funds and companies to invest more in this sector.

For individuals, this year's Finance Bill introduces significant reductions in capital gains tax (CGT) for investment in unquoted companies. All such holdings, with no minimum threshold, now qualify as "business assets", and higher rate taxpayers who now invest in such shares for at least four years will pay an effective rate of only 10 per cent. on the capital gains realised.

The Finance Bill also makes several improvements to the operation of the Enterprise Investment Scheme (EIS), which provides tax incentives for individuals to invest in smaller higher risk trading companies. Income tax reliefs will now be available on shares held for at least three years (rather than the previous five year limit), and SMEs will be able more easily to seek capital from both EIS investors and venture capital funds. Parallel changes to the tax reliefs for individuals investing in risk capital via Venture Capital Trusts are also being introduced.

With the aim of reducing the regulatory cost to SMEs in raising risk capital from individuals, the Government have consulted, and are considering responses, on whether to create specific exemptions from the prohibition on financial promotion for defined classes of "high net worth individuals" and "sophisticated investors". This would enable smaller companies and others to communicate more easily with potential investors who are able and willing to invest without the standard protection offered by financial services legislation.

For institutional funds, the Government are creating a series of public-private partnerships to stimulate the supply of small scale and early stage venture capital across the UK's regions. The Department of Trade and Industry's Small Business Service (SBS) is in the process of establishing a UK High Technology Fund with a target size of £120 million, using a £20 million Government investment to lever in further capital from UK pension funds and other institutional investors. The SBS is also supporting the creation of a network of Regional Venture Capital Funds across the English regions. These will enable institutional funds and banks to invest, with SBS support, in venture funds which will specialise in financing the growth of smaller companies in particular regions.

The Chancellor announced in this Budget a further £100 million of Government funding for this activity over the next three years, with the aim of creating a £1 billion target umbrella fund by levering in significant additional amounts of private investment capital. The umbrella fund will encompass the public-private partnerships currently being established, along with further regional funds. SBS will work with the Regional Development Agencies and a new Small Business Investment Task Force to strengthen the risk capital market for SMEs through this programme.

In addition to creating specific incentives to encourage institutional funds to invest in certain types of risk capital, the Government are also concerned to understand whether there are factors encouraging institutional investors to follow industry-standard investment patterns which focus on quoted equities and gilts. The Chancellor has asked Paul Myners, Chairman of Gartmore investment managers, to conduct a review of institutional investment, to consider this and other issues, which will report back by Budget 2001.

To encourage UK companies to become more active risk capital investors in SMEs with growth potential, the Finance Bill introduces a new corporate venturing scheme. This will provide relief against corporation tax where a company takes a minority shareholding for a minimum period in a smaller higher risk trading company. It is likely to be particularly useful for high technology SMEs which can benefit from the investment and other non-financial support of larger companies operating in similar technology fields.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much is invested in venture capital in the UK as a percentage of all pension funds; and what are the comparable figures for the USA. [124757]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Definitions of venture capital vary between countries: the UK definition normally includes leveraged buyout funds, whereas the US definition does not. In both countries, figures are based on surveys of some, rather than all pension funds and are therefore not precise.

The British Venture Capital Association has calculated figures based on the 1999 Annual Survey of the National Association of Pension Funds. According to these calculations, approximately 0.6 per cent. of the assets of those pension funds who responded to the Survey were invested in a broad definition of venture capital. A survey of 189 pension funds in the US (Source: Report on Alternative Investing by Tax Exempt Organisations 1999, Goldman Sachs and Frank Russell Company) showed 116 of them investing in alternative assets. Those 116 funds invested 6 per cent. of their assets in venture capital and leveraged buyout funds.

Tax Allowances

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the benefits of introducing a system of tax allowances for entrepreneurial new companies. [124760]

Mr. Timms: The Government are introducing a wide range of initiatives that will benefit entrepreneurial new companies. Small companies will benefit from the new 10 per cent. starting rate for Corporation Tax. R&D tax credits will encourage innovation by small and medium-sized companies. They increase tax relief for R&D spending, and companies not in profit such as start-up ventures, can take the relief up front as a cash payment. The Corporate Venturing Scheme will encourage companies to invest in small, higher-risk trading companies. The investment will attract corporation tax relief at 20 per cent. Enterprise Management Incentives will make it easier for new companies to attract and retain the best people. Companies can reward key staff with share options free of income tax and national insurance charges. The development of each of these three schemes has involved detailed consultation with businesses and representative bodies. All three have been welcomed.

Capital Gains Tax

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of the increase in capital gains tax on share options in each year since 1996. [124759]

Dawn Primarolo: There is no Capital Gains Tax (CGT) on the exercise of share options. CGT may be payable when shares acquired on exercise of the options are sold if the gains exceed the annual exempt amount. The effective rate of CGT depends on the size of the gain, whether the shares were business or non-business assets, and how long the shares have been held. The effect of taper relief is to reduce the tax on gains the longer the shares are held. CGT taper relief normally runs from the date that the shares were acquired.

The November 1999 Pre-Budget Report announced the intention to make further improvements in CGT in order to promote productivity. Following consultation, the Budget announced proposals to improve the CGT treatment of shares owned by employees and officers in the trading companies in which they work. For periods from 6 April 2000 such shares will be treated as business assets, and will benefit from more generous taper rates. Business asset treatment applies whether the shares were acquired through share options or by other means.

The Government are introducing in the current Finance Bill two new employee share plans. Under the All Employee Share Plan, employees who keep their shares in the plan until they sell them will have no CGT to pay however great the increase in value of those shares. In addition, under the Enterprise Management Incentive (EMI) scheme, companies will be able to grant each of their key employees share options worth up to £100,000, normally without any Income Tax or National Insurance charge on exercise. When the shares are sold, CGT taper relief will normally start from the date the options were granted.

Tobin Tax Initiative

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with financial organisations on the (a) viability and (b) acceptability of the Tobin Tax initiative. [123179]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Chancellor meets regularly with members of the international financial community to discuss a range of measures designed to reduce currency market instability.

The Government believe the Tobin tax idea is, in principle, interesting, but has a number of practical drawbacks. In particular, it could introduce serious economic distortions to the international financial system, and is unlikely to have much effect in a crisis. It would be practically impossible to achieve global coverage, and there would be huge scope for avoidance.

Child Care

Ms Harman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what tax relief is available to companies which wish to help their employees with child care; and if he will make a statement. [124778]

Dawn Primarolo: Employers can get tax relief, under the normal business tax rules, for their day-to-day expenditure on child care provision for employees' children, whether given directly or indirectly. The relief is given by deducting such expenditure when working out their business profit for tax purposes.

They can also claim relief through the capital allowances system for certain capital expenditure on furnishing and equipping nurseries and playschemes (and for the buildings if the employer is carrying on a qualifying trade in the industrial sector).

Royal Taxation

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to paragraph 20 of the Memorandum of Understanding on Royal Taxation, if an inventory exists to distinguish assets held by the Queen (a) as Sovereign and (b) as a private individual. [124214]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: There is a computerised inventory of the Royal Collection which identifies assets held by the Queen as Sovereign and as a private individual.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reason inheritance tax is not payable on private possessions passed from one sovereign to the next. [124212]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The tax arrangements for the Queen and Prince of Wales are set out in the Memorandum of Understanding on Royal Taxation, attached to the Report of the Royal Trustees published on 11 February 1993 (HC 464).

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what variations have been notified under paragraphs 33 to 35 of the Memorandum of Understanding on Royal Taxation; [124216]

(2) on how many occasions a disagreement has occurred under the terms of paragraph 31 of the Memorandum of Understanding on Royal Taxation. [124215]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Amendments to the original Memorandum of Understanding were announced in October 1996 to reflect changes in the arrangements for paying tax under self-assessment.

A copy of the amended Memorandum was placed in the House of Commons Library.

The normal rules of taxpayer confidentiality apply to matters under paragraph 31 of the Memorandum of Understanding.

Royal Trustees

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the Royal Trustees and the dates on which they have met since 1 May 1997. [124421]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Under the Civil List Act 1952, the Royal Trustees are designated to be those holding the offices of First Commissioner of HM Treasury (the Prime Minister), the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Keeper of HM Privy Purse. Consequently the current Royal Trustees are:

The right hon. Tony Blair MP

The right hon. Gordon Brown MP

Sir Michael Peat KCVO.

No formal meeting of the Royal Trustees has occurred since 1 May 1997, but regular communications are maintained through their officials and through correspondence.

Royal Collection

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the tax position in respect of the Royal Collection. [124213]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The Royal Collection is administered under the terms of a charitable trust. The tax treatment is the same as for any other charitable trust.

Free Television Licenses

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the basis of his oral statement of 6 April 2000, Official Report, column 1137, that 11,000 pensioners in the Christchurch constituency will receive free colour television licences. [123919]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The basis of the Chancellor's oral statement to the House on 6 April was his Pre-Budget Report announcement in November 1999 that free TV licences will be available to all pensioners aged 75 and over from autumn 2000.

Aggregates Tax

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what analysis has been (a) carried out and (b) published by the Government on the price sensitivity of demand for primary aggregates and to quantify the impact of the proposed aggregates tax on demand for primary aggregates; [124440]

(2) what analysis has been (a) carried out and (b) published by the Government about price sensitivity of demand for recycled and secondary aggregates and to quantify the impact of the proposed aggregates tax on demand for recycled and secondary aggregates. [124441]

Mr. Timms: The estimated impact of the proposed aggregates levy on the demand for aggregates is given in the Aggregates Levy Regulatory Impact Assessment, published on 21 March 2000.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what assessment has been made by the Government about the impact of an aggregates tax on total vehicle mileage involved in the supply of aggregates from all sources of supply; [124432]

(2) what assessment has been made of the impact of an aggregates tax on the volume of aggregates transported by Rail Freight. [124433]

Mr. Timms: The introduction of the aggregates levy will make the price of aggregates better reflect their true social and environmental costs and encourage the use of recycled aggregates. We do not expect there to be a significant impact on the transportation of aggregates.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Browne: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many households in (a) Scotland, (b) East Ayrshire and (c) Kilmarnock and Loudoun are eligible for the working families tax credit which are (i) single parent families where the woman is the sole earner, (ii) single parent families where the man is the sole earner, (iii) couples where the male is the sole earner, (iv) couples where the female is the sole earner and (v) dual-income families. [124652]

Dawn Primarolo: It is estimated that 98,800 families in Scotland have been awarded the Working Families Tax Credit to the end of March 2000, of which 3,300 were in the East Ayrshire local authority and 1,700 were in Kilmarnock and Loudoun parliamentary constituency.

The breakdowns requested are as follows:

Family type	Scotland	East Ayrshire	Kilmarnock and Loudoun
Single parent—female earner	61,100	1,700	900
Single parent—male earner	2,100	[1]—	[1]—
Couple—male sole earner	21,800	1,000	600
Couple—female sole earner	8,500	[1]—	[1]—
Couple—both earning	5,400	[1]—	[1]—
Total	98,800	3,300	1,700

[1] There are too few cases in the 5 per cent. sample used for these analyses to provide a complete breakdown for East Ayrshire, or for Kilmarnock and Loudoun.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 17 April 2000, Official Report, column 361W, on ministerial meetings, how many formal meetings he has had over the last two years with representatives of (a) farming unions, (b) the Country Landowners' Association, (c) the Country Sports Organisation and (d) pensioners' groups. [124577]

The Prime Minister: As I made clear in my earlier answer, I have met pensioners and countryside representatives at No.10 in the course of my official duties as well as during my visits throughout the country, and will continue to do so.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 7 June. [124330]

The Prime Minister: This morning I delivered a speech to the Women's Institute Conference and had meetings with Ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

SCOTLAND

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123743]

Dr. Reid: [holding answer 25 May 2000] From May 1997 to June 1999, the Scottish Office had 14 laptops stolen and five were lost.

Since 1 July 1999, one laptop used by a Scotland Office official was stolen.

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 10 February 2000, Official Report, columns 279–80W, concerning secondments, which of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124819]

Dr. Reid: The following secondments from the Scotland Office were for periods of 12 months or less:

Private Sector Secondments

	May 1997 to April 1998	May 1998 to April 1999	May 1999 to June 1999

NORTHERN IRELAND

Contracts

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 29 February 2000, Official Report, column 203W, concerning contracts, if he will list the companies concerned; and whether these contacts were subject to competitive tendering. [124824]

Mr. Ingram: Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

RUC Investigations

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following reports on the night of 7–8 August of attacks upon (a) the Presbyterian church hall in Ballyroney, County Down,

(b) the Orange hall in Ballyroney, County Down and (c) the Free Presbyterian church; in each case, how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions, what conclusions he has reached on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105463]

Mr. Ingram: (a) and (b) Police were assigned from Banbridge at 0711hrs on 8 August and arrived 0747hrs.

(c) Police were assigned from Castlewellan at approximately 1130hrs. on 8 August and arrived approximately 20 minutes later.

No estimate of the cost of damage is available. There is no record of similar incidents in the area. The attacks may be linked on an 0700hrs. service held on 11 July commemorating the 150th Battle of Dolly's Brae. The number of perpetrators is not known but they are believed to be from a Nationalist background. The investigation remains open.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of a petrol bomb attack on a property in Ligoniel, north Belfast on 13 August 1999; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105446]

Mr. Ingram: This incident was reported at 0403hrs. Police attended the scene at 0420hrs., having checked the authenticity of the call. There is no estimate of the cost of damage which was slight because the petrol did not ignite. There have been no similar incidents in the area although a brick was thrown at the window of this house on 9 August. It is not thought that parades had any bearing. The community affiliation of the perpetrators is not known. The investigation is ongoing.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of an attack on the BT Target Sports Club near Loughbrickland, County Down, on 22 August 1999; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105437]

Mr. Ingram: There was no attack at this location on 22 August 1999. However there was an attack on the night of 4 August. That incident was reported at 0059hrs. Police arrived on the scene at 0110hrs. Damage to a tracked excavator has been estimated at £29,000. There have been no similar incidents in the area. Parades are not believed to have had a bearing. The community affiliation of the perpetrator(s) is not known. The investigation remains open but is subject to further information becoming available.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of a pipe bomb attack on property in Sallagh Park South, Larne, on 30 August 1999; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105444]

Mr. Ingram: This incident was reported at 0106 hrs. Police arrived on the scene at 0107 hrs. There was no apparent damage. There have been a number of similar attacks in the area. It is not thought that parades had any bearing. The attack is believed to have been carried out by Loyalists. The investigation is ongoing.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of a pipe bomb being discovered at St. Peter the Rock church, Lisburn, on 29 August 1999; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105442]

Mr. Ingram: This incident was reported at 1936 hrs. Police attended the scene at 2003 hrs. having verified the authenticity of the call. There was no damage. There have been similar incidents in the area. It is believed that the perpetrators may be Loyalist. It is not thought that parades had any bearing. The investigation is ongoing.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of an assault on a woman in Kilkeel on 14 August 1999; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what injuries were sustained as a result of the attack; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105447]

Mr. Ingram: Three men have been charged and are due to appear in court in connection with this incident. It would therefore be inappropriate to comment further.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of an attack on St. Mary's Gaelic Athletic Association club in Ahoghill, County Antrim, on 29 August 1999; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached so far on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105441]

Mr. Ingram: This incident was reported at 0307 hrs. Police arrived on the scene at 0320 hrs. Damage was extensive but an estimate of cost has not yet been received. There have been a number of similar incidents in the area. It is not thought that parades had a bearing. The attack is believed to have been carried out by Loyalists. The investigation is ongoing.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of an attack on a Church of Ireland hall in Strabane on 15 August 1999; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached so far on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105448]

Mr. Ingram: Police saw smoke coming from the hall and took appropriate action. No estimate of damage has yet been received. There have been six previously recorded incidents involving arson of places of worship in the area between 1995 and 1998. It is not thought that parades had any bearing. The attack is believed to have been carried out by Nationalists. The investigation remains open.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of attacks on property and residents on Craigwell Avenue, Portadown, on 17 August; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; what is the present stage of the investigation; and what is his estimate of the number of families that have moved out of the area or sought rehousing as a consequence of community tensions in the past four years. [105436]

Mr. Ingram: There is no record of any such incidents on or about the date given. It is not possible to give the numbers of families who may have moved from the area because of community tensions; however, there have been 12 successful SPED applications during the last four years.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of a serious assault upon a 16 year-old boy from the Lower Ormeau Road, Belfast, on 26 August 1999; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached so far on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105439]

Mr. Ingram: When the assault by occupants of a vehicle was reported, police immediately circulated the limited details of the vehicle which was not located. The scene was visited and potential witnesses were interviewed but no further evidence came to light. There is nothing to suggest that this was a sectarian attack. There have been no recent incidents of this type in the area. Parades in the area have caused tension but it is not thought that they had a bearing on the incident. The community affiliation of the three assailants is not known. The investigation remains open but is dependent on additional information becoming available.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of a paint bomb attack on a property on the Curryneirin estate, Derry, on 15 August 1999; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105449]

Mr. Ingram: This incident was reported at 0104hrs. Because of incidents of serious disorder that evening, including hijacking, criminal damage and intimidation, police were unable to attend the scene until 0303hrs. Damage to property is estimated at £800. It is not thought that parades had any bearing. Police believe the perpetrators may have been Nationalists. The investigation remains open.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of an attack on Ryan's Presbyterian church hall outside Rathfriland, Co. Down, on 9 August 1999; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105445]

Mr. Ingram: This incident was reported at 0238hrs. Police arrived on the scene at 0247hrs. Damage is estimated at £109,995. There are no recently recorded similar incidents in the area. Parades are not believed to have had a bearing. The community affiliation of the perpetrator(s) is not known. The investigation is ongoing.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of a petrol bomb attack on a residential property in the early hours of 9 August; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105464]

Mr. Ingram: It is assumed that this question refers to an incident at Hampton Crescent, Larne, on 9 August 1999. This incident was reported at 0316hrs. Police arrived on the scene at 0318hrs. No estimate of the cost of the damage is available. There have been a number of similar attacks in the area. It is not thought that parades had a bearing. The attack is believed to have been carried out by Loyalists. The investigation is ongoing.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of an attack on the home of councillor Danny O'Connor in Larne, on 28 August 1999; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what bearing controversial parades have on these actions; what conclusions he has reached so far on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105440]

Mr. Ingram: This incident was reported at 0434hrs. Police arrived on the scene at 0437hrs. No damage was caused. There have been a number of similar attacks in the area. It is not thought that parades had any bearing. The attack is believed to have been carried out by Loyalists. The investigation is ongoing.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of an attack on the home of Mr. Kevin O'Connor in Larne on 30 August 1999; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what conclusions he has reached on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105443]

Mr. Ingram: This incident was reported at 0916hrs. Police arrived on the scene at 0922hrs. There was scorch damage to the area of the hallway and fine nails embedded in a wall. No estimate of the damage is currently available. The attack is believed to have been carried out by Loyalists. The investigation remains open.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the report of attacks on vehicles and properties on the Shankill Road, Belfast, on the night of 30–31 July; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; what is his estimate of the damage to property; what record of similar incidents exists in that area; what conclusions he has reached so far on the number and community affiliation of the perpetrators; and what is the present stage of the investigation. [105460]

Mr. Ingram: Police have no records of any attacks of the type described.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following reports of an incident on Craigwell Avenue, Portadown, on 31 July; how long it took for police to arrive on the scene; how many shots were fired; what conclusions he has reached on the community affiliation of the perpetrator; how many persons were (a) arrested and (b) charged; and what is the present stage of proceedings. [105461]

Mr. Ingram: A man has been charged and is due to appear in court in connection with this incident. It would therefore be inappropriate to comment further.

Tourist Intimidation (Bushmills)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC has taken to respond to reports of verbal abuse and intimidation of tourists in the Bushmills area, County Antrim; and how many meetings have been held with the Bushmills Community Association in the past 12 months. [105438]

Mr. Ingram: There have been no reports of verbal abuse or intimidation reported to the police. There have been six meetings with the Bushmills Community Association in the last year.

Hurling Summer Scheme

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps the RUC took following the Irish News newspaper report of 5 August concerning threats received by organisers and children participating in a hurling summer scheme to have taken place on the O'Neill Park, Dungannon; when the police first learned of the threats against the scheme; and what measures were taken to address the community relations aspects of this incident. [105462]

Mr. Ingram: As a result of information on 3 August, police personally informed two representatives of the Gaelic Athletic Association at O'Neill Park that day and a third representative on 4 August of a possible threat to the summer scheme. Appropriate crime prevention and security advice was given and all police patrols were briefed to give attention to the area at the times given by GAA representatives.

Robert Hamill and Gregory Girvan

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made with the investigation by the Royal Ulster Constabulary into the assault on Gregory Girvan in Portadown town centre on 27 April 1997. [119711]

Mr. Ingram: A file was forwarded to the Director of Public Prosecutions on the 31 July 1997 in respect of this assault. However, he directed that there was insufficient evidence to press charges. The investigation therefore remains open and I would implore anyone who has not already done so to contact the police and provide whatever information they can to assist in catching those responsible for this despicable crime.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will list by rank and the time at which they attended, those officers above the rank of constable who attended the scene of the assaults on Robert Hamill and Gregory Girvan in Portadown town centre on 27 April 1997; [119713]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 10 January 2000, Official Report, column 32W, on Robert Hamill, for what reasons police did not cordon off the location of the attack on Robert Hamill in Portadown on 27 April 1997 until 07.27 hours. [119714]

Mr. Ingram: The Independent Commission for Police Complaints are actively considering whether disciplinary proceedings will be instigated against police officers in this particular case and it would therefore be inappropriate to comment on such details at this time.

Parades Commission

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the applications for judicial review of a decision of the Parades Commission since its creation, in each case describing the (a) issue involved, (b) the result of the application hearing and (c) the result of the substantive hearing and summarising of the findings of the Court. [124107]

Mr. Ingram: To date there have been five occasions when applications for judicial review have been made on determinations made by the Parades Commission:

1. Ormeau Road parade on 13 July 1998:

(a) The Commission's decision not to impose route restrictions on the Orange Order parade was the subject of an application for judicial review on 7 July 1998. The grounds of the application were that, in not prohibiting the parade from parading on the Lower Ormeau Road as it had done in relation to previous parades, the Commission had exceeded its statutory powers. It was argued that the functions of the Commission were the balancing of local interests, and that the meaning of "community" in the Public Processions Act 1998 was confined to the people living in the area through which it was proposed that the parade should pass. The Commission could not, therefore, come to a different conclusion in relation to the 13 July parade if, as it was bound to do, it restricted itself to local considerations.

(b) The application was dismissed. The decision, when appealed, was upheld.

(c) No substantive hearing.

2. Apprentice Boys Parade in Dunloy on 8 August 1998:

(a) The Commission's decision not to permit the Dunloy Apprentice Boys to parade through the village of Dunloy was the subject of an application for judicial review on 6 August 1998. The grounds of the application were, among others, that the Commission had failed to distinguish the various groups which are commonly described as the 'loyal orders' and had imposed an obligation on those loyal orders to engage with the local community. This, it was argued, had fettered the Apprentice Boys discretion.

(b) The application was dismissed.

(c) No substantive hearing.

3. Parkmount Junior LOL No. 150 parade in Portadown on 29 May 1999:

(a) The Commission's decision not to impose conditions on the parade along a section of the lower end of Garvaghy Road in Portadown was the subject of an application for judicial review on 27 May 1999. The grounds for the application were that in deciding not to impose conditions the Commission had not acted in accordance with its own procedures.

(b) Leave to apply was not granted. The applicant appealed the decision and the Court of Appeal subsequently granted leave and heard and determined the application.

(c) The judgment found that the Commission had taken into account relevant factors, and had not taken into account irrelevant factors, and that the decision to impose no restrictions was lawful, procedurally proper and reasonable in the circumstances.

4. Long March Parade on 3 July 1999 (Lurgan to Portadown):

(a) The Commission's decision to re-route that part of the march notified to pass through Lurgan was the subject of an application for leave to apply for a judicial review on 2 July 1999. The grounds for the application were that the Commission had not complied with its own procedures in failing to consult with the organiser of the march in order to facilitate mediation.

(b) The court considered that the Commission had not acted " in a way which was clearly outside its powers or contrary to its prescribed procedure". The application was refused. The applicant appealed the decision on 2 November 1999. A preliminary hearing was held on 8 November 1999, and the substantive hearing on 1 December 1999. The appeal was dismissed.

(c) Dismissed on invitation of appellant's counsel.

5. St. Patrick's Day parades in Kilkeel on 17 March 2000:

(a) The Commission's decision to permit parades by two nationalist bands to proceed along their notified route was the subject for an application for a judicial review on 16 March 2000. The ground for the application was that the Commission had failed to comply with its procedures in not consulting widely enough to gain sufficient information on which to base its decision. It had therefore failed to take into account previous disorder in relation to the parade, and to consider the adverse impact of the parade on community relations, and had not advised anyone that "they were minded to alter the status which had existed for over 20 years".

(b) The judge agreed, in view of the time constraints, that he would deal with both the leave application, and if this were successful, the substantive hearing. The Court held that the Commission had not acted outside its powers or contrary to its procedures, and the application was dismissed.

(c) No substantive hearing.

RUC Personnel

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the composition by gender and perceived community origin of the (a) RUC Special Branch and (b) RUC Criminal Investigation Department. [123956]

Mr. Ingram: The following table details the current composition by gender and perceived community background of the RUC Special Branch and RUC Criminal Investigation Department:

	Special Branch	CID
Male	739	886
Female	88	150
Perceived Protestant	762	898
Perceived Roman Catholic	54	98
Undetermined	21	40

It should be noted that these figures include all police officers in both Departments, unlike the answers given on 10 February 2000, Official Report, column 239W, and on 11 February 2000, Official Report, column 322W, which only stipulated the number of officers with detective status in RUC Special Branch and CID.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the process of selection and entry requirement for officers to serve in the (a) RUC Special Branch and (b) RUC Criminal Investigation Department. [123955]

Mr. Ingram: Vacancies in the ranks of Constable to Inspector are circulated throughout the force in accordance with force orders. Applicants, who must have completed their probationary period, are required to complete an application form and receive a line manager's recommendation before being interviewed by a selection panel consisting of officers of at least Chief Inspector rank, one of whom is from the specialism involved. The Chairman of the panel is always from outside the specialism. Successful candidates undergo a one-year aideship and only on successful completion will an appointment to the branches be made permanent. Appointments at the ranks of Chief Inspector and above are the responsibility of Force Command, advised by Personnel Branch, who consider the number of vacancies and the policing experience of potential appointees before making recommendations.

RUC (Compensation Claims)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will provide a breakdown from

(a) 1 May 1998 to 30 April 1999 and (b) 1 May 1999 to 30 April 2000 of compensation claims against the RUC broken down into (i) new claims, (ii) claims disposed of, (iii) damages paid, (iv) plaintiff's solicitor's costs, (v) Crown solicitor's costs and (vi) Crown solicitor's outlay. [123884]

Mr. Ingram: The following table provides a breakdown of costs associated with compensation claims against the Royal Ulster Constabulary. It should be noted that the figures cover the 1998–99 and 1999–2000 financial years.

	April 1998 to March 1999	April 1999 to March 2000
New Claims	654	693
Claims disposed of	480	365
Damages paid (£)	1,046,115	1,127,632
Plaintiff's solicitor's costs (£)	619,885	668,050
Crown Solicitor's costs (£)	735,637	900,738
Crown Solicitor's outlay (£)	408,159	386,033

RUC (Disciplinary Proceedings)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (a) if he will set out the stages of disciplinary proceedings in the RUC from initial complaint to final outcome, (b) what considerations affect the time taken for the completion of each stage in the procedure, (c) when procedures were last reviewed and (d) what proposals have been adopted in the past five years to enhance the prompt and efficient administration of the system. [124106]

Mr. Ingram: The various stages of disciplinary proceedings are contained within The Police (Northern Ireland) Order 1987, the Royal Ulster Constabulary (Complaints etc.) Regulations 1988, The Royal Ulster Constabulary (Complaints)(Informal Resolution) 1988, The Royal Ulster Constabulary (Discipline and Disciplinary Appeals) Regulations 1988, The Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve (Part-Time)(Discipline and Disciplinary Appeals) Regulations 1988 and Guidance to the Chief Constable of Police Complaints and Discipline Procedures.

The time taken to complete each stage of the disciplinary procedure is affected by many factors, including the nature and extent of the allegations, the complexity and availability of evidence, the resources devoted to the investigation, the progress of related criminal or civil proceedings and the level and nature of co-operation afforded by the complainant.

A comprehensive review of the police complaints system in Northern Ireland was carried out by Dr. Maurice Hayes, who published his report in January 1997. The present Independent Commission for Police Complaints will be replaced by the Office of the Police Ombudsman on 1 October 2000. The Police Ombudsman will receive and investigate all complaints about the police and will make recommendations for criminal and disciplinary action.

Garvaghy Road

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what undertakings he has entered into in relation to parades in the vicinity of Garvaghy Road, Portadown on 9 July with (a) the Orange Order, (b) the Garvaghy Road Residents Coalition, (c) political parties and (d) the Irish Government. [123954]

Mr. Ingram: In the absence of a local agreement, it is entirely the responsibility of the Parades Commission to decide whether or not to allow a parade to take place, or to impose restrictions.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of decisions by adjudication officers and decision makers on Disability Living Allowance have proceeded to (i) review stage and (ii) an independent appeal tribunal in each of the last five years. [124707]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Decisions/submissions	1995–96	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000[1]
Initial claim decisions	503,170	515,795	466,960	383,794	371,431
Renewal decisions	154,102	167,794	176,164	194,579	185,518
Reviews inside time[2]	165,367	188,548	210,256	173,832	160,349
Reviews outside time[3]	167,594	170,786	159,798	126,964	116,234
Appeal submissions	33,761	39,323	48,047	46,986	46,574

[1] Figures for January were estimated for initial claims, renewals and reviews.
[2] Figures include reconsiderations under the new decision making process from October 1999.
[3] Figures include supersessions under the new decision making process from October 1999.
[4] Some reviews and appeals relate to claims made or reviewed in the previous year. It is therefore not possible to provide the exact proportion of the claims made in any year which proceed to review or appeal.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the (a) cost and (b) number of beneficiaries, in each of the next five years, of raising the upper age limit to (a) 70, (b) 75 and (c) 80 years for the Disability Living Allowance mobility component. [124688]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the tables.

Raising age limit of Disability Living Allowance (DLA) mobility component to age 70		to age 75		to age 80

	Cost (£ billion)	Gainers (Million)	Cost (£ billion)	Gainers (Million)	Cost (£ billion)	Gainers (Million)
2001–02	0.3	0.15	0.8	0.4	1.4	0.75

2005–06	0.5	0.25	1.1	0.5	1.9	0.85

Notes:
1. Costs are in cash prices and rounded to nearest hundred million and number of gainers rounded to the nearest fifty thousand.
2. Estimates derived from model of entitlement based on 1996–97 Disability Survey and forecast caseloads.
3. Estimates are subject to a significant margin of error underlying uncertainties of modelling entitlement from available survey data. It is assumed that cases leave the benefit at an average rate for all DLA mobility cases.
4. Estimated costs include effects on income-related benefits.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the (a) cost and (b) number of beneficiaries in each of the next five years, of removing the upper age limit for the Disability Living Allowance (i) mobility component and (ii) lower rate care component. [124687]

Mr. Bayley: The information is in the table.

Estimated cost of and numbers of gainers from abolition of upper age limit for Disability Living Allowance mobility component and care component

	Cost of extending mobility component (£ billion)	Gainers (million)	Cost of extending care component (£ billion)	Gainers (million)
2001–02	2.6	1.30	0.2	0.30

2004–05	3.0	1.40	0.3	0.30
2005–06	3.1	1.45	0.3	0.30

Notes:
1. Costs are in cash prices and rounded to nearest 100 million and number of gainers rounded to the nearest 50,000.
2. Estimates derived from model of entitlement based on 1996–97 Disability Survey and forecast case loads.
3. Estimates are subject to a significant margin of error reflecting underlying uncertainties of modelling entitlement from available survey data.
4. Estimated costs include effects on income related benefits.

Social Security Numbers

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps are taken by his Department to ensure that social security numbers are given to the right person and linked to the right department; what is the cost of this; how many incidents in the years (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 were found where people were (i) allocated and (ii) used the wrong national insurance number; and if he will make a statement. [124557]

Mr. Rooker: The National Insurance Number (NINO) exists to allow this Department and the Inland Revenue to differentiate accurately between the millions of people who do business with them. When a person applies for a NINO, the Department checks its records to see that a NINO has not already been issued and then interviews the person to confirm identity. The interviewer checks the person's circumstances, background and history by asking questions. Answers are confirmed and any documents produced as evidence are authenticated before a NINO is allocated.

The current annual cost of allocating NINOs is £5.4 million.

The total number of NINOs allocated in 1998 was 272,844 compared with 284,144 for 1999. Inevitably, with these volumes, the system is subject to instances of existing numbers not being traced correctly and duplicate accounts being created in error. Unfortunately, data on wrongly allocated NINOs are not available in the format requested. However, in order to address this issue the Department has established a comprehensive programme of data cleansing.

The Identity Fraud Unit has recorded 1,314 false NINOs and accounts since it was established in 1997.

The Department is committed to ensuring that NINOs are issued, used and controlled consistently. Our overall aim is to always establish the correct identity of a person prior to providing a benefit or service to ensure that we are dealing with the right person. We will continue to develop and implement strategies that enable us to achieve this aim.

Non-local Offices

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his Department's estimate of the annual savings to the social security budget of the disposal of non-local offices from London in each of the last five years. [124401]

Mr. Rooker: Prior to 1 April 1998 and within the last five years, the Department vacated only one "non-local office[1]" in the London area, where it was the major Government occupier. This was Euston Tower, but being a leasehold building there was no disposal value; savings simply accrued through the discontinuance of rent, rates and the service charge.

On 31 March 1995, an initial release of space at Euston Tower produced net annual savings of £436,694, after the deduction of additional occupation costs following relocation of the Headquarters staff involved to the Adelphi. The final moves, involving a number of units, took place in 1996. The net annual savings after relocation were in the region of £1.4 million.

On 1 April 1998 the Department subsequently transferred all of its property, both freehold and leasehold, to the private sector consortium Trillium plc under the PRIME Agreement. We now no longer own nor rent any buildings. Instead, serviced office accommodation is purchased from Trillium. So now, if we withdraw entirely from a building, or hand back only a proportion of our space, it is for Trillium to dispose of.

In the two years since the PRIME contract began, as part of estates strategies in the London area, the Department has handed back some 45,431m^2 of space in both local office and non-local office buildings. However, the only buildings that we have withdrawn from entirely are local office buildings. Consideration is presently being given also to taking on additional space elsewhere in London.

Note:

1. A non-local office has been defined as a building without public caller facilities.

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 9 February 2000, Official Report, column 213W, concerning secondments, which of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124820]

Mr. Rooker: All three of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less.

Benefits Agency

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to improve the quality and accuracy of postcode data with the Analytical Services Division within the Benefits Agency. [124686]

Angela Eagle: The Department's Analytical Services Division currently produces a range of local level information by matching a claimant's postcode against the Office for National Statistics postcode directory for the key benefits including Income Support, Jobseeker's Allowance and Incapacity Benefit. For some benefits, incomplete or missing postcode information makes such a process unreliable and work to improve the accuracy of this information is ongoing. For example, August 1999 Child Benefit data were recently enhanced through the imputation of postcode from claimant address details. A final phase of work to match this against the 2000 postcode directory will soon result in the production of reliable small area estimates for child benefit for the first time.

A copy of the child benefit data for all parliamentary constituencies will be placed in the Houses of Parliament Libraries by the end of July 2000.

Pension Funds

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the minimum funding requirements for pension funds with reference to venture capital. [124756]

Mr. Rooker: The Minimum Funding Requirement (MFR) does not prescribe how pension funds should invest their assets. Investment practice is a matter for pension schemes. The MFR is intended to provide a reasonable level of security for members in the event of the employer becoming insolvent and requires defined benefit schemes to hold a minimum level of assets to meet their liabilities valued according to a prescribed methodology. We have asked the Faculty and Institute of Actuaries to carry out a review of the minimum funding requirement and will be consulting shortly on the proposals in their report. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has also asked Paul Myners to conduct a review of institutional investment which is considering this and other issues.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Lord Levy

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the oral answer of 11 April 2000, Official Report, column 179, if Lord Levy has held meetings with representatives of foreign (a) intelligence and (b) security agencies. [118947]

Mr. Hain: In line with long standing practice of successive Governments we do not comment on intelligence matters.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs from which officials Lord Levy has received briefings on the Middle East. [119672]

Mr. Hain: Lord Levy has been briefed by officials responsible for the regional and bilateral issues on which he has passed messages from the Prime Minister, and by Ambassadors in the countries where he has passed such messages. As I know from having talked to the Ministers and others in these countries, his work is greatly appreciated and has helped enhance both Britain's standing and our contribution to the Middle East peace process.

British Council

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British Council offices there were overseas on 1 April. [123376]

Mr. Hain: On 1 April there were 243 British Council offices overseas, in 110 countries.

Joint Entry Clearance Unit

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the Joint Entry Clearance Unit. [125245]

Mr. Vaz: As I told the House on 20 March 2000, Official Report, column 833–36, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Home Office have signed a Memorandum of Understanding on the establishment of the Joint Entry Clearance Unit (the JECU). Copies of the document have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. This week the JECU has moved to its new offices at 89 Albert Embankment. By bringing together Foreign and Commonwealth Office and Home Office expertise in a single unit, it will provide a better co-ordinated and more effective service to entry clearance applicants. More information about the new Unit, including contact numbers within it, will be circulated to Members.

Export Licences (Iran)

Ann Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has recently authorised the issue of export licences for Iran as an exception to the national arms embargo. [125251]

Mr. Hain: We have recently issued, as an exception to the national arms embargo on Iran, an export licence for the export of night vision equipment for the use of Iranian drug enforcement personnel. This equipment has been procured by a private company on behalf of the UN Drugs Control Programme (UNDCP) as a contribution to the UNDCP in Iran. These goods require a UK export licence as they are transiting the UK en route to Iran.

The UK fully supports assistance for the considerable efforts being made by the Iranian authorities to stem the trafficking of drugs through Iran. Since early 1999 the UK has contributed £1.5 million to support Iranian counter drugs activity.

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 11 February 2000, Official Report, columns 337–38W, concerning secondments, which of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124822]

Mr. Battle: There were (a) 14 private sector staff who undertook secondments of 12 or less months to my Department between May 1997 and April 1998, (b) 11 between May 1998 and April 1999 and (c) 19 between May 1999 and February 2000.

Overseas Territories

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) which Overseas Territories legislatures have e-mail addresses; and which of these can be used to contact individual members of those legislatures; [124842]

(2) when his Department will make an up-to-date list of members of all Overseas Territories legislatures, together with their point of contact, available in the Library; and if he will make it his Department's practice for this to be updated regularly. [124841]

Mr. Battle: My Department is in the process of compiling a list of elected members of those Overseas Territories which have a legislature, together with contact details, including e-mail addresses where these exist. This will be placed in the House of Commons Library and will be updated after elections in the territories. The Commonwealth Parliamentary Association is in regular contact with elected members both in the UK and in the territories and provides a forum for direct liaison between the two.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in implementing the proposals outlined in the recent White Paper on Overseas Territories; and if he will make a statement. [124843]

Mr. Battle: Good progress has been made in key areas covered by the White Paper. Preparations for an Overseas Territories Bill granting British citizenship have reached an advanced stage; structured political dialogue has been effected by the establishment of an annual Consultative Council between British and Overseas Territories Ministers; a process of constitutional modernisation has been initiated; a draft environmental charter has been distributed for consultation; capital and corporal punishment have been abolished in most territories, with agreement to do so in the others, and an independent review of the regulation of financial sectors in the Overseas Territories is being conducted by consultants.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the visits made to each Overseas Territory by Ministers in his Department since 1 May 1997; and if he will make a statement. [124840]

Mr. Battle: The information is in the table.

Gibraltar

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library the speeches and press releases and documents pertaining to the United Kingdom's bilateral and EU relations with Spain which have related to Gibraltar, since the recent agreement was reached with Spain on Gibraltar. [124835]

Mr. Vaz: A copy of the documents relating to the arrangements covering a number of issues within the European Union concerning Gibraltar which were agreed with Spain following extensive consultation with the Government of Gibraltar were placed in the Library of the House on 19 April 2000, and details were given to the House by the Foreign Secretary on the same day, Official Report, columns 499–500W. The Foreign Secretary's statement announcing the arrangements on 19 April will also be placed in the Library.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what information he has collected relating to the average time of waiting at the Spain-Gibraltar border for motor vehicles entering or leaving Gibraltar since the recent agreement reached with Spain on Gibraltar; [124834]

(2) if he will list, for each day since the recent agreement with Spain about Gibraltar, the (a) longest and (b) average waiting time for vehicles entering or leaving Gibraltar. [124833]

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there has been a diminution of delays at the border between Gibraltar and Spain as a result of the recent Anglo-Spanish agreement. [124798]

Mr. Vaz: The border did not form part of the discussions between Her Majesty's Government and the Spanish Government, which concluded on 19 April, with the support of the Government of Gibraltar. The table shows maximum and average delay times for cars entering and leaving Gibraltar since 19 April, based on figures collated by the Royal Gibraltar Police.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what role his Department will play in respect of matters covered by the recent Anglo-Spanish agreement. [124812]

Mr. Vaz: A United Kingdom Government/Gibraltar Liaison Unit for EU Affairs has been established in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office with responsibility for conveying formal communications between Gibraltar authorities and their counterparts in other EU member states under the new arrangements concerning Gibraltar competent authorities. The Department will also play a role in facilitating as necessary the implementation of other aspects of the various new arrangements, including the development of practical cooperation between the Royal Gibraltar Police and the Spanish police forces under the new police cooperation arrangements.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the visits made by himself or his ministers to Gibraltar within the last two years, stating the (a) purpose and (b) outcome of the visit. [124799]

Mr. Vaz: My right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin) visited Gibraltar on 22–23 July 1999 and I visited on 18–19 May 2000.

The main purpose of the visits was to enable Ministers responsible for Gibraltar to meet and hear the views of the people of Gibraltar and their elected representatives. This was achieved.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) also visited Gibraltar from 7–8 October 1997.

CABINET OFFICE

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in her Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123731]

Mr. Stringer: No laptop computers have been reported lost from my Department, excluding its agencies, since May 1997. Two laptop computers have been reported stolen.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his answer of 8 February 2000, Official Report, column 132W, concerning secondments, if the secondee to the Law Commission listed was appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124826]

Mr. Lock: The secondment in question lasted for less than 12 months.

Vaccine Damage Payments Scheme

Mr. Baker: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the members of the panel from which boards are drawn to determine cases under the vaccine damage payments scheme; what are their qualifications; and which members have registered links with pharmaceutical companies. [124754]

Mr. Lock: There are a number of legal and medical members. Legal members must be qualified lawyers of at least five years' standing. Medical members must have at least five years' experience treating patients as a fully registered medical practitioner in the UK or other EEA state, and in addition must either be on a specialist register maintained in the UK or other EEA state, or hold a vocational training certificate. In the time available, it has not been possible to collate all the information requested. When we have the information I will write to the hon. Member and put a copy of my letter in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Forms

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123942]

Dr. Howells: There are no forms issued by the Department specifically aimed at charities or other voluntary organisations. Where charities are incorporated as companies under the Companies Acts they will of course need to file company accounts and other event-generated forms in the normal way.

Efforts are continually being made to simplify these forms. A recent example is the repeal of the requirement to list a director's other directorships on the company annual return.

European Structural Funds

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the total amount received by the UK under the European Union structural funds in each of the last five years. [124743]

Mr. Caborn: The total European Union Structural Funds allocation to the United Kingdom for the period 1995–99 is 12,590 million Euros, which is £8,229 million in 1999 prices. The table breaks this total into the yearly sums. This figure includes the European Social Fund allocation.

	Euro million	£ million
1995	2,341	1,530
1996	2,455	1,604
1997	2,552	1,668
1998	2,569	1,679
1999	2,673	1,748

The figures in the table are for allocations rather than receipts. Some receipts are not recorded centrally and, in any case, receipts in one year include reimbursement of some claims submitted in respect of previous years, while some claims submitted during the year in question will not be paid in that year. Programmes have until the end of 2001 to spend and claim the amounts allocated and committed for the period 1994–99.

Petroleum Prices

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of when the OPEC member countries' decision to restore their production to pre-March 1999 levels will be reflected in petroleum prices in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [124205]

Mrs. Liddell: OPEC production increases, agreed in March 2000, led to a significant fall in crude oil prices, which has subsequently been reversed due to low stock levels and high product demand.

In recent months, historically low product stocks and significant European refinery maintenance have reduced the supply of petroleum to the market, putting pressure on prices.

ECGD

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to limit the provision of export credits for non-productive exports. [124660]

Mr. Caborn: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to a question from the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) on 8 February 2000, Official Report, column 216–18W

There are no plans at present to extend this initiative to other countries.

Power Lines

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received calling for the undergrounding of the proposed Lackenby to Shipton overhead transmission line to prevent damage from lightning storms. [124227]

Mrs. Liddell: Other than the hon. Member's letter of 24 May 2000 to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, to which I am replying separately, I am aware of no such representations.

Scottish Highlands

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the current economic impact of assisted area status on the Scottish Highlands; and if he will make a statement. [124775]

Mr. Caborn: Assisted area status is widely considered to have a positive economic impact on those areas—such as the Scottish Highlands—covered by the assisted area map.

World Petroleum Congress

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which representatives of the UK Government will be attending the World Petroleum Congress in Calgary this month. [125015]

Mrs. Liddell: The Department will be represented by senior officials.

Energy Council

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Energy Council on 30 May. [125577]

Mrs. Liddell: The Council considered several matters of interest to the United Kingdom.

The centre-piece of the Council was a structured debate on energy liberalisation where the Commission presented a paper outlining progress on building a single energy market with proposals for accelerating liberalisation. Ministers were asked to comment on measures needed to monitor progress, further harmonisation requirements, social implications and public service obligations. The UK welcomed the Lisbon agreement on accelerating liberalisation, called for 100 per cent. liberalisation by a specific date and supported further structural measures including unbundling and regulated third party access. The UK circulated a report on the UK's experience of the social effects of energy liberalisation aimed at providing the Council with a balanced analysis of social effects of energy liberalisation. Also the UK/Netherlands circulated preliminary results of a joint study providing both qualitative and quantitative data on the development of competition in gas and electricity markets across Europe and urged the Commission to take this work forward. The Commission and most member states welcomed this work. Copies of both documents have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The Council adopted conclusions welcoming progress on implementation of the electricity directive and the agreement of the European electricity regulatory forum on a cross border transmission pricing mechanism, effective from 1 October, and acknowledged that further work was needed on congestion management. On gas the conclusions noted the work of the European gas regulatory forum.

In addition, the Commission presented a draft proposal on access for renewables to the internal electricity market and an energy efficiency action plan. The UK welcomed both dossiers identified as priorities in the UK Presidency. The first is a particularly important single market measure and both are key elements of the energy/environment integration strategy developed as part of the EU's response towards our Kyoto targets. The Council agreed conclusions on the energy efficiency action plan which recognised the need for Community policies and measures to complement, coordinate and add value to national actions, and invited the Commission, working in cooperation with member states, to come forward with specific proposals quickly.

The Council agreed conclusions on gas security of supply which invited the Commission to continue to monitor the supply position in Europe and to establish a group on an informal basis to discuss mutual areas of interest to improve coordination between member states.

Also, the Council adopted a decision enabling the European Community to sign an agreement with the United States on the coordination of energy-efficient labelling programmes for office equipment—energy star—and reached political agreement on a draft regulation for implementation of the energy star scheme.

Finally, the Council noted reports on Euro-Med Cooperation including conclusions and the Energy Charter Treaty.

CABINET OFFICE

Grace and Favour Residences

Mr. Kemp: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what the (a) number and (b) locations are of grace and favour residences not within royal palaces. [118871]

Marjorie Mowlam: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) by the Prime Minister on 5 June 2000, Official Report, columns 50–51W.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 25 May 2000, Official Report, column 581W, on opinion research, what steps have been taken to ensure that his Department makes such results publicly available as required by paragraph 19 of the Cabinet Office May 1999 Guidelines on Research into Public Attitudes and Opinions. [124903]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Officials in the Department and its agencies and staff in our NDPBs are aware of their obligations under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, to which paragraph 19 of the Cabinet Office Guidelines refers, and I expect them to ensure that the Code of Practice is followed. A senior official in my Department wrote to all chief executives of DCMS NDPBs on 10 December 1999, drawing their attention to the publication of the Freedom of Information Bill and reminding them of the need to comply, until a Freedom of Information Act is brought into force, with the Code of Practice.

National Lottery

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the (a) health and (b) education projects that have been funded from the National Lottery in each of the last two years; and how much each has received. [123634]

Kate Hoey: Lottery funding for health and education projects is primarily distributed through the New Opportunities Fund, although some awards made by other distributors, such as Sport England, the Arts Council and the National Lottery Charities Board, will certainly have educational or health benefits.

Over the past two years, the New Opportunities Fund has made nearly 1,000 separate awards distributing £75 million to its educational and health programmes. These awards have included nearly £65 million to 980 out of school hours child care and learning schemes, and £10 million to create six Healthy Living Centres. The Fund is about to begin distributing to NHS Trusts over £90 million worth of equipment for detecting and treating cancer.

I have asked the Chief Executive of the Fund to write to the hon. Member with full details of all of the health and education awards. Copies of this letter will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Health Projects

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if the level of funding granted by her Department for reproductive health projects in (1) 2000–01 will be set at 85 per cent. for the entire duration of such projects; [124901]

(2) 2001–02 will be set at 70 per cent. for the entire duration of such projects. [124902]

Clare Short: The levels of funding granted by my Department, under the Civil Society Challenge Fund for new reproductive health projects funded in the following fiscal years, are:

funded in 2000–01—up to 85 per cent. funding available

funded in 2001–02—up to 70 per cent. funding available

funded in 2002–03—up to 50 per cent. funding available.

The funding level agreed in the first year of each project will be set for the entire duration of the project.

Central Reserve (Humanitarian Emergencies)

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many times her Department has accessed the Treasury's central reserve to fund humanitarian emergencies this year; and if she will make a statement. [124998]

Clare Short: My Department has not accessed the Treasury's central reserve during the 2000–01 financial year. During 1999–2000, DFID accessed the central reserve on two occasions to help fund humanitarian emergencies in Kosovo and East Timor.

Kosovo

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much of the United Kingdom's assistance to Kosovo is paid from her Department's conflict and emergency fund; and how much is met from Her Majesty's Treasury's central reserve. [125001]

Clare Short: I refer the hon. Member to page 86 (Box 6d) of the Department for International Development's Departmental Report 2000, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Sumatra

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment her Department has made of the humanitarian effects of the recent earthquake in Sumatra. [125019]

Clare Short: The worst affected areas are Bengkulu and Lampung Provinces and the island of Enggano. Over 100 people are confirmed as dead and a further 700 people have been injured. These figures are likely to rise. There has been extensive damage to housing and public buildings, including Bengkulu city hospital. Communication with the Bengkulu area is extremely difficult as the telephone system is down and access has been restricted due to damage to the airport, major roads and bridges. However, initial reports indicate that the damage was not as devastating as might have been expected, given the size of the earthquake.

The Indonesian authorities have rapidly mobilised civil and military assets to respond to the disaster and are supported by the local Red Cross Society. A six-person United Nations Disaster Assessment and Coordination team has been deployed to the region to assist with the relief effort.

My Department has contributed £250,000 for the purchase and distribution of relief items, such as shelter, blankets and the provision of clean water and first aid. This support is being channelled through the Red Cross and will target 140,000 of the worst affected people. We will continue to monitor the situation and stand ready to respond further to assessed needs.

India

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the humanitarian impact of the drought affecting the Indian states of Rajasthan and Gujarat. [125018]

Clare Short: A team from my Department has recently returned from India where they made a humanitarian assessment of the impact of the drought and the likely needs of the population. The team found Rajasthan and Gujarat to be among the three states in India worst affected by the drought. The principal humanitarian impacts of the drought include a significant reduction in household income; an increase in temporary migration; death of livestock; weakening of remaining herds; and health problems associated with scarcity of water and reduced food intake.

The Government of India have launched a large-scale drought relief effort which appears to be reaching a significant proportion of the affected population. United Nations agencies and non-governmental organisations are also active in providing humanitarian assistance to those suffering as a result of the drought.

We have committed nearly £3 million for relief projects in response to the drought regionally, including Pakistan and Afghanistan which are also badly affected. £500,000 of this support is being channelled through Oxfam for their relief programme in Rajasthan and Gujarat. We are considering what further assistance to provide.

Southern Africa

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress has been made with the implementation of the EU's initiative on prevention of trafficking of light weapons in southern Africa launched in 1998. [125020]

Clare Short: Progress has been made in a number of areas. Key organisations such as the Southern Africa Development Community (SADC) and the Southern African Regional Police Chiefs Co-operation Organisation (SARPCCO) have made significant efforts to take forward components of the agreed agenda in order to better address small arms questions, and are playing a growing role in bringing together a regional approach. The regional action programme has itself been an important mechanism around which the actions of donors can be co-ordinated with the needs and priorities of partner countries.

We have continued to provide support through non-governmental organisations such as Saferworld and the South African Institute for Security Studies (ISS) to take the regional action programme forward. In addition, we are also supporting a number of relevant police and customs service development projects which increase security and thereby decrease the need for, and availability of, small arms.

We are committed to continuing support for the regional action programme and to working closely with other UK Departments to ensure that this important initiative remains a priority activity for the EU.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Questionnaires

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many questionnaires have been compiled by his Department since 1 May 1997 for public distribution; and what has been the response rate for each. [123611]

Mr. Hain: I refer the hon. Gentleman to previous answers given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Europe about the questionnaire attached to the "Your Britain, Your Europe" leaflet on 10 April 2000, Official Report, column 77W; on 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 67W; and on 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 28W. In addition, at two FCO Open Days in October 1999 we distributed just under 720 questionnaires to canvass reactions from visitors. We received 227 replies.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the support for the Government forces in Sri Lanka from Israel. [124357]

Mr. Hain: None.

Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 259W, on the inter-Governmental conference, in what manner applicant states will be permitted (a) to operate fisheries within community waters and (b) otherwise to participate in execution of common policies. [124373]

Mr. Vaz: (a) Negotiations on Fisheries have started with six applicant countries (Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Poland and Slovenia). The EU Common Positions agreed for these negotiations will make clear that all new member states will be expected to apply the Common Fisheries Policy in full and that access to fisheries resources within EU waters will be based on the principle of relative stability, which allocates national quotas according to historic catch levels. In their position papers, these countries have accepted the principle of relative stability and are only seeking to maintain access to stocks and waters which they already fish.

(b) The participation of new member states in the execution of Common Policies will be determined in the accession negotiations. At the opening of the accession negotiations with Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Poland and Slovenia on 31 March 1998 during the UK Presidency, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State laid down the principles for negotiation, emphasising the necessity of "full acceptance of the actual and potential rights and obligations attaching to the Union system and its institutional framework, known as the 'acquis' of the Union". This principle covers all the Common Policies of the EU. The applicant's acceptance of the 'acquis' may give rise to technical adjustments, and exceptionally to non-permanent transitional measures. The same principles govern the accession negotiations with Bulgaria, Latvia, Lithuania, Malta, Romania and Slovakia, which began in February.

European Judges

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which published documents relating to the Court of the European Communities contain the (a) required qualifications for persons appointed to it as judges and decision makers concerning its preliminary proceedings including those conducted by the advocate general and the Court of First Instance, (b) procedures for their selection and appointment and the names of the persons appointing them and their staff; together with the names and previous experience and qualifications of the current judges and advocates general, together with the dates of their appointment and the expiry of their terms of office. [124638]

Mr. Vaz: The criteria for nomination and the appointment procedure for judges and advocates general at the European Court of Justice are set out in Article 223 TEC. The criteria for judges at the Court of First Instance are set out in Article 225.3. Profiles of the judges can be found on the Court of Justice website at www.curia.eu.int.

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the differences between the commitments (a) made in the final declaration of the Review Conference of the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty, held in New York in April-May and (b) entered into in 1970 by nuclear weapons states in respect of Article VI of the Treaty. [124794]

Mr. Hain: The unequivocal undertaking to the total elimination of their nuclear arsenals contained in the final document of the 2000 NPT Review Conference is the most explicit pledge ever made by the Nuclear Weapon States to work for complete global nuclear disarmament. It is an important statement of intent which we hope will provide a timely boost to international non-proliferation and disarmament efforts. The UK played a key role in securing agreement with the New Agenda Coalition for this important achievement.

EU Council

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the forthcoming business in the Council of the European Union to June and also list the major European Union events for the next six months. [125576]

Mr. Vaz: The information is as follows:

Step Change Project

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Step Change Project, listing its aims, objectives and methods. [124332]

Mr. Vaz: Following Britain's Presidency in 1998, the Prime Minister called for a "Step Change" in Britain's relations with its European partners. The initiative is intended to increase ministerial and official contacts across Europe and thereby promote British interests in the EU. As Minister for Europe, I co-ordinate Whitehall's "Step Change" efforts through the "Ministerial Group for European Co-ordination" (MINECOR).

Embassies (Party Political Activities)

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the rules concerning use of British embassies overseas by (a) Ministers and (b) hon. Members for party political activities. [124333]

Mr. Robin Cook: It is established policy that Government property should not be used for party political activities.

Lockerbie Bombing

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when (a) he, (b) other Foreign Office ministers and (c) officials were informed of statements made by Mr. Ahmad Behbahani, in respect of the bombing of Pan Am flight 103. [124946]

Mr. Battle: Officials were informed of Mr. Behbahani's remarks on 5 June 2000. Ministers were informed on 6 June 2000.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will obtain and assess the text of the statement made in the USA on 4 June by Mr. Ahmed Behbahani in relation to the Lockerbie bombing; and if he will make a statement. [124897]

Mr. Battle: Since Mr. Behbahani's alleged remarks relate to the current trial at the Scottish Court in the Netherlands, it would be inappropriate to comment on them.

Drugs Control

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the United States counterparts concerning the use of Fusarium Oxysporum in drug eradication strategies in Colombia and Peru. [124999]

Mr. Battle: Field trials on Fusarium Oxysporum have not yet been conducted by UNDCP in Colombia. Before these take place further research would need to be carried out inter alia to confirm that it is specific to coca and would not harm agricultural crops and other plant species. Field testing and any subsequent eradication campaign would also have to be approved by the Colombian Government.

Her Majesty's Government are not funding UNDCP research into Fusarium Oxysporum. The Foreign Secretary has not discussed it with the US Government.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with his UN counterparts about the effectiveness of the UN Drugs Control Programme's drug reduction strategy for drug-producing regions. [125017]

Mr. Battle: The UK is an active participant in UN drugs policy forums and is a key supporter of the United Nations Drugs Control Programme. In co-ordination with the United States and EU partners, the UK is supporting improved evaluation and management procedures in UNDCP drugs assistance projects. Examples of UK contributions include support for effective action by the UNDCP in reducing the cultivation of coca bush in Bolivia.

East Timor

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made with the return of East Timorese refugees from West Timor. [125016]

Mr. Battle: More than 162,000 refugees have now returned to East Timor. The UK continues to press the Indonesian authorities to resolve outstanding issues (eg civil service pensions) to allow those refugees who still wish to return to do so safely and speedily.

Small Arms

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with his EU counterparts concerning the implementation of the 1999 EU resolution on combating the excessive and uncontrolled accumulation and spread of small arms. [125021]

Mr. Hain: None, but officials regularly discuss small arms issues with EU counterparts and the Commission. These issues include the implementation of the resolution and the related December 1998 Joint Action on small arms proliferation.

Rights of the Child Convention

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the Government plan to ratify the protocol to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child prohibiting states from allowing children under the age of 18 years to fight in armed conflicts. [125022]

Mr. Hain: The Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict was adopted by the UN General Assembly on 25 May 2000. It is expected to be opened for signature and ratification later this year. The Government welcome adoption of the Optional Protocol. We are looking closely at the implications for the UK Armed Forces and the measures that would be required to allow the UK to ratify.

Colombia

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 17 April 2000, Official Report, column 394W, if he will make a statement on progress made in the hosting of an international gathering to discuss the details of Plan Colombia before the donors conference in July. [125013]

Mr. Battle: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office will host a preparatory meeting of senior officials and technical experts on Colombia on Monday 19 June. The Colombian Government will be represented as well as the Inter-American Development Bank, World Bank, selected NGOs and the UN Secretary General's Special Representative for Colombia. We have invited all EU member states, the Commission, Japan, Canada, the US, Norway and Switzerland.

On 5 June I hosted a meeting in the FCO with academics and NGOs in order to hear a wide range of views of academics, NGOs and officials prior to the London and Madrid meetings.

Pristina

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current security situation in Pristina and its effect on the safety of returning refugees. [124906]

Mr. Vaz: The security situation in Pristina is described as generally calm by the NATO-led Kosovo Force (KFOR). There is no general threat to Kosovo Albanian refugees returning to Pristina. In the case of Serb refugee returns, UNMIK and KFOR are doing their utmost to facilitate their return, offering protection where necessary.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Housing

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of total capital spending Government spending on housing and construction represented in each of the last 10 years. [123007]

Mr. Mullin: Central Government capital expenditure on housing in England as a percentage of total capital public spending for England over the last 10 years is set out in the table. Expenditure consists mainly of grants and subsidies provided through local authorities and the Housing Corporation. By 2001–02, the Government will have doubled the annual level of capital expenditure on housing that it inherited from the previous administration.

Year	Percentage
1991–92	14.7
1992–93	16.0
1993–94	14.8
1994–95	11.9
1995–96	10.1
1996–97	11.4
1997–98	9.7
1998–99	10.5
1999–2000[1]	10.7

Note:

Calculations based on housing capital expenditure figures in the Department of the Environment Annual Report, 1996, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions Annual Report 2000 and Table 4.1 of HM Treasury's Public Expenditure Statistical Analysis 2000–01

London Underground

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which EU legislation governs direct expenditure by London Underground Ltd. and its successors, in undertaking or supervising by a combination of direct and contracted operations, measures necessary to ensure the standards of operational performance required by the long-term contracts proposed by the Government. [124637]

Mr. Hill: All arrangements will need to be compatible with the relevant provisions of the EC Treaty and associated legislation.

Camping

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 12 May 2000, Official Report, column 485W, how many prosecutions under section 59(8) of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 have been made concerning waste left by unauthorised camping. [124746]

Mr. Mullin: The Department holds no central records of prosecutions made under this provision.

Flight Safety

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the result of the trials on the effects of mobile phones on flight safety carried out by the CAA; what recommendations have been made by the CAA as a result of these trials; and what changes will be made to flight safety rules as a result. [124783]

Mr. Mullin: The CAA carried out tests on the level of interference from passengers' mobile phones on the avionics systems of two aircraft parked at Gatwick Airport in February. These tests confirmed that mobile phone transmissions (including those made when a phone is on standby) made near an aircraft's flight deck or avionics equipment will produce interference that exceeds certification levels for some equipment. Consequently, the CAA will maintain their policy of prohibiting the use of mobile phones by passengers while an aircraft's engines are running.

The CAA is also consulting airport operators and airlines about the viability and value of additional measures to further minimise the risks of inadvertent operation of portable telephones. Such additional measures could include reminder notices in airport departure lounges and at aircraft boarding points and the introduction by airlines of detection equipment and related procedures to ensure telephones are switched off.

The full report of the tests is available on the CAA's website: www.srg.caa.co.uk/srg/srg—news.asp.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 25 May 2000, Official Report, column 570W, concerning the main waste disposal facilities in the East of England, if he will list the quantity of waste dealt with at each facility in 1998–99 or the nearest available year. [124804]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 7 June 2000]: The quantity of waste dealt with, in tonnes of waste for 1998–99 (or the nearest available year), at the main waste disposal facilities in the East of England, is shown in the table.

The data for landfills in Hertfordshire is missing. This is because the Environmental Protection Act 1990 makes provision for licensees to request that such information be kept off the public register on the grounds of commercial confidentiality. The Agency is in the process of reviewing these cases.

Central Railway

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions his Department has had with Central Railway in relation to the company's plans for a high speed freight rail link with particular reference to the part of the route adjacent to or in the vicinity of the M25; and if he will make a statement. [124844]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 7 June 2000]: None.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what contacts have taken place between (a) officials, (b) special advisers and (c) Ministers in his Department and representatives of the Central Railway. [125062]

Mr. Hill: Officials met representatives from Central Railway in 1998 to discuss its revised proposals for a freight railway between Liverpool and Lille. Ministers have received further representations from the company from time to time, including copies of its consultation documents.

Rail Subsidies

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he takes to ensure that Government subsidies to privatised railway companies are not passed on to shareholders. [124805]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 7 June 2000]: Government subsidies to privatised railway companies take two forms: payments under franchise agreements to passenger train operating companies, and grant payments to rail freight operators under the track access and freight facilities grant schemes.

Franchise subsidies are agreed by the Franchising Director following competitive tender. Franchise payments are for specific contractual obligations, including minimum service levels, which the operator must fulfil.

Grant payments to rail freight operators are available on application in accordance with the published terms of the grant schemes. The grant payments are calculated at the lower of the environmental benefit gained, the economic need of the business, and, where applicable, the level of track access charge. Grant is paid only where the service or investment in question is actually delivered.

North Wales Main Line

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 436W, which external consultants the Franchising Director used to satisfy himself of the validity of the Virgin rail study on electrification of the North Wales main line; and what their terms of reference were. [124802]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 7 June 2000]: The Franchising Director commissioned MVA Ltd. in connection with the Virgin study. Their terms of reference were to make an assessment of the study to allow the sSRA to reach a view on the robustness of methodology and the merits of the proposed North Wales electrification scheme.

Rail Ticket Pricing

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to ensure that rail passengers are not overcharged when buying tickets. [124800]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 7 June 2000]: A condition of station operators' licences from the Rail Regulator is that accurate and impartial advice on ticket pricing must be given to passengers.

Bus Monitors

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many bus monitors have been employed by the Vehicle Inspectorate in each year from 1997 to date. [124909]

Mr. Hill: The Vehicle Inspectorate employed 12 bus monitors in a successful pilot project in 1999. The same number will be employed in 2000.

Traffic Commissioner

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent assessment he has made of the sufficiency of the personnel available to the Traffic Commissioner within the South Eastern and Metropolitan traffic areas. [124908]

Mr. Hill: The level of resources, including the number of staff, required to support the Traffic Commissioner for the South Eastern and Metropolitan Traffic Area is assessed each year as part of the normal budgeting process. More generally, the Traffic Area Network is engaged in a major modernisation programme—called TAN 21—designed to equip all the Traffic Area Offices across the country with up to date management and business systems. This has involved a fundamental review of all the business processes carried out in the offices. The aim is to provide improved support to the Traffic Commissioners and a better customer service to the commercial transport industries.

Local Government Codes of Conduct

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the local authorities which do not include in their codes of conduct the 15 principles of conduct set out in the White Paper, "Local Government: In Touch with the People". [125101]

Ms Armstrong: It is not yet a statutory requirement for local authorities to have their own code of conduct. The obligation on local authorities to adopt a code of conduct, based on the general principles of conduct, is contained within Part III of the Local Government Bill, currently in Committee in this House.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the local authorities which have not yet established formal whistleblowing arrangements in accordance with the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998. [125103]

Ms Armstrong: My Department collects no information on whether local authorities have such procedures in place. While many employers, including local authorities, will wish to introduce procedures that facilitate internal whistleblowing, the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998 does not require them to do so, nor to inform the Government of their actions in this respect.

South-east Airports

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with the London Chamber of Commerce and Industry regarding projected passenger numbers and numbers of flights into airports in the south-east of England. [124488]

Mr. Mullin: None. The London Chamber of Commerce and Industry (LCCI) report, "Options for Growth—meeting demand at London's airports", was received by my Department after it had been published and the contents widely reported.

The work was commissioned independently and there were no discussions between my Department and the LCCI regarding the report.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received regarding new runways in the south-east of England. [124490]

Mr. Mullin: The commissioning of the South East and East of England Regional Air Services (SERAS) study, and the consultation on the proposed appraisal framework to be used in that study, has resulted in a wide range of organisations making representations about new runways in the south-east of England.

These are being carefully considered as part of the ongoing SERAS work. We are currently in the early stages of assessing options, both at existing airports and possible new sites. We will proceed through successive sifts to narrow down options to a final shortlist, on which there will be a full public consultation before Ministers come to decisions.

House Demolitions, Liverpool

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many representations he has received in respect of the possible demolition of houses in Broad Lane, Liverpool; what his response has been; and if he will make a statement. [125106]

Mr. Mullin: I have received a total of nine representations regarding the concerns of tenants and residents in Broad Lane, Liverpool. I have been assured by Liverpool City Council that tenants and residents will continue to be consulted throughout the development of proposals for the area, and my responses have reflected this.

Oceans

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent United Nations meeting on the oceans. [125404]

Mr. Prescott: The United Nations Informal Consultative Process on Oceans and Law of the Sea met for the first time in New York last week. This is a new initiative to provide a global forum where we can identify ways to improve co-ordination at a national and international level, in order to ensure effective implementation of the framework provided by the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea and Chapter 17 of Agenda 21 (Oceans and All Seas). Participants include states, non-governmental and inter-governmental organisations.

The first meeting succeeded in providing a forum both for a general debate on oceans issues and for a more detailed discussion of particular topics. The scope for further action to counter piracy and armed robbery at sea, and improving co-ordination of global oceans management, particularly by making use of the Secretary General's annual report on all aspects of oceans use, were among the issues covered by the general debate.

The two issues given special consideration at this meeting were improved fisheries management, particularly to counter the problem of illegal, unregulated and unreported (IUU) fishing, and the economic and social implications of marine pollution.

On fisheries, one of the main priorities to emerge was the need for early adoption by the UN Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO) of an International Action Plan on IUU fishing. There was also support for the newly agreed co-operation between the FAO and the International Maritime Organisation on developing control measures. Regional fisheries organisations were recognised as pivotal instruments through which states can manage particular fisheries, taking account of scientific stock assessments and balancing priorities, including food security and the need for sustainable economic base for fishing communities.

On marine pollution, the meeting acknowledged the recent progress that had been made in implementing the 1995 Washington Global Programme of Action to Protect the Marine Environment against Land-Based Activities (GPA), but urged states and inter-governmental agencies to do more in this regard. It was also suggested that the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) might identify what international support is needed to overcome the obstacles to the implementation of the GPA at national and local levels. The need to integrate action on marine pollution and degradation into mainstream investment programmes, as well as the need for capacity building to facilitate the integrated management of the coastal zone, were both highlighted.

The report of the meeting will be submitted to this Autumn's UN General Assembly debate on Oceans and Law of the Sea, where I hope it will help produce a focused General Assembly resolution covering the priority areas for action.

There will be a further meeting of the new process next year. A number of possible issues for special discussion have already been identified. These include improved development and use of marine science, and capacity building in developing countries.

Particularly today, World Oceans Day, I am pleased to confirm that the UK will continue to support and encourage this new informal consultative process. As well as participating in the meeting, this year we helped to shape the agenda and were able to help broaden participation by funding the attendance of a number of experts from developing countries. I hope that others will follow this lead.

Central Trains Ltd.

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if there is an exemption order for the fleet of new Class 170/5 and 170/6 trains to be introduced into service by Central Trains Ltd. in respect of any of the provisions of the Rail Vehicle Accessibility Regulations 1998; and if he will make a statement. [125526]

Mr. Hill: We have received an application from Central Trains Ltd. relating to the new Class 170/5 and 170/6 trains they wish to introduce into service. The exemptions have been discussed with our statutory advisers the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee. An exemption order relating to the exemption of these trains was laid in Parliament on Thursday 1 June. Copies are available from the Library.

The exemptions will not prevent disabled people from using the new trains. Indeed, we believe that the introduction of the new trains will make a significant contribution to improving mobility opportunities for disabled people.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Maternity Benefits

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have claimed under the Sure Start Maternity Grant scheme; what steps his Department is taking to make sure that people eligible for this grant are aware of it; and if he will make a statement. [124548]

Angela Eagle: Sure Start Maternity Grant was introduced on 27 March of this year for babies due or born on or after 11 June. The Maternity Payment scheme remains in operation for babies due or born on or before 10 June. Both schemes will continue to run concurrently during the transitional period. In the first full month of the new payment's operation (up to 30 April), there were an estimated 5,224 claims. During the same period there were 8,430 claims for Maternity Payments. The number of claims made for Sure Start Maternity Grant will inevitably be lower now than they will be when claims for Maternity Payments finally come to an end.

To raise awareness of the new grant a special leaflet and poster have been produced jointly by this Department and the Department of Health. These are being distributed to outlets likely to be used by lower income families with newly born babies. The leaflet is included in a free pack that expectant mothers can obtain from Mothercare. The leaflet and a poster are being distributed through a number of major retail and pharmaceutical chains. They are also available through doctors' surgeries, through advisory organisations, through key Employment Service offices offering ONE and departmental local offices.

The leaflet and poster are available in Welsh as well as in English and are available in Braille and cassette versions. Information on Sure Start Maternity Grant is also included in departmental leaflets "Expecting a Baby?" and "Babies and Children". These are available in English, Welsh and eight ethnic languages. To coincide with the launch of the new payment, articles were placed in women's magazines. Advice on the grant can also be accessed through the departmental website pages.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will extend maternity benefit to those lower-paid women who are excluded from receiving payment; how many people will be beneficiaries of this payment; and if he will make a statement. [124550]

Mr. Bayley: More women will be able to qualify for Maternity Allowance (MA) under new rules which apply to women expecting babies on or after 20 August 2000. The improvements will extend MA to low-paid women who earn at least £30 a week on average, and who are employed or self-employed for 26 weeks in the 66 week period ending with the week before the week the baby is expected.

Around 11,000 employed women and 2,000 self-employed women will receive a maternity payment for the first time. The changes will also increase MA by 15 per cent. for around 11,000 self-employed women who, until now, received less MA than employed women.

Pensions

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people (a) are eligible for and (b) claim the state pension in (i) Scotland, (ii) Dumfries and Galloway and (iii) Galloway and Upper Nithsdale parliamentary constituency. [124729]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

There were an estimated 919,600 people of pensionable age resident in Scotland in mid-1998. It is not known how many of these were eligible for the State Retirement Pension.

31,800 people of pensionable age were estimated to be resident in Dumfries and Galloway unitary local authority in mid-1998 and 14,700 people of pensionable age were estimated to be resident in Galloway and Upper Nithsdale parliamentary constituency in 1991.

An estimated 875,500 people were receiving State Retirement Pension in Scotland in March 1999.

Notes:

1. Population of pensionable age defined as men aged 65 and over and women aged 60 and over.

2. Population estimates provided by the Office for National Statistics and are rounded to the nearest 100 persons.

3. Population estimates are not available at constituency level. Constituency level data are derived from the 1991 Census.

4. Numbers of retirement pension recipients derived from a 5 per cent. sample of the Pensions Computer Strategy System. Estimates rounded to nearest 100 persons. Local authority and constituency level data are not available.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the amount of the basic pension would be if it had been uprated in line with hon. Members' salaries since 1987. [124247]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 6 June 2000]: The basic State Pension for a single person in 1987 was £39.50 a week. By 2000 it would have been raised by a factor of 2.61, had it been increased in line with hon. Members salaries over this period.

By definition a salary would be presumed to be enough to live on whereas the basic State Pension is not intended to be more than the foundation of total pensioner income, which for the 1997–98 tax year averaged £132 per week net for a single pensioner, this is of course more than twice the level of the basic State Pension for that year.

Winter Fuel Payments

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were recipients of winter fuel payments in 1999–2000; how many people who were eligible he estimates did not take advantage of these payments; and if he will make a statement. [124546]

Angela Eagle: In the winter of 1999–2000 around 10 million people in over 7.5 million households received winter fuel payments.

In the first three winters of the winter fuel payment scheme, eligibility was based on receipt of one of a number of Social Security benefits. We were able to identify those eligible through the benefit computer systems, and then make payments automatically. There was therefore no need for anyone to claim their winter fuel payment, and all those eligible should have received the payment.

As a result of changes to the winter fuel payment eligibility rules announced in December 1999, it has been necessary to introduce a claims process so that people aged 60 and over can establish whether they are eligible. The new rules are being backdated to the beginning of the scheme in the winter of 1997–98. The claims process will enable newly eligible people, many of whom are not in receipt of benefits and who will therefore not be identifiable through the benefit computer systems, to claim their winter fuel payments for past winters. It is too early to say what proportion of the newly eligible population will apply for such payments.

Minimum Income Guarantee

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in (a) Scotland, (b) Dumfries and Galloway and (c) Galloway and Upper Nithsdale parliamentary constituency have claimed support under the minimum income guarantee. [124714]

Mr. Bayley: Approximately 21,000 new claims have been made for the minimum income guarantee in Scotland since its introduction in 1999.

Current numbers of pensioners in receipt of the minimum income guarantee—February 2000

Parliamentary Constituency/Local Authority Area/Country	Number
Scotland	162,000
Dumfries and Galloway Local Authority Area	4,000
Galloway and Upper Nithsdale Parliamentary Constituency	2,000

Notes:

1. Figures are rounded to the nearest thousand.
2. Pensioners are defined as a benefit unit where the claimant and/or partner are aged 60 or over.
3. Sample size 5 per cent.
4. Figures are allocated by matching the postcode against the 1999 version 2 of the Postcode Directory.

ONE Service

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the ONE service operation currently piloted in 12 locations will be extended to other areas; when the Portsmouth area will be covered; and if he will make a statement. [124554]

Angela Eagle: The 12 pilots of the new ONE service are planned to run until March 2002. The pilots have been designed to test the effectiveness of work-focused interviews for all working-age clients and to develop appropriate models for the integration and improvement of welfare services. No decision has yet been made as to when ONE might be extended beyond the current pilot areas.

Disability Living Allowance (Children)

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what percentage of children who had their first claim for Disability Living Allowance disallowed, appealed against the decision in (a) Halton, (b) the North West and (c) England and Wales in (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999; [123927]

(2) what percentages of children under the age of five years making their first claim for Disability Living Allowance, had their claim (a) disallowed and (b) allowed in (i) Halton, (ii) the North West and (iii) England and Wales in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999; [123928]

(3) how many children aged under five years in (a) Halton, (b) the North West and (c) England and Wales made a first claim for Disability Living Allowance in (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [123929]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of Disability Living Allowance is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Charlie MacKinnon to Mr. Derek Twigg, dated 6 June 2000:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Alexis Cleveland to respond to your recent Parliamentary Questions about claims for Disability Living Allowance (DLA). Due to annual leave I am replying on her behalf.

Information about claims for DLA is not available in relation to an individual constituency or an unsuccessful applicant. However, I am able to provide the information as shown in the attached appendices.

Information about children who had their first claim for DLA disallowed and then appealed against the decision is shown in Appendix 1.

The reviews figures noted in the tables refer to claims which were originally disallowed and then subsequently awarded as a result of a review by DLA. The appeal figures refer to claims that were originally disallowed, subject to a review and disallowed and then awarded as the result of an appeal.

The details about children under the age of five making their first claim for DLA are shown in Appendix 2.

It should be noted that figures held for Halton Parliamentary Constituency which are relevant, are unreliable because of the small number of cases in the 5% data source. The review figures quoted are for claims which were originally disallowed and awarded following a review and the appeals figures, are for claims which were disallowed after review and subsequently awarded as a result of an appeal.

I regret that figures held by the Department for all claims are not in a form that enables me to supply you with the information requested.

I hope this is helpful.

Pension Books

Mr. Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what performance targets exist for the issue of pension books; [124234]

(2) what is the average length of time it takes for a widow to receive her pension book from the date of bereavement; [124233]

(3) how many pension books have been recalled due to errors by the Benefits Agency in each of the past three years. [124235]

Mr. Rooker: The administration of benefits is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to my hon. Friend. If he has a particular constituency problem then perhaps he will write to me.

Letter from Charlie MacKinnon to Mr. Clive Efford, dated 6 June 2000:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Alexis Cleveland to reply to your recent Parliamentary questions about the performance targets for the issue of pension books, the average time it takes a widow to receive her pension book from the date of bereavement and the number of pension books that have been recalled due to errors by the Benefits Agency in each of the past three years. Due to annual leave I am replying on her behalf.

At April 2000, 56% of widows and retirement pensioners received their payments by order book, out of a customer base in excess of 11 million.

The Benefit Agency does not have a target for the issue of order books. It measures performance from the date a claim is received to the date the benefit is awarded. The current clearance targets for straightforward Retirement Pension claims is 95% within 60 days and for Widows Benefit claims 85% in 30 days. On average a Widows Benefit claim is awarded within seven days of receipt of the claim.

Once the benefit has been awarded on the Pension Strategy Computer System an electronic interface between that system and the Area Computer Centre arranges for the production and issue of the order book to the relevant destination. This can be the post office or the customer's home address.

I am unable to advise you of the number of pension books that have been recalled over the last three years due to Benefit Agency error as Pension order books are recalled for a number of reasons including changes in customer's circumstances. Detailed records are not kept on the reasons for recall.

I hope this is helpful.

Reciprocal Agreement (Yugoslavia)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what reciprocal agreement exists between the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia over the payment of social security benefit; which benefits it covers; if it applies to asylum seekers; and if he will make a statement. [125033]

Angela Eagle: The UK has had a bilateral social security agreement with the former Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia since 1958. Following the break-up of the Republic, the UK continues to apply the agreement to the now separate independent states until such time as revised agreements are entered into with them individually.

The agreement covers Retirement Pension, Widows Benefit, Incapacity Benefit, contribution-based Jobseeker's Allowance, Maternity Benefits, Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit and Child Benefit. Where a person does not fully satisfy the conditions for any of those benefits, the agreement can help them qualify if they have contributed to both countries' social security schemes. There is no special provision in the agreement for asylum seekers.

Fraud

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list those local authorities that have not introduced penalties for fraud under the Social Security (Fraud) Act 1997. [125100]

Angela Eagle: All local authorities have the power to offer administrative penalties to those shown to be claiming Housing Benefit fraudulently, as an alternative to criminal proceedings. From 1999–2000, local authorities have been asked to provide data on the number of penalties offered. These figures are not yet available.

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 25 May 2000, Official Report, column 619W, concerning market and opinion research, if he will list the title and purpose of each item of research. [124848]

Mr. Rooker: A title and brief description of all research commissioned under the Department's Research Programme, including public opinion research, can be found in the Department's Research Yearbook published annually. A copy of the annual Research Yearbook is available from the House of Commons Library.

In addition, the War Pensions Agency carries out an annual survey among its customers entitled "War Pensions Agency Customer Research Survey". The objective of this survey is to assist the Agency in determining the needs, expectations and satisfaction of current and future war pensioners.

A list of research conducted by the Communications Directorate since 1 May 1997 is available in the Library.

Integrated Child Credit

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the cost of introducing the integrated child credit; what steps are being taken to ensure that the scheme is delivered at the planned time; and if he will make a statement. [124549]

Dawn Primarolo: I have been asked to reply.

The integrated child credit announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget Speech will be introduced from 2003 and administered by the Inland Revenue alongside the employment tax credit.

The Budget Paper "Tackling Poverty and Making Work Pay: Tax Credits for the 21st century" gives more details of the proposals.

HEALTH

Surrey and Sussex Healthcare Trust

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will make a decision on the future provision of acute services by the Surrey and Sussex Healthcare Trust. [124945]

Ms Stuart: Ministers are fully aware of the strength of local feeling about this issue. A final decision, which will be made as soon as possible, will only be made in the best interests of the local community.

Correspondence

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will reply to the letter of 1 February from the hon. Member for Aylesbury about the case of Mrs. Sylvia Morgan. [125063]

Ms Stuart: Unfortunately, we do not appear to have received the hon. Members letter on behalf of Mrs. Sylvia Morgan. If he passes me a copy of the letter I will ensure that a response is forthcoming as soon as possible. I apologise for any inconvenience caused.

Norfolk and Norwich Hospital

Mrs. Shephard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many intensive care beds there were at the Norfolk and Norwich Hospital on (a) 1 June 2000 and (b) 1 April 1997. [125059]

Ms Stuart: The Norfolk and Norwich Hospital had six intensive care beds at 1 April 1997 and 1 June 2000. However, as part of their planning for the 1999–2000 winter period, the trust made provision for two additional intensive care beds by transferring resources from its high dependency beds, which reduced in number from six to four.

We have recently announced a significant investment of £150 million of additional resources to improve capacity of critical care services and the Eastern Regional Office of the National Health Service Executive is currently discussing with Norfolk and Norwich Health Care NHS Trust how the trust will improve its critical care services for the coming winter.

Organic Food

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent research his Department has carried out on the (a) composition and (b) impact on health of organic food. [118571]

Ms Stuart: The Department has not carried out any research on either the composition or impact on health of organic food.

Responsibility for matters relating to the safety and composition of food now rests with the Food Standards Agency. I am advised by the agency that although it has not carried out any research into the composition of organic food it is aware that a number of studies on this subject have been carried out over the last 10 years. I am also advised that the agency has a programme of research assessing microbiological safety issues that are relevant to the production of both organic and conventionally grown fruit and vegetables.

Mobile Phones

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to implement the recommendations of the Stewart Committee on Mobile Phones and Health. [122311]

Yvette Cooper: The Stewart report published on 11 May includes over 30 wide-ranging recommendations. We issued our initial response on the same day and copies are available in the Library. We will implement the research in a comprehensive programme costing several million pounds. We plan to launch this programme by September. Further discussions have been held with the Stewart Group about the provision of information to the public about the use of mobile phone technology. Other recommendations are being taken forward by the appropriate Government Departments and agencies.

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has commissioned on the health risks of (a) mobile telephones and (b) telecommunication masts; and if he will make a statement. [122354]

Yvette Cooper: The Department has funded two research projects on possible effects of radio frequency fields similar to those emitted by mobile phones and base stations. (i) a behavioural study of rodents and (ii) a human study involving psychological tests under simulated mobile phone use. The Department is also providing support for the World Health Organisation International Electromagnetic Fields Project and a multinational study of brain cancer and mobile phone use.

Preparations are currently under way to set up a substantial programme of research funded jointly by Government and industry. Details will now be taken forward in the light of the recommendations of the independent group on mobile phones and health (Stewart Report). This report was published on 11 May and copies have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research he has commissioned into the possible links between proximity to mobile phone transmitter masts and the development of cancers; and if he will make a statement. [124095]

Yvette Cooper: The Department has not commissioned any research into links between proximity to transmitter masts and cancers. The Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones (the Stewart group) was set up to investigate the broader public health implications of mobile phone technologies. The group's report was published on 11 May and copies are in the Library. The report includes a number of recommendations for research which are being taken forward by Government in a comprehensive programme of research costing several millions of pounds. It is planned to launch this programme by September.

Paramedics

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to increase the number of paramedics in the Ambulance Service. [122583]

Ms Stuart: We have invested a further £21 million this year to support the ambulances in meeting the new national response time performance standards. Meeting the 75 per cent. response time target for immediately life threatening emergencies will require the recruitment and training of significant numbers of paramedics. All 32 ambulance services have presented their plans for improving performance to the National Health Service Executive including the necessary paramedic work force requirements. Currently every frontline ambulance carries a fully trained paramedic.

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the role of paramedics in the Ambulance Service. [122582]

Ms Stuart: Ambulance paramedics have made a very valuable contribution to pre-hospital patient care over the past 10 years. They are playing an increasingly important role in saving lives, particularly the lives of people with heart attacks. Their responsibilities include providing life saving care and drugs to people with immediately life threatening medical conditions. That is why we supported their registration as Professions Supplementary to Medicine last year.

NHS (Financial Assistance)

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people each year receive financial assistance after appealing for help with NHS costs using an HC1 form. [122783]

Ms Stuart: In England for the year 1999–2000, the Health Benefits Division of the Prescription Pricing Authority issued around 542,000 National Health Service charges certificates (HC2) for full help and around 299,000 NHS Charges certificates (HC3) for limited help following an HC1 claim. People named on an HC2 would be entitled to full financial assistance with NHS costs (e.g. free NHS prescriptions) when they received treatment. People named on an HC3 would have been entitled to financial assistance with health costs (excluding prescription charges) on a sliding scale when they received treatment. The number of people who receive financial assistance in this way is not recorded.

Chlamydia Trachomatis

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the policies adopted following the recommendations of the Chief Medical Officer's Expert Advisory Group on screening for chlamydia trachomatis; what has been the outcome of the two pilot studies which were set up; and if he will make a statement. [123779]

Yvette Cooper: After considering the expert advice, we strengthened our national health promotion on chlamydia and set up a pilot screening programme to investigate the feasibility and acceptability of opportunistic screening. The pilot is under way and will run until 31 August. The results will be used to develop future policy on national screening programmes and we aim to identify possible policy options by the end of this year. These data will also be considered as part of the national sexual health strategy currently under development.

Surgical Instruments

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he has taken to ensure that surgical instruments used in NHS hospitals are sterile. [123724]

Yvette Cooper: The Department and the National Health Service are aware of the need to maintain high quality decontamination procedures to ensure that surgical instruments used in NHS hospitals are sterile. In August 1999, as part of the Department's initiatives on Infection Control, particularly relating to the risks posed by surgical instruments, a comprehensive package of extant decontamination guidance was issued free of charge to all NHS Trusts under Health Service Circular (HSC) 1999/179 Controls Assurance in Infection Control: Decontamination of Medical Devices.

The HSC emphasised the importance of implementing existing guidance on the cleaning and sterilisation of medical devices. We have also asked NHS Estates (an executive agency of the Department of Health) to undertake an assessment of current decontamination practices across healthcare sectors in England, including NHS hospitals. The review is due to be completed at the end of June 2000. The need for further policy, advice and guidance will then be reviewed.

Cancer

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the percentage of cancers in the United Kingdom which were caused by infections in the last year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [123795]

Yvette Cooper: There is some evidence to show that certain cancers may be linked to infections (notably stomach, liver, cervix, penis and Non-Hodgkins lymphoma). We are not able to identify the percentage of cases of these cancers which are caused in this way.

New Variant CJD

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for how long after the death of an individual that individual's medical records are kept; whether an individual's medical records are kept for a different length of time if they die from new variant CJD; and if he will make a statement. [124088]

Yvette Cooper: The Department issued guidance to healthcare organisations in 1998 and 1999 (Health Service Circulars 1999/053 and 1998/217), which advised that hospital medical records for deceased patients should be kept for a minimum of eight years and similar records held by general practitioners for a minimum of 10 years. Such records are often retained for a longer period of time in certain cases such as maternity and mental illness.

The National CJD Surveillance Unit collates detailed information on patients who have had CJD of any type, including copies of medical records wherever possible. It is expected that this information will be held by the unit for the foreseeable future.

Vaccines

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent advice his Department has (a) sought and (b) received concerning the effectiveness of the purification process for removing bovine material from vaccines in the early stages of manufacture; what assessment his Department has made of the effectiveness of this process; and if he will make a statement. [124086]

Yvette Cooper: For those vaccines which use bovine material in the early stages of their manufacture, manufacturers are required to provide supporting evidence to the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) that the purification process is properly controlled and validated, to ensure the removal of such material. The Committee on the Safety of Medicines advises the MCA on the suitability of the purification process and its validation.

Skin Cancer

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the recent inquiry commissioned by the NFU into the alleged link between skin cancer and pylon lines; and if he will make a statement. [123907]

Yvette Cooper: No assessment has been made into the alleged link referred to in the question although the general allegation of an association between power line and health effects has been widely researched. The Department of Health Radiation Protection Research Programme has its own ongoing investigations and also contributes to the World Health Organisation International Electromagnetic Fields Project. In 1992, the National Radiological Protection Board's (NRPB) Advisory Group on Non-ionising Radiation examined in detail the evidence for an association between the incidence of cancer and exposure to electromagnetic fields and concluded that there was no clear evidence of an adverse health effect at the levels of electromagnetic field to which the public is normally exposed. The NRPB Advisory Group keeps the relevant research under review and will be publishing a comprehensive overview of electromagnetic fields and cancer later this year.

Laptop Computers

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123737]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 25 May 2000]: The figures for laptop computers reported lost or stolen belonging to the Department and its agencies for the period covering May 1997 onwards are shown in the table.

Date	Number lost or stolen
1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998	23
1 April 1998 to 31 March 1999	19
1 April 1999 to 31 March 2000	18
1 April 2000 to 31 May 2000	1
Total	61

Farnham Hospital

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library the NHS press notices in which Farnham Hospital is named for the past three years. [124229]

Ms Stuart: This information is not held centrally.

Officials at South East Regional Office have, therefore, asked West Surrey and North and Mid Hampshire Health Authorities for copies of all National Health Service press notices issued in the past three years in which Farnham Hospital is named.

These will be placed in the Library in due course.

Alcohol Abuse

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to publish a national strategy for dealing with alcohol abuse; and if he will make a statement. [124699]

Yvette Cooper: We plan to publish a consultation paper later this year, which will allow a period for comment, prior to the publication of the strategy.

MMR Vaccines

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Taunton (Jackie Ballard) of 3 April 2000, Official Report, column 349W, on MMR vaccines, if he will provide the (a) current and (b) projected total costs of meningitis C vaccine purchased by the NHS as part of the current vaccination programme. [123166]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The cost of vaccine purchase is commercially confidential. However, at the end of the programme we hope to be able to give an aggregate cost for the whole programme including vaccine purchase, distribution, implementation, information and publicity.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Butler Report

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Solicitor-General if the report by His Honour Gerald Butler QC concerning the handling of the case of R v. Doran and others has been delivered; what information concerning it will be published; and what action the Government plans to take in response. [124941]

The Solicitor-General: The report by His Honour Gerald Butler QC was delivered on 14 April. On 22 July 1999, Official Report, columns 607–09, the Attorney-General indicated the Government's intention to make a summary of the report and its recommendations available to both Houses. In the event, it is possible to make the report available in full, and the Attorney-General has therefore today lodged a copy of the report in the Libraries of both Houses, together with a copy of the Government's response. In addition, the summary included in the report and the inquiry's recommendations, together with the Government's response to them, are being made publicly available on the HM Customs and Excise internet site (http://www.hmce/gov.uk), and copies of the full report will be available on request from HM Customs and Excise at a cost of £8.

All the recommendations made to the Attorney-General in the report which are capable of acceptance immediately have been accepted. Further work is required by other recommendations and such work is being set in hand.

With the agreement of the Chairman of Customs and Excise Commissioners, His Honour John Gower QC, assisted by Sir Anthony Hymenoid KCB QC, has agreed to carry out an immediate review of the role of Customs as a prosecuting authority. The terms of reference are:

> Having regard to the Butler Report and the Hosker Report, the tripartite system operated within Customs and Excise in relation to the investigation and prosecution of offences, and to all other relevant considerations, to examine
> (1) whether or not some or all of the prosecutions at present conducted by the Solicitor's Office of HM Customs and Excise should continue to be conducted by that Office;

(2) to the extent that it is concluded that the Solicitor's Office should not continue to conduct some or all of those prosecutions, whether such prosecutions should be conducted by an existing prosecution authority, or by some other body.

and to make recommendations.

The Attorney-General anticipates receiving this report by the end of October this year.

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Solicitor-General what targets he has set the Crown Prosecution Service in respect of the number and duration of adjournments in magistrates courts proceedings. [125038]

The Solicitor-General: No specific targets have been set by the Crown Prosecution Service in respect of adjournments. The service is working with other criminal justice partners to reduce the number of avoidable adjournments, which impact on a number of the Government's over-arching objectives for the criminal justice system; particularly those for dealing with cases with appropriate speed and meeting the needs of victims and witnesses. Adjournments may be caused by a combination of factors not necessarily within the control of any one agency, and it would not be appropriate to target the prosecution alone.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Solicitor-General how many Crown Prosecution Service inspectors there are; how many (a) are women, (b) are from ethnic minorities, (c) have disabilities and (d) were formerly Crown Prosecution Service prosecutors, and in what grades; and if he will make a statement. [125078]

The Solicitor-General: There are three categories of inspector within the Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate—casework inspectors, business management inspectors and legal inspectors at levels B2, D and E respectively. The breakdown by reference to gender and ethnic origin is set out in the table.

	Male	Female	Ethnic minority
Casework Inspectors	0	5	2
Business Management	1	[1]	0
Legal Inspectors	8	6	2

[1] This person has been appointed and takes up the post on 12 June 2000.

The Chief Inspector and three Group Directors (SCS level) are all male. None comes from an ethnic minority. No inspector has declared himself/herself disabled.

The Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate at present constitutes a unit within the CPS, but will become an independent statutory body subject to enactment and implementation of the Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate Bill now before Parliament. All staff are at present therefore employed by the CPS. It is intended that the Inspectorate should in future be staffed by a combination of inspectors who have served in the CPS and others who have not and will therefore bring an external perspective to its work.

Most inspectors are now recruited by open competition. Ten out of 14 legal inspectors served in the CPS immediately before joining the CPS; one served in HM Customs and Excise (although she had in the past been employed by the CPS); one served as a trade union national officer for four years (while remaining employed by the CPS); and two joined from private practice. Both business management inspectors were recruited by one competition from outside the civil service. The casework inspectors all joined the Inspectorate from the CPS itself.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Solicitor-General how many Crown Prosecution Service inspectors have undergone race awareness training; what the training consisted of; and if he will make a statement. [125079]

The Solicitor-General: With the exception of three inspectors who joined in April and May 2000, all inspectors have had racial awareness training. The common features of the training may be summarised as follows:

1. All the staff with line management responsibility have been required to attend a formal course run by the CPS on Human Awareness and Racial Equality.
2. All staff have been required to participate in discussion groups based on a showing of the CPS Equality and Diversity video.
3. An Inspectorate training event (involving all staff) in May 1999 incorporated separate presentations and discussion sessions led by a senior lawyer within CPS Policy Directorate and by the Director for Criminal Justice and Race at NACRO. A similar training event in May 2000 included a presentation by a senior lawyer within CPS Policy Directorate and by the Director for Criminal Justice and Race at NACRO. Newly appointed inspectors will undergo race awareness training as part of a personal development plan which all staff must have. The Inspectorate keeps under review the need for training to ensure that no discriminatory practices occur within the Inspectorate itself; in addition, inspectors must be properly equipped to examine diversity issues in all aspects of the inspection process.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Solicitor-General, pursuant to his answer of 14 February 2000, Official Report, column 369W, on the Crown Prosecution Service, if the Crown Prosecution Service has completed its consideration of how the recommendations of the Employment Tribunal in its decision in the case of Bamieh v. CPS (Case No. 2202655(98)), concerning temporary acting-up posts should be met; and if he will make a statement. [125104]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service has implemented the Employment Tribunal's recommendation concerning temporary acting-up posts as Prosecution Team Leader. With effect from 29 February 2000, such opportunities have been advertised in the weekly guide to CPS business which is circulated to all CPS staff. The CPS will be monitoring each acting-up appointment and at the end of the twelve-month period covered by the recommendation will be considering whether this practice should be adopted permanently into the Department's deputising and temporary promotion procedures.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Solicitor-General if all Chief Crown Prosecutors have received race awareness training; if the Equality Committee of the Crown Prosecution Service has completed its review of training; and if he will make a statement. [125107]

The Solicitor-General: All Chief Crown Prosecutors have seen an internal video to raise awareness of equality issues in the Crown Prosecution Service. In addition, the Chief Crown Prosecutors discussed the issues raised at their recent (April) conference. All of the 42 CCPs and ACCPs have attended a formal training event for racial equality and human awareness. The Equality Committee has agreed an action plan to review and amend the content of 60 internal courses and a number of new courses by the end of December 2000.

DEFENCE

Medical and Dental Officers

Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the pay of medical and dental officers in the armed forces. [125580]

Mr. Hoon: The Armed Forces Pay Review Body has made recommendations on the pay of medical and dental officers in the armed forces. Consistent with the awards recommended by the Doctors' and Dentists' Review Body, and to maintain comparability with the salary scales of NHS doctors, the Review Body recommends that all medical and dental officers should receive a general 3.3 per cent. increase in basic pay. The Review Body also recommends a number of additions to the pay scales for consultants and general medical practitioners to reflect additional payments already agreed for comparators in the NHS. In addition, Service medical and dental officers receive the same rate of X-factor as combatants, which increased by 1 per cent. from 1 April 2000.

The Government have decided to accept the Review Body's recommendations and these will be payable in full from 1 April 2000.

Service Children's Education Agency

Jean Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Service Children's Education Agency for the financial year 2000–01. [125579]

Dr. Moonie: The Chief Executive has been set the following Key Targets for 2000–01:

To meet the following percentage of pupils achieving Level 2 at the end of Key Stage 1 in:

Reading—88 per cent.

Writing—91 per cent.

Spelling—75 per cent.

Mathematics—92 per cent.

To meet the following percentage of pupils achieving Level 4 at the end of Key Stage 2 in:

English—78 per cent.

Mathematics—76 per cent.

Science—81 per cent.

To meet the following percentage of pupils achieving Level 5 at the end of Key Stage 3 in:

English—82 per cent.

Mathematics—71 per cent.

Science—71 per cent.

To maintain a three year rolling average percentage of Year 11 pupils in SCE achieving five or more higher (A*-C) grades in GCSE of 47 per cent.

To meet a three year rolling average of subject entries achieving passes at grades A-C level of 56 per cent.

To achieve as a minimum a "satisfactory" standard in each OFSTED school inspection.

To respond in full to customers seeking educational advice from SCE(UK) within the following timescales:

92 per cent. within 10 working days of receipt (remainder within 20 working days of receipt).

To develop a pilot scheme in 2000–01 to produce a measurement of "value added" in SCE schools for 2001–02.

To achieve index of satisfaction with SCE within the Army Spouses Continuous Attitude Survey above 362 overall.

Budget Allocations

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the budget allocation is for (1) the Defence Dental Agency for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation; [125088]

(2) the Army Training and Recruiting Agency for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation; [125096]

(3) the Army Training and Recruiting Agency for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation; [125087]

(4) the Army Base Repair Organisation for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation; [125095]

(5) the Defence Clothing and Textiles Agency for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation; [125093]

(6) the Defence Housing Executive for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation; [125089]

(7) the Army Technical Support Agency for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation; [125097]

(8) the Defence Aviation Repair Agency for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation; [125091]

(9) the Defence Communication Services for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation; [125086]

(10) the Armed Forces Personnel Administration Agency for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation; [125094]

(11) the Defence Analytical Services Agency for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation; [125090]

(12) the Defence Bills Agency for the financial year 2000–01; and when the agency received its budget allocation. [125092]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is set out in the table.

Agency	Budget allocation (£ million)	Date agreed
Armed Forces Personnel Administration Agency	54.416	31 May 2000
Army Base Repair Organisation	65.28	22 May 2000

Tanker Ships

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what commercial tanker ships his Department has chartered to move fuel between British naval bases in the past 12 months. [125085]

Mr. Spellar: In the past 12 months the Ministry of Defence has not chartered any commercial tanker ships to move fuel between British naval bases.

HMS Cambridge

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the closure of HMS Cambridge. [125010]

Mr. Spellar: The proposed closure of HMS Cambridge is now subject to formal consultation, which is not due to complete until 26 June 2000, and a formal statement on the closure cannot be made until after this date. However the recommendations of the Investment Appraisal were that, following the cessation of live gunnery firing at HMS Cambridge, it was likely that the remainder of the establishment's training activity, namely Non Firing Gunnery Training, Board and Search Training and Naval Military Training, could be delivered more cost-effectively elsewhere. Indications are that the earliest date that a co-ordinated closure could be achieved is April 2001. Live firing for initial and career course training ceased in October 1999.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what savings will accrue from the closure of HMS Cambridge. [125056]

Mr. Spellar: Following the cessation of live gunnery firing at HMS Cambridge, it was likely that the remainder of the establishment's training activity, namely, Non Firing Gunnery Training, Board and Search Training and Naval Military Training, could be delivered more cost-effectively elsewhere. The completed Investment Appraisal shows that, against a capital cost of £7.8 million, the projected overall savings to the Ministry of Defence over the 25 years appraisal period would be £112 million (net present value £49 million). The capital cost is for transferring training to HMS Raleigh, HMS Collingwood and HMS Dryad.

Missiles

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what live-fire training exercises are planned to take place in the next 12 months using Sea Eagle missiles. [125005]

Mr. Spellar: I am withholding this information in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, which relates to Defence, Security and International Relations.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what training exercises involving the live firing of Sea Eagle missiles have taken place in each of the past 10 years. [125081]

Mr. Spellar: I am withholding this information in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, which relates to Defence, Security and International Relations.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what training exercises involving the live firing of Exocet missiles have taken place in each of the past 10 years. [125008]

Mr. Spellar: I am withholding this information in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, which relates to Defence, Security and International Relations.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to procure further stocks of Exocet missiles for use by the Royal Navy. [125006]

Mr. Spellar: We have no plans to procure further stocks of Exocet missiles for use by the Royal Navy. The Exocet missile system has been gradually withdrawn from service since October 1997 as it has become obsolete. The removal of the Exocet system from service is more than adequately offset by other very capable systems deployed in many other ships in the Royal Navy, including the superior Harpoon Anti Ship missile.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what stocks of (a) Exocet, (b) Sea Eagle and (c) Sea Dart missiles are retained by the Royal Navy. [125011]

Mr. Spellar: Both Exocet and Sea Eagle were formally removed from Royal Navy service in 1999 and all remaining missile stocks are currently subject to disposal action.

The Sea Dart remains in operational service. Accordingly, I am withholding detailed information on this system in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, which relates to Defence, Security and International Relations.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if Exocet missiles are routinely carried by Type 22 Frigates in service. [125007]

Mr. Spellar: Exocet missiles are no longer in Naval service, and none are carried by Type 22 Frigates in service.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what upgrade and refurbishment work is planned to take place on the Royal Navy's stock of (a) Exocet and (b) Sea Dart missiles in the next 12 months. [125012]

Mr. Spellar: The Royal Navy's Exocet missiles have become obsolete and have gradually been withdrawn from service. Therefore no upgrade or refurbishment work on these weapons is planned. The removal of the Exocet system from Service has been offset by other very capable systems deployed throughout the Royal Navy. A contract for the final phase of the Sea Dart missile refurbishment programme was placed on 23 May 2000. This is to ensure that the Royal Navy has sufficient serviceable Sea Dart missiles until 2015, the current planned out of service date for the weapon system.

Meet Your Navy Programme

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which ships have been withdrawn from the Meet Your Navy programme running from 26 May to 9 July. [125058]

Mr. Spellar: RFA Fort George was withdrawn from the Meet Your Navy programme to support operational commitments in Sierra Leone, but has been replaced by RFA Olna.

Nuclear Submarines

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many submariners are allocated to crew each decommissioned nuclear submarine. [125057]

Mr. Spellar: Eleven nuclear submarines have left RN service, of which two continue to be manned by a reduced ship's company (Valiant with 22 personnel and Renown with 43 personnel) until they complete the de-fuel, de-equipping and lay-up process.

Partnership for Peace

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when his Department's officials last met their Croatian counterparts; and what discussions were held on the Partnership for Peace initiative. [125003]

Mr. Hoon: My officials last met their Croatian counterparts for UK-Croatia Bilateral Defence Talks held in the UK on 19 April 2000. The Croatian delegation was led by the Assistant Minister for Policy, Mr. Ivan Kozlica, who covered a wide range of subjects focusing on the new Government's commitment to root and branch reform of the armed forces.

Discussions also touched upon Croatia's potential entry into the Partnership for Peace (PfP) programme. The Croatian delegation reiterated not only their Government's strong commitment to meeting the internationally agreed conditions for PfP membership, but also Croatia's intention to play a more constructive role in regional security.

Given the momentous political changes over the last six months the UK was pleased to support Croatia's early admission to PfP, which was achieved at the Florence Ministerial on 24 and 25 May.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the role Britain has played in Partnership for Peace activities with Croatia. [125004]

Mr. Hoon: Croatia was admitted to the Partnership for Peace programme during the Florence Ministerials on 24 and 25 May 2000 and is now eligible to participate in Partnership for Peace (PfP) activities. Prior to that date Croatia, not being a PfP member, did not take part in PfP activities. Croatia is now deciding on the activities in which she will participate and will be an effective contributor to PfP.

Israel

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many visits have been made by Defence Procurement Agency personnel to Israel in the last year. [117560]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 3 April 2000]: This information is not held centrally, but from a survey of the present DPA organisation I understand that there were 13 such visits by staff.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Enterprise and Skills Development

14. Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what initiatives his Department have established within schools to encourage the development of enterprise and skills relevant to business. [123347]

Jacqui Smith: The new National Curriculum, which will be introduced in schools from autumn, encourages schools to provide enterprise education to develop pupils' confidence, self-reliance and willingness to embrace change. We are also working with the Department of Trade and Industry to develop a website to support teachers in this.

Physical Education

15. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress has been made in reaching the target of two hours physical education a week for pupils at all key stage levels. [123348]

Jacqui Smith: We have set a very clear aspiration that all schools should provide two hours of physical activity a week, both within and outside lesson time. We are now working to inspire schools and partners in the sports sector to deliver this through the Sport Strategy.

New Deal (Over-50s)

16. Mr. Anthony D. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the Government's new deal for the over-50s. [123349]

Ms Jowell: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister launched New Deal 50 Plus nationally in April and I am pleased to announce that in its first four weeks over 1,700 people have gone back to work with the help of the Employment Credit. We plan to spend a total of £270 million to the end of this Parliament on this targeted help for people over 50 looking for work.

Employment Service Direct

17. Mr. Singh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average weekly number of jobs secured through the Employment Service Direct. [123351]

Ms Jowell: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton), Official Report, column 410.

Our most recent records show that between January 1999, when Employment Service Direct began, and 19 May 2000, the average weekly number of jobseekers who have been helped by the Service is 1,148.

Between January 2000 and 19 May 2000, the average weekly number is 1,319.

New Deal (Yorkshire and Humberside)

18. Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many employers have signed up to support the New Deal in the Yorkshire and Humberside region. [123352]

Ms Jowell: By the end of April, 7,000 employers in Yorkshire and the Humber Region had signed agreements supporting the New Deal.

Failing Schools

19. Mr. Geraint Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what incentives he is planning to encourage successful teachers to move to work in failing schools. [123353]

Ms Estelle Morris: The new pay system for teachers, which comes into effect from 1 September 2000, will introduce more flexibility for schools to make recruitment and retention payments to classroom teachers in challenging situations. From September such payments will be worth up to £3,765 for schools in inner London in special measures, and can be paid as salary enhancements or as one-off bonuses. In September 1999 we introduced flexibility within the pay system to offer head teachers significantly increased rewards if they perform well at schools deemed as failing.

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received on the number of failing schools. [123343]

Ms Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received a wide range of representations on failing schools from hon. Members and other interested parties. We are particularly encouraged that because of decisive action by this Government, the time it takes to turn around a failing school has fallen from 25 months under the Conservatives to 18 months now. The imposition of a deadline for improvement has been the key factor in this.

New Deal (Administrative Burden)

20. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the burden of administration for employers wishing to participate in the New Deal. [123354]

Ms Jowell: The New Deal is an unqualified success. 70,000 employers have signed up to New Deal and over 200,000 young people have left and found jobs. Paperwork is kept to a minimum needed to safeguard public funds.

Information and Communication Technology Learning Centres

21. Mrs. Betty Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the development of information and communication technology learning centres. [123355]

Mr. Wills: In the March 1999 Budget the Chancellor announced the development of around 700 ICT Learning Centres across England. The initiative is targeted at disadvantaged communities, including: the 2,000 most deprived local authority wards; rural areas with significant transport and deprivation problems; and disadvantaged client groups with low or no ICT skills.

This initiative centres on people living and working in the most disadvantaged communities and will provide access to ICT and learning into disadvantaged communities to bridge the gap between those in society who have access to ICT and those who do not. Early centres were announced in October. A further round of centres were announced in January when the prospectus for the main rollout of the programme was published. Over 300 applications have been received for the first phase of the programme. The first successful projects will be announced in September.

Employment Zones

22. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of Employment Zones in helping the long-term unemployed into work. [123356]

Ms Jowell: It is too early to assess the effectiveness of the 15 Employment Zones that were launched in April and May of this year. The Zones will be operational until March 2002 and we will, of course, be monitoring and evaluating their progress over the next two years.

Performance-related Pay

23. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the anticipated take-up rate of performance-related pay for teachers. [123357]

Ms Estelle Morris: All teachers who apply for assessment at the performance threshold and are assessed as meeting the national standards will pass. We have set no limits on take-up.

24. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment upon what aspects of his performance-related pay proposals teachers from the SEN sector have made representations. [123358]

Ms Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received a variety of representations on the new pay structure for teachers, including a number from heads and teachers involved in providing for SEN. He has made clear his intention that teachers from the SEN sector should be able to benefit from the new pay system in the same way as other teachers.

33. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent representations he has received on performance-related pay for teachers. [123368]

Ms Estelle Morris: On 2 May we launched consultation on the draft School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Document with the statutory consultees. These are the organisations we are required to consult with as part of the Review body process: teaching and headteachers' unions, governors' representatives and the National Employers. The consultation will run until 2 June. We will take the consultation responses into account in finalising the text of the Pay and Conditions Document, which will come into force from September 2000.

Specialist Schools

25. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many Sports Colleges he expects will result from the next round of specialist school designations. [123359]

Ms Estelle Morris: All of the applications received in the June 2000 Sports College competition will be considered in relation to the published criteria. It is not possible at this stage to estimate the number of designations we will make. We expect to be on schedule to reach the target of 110 Sports Colleges by 2003 as set out in the recent Sports Strategy "A Sporting Future for All".

Top-up Student Fees

26. Mr. Rammell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on his response to the Russell Group of Universities' proposals for top-up student fees. [123360]

Mr. Wicks: The Government have legislated to prevent higher education institutions from charging "top-up" tuition fees. We are putting increased resources into higher education. This is an 11 per cent. increase in real terms amounting to an extra £1 billion in the four years from 1998.

Adult Literacy and Numeracy

27. Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on his plans to improve levels of adult literacy and numeracy. [123361]

Mr. Wicks: The Government are committed to tackling poor literacy and numeracy among adults. Last year we announced an additional £17 million to support the first phase of our campaign, and many of the new measures announced at the time are now in place or are well on the way. On 22 May my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment dedicated a further £20.25 million this year to improving adult and family literacy and numeracy skills. He will announce a full national strategy later this year and is putting in place a new Adult Basic Skills Strategy Unit within this Department to drive forward its implementation.

New Deal (Subsidised Employment Option)

28. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of people on the New Deal are undertaking a subsidised employment option; and what proportion of people having taken this route have remained in employment with the same employer six months after the subsidy has finished. [123362]

Ms Jowell: At the end of February 2000, 129,000 young people were on the New Deal. Of these, 8 per cent. (10,600) were on the Employment Option.

We do not collect separate figures for the numbers of young people who remain with the same employer six months after the subsidy finishes. The findings from a survey of employers will be published in the autumn.

Higher Education

29. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on progress towards meeting Government targets for increased participation rates in full-time education for young people aged 18 to 21 years. [123363]

Mr. Wicks: The Government's plans provide scope for participation by young people aged less than 21 entering full-time higher education undergraduate courses to reach 35 per cent. by 2002. Some 31 per cent. entered in autumn 1998; information on those who entered in autumn 1999 will be available by end summer 2000.

Other than this there are no Government targets specifically concerned with the full-time participation in education of those aged 18–21.

Agency Lecturers

30. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received regarding the use of agency lecturers by colleges. [123365]

Mr. Wicks: We have been very disturbed by reports about the treatment of staff by some employment agencies, and suggestions that some have sought to circumvent employment legislation. We are working closely with the Department of Trade and Industry, which is in the final stages of revising the regulations which govern the conduct of employment agencies. We hope to have these in place later this year. We remain committed to ensuring that all those in the work place, whether they find work through agencies or otherwise, are treated fairly.

Early Years Learning

31. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps his Department is taking to evaluate European best practice in early years learning. [123366]

Ms Hodge: The research and evaluation division of my Department maintains a watching brief on research which is being undertaken in other European countries, to assess good practice in early years learning and to inform the development of policy in this country. We are participating currently in a Thematic Review of Early Childhood Education and Care Policy, which is being undertaken by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). The OECD review will compare practice in 12 countries, including the UK, and is expected to publish its report in 2001. The report will provide objective commentary on policy and practice in the UK, within an international context.

Dance and Drama Students

32. Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on support for dance and drama students. [123367]

Mr. Wicks: The Dance and Drama Awards announced by my right hon. Friend on 27 November 1998 have been a great success. These scholarships have been taken up fully and over 830 students have started training. A similar allocation has been made for the second intake in September 2000.

The awards have enabled an unprecedented number of students from low income families to enter training and to study for further and higher education qualifications. We have increased the level of maintenance available to further education students by 300 per cent. to £3,000 a year, to support them through their training. Students on higher education courses have access to the same financial support as other undergraduates, including student loans.

Other dance and drama students also have access to support towards their fees and maintenance in the publicly maintained further and higher education sectors.

Manufacturing Training

34. Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures his Department has taken to improve training for work in manufacturing industry. [123369]

Mr. Wicks: We are creating the Learning and Skills Council, which will work closely with National Training Organisations to address workforce development for all sectors, including Engineering Manufacture.

My Department has recognised a network of 76 National Training Organisations (NTOs) to provide the pivotal role in helping to modernise the education and training system needed to deliver the skills for greater competitiveness and employability. We have supported NTOs in several initiatives, including the development of Foundation Modern Apprenticeships, Advanced Modern Apprenticeships and National Vocational Qualifications (NVQs).

Remploy

35. Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what funding has been provided to Remploy to enable it to implement its modernisation strategy. [123370]

Ms Hodge: I was pleased to announce on 12 May that the Government would be providing £5 million to help Remploy carry out its modernisation strategy. This is on top of the £1.5 million that we made available to Remploy last year and a further £1.5 million for this year to support the restructuring of their factory provision. This, along with the proposals for modernising supported employment I also announced on 12 May, will increase greatly the numbers of disabled people moving into mainstream employment.

New Deal

37. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the efficacy of the New Deal. [123372]

Ms Jowell: The latest figures show that by the end of February 2000, 199,340 young people had gained jobs through the New Deal for Young People. These figures highlight the excellent progress we are making towards our commitment to help 250,000 young people into work through the New Deal in the lifetime of this Parliament.

Evaluation from independent organisations show that approximately 50 per cent. of those leaving unemployment through New Deal would not have done so in the absence of the programme.

Furthermore, three quarters of young people believe that the personal adviser played a pivotal role in supporting them through New Deal. This continuity and support is unlike anything seen on previous programmes.

Thames Gateway

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on plans to increase employment opportunities in the Thames Gateway area. [123371]

Ms Jowell: The Government attach great priority to the Thames Gateway. We want the area to become a hub for development and regeneration. We have therefore announced plans to establish a Strategic Partnership and Excellence Body, designed to give a new momentum to development in the area and to ensure that regeneration and economic expansion can be delivered in a sustainable way.

In the light of the job losses announced by Ford in Dagenham, my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment have announced a 10 point plan for the regeneration of the area. The Employment Service already has a presence on the site through its job shop. There will also be a role for the TECs initially, and subsequently the Learning and Skills Councils, for Business Links and then for the Small Business Services. We are in discussions with Ford about the wider implications for local businesses and for those in the supply chain.

Schools Standards and Framework Act 1998

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which sections of the Schools Standards and Framework Act 1998 have not yet been subject to a commencement order. [122500]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following sections of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 are not in force:

Section:

39 (1) (partly in force: for the purpose of making regulations only)

112 (3)

115 (2),(3)

128

134 (2)

Schedule:

30, paragraph 28 (2)(b) repealed (never in force)

30, paragraph 64,65

30, paragraph 70 (partly in force)

30, paragraph 109 (partly in force)

30, paragraph 114 (partly in force)

30, paragraph 116 (partly in force)

30, paragraph 138

30, paragraph 185 (partly in force)

31, (partly in force)

FHE Institutions (Criminal Records)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will issue guidance to institutions of (a) further and (b) higher education in respect of the admission of applicants with criminal records. [123249]

Mr. Wicks: In November 1999, the Further Education Funding Council (FEFC) extended the funding of widening participation to new categories of student. One such category was ex-offenders. The Council has introduced a new code in the Individualised Student Record (ISR) to show that additional funding is being claimed for widening participation because the student is an ex-offender. Some colleges asked whether they would be required to ask all students at enrolment whether they were ex-offenders. The Council provided written advice to all colleges that this was not the case. Where a student's eligibility for widening participation emerges during their programme of study, the institution may amend its data and the additional funding will be allocated for the whole of the teaching year covered by the ISR return. Information provided on enrolment forms is collected and used by the FEFC for the collection and analysis of statistical data, and is shared with other organisations for the purposes of detecting fraud. The FEFC is registered under the Data Protection Act 1984. There are no plans for the introduction of guidance to further education institutions in respect of the criminal records of applicants for admissions at the present time.

In respect of Higher Education, the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS) application form includes a declaration by the applicant about criminal convictions. If this section is not completed, the form is returned to the applicant and it is not processed until it is. Institutions, however, may make their own decision about whether there are still concerns about an applicant.

The declaration was included in the application process two years ago in response to concerns that in a few instances victim and attacker had been accepted by the same institution. There is no guidance from UCAS to institutions about how they should deal with applicants with convictions—it is purely a matter for individual institutions. However, some professions have their own guidelines—for example, teaching and social work—which would guide institutions. The UCAS process also covers some further education institutions offering courses of higher education.

Citizenship Studies

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will define those elements of citizenship studies which are affected by the new international dimension to the national curriculum; and if he will make a statement. [124748]

Jacqui Smith: International issues are currently covered in a number of National Curriculum subjects, such as Geography and History. From September 2002, when Citizenship will become statutory in secondary schools, pupils aged 11–14 will be taught about the world as a global community, and the political, economic, environmental and social implications of this, and the role of the European Union, the Commonwealth and the United Nations, and pupils aged 14–16 will cover the opportunities for individuals and voluntary bodies to bring about social change in Europe and internationally; the United Kingdom's relations in Europe, including the European Union, and relations with the Commonwealth and the United Nations, and the wider issues and challenges of global interdependence and responsibility.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment on how many occasions since 31 March 1999 (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental special advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity. [124127]

Mr. Blunkett [holding answer 5 June 2000]: During the period 31 March 1999 to 31 March 2000, special advisers in this Department travelled overseas on two occasions. All travel complied with the requirements of the Ministerial Code and the Civil Service Management Code.

Teachers and Lecturers (Salaries)

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the starting salary for (a) a newly qualified teacher and (b) a further education college lecturer in England. [124171]

Ms Estelle Morris: A newly qualified teacher with a second class honours degree or above starts at £16,050 pa; others start at £15,141 pa. If they work in London they also receive London allowances ranging from £591 pa to £2,316 pa. All schools can make additional payments to teachers to address recruitment and retention difficulties. From 1 September 2000 these allowances will range from £909 pa to £3,765 pa.

It is for each college in the further education sector to decide the salary of its staff. The Sixth Form Colleges' Employers' Forum recommend a minimum starting salary of £15,412 for teachers in Sixth Form Colleges who have a second class honours degree or better.

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the maximum pay for (a) a qualified teacher in England and (b) a further education college lecturer, on average, in England. [124172]

Ms Estelle Morris: The pay reforms that we are introducing from 1 September introduce two pay ranges for teachers. The maximum that a classroom teacher can earn purely by incremental progression is £23,958 pa. However, they will then be able to apply for "threshold assessment" and if successful will move to an upper pay range which starts at £25,959. They will have the prospect of moving through four further points, subject to strong performance, to a maximum of £30,018 pa. Classroom teachers may also receive other payments on top of their basic pay. These include: London allowances ranging from £591 pa to £2,316 pa; recruitment and retention allowances ranging from £909 pa to £3,765 pa; management allowances ranging from £1,485 pa to £9,573 pa; and special educational needs allowances ranging from £1,515 pa to £3,000 pa.

It is for each college in the further education sector to decide the salary of its staff. Statistics on average salaries of further education staff are not held centrally.

Primary Pupils (Spending)

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 9 November 1999, Official Report, column 525W, on primary school pupils, when he will write to the hon. Member for South Derbyshire. [124428]

Ms Estelle Morris: The figures required to enable me to reply to my hon. Friend's earlier question are expected to become available shortly. I shall write to him and place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Online Computer Training Initiative

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how the UK online Computer Training initiative will be evaluated; if there will be a control group; and if he will make a statement. [124663]

Mr. Wills: The UK online Computer Training initiative will be evaluated firstly by collecting data for a monthly management information report. This will be available from the beginning of August. Further and more detailed reports will be produced in September. The longer-term evaluation of the initiative will be carried out in April 2001. Evaluation will track individual clients to see how the course has altered their chances of employability. We are interested to find out how provision like this can make a change for people who may be at risk of missing out on the benefits of ICT skills in the modern work place.

The control group for this initiative will be drawn from people who have not attended the course and will allow us to make a direct comparison between people who have attended the course and those who have not.

Once we have established what the scheme has achieved I will make a statement as to how we can apply the lessons we have learned.

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people he estimates will participate in the UK online Computer Training initiative. [124664]

Mr. Wills: Government Offices for the regions have contracted for 50,000 courses to be offered in England under UK online Computer Training. Clients will be directed to courses via the learndirect service. Demand for the courses has been very high: Learndirect received their hundred-thousandth inquiry about this scheme on 6 June 2000. While we anticipate that 50,000 people will benefit directly from the training, we believe that the advertising that supports the scheme will lead people into other courses as well. We will evaluate the benefit to other schemes of the advertising campaign for the UK online Computer Training initiative.

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how long the UK online Computer Training initiative will operate. [124665]

Mr. Wills: UK online Computer Training is a one year initiative and is due to complete in March 2001. The future of the initiative will be decided once reliable management information becomes available and a sound evaluation has been carried out. It is still very early in the life of this initiative, although early indications are very favourable.

School Science Laboratories

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures his Department has implemented to update school science laboratory facilities. [124796]

Jacqui Smith: Under the New Deal for Schools programme, 151 projects for improving science laboratories have been funded at a cost of just under £37 million. A further £60 million is being allocated from the Capital Modernisation Fund to tackle deficiencies in school science over the next two years. This will enable around 400 more improvement projects to be implemented at those schools most in need.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 21 December 1999, Official Report, column 554W, concerning secondments, which of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124817]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 7 June 2000]: All of the secondments listed were for a period of 12 months or less, with the exception of the secondment from Glaxo Wellcome which lasted for a period of 14 months.

Computers for Teachers Scheme

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what assessment he has made of the efficiency of the system for reimbursing teachers under the Computers for Teachers Scheme; and if he will make a statement; [122769]

(2) what estimate he has made of the average time between the purchase of equipment under the Computers for Teachers Scheme and reimbursement. [122770]

Mr. Wills: The Computers for Teachers Initiative was launched on 12 January 2000. It offers a £500 subsidy towards the purchase of a computer for serving teachers and is free of tax. It has proved very popular with teachers and 18,000 applications have been received. The first phase of the scheme was closed on 30 April, with a deadline for receipt of applications of 5 June. 2,470 teachers have already received their reimbursement. The average time between application and reimbursement is about eight weeks, mainly due to incomplete forms in around half of the applications received, which then need to be followed up. Where a form is properly completed, the subsidy can normally be paid more quickly. Additional staff and telephone lines, as well as a dedicated website, were provided to deal with the volume of interest.

New Deal (Local Authorities)

Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many New Deal placements have been offered this year by local authorities. [123350]

Ms Jowell: We do not hold figures which show separately how many New Deal placements have been offered to people by local authorities.

However, Local Government National Training Organisation figures indicate that local authorities have taken on over 4,200 people into New Deal options.

College Principals

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (a) further education college principals and (b) sixth form college principals are (i) in post and (ii) from ethnic minorities. [124690]

Mr. Wicks: Two of the 320 principals of general further education, tertiary and specialist colleges are from ethnic minorities. None of the principals of the 104 sixth form colleges is from an ethnic minority.

The Government are encouraging the Commission for Black Staff in Further Education in its aims of challenging racism, breaking down barriers for black staff and raising achievement for all who work and learn in further education.

We shall also require the Learning and Skills Council to promote equality of opportunity and report annually to the Secretary of State on this issue.

WALES

NHS Waiting Lists

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what changes there were each month in Welsh NHS waiting lists in each health authority area from May 1997 to July 1999. [124328]

Mr. Hanson: The information my hon. Friend has requested is in the table:

PRIME MINISTER

Civil Service (Political Neutrality)

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Prime Minister what changes he has made to the rules on political neutrality of the Civil Service. [123131]

The Prime Minister: None.

Central Railway

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Prime Minister what recent contacts have taken place between his policy unit and representatives of Central Railway; and if he will make a statement. [125060]

The Prime Minister: My staff and I have meetings with a wide range of organisations and individuals.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Magistrates Courts (Adjournments)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what targets he has set magistrates courts for the number and duration of adjournments. [125039]

Jane Kennedy: The Lord Chancellor has set no targets for magistrates courts in terms of the number and duration of adjournments although he has spoken out strongly against any culture of granting adjournments too readily. The Government are committed to reducing delay in the criminal justice system. The Lord Chancellor has encouraged benches to give rigorous consideration to requests for adjournments, whether from the prosecution or the defence, to the amount of time sought and whether it is genuinely required in the interests of justice.

Civil Law Convention

Mr. Hope: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if the Government will ratify the Council of Europe Civil Law Convention on corruption; and if he will make a statement. [125583]

Mr. Lock: I am pleased to be able to announce that the Lord Chancellor has today signed the Civil Law Convention during the course of the Conference of the European Ministers of Justice.

The Government have strongly supported the programme of action undertaken by the Council of Europe in the fight against corruption. The Civil Law Convention is an innovative and important international legal instrument which will enable victims of corruption to obtain appropriate remedies in the civil courts of all states who ratify the Convention. The United Kingdom is not in a position to ratify the Convention at present, because the requirements of the Convention with regard to the rules of limitation for civil proceedings go further than is provided for by current UK law. However, the Law Commission is currently considering the rules relating to limitation of actions and the Government will review this issue as soon as the Law Commission's Report is available.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cattle Diseases

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on future testing in England for the cattle diseases enzootic bovine leukosis and brucellosis. [125582]

Ms Quin: We are issuing a consultation paper on proposed changes to the way cattle health testing for enzootic bovine leukosis (EBL) and brucellosis is carried out in England. This is part of a GB wide initiative and is a direct result of our gaining of "officially EBL free" region status within the EU and the continued recognition of GB status as an "officially brucellosis free" region within the EU.

It is proposed to amend the EBL Order to take account of new reduced test frequencies. For dairy cattle these would reduce milk testing from three times a year to twice in every fifth year. For beef suckler herds these would reduce blood testing from once every second year to once every fourth year. The proposed reductions are in line with veterinary advice. We aim to have the new arrangements introduced by September this year and fully effective by April next year.

No changes are currently proposed for brucellosis testing. Test frequencies for brucellosis are currently subject to review but results are not expected before August. GB has had low or no incidence of brucellosis since 1993.

Since these proposals would require changes to the EBL Order we are also proposing to simplify publication of the list of laboratories approved to do milk testing and clarify the use of laboratory approval. We propose that these changes are also carried over into a remade Brucellosis Order and that both new orders take full account of devolution.

I am pleased that, in this consultation, we are able to recommend reducing monitoring for EBL in England now that we have "officially EBL free region" status for GB. This reduces costs and burdens for both industry and the public purse and is in line with EU requirements.

Correspondence

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will reply to the letter of 28 April from the hon. Member for Ludlow about abattoir closures. [123097]

Ms Stuart: I have been asked to reply.

I replied to the to the hon. Member on 22 May.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to reply to the letter of 18 October 1999 from the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East, in respect of which a reminder letter was sent on 17 February. [124807]

Ms Quin: I replied to the letter from the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East on 7 June.

Crop Contamination

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the Government plan to make public the location of crop sites sown with Advanta rapeseeds contaminated with GM rapeseeds. [124156]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The company is taking action to inform affected farmers. There are no safety implications which would necessitate identifying the location of affected crops.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what obligations EU member states have to inform one another and the Commission of incidents in which conventional crop seed traded across international boundaries is found to be contaminated with genetically modified crop seed. [124150]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: I am not aware of any specific obligations that require member states to inform one another and the Commission of incidents involving the contamination of non-GM seeds with GM seeds. However, member states have exchanged information on a voluntary basis and have been making public statements about such incidents.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what reports he has received concerning the date that the German authorities discovered that conventional Advanta rapeseed had been contaminated with genetically modified rapeseed. [124149]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Advanta have told me that the German authorities informed them of their findings on 3 April.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the advice he has received from the (a) Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment, (b) Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes and (c) Food Standards Agency, about the risks to human health and the environment from the contamination of Advanta rape seed by GM crops. [124137]

Mr. Nick Brown: [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The advice of the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment, Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes, and the Food Standards Agency has already been placed in the Libraries of the House and is available on the MAFF website.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in full the information made available by Advanta UK on the contamination of conventional rapeseed with genetically modified rapeseed. [124147]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The main points of the information provided by Advanta were described in the Government's announcement on 17 May and in my statement of 19 May. The company also published information in a news release on 17 May.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what reports he received, prior to being made aware of the contamination of conventional Advanta rapeseed with genetically modified seed, of similar incidents involving crop seeds imported into European Union member states, indicating when each such report was received. [124145]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: None.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the Government have designated an acceptable level of seed purity in the case of conventional crop seeds in relation to contamination with GM seeds. [124153]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: There are currently no levels set for the presence of GM seeds in non-GM seeds. The Government will be participating in discussions within the EC and the OECD on this matter.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the Government were first (1) advised by Advanta Seeds UK that supplies of its conventional rapeseed contained genetically modified rapeseed; [124143]

(2) informed that supplies of conventional Advanta rapeseed had been or may have been contaminated with genetically modified rapeseed. [124144]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: DETR and MAFF officials were informed by Advanta Seeds UK on 17 April that supplies of conventional Advanta rapeseed might have been affected by the presence of genetically modified rapeseed.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for what reason the announcement about the contamination of conventional Advanta rapeseed was made on 17 May. [124146]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The announcement on 17 May was made to inform Parliament and interested parties of the action which the Government were taking to address the issue of seed purity.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which statutory bodies prior to 17 April had a legal responsibility to ensure the seed purity of imported supplies. [124165]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The legal duty and responsibility to ensure the seed purity of imported supplies lies with the seeds authorities in the producer country and with the seed merchant marketing the seed in this country.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will review the separation distances between GM and non-GM crops. [124164]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Yes. I announced this in my speech to the House earlier today.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to the answer given on 17 May 2000, Official Report, column 173W, if the report on the study of seed sourcing and the possibility of GM seed in imported seed is now available. [125581]

Ms Quin: The report of the preliminary findings of the study has been placed in the Library of the House and will be made available on the Ministry website. The Government inspection programme being undertaken by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions will be focused on those imported seed species which are identified as most likely to be affected. Further studies are in hand.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received from the European women's lobby on gender-sensitive asylum policy; and if he will make a statement. [123615]

Mrs. Roche: Recent representations from groups representing women's issues have focused on the treatment of women seeking asylum in the United Kingdom, the delay in resolving asylum claims and the support available for women awaiting the outcome of their applications.

All applications, whether from women or men, are considered in accordance with the criteria set out in the 1951 United Nations Convention relating to the Status of Refugees. To qualify for asylum, a person must be outside her/his country of nationality and have a well-founded fear of persecution for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion.

Caseworkers dealing with these applications are given awareness training in gender and cultural matters and special training is given for dealing with those who have been tortured. It is recognised that women's experiences as asylum seekers may be different from those of men and their applications are handled with due sensitivity.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what detailed programmes the Government (a) has in place and (b) has planned, to improve the education, skills and qualifications of asylum seekers; what are the costs of these programmes; and if he will make a statement. [123729]

Mrs. Roche: Asylum seekers who receive a positive decision on their application are eligible to enrol on courses at further education colleges. Asylum seekers who have not received a decision on their application after six months can seek permission to work and as part of this can gain access to work based learning. The costs of this would be borne by the Department for Education and Employment, but information relating to the costs of educating asylum seekers is not recorded separately.

School-age children (under 16 years of age) of asylum seekers are entitled to attend school irrespective of when the application for asylum was lodged. The costs to the Department for Education and Employment of providing places in schools for the children of asylum seekers are not recorded separately.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people who entered the United Kingdom at (a) Heathrow, (b) Gatwick, (c) Stansted and (d) Luton airports since 1 January have claimed asylum on arriving at these airports. [124482]

Mrs. Roche: The information requested is given in the table:

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people the National Asylum Support Service (a) has dispersed and (b) plans to disperse to each of the cluster areas listed in the letter to all hon. Members of 25 May from the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche); [125055]

(2) if he will list the local council areas to which asylum seekers have been dispersed by (a) local authorities and (b) his Department; and how many dispersed asylum seekers are resident in each such area. [125064]

Mrs. Roche: As of 2 June, 2,049 asylum seekers, including dependants, have been dispersed by the National Asylum Support Service. They have been dispersed to Scotland, the North East, the North West, Yorkshire and Humberside, West Midlands, East Midlands and Sussex. The figures also include a small number of asylum seekers with specialist medical needs who have been provided with accommodation in London. The number of future dispersals to particular areas will depend on a number of factors including the type of accommodation required by asylum seekers and its availability in any area.

The National Asylum Support Service does not record details of the local council areas to which it disperses asylum seekers.

Information of the type requested on dispersal by local authorities under the interim arrangements is not held by the National Asylum Support Service. This is a voluntary scheme between local authorities and is sponsored by the Local Government Association and the Association of London Government.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the people aboard the Afghan airline hijacked to Stansted are still in the United Kingdom; what is the status of each of their asylum claims; and if he will make a statement. [125032]

Mr. Straw: Of the 170 people on the plane, 81 have left the United Kingdom, 89 remain in the United Kingdom, including 12 who are the subject of criminal charges in relation to the hijacking. Of those remaining who have applied for asylum, nine have been granted asylum including six as dependants, and 36 have been refused including five dependants. All of the latter have appealed against refusal and the substantive hearings commenced on 8 May. Of the remaining 32, 14 are the dependants of those facing charges and their applications will not be considered until the outcome of the prosecution is known. A further two originally faced charges which were subsequently withdrawn, and consideration is being given to their applications and those of their eight dependants. The wife and six children of one of those facing charges—who had originally applied as his dependants—have now applied in their own right and consideration is being given to their applications also. One application awaits consideration of information from The Medical Foundation for the Care of Victims of Torture. Consideration of further action will be given as soon as the outcome of the appeals is known.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers and dependants sent to Oakington detention centre have (a) been granted refugee status or exceptional leave to remain in the United Kingdom, (b) been dispersed to other accommodation in the United Kingdom, (c) left the United Kingdom, (d) been detained elsewhere and (e) absconded from Oakington. [125050]

Mrs. Roche: As at the end of May, of those asylum seekers and their dependants who were sent to Oakington, three were granted asylum and three granted exceptional leave to remain; 147 were dispersed to other accommodation, mainly under the National Asylum Support Service scheme, and 101 were granted temporary admission and released to private addresses; 26 main applicants refused asylum have left the United Kingdom, 11 of whom were removed after their appeals had been dismissed. In addition, 16 main applicants and seven dependants withdrew their claims and departed before being accommodated at Oakington. Forty nine were detained elsewhere and seven have absconded, of whom three have been apprehended.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers and dependants have been sent to the Oakington detention centre since it was opened; and how many of those people have had their cases decided while at Oakington. [125052]

Mrs. Roche: As at 31 May, 338 main applicants and 23 dependants have been accommodated at Oakington since the centre opened on 20 March. A total of 265 applications have been decided at Oakington.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time that an asylum seeker sent to Oakington resides there. [125051]

Mrs. Roche: The majority of asylum seekers whose cases have been processed have remained seven days or less.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to open further detention or reception centres to house asylum seekers; how many people these centres will accommodate; what will be the start-up costs and running costs of each new centre; and if he will make a statement. [125098]

Mrs. Roche: We have made clear on a number of occasions that more detention places are required to support our commitment to remove people whose asylum applications are refused and subsequently do not leave the country voluntarily. We have not yet determined precisely how many detention places are required or how they should be provided but, because of the lead-in time, planning notifications have been submitted to local authorities for the provisions of centres on the DERA (Tunnel) site at Thurleigh in Bedfordshire, at Harmondsworth and at Aldington in Kent. Together these three sites would deliver about 1,800 extra places. Potential suppliers have been asked to prepare proposals on that basis, but estimates of start-up and running costs will depend upon the outcome of the competitive tendering process.

We have no current plans to open further reception centres, but are keeping the need for additional facilities under review as capacity at Oakington increases.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to have information available on the number of asylum seekers being supported by each local authority. [125034]

Mrs. Roche: In the reply I gave the hon. Member on 7 April 2000, Official Report, column 633W, I explained that the Home Office had launched an exercise to obtain information from local authorities on how many asylum seekers they were supporting, together with the status of those asylum seekers and where they were being accommodated. The exercise is still on-going and, at this stage, I am unable to say when it will be concluded. The information requested will be available once the exercise is completed.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the Government's policy is towards the proposal that the European Court of Justice should have jurisdiction over asylum matters in accordance with Article 68. [125046]

Mrs. Roche: Article 68 of the Treaty of the European Community already provides for the highest domestic court to refer to the European Court of Justice (ECJ) for a preliminary ruling on an issue concerning the interpretation or validity of a Community measure made under Title IV (which covers immigration and asylum policy), or on the interpretation of Title IV itself. In the context of the current Inter-Governmental Consultation negotiations, the Government will be seeking an amendment to article 68 to ensure that cases that require a preliminary ruling can be quickly referred to the ECJ, in order to facilitate the prompt resolution of such cases.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many units of accommodation for asylum seekers are (a) being provided and (b) planned to be provided by each regional consortium; how many asylum seekers have been dispersed to such accommodation; and if he will make a statement. [125061]

Mrs. Roche: The arrangements with the regional consortia enable the amount of accommodation provided by each region to vary over time according to the changes in demand for accommodation. As there are ongoing negotiations with the regional consortia about the provision of accommodation, information relating to these negotiations is currently commercially confidential. The Scottish Regional consortium has provided 441 units of accommodation to date.

As of 2 June, 2,049 asylum seekers including dependants had been dispersed.

Criminal Assets

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he received the report of the Performance and Innovation Unit on the pursuit and seizure of criminal assets, following the recommendations of the Third report of the Home Office Working Group on Confiscation; what action he proposes to take following the report; what discussions (a) he, (b) Ministers in his Department and (c) his officials have had with (i) the Minister for the Cabinet Office, (ii) the Minister of State, Cabinet Office, (iii) the Prime Minister and (iv) officials in the Cabinet Office regarding the report; if he will place a copy of the report in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [123788]

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what responsibilities for policy on the confiscation of criminal assets have been transferred to the Cabinet Office; and if he will make a statement. [123789]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 5 June 2000, Official Report, columns 105–07W.

Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) indictable and (b) either way offences were tried at the Crown court in each of the last five years for which figures are available indicating for each year (i) what proportion of either-way offences reached the Crown court (A) by the defendant electing jury trial and (B) on the direction of the magistrates, (ii) what proportion of trials for each type of offence resulted in a guilty verdict after a plea of not guilty, (iii) what proportion of trials for each type of offence resulted in a guilty plea and (iv) what proportion of trials for each type of offence resulted in an acquittal. [123861]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 25 May 2000]: Official statistics do not include separate information on plea for those who elect Crown court trial. The available information is contained in the following tables:

Mike Tyson

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has investigated the leaks in the press on 12 May, which stated that Mike Tyson would be granted his visa. [124655]

Mr. Straw: No. Although the press reported that Mike Tyson would be granted an entry clearance, a decision on Mr. Tyson's application had not been made by 12 May (indeed, the application itself was only made in the United States of America on that day). The media reports were, therefore, entirely speculative.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he made of the arguments in relation to creating a precedent at the time of his authorisation of Mike Tyson's visit to the UK in January. [124740]

Mr. Straw: It was clearly indicated in January that there were exceptional circumstances in granting Mike Tyson entry on that occasion. In communicating my decision to him, it was made clear that this decision in no way set a precedent for any future applications he might make to enter the United Kingdom as a visitor or in any other capacity. Any such application would be considered under the Immigration Rules taking all relevant circumstances into account.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with whom he consulted between 3 and 17 May on Mike Tyson's visa application. [124654]

Mr. Straw: I refer my hon. Friend to the replies I gave the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) on 24 May 2000, Official Report, columns 493–96W.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he took to inform himself of reasons why Mike Tyson should not be granted a visa. [124656]

Mr. Straw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Ms Ward) on 18 May 2000, Official Report, columns 209–10W, where I stated clearly that I weighed up both the factors against granting Mr. Tyson entry clearance and those for.

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whom he met regarding Mike Tyson's recent application to enter the United Kingdom; and on what dates. [124461]

Mr. Straw: As stated in the reply I gave the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) on 24 May 2000, Official Report, column 495W, I met my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Ballieston (Mr. Wray) and his delegation, which included my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding), Lord Brooks of Tremorfa and Stephen Davies, on 3 May. In addition, the Minister of State, Home Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), also met my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Ms Jones), together with my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) on 17 May.

Visa Applications

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in changing the law on visa applications, he is minded to fast-track applications involving (a) weddings, (b) funerals and (c) visiting seriously ill people when in any such case there is a proven close family relationship or other reasonable cause for requesting a short visit. [124739]

Mr. Straw: I assume my hon. Friend is referring to the proposals set out in the consultation paper I announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Ms Kelly) on 18 May 2000, Official Report, column 210W. These are concerned solely with Immigration Rule 320(18), which deals with the refusal of entry to those with criminal convictions.

Arrangements for processing entry clearance applications differ from post to post, but every effort is made to deal with applications in urgent or compelling compassionate cases as quickly as possible.

Immigration and Asylum Act 1999

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) the provisions of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 which have come into force, indicating the date on which each came into force and (b) the provisions of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 which have yet to come into force and the projected date on which each will come into force. [124443]

Mrs. Roche: Section 170 of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 lists those of its provisions which came into force on Royal Assent. The Schedule to the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 (Commencement No.4) Order 2000 (SI 2000 No. 1282 (C.38)), specifies the provisions which commenced on 22 May 2000 and lists those provisions which have been brought into effect by earlier Commencement Orders.

We are keeping implementation of the Act's remaining provisions under review. However, our current intention is to phase implementation of the major provisions as follows:

Provisions of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999

June to September 2000

Carriers' Liability provisions in Part II

From October 2000

Bond scheme for visitors pilot provided for in section 16 and 17 of Part I;

Single, comprehensive appeal process provided for in Part IV and related provisions in sections 10–12 and 23 of Part I;

Under Part V, the regulatory body established by the Immigration Services Commissioner will begin to consider applications for registration and exemption. The Immigration Services Tribunal will be established;

Fingerprinting provisions in Part VII;

Statutory management and operation of detention centres under Part VIII;

Powers of superintendent registrars regarding marriage in Part IX and their duty to report suspicious marriages in section 24 of Part I.

From April 2001

Code of practice on restriction on employment in Part I;

Immigration control: facilities and charges provisions in Part I;

Bail provisions in Part III;

Full implementation of the scheme to regulate immigration advisers and immigration service providers under Part V.

Harassment (Formal Warnings)

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many formal warnings have been issued to (a) juveniles and (b) adults under powers contained in the Harassment Act 1997 in (i) Manchester, (ii) Trafford, (iii) Greater Manchester and (iv) England. [124525]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Records of formal warnings are not held centrally.

Schengen Information System

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 15 May 2000, Official Report, columns 52–53W, on the Schengen Information System, when he made an application for participation in that system; what reply he has received; and if (a) Iceland and (b) Norway participate in the manner for which he has made application and without any additional condition. [124378]

Mrs. Roche: The United Kingdom's application to participate in parts of the Schengen acquis, including the Schengen Information System (SIS), which was made on 20 May 1999, was agreed by the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 29 May 2000. The SIS will be a valuable weapon in the fight against organised and international crime as part of Schengen co-operation agreements.

Iceland and Norway's applications to become associated members of Schengen were agreed in December 1996 within Schengen structures and subsequently in accordance with Article 6(1) of the Schengen Protocol in Council Decision 1999/437/EC. They are not expected to have implemented the Schengen acquis fully until next year. When they have done so, they will participate in the SIS in broadly the same way as the United Kingdom will do when it has implemented the acquis. The principal difference will be that the United Kingdom has not sought access to, and exchange of, immigration data contained in the SIS as it will not participate in those parts of the acquis which concern external frontier controls.

Kosovo

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what inquiries he proposes to undertake about housing conditions in Kosovo for those refugees expected to return from the United Kingdom by 25 June. [124907]

Mrs. Roche: The Home Office receives regular up-to-date information regarding housing conditions in Kosovo from a range of sources including the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the United Nations High Commission for Refugees.

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 25 May 2000, Official Report, column 623W, concerning market and opinion research, if he will list the title and purpose of each item of research, stating in each case whether the results will be published. [124899]

Mr. Straw: For the available information, I refer to the reply I gave the hon. Member on 19 July 1999, Official Report, column 392W, and to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), the then Minister of State, Home Office, to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 23 February 1998, Official Report, columns 51–52W, and the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant) on 3 July 1998, Official Report, column 287W. Details of the eight completed and a further eight on-going additional items to add to this list have been placed in the Library.

Racial Discrimination

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his policy is concerning the burden of proof in cases of alleged racial discrimination. [125053]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: This Government welcome the agreement of the European Community Directive on racial discrimination, which includes a provision requiring the respondent, once a prima facie case of discrimination has been made by the complainant and accepted by the court or other instance, to demonstrate that there is a reasonable explanation for the practice or criterion concerned. This applies only to civil cases.

This does not represent a major change in terms of United Kingdom legal practice. Under current United Kingdom law, United Kingdom tribunals can and do, if faced with facts which raise a presumption of discrimination, draw inferences that discrimination has occurred.

Immigration

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people are employed and at which grades in (a) the Immigration and Nationality Directorate and (b) the Immigration Service; [125044]

(2) if he will list the locations where members of the Immigration Service are employed, indicating in each case the number of staff and their grades. [125043]

Mrs. Roche: On 1 June 2000, there were a total of 6,817 staff employed by the Immigration and Nationality Directorate, of whom 2,786 were employed within the Immigration Service and 4,031 were generalist grades. A breakdown by grade is as follows:

Grade	Number

Eurodac

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on whether the implementing powers under the Eurodac Regulation should be exercised by (a) the Commission or (b) the Council. [125049]

Mrs. Roche: The European Parliament is to be reconsulted on the Council's proposal to reserve these implementing powers to itself, rather than delegate them to the Commission. A copy of an Explanatory Memorandum has been sent to the Scrutiny Committees setting out the Government's position on the draft regulation. A copy will be available in the Library.

Equal Treatment Directive

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the compatibility of the proposed EU Directive against racial discrimination with existing British race relations legislation as it affects the Immigration and Nationality Directorate. [125080]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: (The Directive is a European Community Directive, not a European Union Directive.)

No assessment of the Directive's compatibility as it affects the Immigration and Nationality Directorate is necessary. Immigration functions are not covered by the fields listed under the scope of the Directive in article 3(1). Furthermore, the United Kingdom secured the addition of paragraph 3(2), which states:

> This Directive does not cover difference of treatment based on nationality and is without prejudice to provisions and conditions relating to the entry into and residence of third-country nationals and stateless persons on the territory of member states, and to any treatment which arises for the legal status of the third-country national and stateless persons concerned.

Thus the social protection-type functions carried out by the National Asylum Support Service are not covered by the Directive either.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which organisations he has consulted on the impact of the draft EU Directive on implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of racial or ethnic origin. [125042]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: (The Directive is a European Community Directive, not a European Union Directive.)

The Home Office has consulted: all relevant Whitehall Departments, and the devolved administrations; a range of business organisations and employee organisations, including the Confederation of British Industry, the Construction Federation, the Small Business Centre, the Institute of Personnel Development, the Federation of Small Businesses, the Engineering Employers Federation and the Trade Union Congress; and some 80 non-governmental organisations working in the race relations field, including the Commission for Racial Equality and the European Monitoring Centre.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the cost to (a) British businesses and (b) other organisations of implementing the proposed EU Directive on the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of racial or ethnic origin. [125054]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: (The Directive is a European Community Directive, not a European Union Directive.)

Since a final version of the text was only agreed yesterday, it has not been possible to carry out a full assessment of the cost to British businesses and other organisations of implementing the European Community Directive on the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of racial or ethnic origin. A copy of the Regulatory Impact Assessment has been placed in the Library. It has been prepared on the basis of an earlier draft of the Directive, which addressed the potential costs of the proposed Directive, the contents of which have been shared with representatives of the business community.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to bring forward further amendments to the Race Relations (Amendment) Bill [Lords] in respect of the EU Directive implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of racial or national origin. [125041]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have no such plans. The main purpose of the Race Relations (Amendment) Bill is to extend further the Race Relations Act 1976 to the police and other public authorities, meeting a key recommendation of the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry Report. It would not be within the scope of the Bill to seek to implement the measures contained in the European Union Race Directive, which would have implications for the private sector as well as the public sector. In addition, the timing of the Directive does not fit in with that of the Bill. We are hopeful that the Race Relations (Amendment) Bill will receive Royal Assent by the summer. By contrast, although political agreement on the Directive was reached at the European Union Social Affairs Council at its June meeting, the Directive will now be subject to legal scrutiny and will not be adopted before the Council's October meeting, from which time the United Kingdom will have three years to implement it. In these circumstances, it would be unwise to attempt to make unnecessarily speedy amendments to legislation which is already passing through Parliament.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which aspects of education will be covered by the draft European Union Directive implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of racial or ethnic origin; what assessment he has made of the compatibility of the draft Directive with the provisions of the Race Relations Act 1976 relating to duties imposed on educational bodies; and if he will make a statement. [125031]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: (The Directive is a European Community Directive not a European Union Directive.)

Our Race Relations Act has, since 1976, fully covered the education sector in the United Kingdom and the Directive has limited coverage in respect of education. The areas where the Directive will primarily come into play are those which deal with such schemes as exchange of best practice and encouraging co-operation between educational bodies in different member states and student and teacher mobility schemes such as exchanges.

Justice and Home Affairs Council

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the proceedings and conclusions of the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 29 and 30 May. [125040]

Mr. Straw: I am writing to the Chairman of the Select Committee on European Scrutiny, in accordance with established practice, to report on the outcome of the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 29 May. I will arrange for a copy of that letter to be placed in the Library.

Dublin Convention

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on the Commission Working Paper, "Revisiting the Dublin Convention". [125048]

Mrs. Roche: The European Commission has produced a working paper entitled "Revisiting the Dublin Convention". This seeks to initiate debate on the Dublin Convention as the first step towards developing Community legislation for determining which member state is responsible for considering an application for asylum submitted in one of the member states, as required by the Treaty of Amsterdam. The Government's view of this document can be found in the Home Office Explanatory Memorandum dated 10 May, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library copies of the quarterly statistics on the Dublin Convention exchanged between member states under the terms of decision 1/97. [125047]

Mrs. Roche: I have arranged for copies of these latest statistics to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is the Government's policy to seek to replace the Dublin Convention with a system which allocates responsibility for an asylum applicant to the last known transit country within the EU. [125045]

Mrs. Roche: The Treaty of Amsterdam requires that a Community instrument must replace the Dublin Convention by May 2004. The Commission has already presented a working document entitled "Revisiting the Dublin Convention" to the Justice and Home Affairs Council Meeting held in Brussels on 27 March.

The next step in the process will be the circulation of a Commission questionnaire to evaluate the operation of the Dublin Convention as it stands. The Government see evaluation as central to the development of a new draft measure. We must build on the results of the forthcoming evaluation to ensure the development of a more robust and efficient new mechanism in this field. At this preliminary stage, however, the Government consider that the underlying premise of the Dublin Convention (that the State responsible for an applicant's entry into European Union territory is responsible for the determination of any resulting asylum claim) provides a proper model for any future measure.

TREASURY

Pensioners (Tax)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many pensioners pay tax and at what rates; and how many (a) paid no tax before the Budget and (b) are paying no tax after the Budget. [117517]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 4 April 2000]: Only around 40 per cent. of pensioners currently have any income tax to pay. Estimates for the number of pensioners by different marginal rates are given in the table:

Number of pensioners[1]

Million

Marginal rate	1996–97[2]	1997–98[2]	1998–99[2]	1999–2000[2]	2000–01[2]	2001–02[2]
0% (non-taxpayer)	6.8	6.7	6.6	6.8	6.5	6.7
10%	—	—	0.1	0.7	0.9	0.8
20%	2.3	2.4	2.4	0.5	0.6	0.6
22%, 23% or 24%	1.4	1.4	1.5	2.4	2.5	2.5
40%	0.2	0.2	0.2	0.2	0.2	0.2
Total	10.7	10.7	10.7	10.8	10.8	10.8

[1] Women aged 60 or over, men aged 65 or over
[2] The estimates are rounded to the nearest 100,000
Note:
The estimates are based on the Survey of Personal Incomes and consistent with the March 2000 Budget.

Marginal Deduction Rates

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the taxes and benefits taken into account in calculating the effect of Government reforms on marginal deduction rates, as shown in Table 4.2 of the Red Book, HC 346. [122498]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 16 May 2000]: A marginal deduction rate (MDR) measures how much of an additional pound of earnings is deducted through the combination of taxes and/or reduced entitlement to benefits and/or tax credits. The figures in table 4.2 of the Red Book are for working households in receipt of income-related benefits or the Working Families Tax Credit where at least one person works 16 hours or more a week. The calculation of an MDR therefore incorporates Income Tax (taking into account personal allowances and tax credits such as the Children's Tax Credit) employee National Insurance Contributions, and income-related benefits and tax credits, namely the Working Families Tax Credit, Council Tax Benefit and Housing Benefit.

Tax Credits

Ms Kelly: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate his Department has made of the number of projected claimants of the (a) Working Families Tax Credit and (b) Disabled Person's Tax Credit for the years (i) 2000–01 and (ii) 2001–02. [123798]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 25 May 2000]: Table C12 in the March 2000 Financial Statement and Budget Report shows projected expenditure on the Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) and the Disabled Person's Tax Credit (DPTC). These projections were based on the expectation that up to 1.4 million individuals and families will benefit from WFTC and DPTC.

Child Poverty

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of children which his policies have lifted out of poverty between 1997–98 and 2000–01, based on a poverty line of (a) 50 per cent. of mean income before housing costs, (b) 50 per cent. of mean income after housing costs, (c) 60 per cent. of median income before housing costs and (d) 60 per cent. of median income after housing costs, indicating in each case the cash value of each threshold. [123716]

Dawn Primarolo: Based on a threshold of 60 per cent. of median income, after housing costs, there will be a total of 1.2 million children in households lifted out of poverty as a result of measures announced this Parliament. Figures for this and for other proportions of the median are given in Box 5.1 on page 86 of the Budget 2000 Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report.

A threshold at 50 per cent. of mean income would be very similar to the 60 per cent. of median income threshold used above. Any difference in results using this threshold would be rendered insignificant by the sampling and estimating errors involved in these calculations.

The number of children lifted out of poverty before housing costs is similar to the after housing costs figures. As before, the differences are small and rendered insignificant by the sampling and estimating errors involved. However, as the number of children in poverty in 1997–98 was lower before housing costs, the proportional reduction in child poverty arising from Budget measures would be greater.

Latest statistics on household incomes (covering 1997–98) can be found in "Households below average incomes 1994–95 to 1997–98" published by the Department of Social Security.

CITES

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) investigations and (b) successful prosecutions Customs officials have conducted with regard to breaches of CITES legislation in the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [124050]

Dawn Primarolo: HM Customs and Excise do not hold central records of the number of endangered species related investigations undertaken by its staff in any given period.

In the period 1995 to date, the Department made 2,174 detections of live species or derivatives covered by CITES legislation. Of these, however, the vast majority were either tourist souvenirs (85 per cent.) or relatively small commercial quantities where there was insufficient evidence of deliberate criminal activity to warrant action beyond seizure of the goods.

During this period Customs has mounted four successful prosecutions, all resulting in custodial sentences.

Single Ombudsman Service

Mr. Efford: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects the Financial Services Authority to publish its response to the consultation on the Single Ombudsman Service; and if he will make a statement. [124944]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Financial Services Authority published its response to the consultation on the Single Ombudsman Service on 24 May on the internet and on 1 June in hard copy form. I understand the FSA has sent a copy of its response direct to my hon. Friend.

National Insurance

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he plans to take to compensate those contributors who were wrongly advised to continue to pay the married women's option in the national insurance scheme. [125102]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government's policy is to provide sufficient information to enable women to make an informed choice about their election to pay reduced rate contributions.

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 25 May 2000, Official Report, column 585W, on opinion research, what steps have been taken to ensure that his Department makes such results publicly available as required by paragraph 19 of the Cabinet Office May 1999 Guidelines on Research into Public Attitudes and Opinions. [124904]

Mr. Timms: The Treasury take full account of the Cabinet Office Guidelines on Government Research into Public Attitudes and Opinions, which were published on 12 May 2000.

Taxation (I-E Formula)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 24 May 2000, Official Report, column 524W, on Taxation (I-E Formula), in respect of each rate of tax shown in the table, what is his estimate of a 1 per cent. reduction in each of the rates shown for tax years 1999–2000 and 2000–01. [125120]

Dawn Primarolo: No estimates are available.

Correspondence

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to reply to the letter of 21 October 1999 from the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East, in respect of which a reminder letter was sent on 17 February. [124806]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I replied to the hon. Member on 23 November 1999 and am sending him a copy of my letter.

Inter-Governmental Conference

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions have taken place on the rebate of the contribution of the United Kingdom to the EU Budget at the Inter-Governmental conference considering the prospective Treaty of Nice; and what has been the percentage change in the UK's (a) gross and (b) net contribution to the EU (i) taking into account and (ii) not taking into account the rebate in the last five years. [125252]

Miss Melanie Johnson: No such discussions have taken place. Details of the United Kingdom's gross contributions, abatement, public sector receipts and net contributions for the period 1973–74 to 1999–2000 can be obtained from various Departmental Reports of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Departments—or, previously, Government Expenditure Plans.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Royal Mail

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what levels of compensation are available to customers of the Royal Mail's Special Delivery service following the termination of the registered post service. [124727]

Mr. Alan Johnson: There are three levels of compensation available with the Special delivery service:

The service comes with an automatic compensation level of up to £250. For an extra fee of £0.45 compensation of up to £1,000 can be purchased. For an extra fee of £1.35 compensation of up to £2,500 can be purchased. Prices for these services are dependent upon the weight of the item and the level of compensation purchased. A full listing is available on Royal Mail's website, www.royalmail.co.uk.

Customers are also able to purchase Consequential Loss on top of the compensation service. This covers any additional financial loss that is separate from the actual market value of the item and is due to delay, loss or damage.

Limited Liability Partnerships

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the number of plcs likely to register as limited liability partnerships under his proposed new legislation. [124381]

Dr. Howells: No such estimate has been made. For a number of reasons we would be surprised if plcs converted to LLPs. There are no shareholders in an LLP, and no provision for the public listing of an LLP. Shareholders in a plc would have to become LLP members, and would be subject to, for example, the potential "clawback" liability of the new section 214A to be contained in regulations applying the Insolvency Act 1986. Treating LLPs as partnerships for tax will mean that each member will be taxed on their proportionate share of the whole of the LLP's income and capital gains. This would make both the LLP's and the members' tax calculations extremely complicated, with the individual members having to pay that tax through self assessment. Further, if an LLP restricted what the members could draw out because it wanted to retain profit for working capital then taxing each member on their proportionate share of the whole of the LLP's profit could mean they paid more tax than they had received. This would give the appearance that they were suffering an effective tax rate of over 100 per cent.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the consultation on the good faith provisions of the Limited Liability Partnerships Bill will be completed. [125346]

Dr. Howells: The consultation paper, "Regulatory Default Provisions Governing Relationship Between Members" (URN 00/617) published in February, sought comments on whether it was appropriate to include express statutory provision that members of an LLP owe a duty of good faith to each other. The consultation period closed on 7 April, and the summary of responses (URN 00/865) published in May set out the conclusions reached.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultation he had with the Federation of Small Businesses about the opportunities for small businesses to become limited liability partnerships before the Limited Liability Partnerships Bill was introduced. [125345]

Dr. Howells: A representative of the Federation of Small Businesses met my officials in October 1999 and has also been in correspondence with them.

Departmental Policies

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in what ways his Department and its executive agencies deliver services to meet the needs of the public as consumers, with particular reference to families. [124537]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 5 June 2000]: My Department and its agencies are committed to improving family life through the encouragement of enterprise and creation of wealth, and to enabling more choice for working parents to help them balance their work and family commitments while providing benefits for business. In a speech at the New Ways to Work Conference on 9 May, I announced a Government review of the issues surrounding maternity pay and parental leave.

My Department aims to benefit the public as consumers by creating strong and competitive markets and by developing a fair and effective legal and regulatory framework for commercial activity. Last year, we published a White Paper, "Modern Markets: Confident Consumers" (Cm 4410) which set out a comprehensive strategy to help people get a good deal. We also provide financial support for consumer bodies, including the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, and have set up an award winning consumer gateway (www.consumer.gov.uk) to steer people round the wealth of consumer information on the World Wide Web.

German Post Office

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make a statement on the decision of the European Commission to initiate inquiries into the handling of UK mail by the German Post Office, indicating the powers which the Commission possesses; [124764]

(2) what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Government of Germany about the handling of mail from the UK; and if he will make a statement; [124765]

(3) if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of the decision of the European Court of Justice on the German Post Office's entitlement to make additional charges for re-mailed letters; and what assessment he has made of the impact of this decision on the Post Office. [124766]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 8 June 2000]: This issue relates to the lack of clarity about what does and what does not constitute ABA re-mail which has led to a number of legal cases within Europe. ABA re-mail is mail sent from Country A to Country B for delivery to Country A. The problems have arisen because the way historically post offices have paid each other has not allowed them to fully recover the costs of delivering incoming mail.

In this context the British Post Office lodged a complaint with the European Commission in February 1998 into the alleged practice of Deutsche Post AG (DPAG) intercepting some international mail inward into Germany. The European Commission has now announced that it has completed an extensive investigation and in its preliminary assessment has concluded that, subject to any arguments DPAG may put forward in its defence, DPAG's practice abuses its dominant market position and restricts competition. The Commission has issued a Statement of Objections, which is a preliminary procedural document and not a final decision. It opens formal proceedings under EU procedural rules. It lists in detail the allegations against DPAG and includes the Commission's assessment of how DPAG infringes Article 82 of the EC Treaty. DPAG has full rights of defence and when these have been considered the Commission will finally decide whether a prohibition decision is necessary. If, following formal proceedings, the initial view of the Commission is confirmed, DPAG will be ordered to cease this behaviour. DPAG may then appeal the decision of the Commission before the European Courts.

I welcome the Commission's decision to investigate this case. Any infringement of competition rules or abuse of a dominant position is of concern. We were aware of the Post Office's complaint but have not made direct representations to the Germany Government as we were awaiting the Commission's views.

The case is one of a number of cases concerning remail. The recent decision of the European Court of Justice on the German Post Office's entitlement to make additional charges for re-mailed letters (in the case of DPAG v. GZS and Citicorp) allowed DPAG to charge bulk mailers the difference between the low rate it receives from the sending countries' postal authorities and the rate it would have received if that mail had been sent domestically within Germany. It did not address the issue of what kinds of items should be regarded as acceptable for ABA re-mail. It is this issue which the current investigation will address.

Also relevant is the recent rejection of the appeal by DPAG in the International Express Carriers Conference (the IECC) v. Commission against the judgment of the Court of First Instance which annulled the Commission's decision of 6 April 1995 that interceptions of commercial ABA re-mail did not constitute an abuse within the meaning of Article 86 (now 82) of the EC Treaty. The rejection of the appeal does not mean that Deutsche Post, or other European Post Offices, are entitled to intercept commercial physical ABA re-mail. Equally there is no ruling that it may do so. I hope the current investigation will clarify matters.

Correspondence

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will reply to the letter of 2 February from the right hon. Member for North-East Hampshire regarding a constituent, Mr. Kelbie. [124997]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 8 June 2000]: I replied to the right hon. Member yesterday.

Car Pricing

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect the Competition Commission recommendation on car pricing would have on the independent car retailers. [124898]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 8 June 2000]: The recommendations should bring about greater competition in the supply and retailing of new cars. This should mean lower prices, increased sales and increased consumer confidence. Both consumers and the car industry will benefit.

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further response he will make to the Competition Commission's report on the Supply of New Motor Cars in the UK. [125759]

Mr. Byers: I intend to publish a draft of the Order under the Fair Trading Act 1973 on Monday 12 June. Under the provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973 I will allow a 30 day period for consultation. This will help to ensure that the Order is workable for the industry and effective for consumers.

I note that prices for new cars have come down recently. I welcome this response by manufacturers and dealers. The Order is an important part of this process.

Science Base

Ms Southworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to reinforce the science base in the North West. [125755]

Mr. Byers: I have today set up a new group which will examine ways of boosting economic development in the North West by capitalising on the region's scientific and industrial strengths. The North West Science and Daresbury Development Group will also make proposals on the role that the Daresbury Laboratory in Cheshire can play in this process. The Group will report to me by 29 December 2000.

DEFENCE

Queen Victoria School

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Queen Victoria School for the Financial Year 2000–01. [125756]

Dr. Moonie: The Chief Executive of Queen Victoria School has been set the following Key Targets for 2000–01:

1. To maintain the staying on rate at school for S4 to S5 at a minimum of 4 per cent. above the Scottish national average for the current year.[1]
2. To maintain the percentage of pupils obtaining at least five Credit awards at Standard Grade at 2 per cent. above the Scottish average.[1]
3. To maintain a percentage of the presentations at Higher Grade achieving A to C at least equal to the Scottish average.[1]
4. To achieve a pupil per capital cost of not more than £15,500 by March 2001. The 1999–2000 target was £17,415.
5. To generate income to the school of at least £245,000.

[1] All Queen Victoria School statistics to be based on the school's results over the last three years, compared with the national average for the current year, those statistics being as published in the Scottish Executive Official Statistics.

War Widows Pilgrimage Scheme

Ms Dari Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received calling for extension of the War Widows Pilgrimage Scheme. [125757]

Dr. Moonie: Following a recent approach by The Royal British Legion, I have agreed to an extension of the War Widows Pilgrimage Scheme for a further two years, until 31 March 2003. The Government greatly appreciate the excellent work of The Royal British Legion who administer this subsidised scheme on our behalf and which, to date, has enabled more than 4,000 widows to visit their husband's grave in many parts of the world.

ECHR (Cyprus)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the European Convention on Human Rights is applied to the sovereign bases in Cyprus. [124402]

Mr. Spellar: The European Convention on Human Rights is not extended to the Sovereign Base Areas in Cyprus.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Young Offenders Institutions

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 18 May 2000, Official Report, columns 219–20W, on young offenders institutions, at which installations the eight self-inflicted deaths in 1999 took place; and what were the (a) ages and (b) gender of the residents concerned. [123978]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The information requested is given in the table.

Self-inflicted deaths in Her Majesty's Young Offenders Institutions: 1999

	Sex	Age
Aylesbury	Male	18
Aylesbury	Male	19
Aylesbury	Male	19
Castington	Male	20
Glen Parva	Male	19
Portland	Male	20
Stoke Heath	Male	19
Weatherby	Male	17

Notes:
1. Establishments have been categorised according to their primary role. However, it should be noted that there are a number of other prisons that hold young offenders (eg male remand centres) which are not included.
2. Not all self-inflicted deaths conclude with a verdict of suicide.

Endocrine Disrupters

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications he has received for licences to undertake testing for endocrine disrupters; and if he will indicate in each case the (a) level of funding, (b) length of study, (c) animal species which are to be used and (d) relevant research body. [124786]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: No project licences have been issued to undertake regulatory testing of endocrine disrupters as there is currently no formally agreed regulatory test requirement or protocol.

Licences have been issued to assist in the development and validation of the test systems that might be required to underpin any regulatory testing regime. The work is done almost exclusively on fish.

Information on sources of funding, research bodies and length of studies are not collated centrally.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what factors are taken into account by the Chief Animals (Scientific Procedures) Inspector when making a cost/benefit assessment under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 before granting a licence to allow experiments on animals. [124789]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Section 5(4) of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 requires that, in determining whether and on what terms to grant a project licence, the Secretary of State must weigh the likely adverse effects on the animals concerned against the benefit likely to accrue as a result of the programme specified on the application.

For the purposes of the cost/benefit assessment, the cost to the animal is considered as the adverse effects of pain, suffering, distress or lasting harm. The benefits must be for humans, animals or the environment and relate to the scientific and/or medical progress likely to result directly from the programme outlined in the application.

All members of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Inspectorate apply the cost/benefit assessment set out in detail in the Chief Inspector's paper, including in the Annual Report of the Animal Procedures Committee for 1997, Chapter 2, Annex 1.

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he has issued to the Chief Animals (Scientific Procedures) Inspector with regard to the safety testing for chemicals used in household products, and the products themselves, where it is not claimed that a product will itself improve the health of man or animals or provide enhanced protection for the environment; and if he will make a statement. [124790]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Section 5(3) of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 sets out the purposes for which a project licence shall be granted. If a programme of work does not satisfy one or more of those reasons, it will not be authorised.

National and international regulatory bodies require that products, ingredients and chemicals are tested to ensure that they are safe (for humans, animals and the environment) during manufacture, transport and use, thereby preventing ill-health or abnormality or their effects and providing protection of the natural environment. The product itself does not have to improve the health of man or animals or provide enhanced protection of the natural environment.

This country has taken, and continues to take, a leading role in Europe in encouraging the use of alternatives which replace animal use, reduce the number of animals used and refine the procedures to minimise pain and suffering.

Secure Training Centres

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which secure training centres are unable to accept inmates sentenced to a detention and training order; and if he will make a statement. [125025]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 8 June 2000]: All three Secure Training Centres (STCs) are able to accommodate children and young people sentenced to Detention and Training Orders (DTOs). Eighteen of the 37 trainees in Medway, 21 of the 40 in Rainsbrook and 17 of the 36 in Hassockfield are serving DTOs.

Blantyre House

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what dates HM Inspector of Prisons last inspected HMP Blantyre House; on what date his report was submitted to his Department; and on what date it is expected to be published. [125065]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 8 June 2000]: Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons carried out a full announced inspection of Blantyre House prison from 21 to 25 January this year. He submitted his report to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 21 March. Discussions on factual accuracy as set out in the established protocol are taking place. I expect the report to be published shortly.

Prostitutes' Cards

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what responses he has received to the consultation exercise entitled New Measures to Control Prostitutes' Cards in Phone Boxes; what action he now proposes to take; and if he will make a statement. [125535]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We received 60 replies to the consultation exercise. Many respondents did not comment directly on the need for action and just under half (27) specifically stated there was a problem which needed to be tackled. Only four did not feel action should be taken. We therefore conclude we need to take specific action to deal with prostitutes' cards in phone boxes.

However, it remains the case that this is very much a local problem and action needs to be targeted at the specific areas involved.

No single straightforward solution emerged from the consultation responses, although there was strong support both for call barring and for a new criminal offence. We accept that action should be taken on both these fronts together.

On call barring, we are asking the Director-General of Oftel to consider how best to develop an effective scheme in consultation with the industry.

On the new criminal offence, respondents to the consultation exercise expressed differing views on how an effective new criminal offence could be formulated. They highlighted the need for the new offence to fit coherently into controls and regulatory schemes already in place. I have, therefore, asked my officials to meet local authorities, Oftel, the police, the Crown Prosecution Service and other agencies to draw up final proposals with a view to legislating when parliamentary time allows.

In taking this action, we have looked carefully at whether effective measures against prostitutes' cards could lead to an increase in street prostitution, and whether, if so, the cards should be seen as the lesser affront. We raised this issue specifically as part of the consultation. However, the responses as a whole did not suggest this was a major concern. It was noted that street prostitution had not decreased with the advent of carding. Moreover, the number of prostitutes advertising in this way in London was estimated at between 250–400, but the number of cards produced was 13 million per year. Prostitutes outside London and Brighton do not normally have recourse to this particularly offensive form of advertising, although we are aware of small scale use of this form of advertising in a few other areas. We have, therefore, concluded that action against carding is justified and is very unlikely to be counter-productive.

I have placed a summary of the responses in the Library.

Chief Inspector of Prisons

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for the post of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons on the expiry of Sir David Ramsbotham's appointment; and if he will make a statement. [125552]

Mr. Straw: I am delighted that Her Majesty the Queen has consented to an extension of the appointment of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons, Sir David Ramsbotham, until July 2001. Sir David has made a great contribution to our shared goal of ensuring that prisoners are held securely in safe, decent and healthy establishments. I am pleased that he will continue in his role beyond the expiry date of his original appointment.

Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Probation, Sir Graham Smith, also retires close to the end of July 2001. Aligning the dates when both posts will be vacant, gives the Government flexibility in considering how best to ensure that the arrangements for inspection of prisons and the probation service best support closer working between the services as well as ensuring that the individual services continue to be inspected rigorously and independently as they have been. I shall be making a further statement to Parliament on this in due course.

Criminal Cases Review Commission

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what re-appointments and appointments are to be made to the Criminal Cases Review Commission. [125553]

Mr. Straw: Her Majesty the Queen has approved the re-appointment for a further term of the following existing members of the Criminal Cases Review Commission:

Mr. Barry Capon CBE
Miss Jill Gort
Mr. John Knox
Mr. David Kyle
Professor Leonard Leigh
Dr. James MacKeith
Mr. Edward Weiss

Her Majesty has also approved the appointment of Mr. David Jessel as a member of the Commission with effect from 1 August.

Marches and Demonstrations (Kent)

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will grant to the Chief Constable of Kent powers to proscribe marches and demonstrations in public places within the Thanet District, Dover District and Canterbury City Council boundaries between 10 June and 31 October. [125354]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Section 13 of the Public Order Act 1986 enables a chief constable to apply to the District Council for an order prohibiting public processions or marches for a period of up to three months, where he reasonably believes that such marches may result in serious public disorder, and that disorder could not be prevented by the imposition of appropriate conditions on the march. The District Council may make such an order with the consent of the Home Secretary. Should an application be received by the Home Secretary in this case, it will be carefully considered on its merits.

Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the cost of drug treatment and testing measures contained in the Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill. [125325]

Mr. Boateng: The current estimates are dependent upon the number of people who will be subject to the drug treatment and testing measures and their deterrence effect. The estimated annual cost for national implementation is in the range of £50 million to £80 million. This includes an estimate of the costs arising from possible increases in the prison population.

The initial piloting of these drug testing proposals in three areas will provide further information of the costs.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research he commissioned on which he based the plans for the Drug Abstinence Order contained in the Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill; and if he will make a statement. [125326]

Mr. Boateng: The use of drug testing to deter and monitor drug misuse in the proposed Drug Abstinence order is based on existing evidence from both America and this country. This includes the evaluation of programmes in Oregon showing that drug testing can be useful in supervising offenders in the community. The Prison Service's mandatory drug testing programme also demonstrates that testing can have a significant deterrent effect on drug misusers.

The drug testing proposals, including the Drug Abstinence Order, are to be piloted over two years and the outcomes fully evaluated. These evaluations will provide further material to inform the future use of Drug Abstinence Orders.

Prisons

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisons have appointed an equal opportunities officer; what percentage of (a) staff and (b) managers have received racial harassment and discrimination training; when targets for the implementation of the Instruction to Prison Governors IG51/1996 will be met; and if will he make a statement. [125327]

Mr. Boateng: All prisons directly managed by the Prison Service have an equal opportunities officer.

The current recorded level of delivered training in racial harassment and discrimination is 9.9 per cent. Records do not differentiate between managers and staff.

The target set out in instruction to governors 51 of 1996, a copy of which is in the Library, was for all staff to receive racial harassment and discrimination training by July 2000. However, legislation and case law have moved on since the instruction was issued and the training needs to be updated. The development and introduction of new training forms part of the Prison Service's diversity action plan.

The Prison Service launched the racial equality for staff and prisoners programme (RESPOND) in February 1999. Under this material issued to all establishments, it makes clear that racism will not be tolerated and includes guidance on language and behaviours which could cause offence.

Police Costs

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 26 November, Official Report, column 241W, on police costs whether information is available on the total additional costs to police forces responsible for policing each of the party conferences last year; and if he will make a statement. [125348]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The total additional qualifying expenditure (extra costs that were related to the police security operation) that was incurred for the Labour Party and Conservative party conferences in 1999 were as follows:

Labour Party Conference at Bournemouth
Dorset Police	1,659,317
Conservative Party Conference at Blackpool
Lancashire Constabulary	891,867

The special payment I authorised for Dorset Police was limited to £1.6 million and, therefore, the excess (£59,317) was met from within their budget. In the case of the Lancashire Constabulary, I have made a special payment that is equal to their additional costs as they were less than the special grant maximum I had earlier set at £895,000.

Drug Testing

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he has taken to ensure consistency and accurate standards of drug testing conducted by his Department; and if he will make a statement. [125323]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The piloting of the drug testing proposals contained in the Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill is due to start in Spring 2001. Planning will include consultation with the Forensic Science Service on the testing arrangements to ensure that the analytical processes are accurate, fully meet industry standards and are subject to rigorous quality assurance programmes. Use will also be made of the considerable experience gained from the well-established Prison Service mandatory drug testing programmes.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's policy in relation to arrest referral schemes and how arrest schemes are to operate in relation to powers to test for drugs at the time of charging of suspects. [125324]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We anticipate that the testing of arrestees charged with the relevant offences will help to identify those who would benefit from participation in arrest referral schemes which are now being developed with a view to providing coverage of all custody suites by April 2002.

The drug testing proposals are to be piloted over two years from spring 2001. This will include an assessment of how drug testing can be used to maximise the effectiveness of arrest referral schemes.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Audit Commission report entitled, Another Country; what plans he has to make changes to the current arrangements for the dispersal of asylum seekers; and if he will make a statement. [125320]

Mrs. Roche: We welcome the Audit Commission report on the dispersal arrangements. The field work for the report was undertaken between October 1999 and March 2000 and draws its conclusions from the effectiveness of dispersal operations under the voluntary arrangements, before the National Asylum Support Service became operational on 3 April 2000. Many of the conclusions and recommendations made within the report have been implemented, or are being developed, or are under active consideration.

We will continue to work with regional consortia to ensure that asylum seekers are properly supported while their claims are being considered, and that no one area takes a disproportionate burden.

Correspondence

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire will receive replies to his letters of 9 February and 4 May on behalf of his constituent Dr. Nazir. [125194]

Mr. Straw: I wrote to the right hon. Member on 8 June. I apologise to him for the delay.

Remembrance Sunday

Mr. Pond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the arrangements for this year's ceremony at the Cenotaph on Remembrance Sunday. [125551]

Mr. Straw: The usual ceremony at the Cenotaph will be held on Remembrance Sunday. The Royal British Legion has made proposals which will allow other relevant groups and individuals who have not in the past taken part in the march past at the conclusion of the official ceremony to do so. I welcome these proposals, which the Royal British Legion are now taking forward. Interested parties will be able to apply through the Royal British Legion.

Burns Inquiry

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what date was first set for the report of the Burns Inquiry into hunting with dogs to be delivered to him; when he expects to receive it; when it will be published; and if he will make a statement. [125349]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Burns Inquiry was asked to report by late spring. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary expects to receive the report from Lord Burns today, and the report to be published next week.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Television Transmitter Failures (Compensation)

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what compensation arrangements apply to television licence holders who are unable to receive broadcasts as a result of transmitter failures. [124738]

Janet Anderson: The television licence fee is a payment for permission to install or use television to receive television programme services and not for a service provided. There is therefore no entitlement to compensation, nor, while a TV remains installed, to refunds of television licence fees in cases of transmitter failures.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what is the standard adult charge for visiting the Dome; and what is the average entrance receipt achieved per visitor. [123985]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The gross standard adult charge for entrance to the Dome is £20. The average gross yield entrance receipt per visitor to date, is £14.50.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if the attainment of a target for visitor figures for the Millennium Dome will be a factor in deciding to award a bonus to Pierre-Yves Gerbeau. [124394]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 7 June 2000]: The attainment of a target for visitor numbers will be one of a range of measures used in any decision to award a bonus payment to the Chief Executive of the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC).

Designated Museums Challenge Fund

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to extend the period of the Designated Museums Challenge Fund; and if he will make a statement. [125075]

Mr. Alan Howarth: £15 million has been allocated to the Designation Challenge Fund between 1999 and 2002. Provision beyond that will depend on the outcome of the spending review 2000.

New Millennium Experience Company

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he expects the New Millennium Experience Company to publish its next accounts; and what period they will cover. [125030]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 8 June 2000]: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) aims to publish its next Annual Report and Accounts at the end of July 2000, to cover the period up to 31 December 1999.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many board meetings of the New Millennium Experience Company have taken place since 1 January; when they took place; and which directors were in attendance at each meeting. [125028]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 8 June 2000]: Since 1 January 2000, the Board of the New Millennium Experience Company has met eight times.

18 January:

31 January:

24 February:

Present: Robert Ayling; P-Y Gerbeau; Ian Ash; Sir Alan Cockshaw; Cllr Len Duvall; Sir Brian Jenkins; Liam Kane; The hon. Mrs. Sara Morrison; David Quarmby.

21 March:

Present: Robert Ayling; P-Y Gerbeau; Sir Alan Cockshaw; Michael Grade; Sir Brian Jenkins; Liam Kane; The hon. Mrs. Sara Morrison; David Quarmby; Neil Spence.

18 April:

Present: Robert Ayling; P-Y Gerbeau; Ian Ash; Sir Alan Cockshaw; Cllr Len Duvall; Sir Brian Jenkins; The hon. Mrs. Sara Morrison; David Quarmby; Neil Spence.

2 May:

Present: Robert Ayling; P-Y Gerbeau; Ian Ash; Sir Brian Jenkins; The hon. Mrs. Sara Morrison; David Quarmby; Neil Spence.

18 May:

Present: Robert Ayling; P-Y Gerbeau; Ian Ash; Cllr Len Duvall; Michael Grade; Malcolm Hutchinson; Sir Brian Jenkins; The hon. Mrs. Sara Morrison; Neil Spence.

23 May 2000:

Present: Robert Ayling; P-Y Gerbeau; Ian Ash; Cllr Len Duvall; Michael Grade; Malcolm Hutchinson; Sir Brian Jenkins; David Quarmby; Neil Spence.

Stonehenge

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if the preferred commercial operator of the proposed visitor centre at Stonehenge has been chosen; and if he will make a statement. [125328]

Mr. Alan Howarth: I anticipate that a statement will be made in the near future.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Pakistan

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received of the rape of eight Christian girls in Pakistan on 7 May. [125143]

Mr. Hain: We are aware of reports that Christian girls were raped on 3 May in Lahore. We strongly deplore this dreadful criminal act. Following the coup of 12 October, General Musharraf gave assurances that the rights of Pakistan's minorities would be respected and that they would be treated as equal citizens. We urge him to fulfil this commitment and ensure that all Pakistan citizens are given the full protection of the law.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to encourage the administration in Pakistan to eradicate religious intolerance. [125145]

Mr. Hain: We share concerns about the position of religious minorities in Pakistan and have relayed those concerns to the Pakistan authorities. Our High Commission in Islamabad maintains a regular dialogue with Christian and human rights groups and the Pakistani authorities on this issue. We will continue to monitor the situation closely and raise our concerns.

India

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Indian Government on the rise of Hindu militancy in India. [125162]

Mr. Hain: During his visit to India in April, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary raised with the India Foreign Minister, Jaswant Singh, his concerns over incidents of religious intolerance. I also discussed attacks on religious minorities with my Indian interlocutors during my visit to India last November.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the frequency of attacks against the Christian population of India in each of the last four years. [125144]

Mr. Hain: We have been following closely reports of attacks on Christians in India. We have noted with concern an apparent increase in such reports over the past four years. We have raised this issue with Indian authorities on a number of occasions and have urged them to respond to international concern over attacks on Christians. We and our High Commission in New Delhi will continue to monitor this issue.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received concerning attacks on Christians in India. [125164]

Mr. Hain: Our High Commission in New Delhi continues to monitor the position of religious minorities in India closely, including reports of attacks on Christians.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what support he is giving the Indian Government to reduce Hindu militant attacks on the Christian population of India. [125163]

Mr. Hain: We support the Indian authorities in their efforts to ensure tha' the right to freedom of religion, as enshrined in the Indian Constitution, is guaranteed. We have welcomed the Indian Government's assurances that attacks on Christians are fully investigated and action taken against the perpetrators.

TREASURY

Income Tax

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people aged 65 years and above pay income tax at the (a) basic and (b) higher rate; and how many did so in the financial year 1996–97. [121010]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 June 2000]: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the answer given to the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) on 8 June 2000, Official Report, column 382W.

HEALTH

Taxanes

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from health care professionals regarding the funding of taxanes. [118345]

Yvette Cooper: The Department receives communications from members of the public from all walks of life representing a wide range of issues. These include some from health care professionals who have shown concerns regarding the funding of taxanes which has led to so called "postcode prescribing".

We share these concerns and this is the reason why we asked the National Institute of Clinical Guidance (NICE) to review the evidence around the effectiveness of two taxane drugs (Taxol and Taxotere). NICE published guidance on the use of taxanes in advanced ovarian cancer on 5 May and will be publishing guidance on the use of taxanes for advanced breast cancer shortly. We have made an additional 8.9 per cent. cash increase available to health authorities on average this year. This includes the additional £660 million announced in the Budget which will, among other things, enable health authorities to fund positive recommendations from NICE.

Influenza

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps the Government plans to take to ensure that vulnerable at-risk groups, including elderly people in nursing homes, have rapid access to antiviral treatment and protection in the early stages of influenza outbreaks in their communities; [121962]

(2) what plans he has to recommend the wider use of antiviral drugs to help control influenza outbreaks; [121961]

(3) what plans he has to communicate to health professionals and the public information about influenza protection and treatment measures other than vaccination, with particular reference to established antivirals; [121966]

(4) what steps he is taking to ensure that general practitioners are aware of the extent to which (a) flu antivirals used in other countries and (b) new antivirals being considered by NICE are available, effective and safe; [121960]

(5) if he will recommend adoption of anti-flu measures as employed by the West Cumberland NHS Trust. [122297]

Yvette Cooper: Recommendations on the use of amantadine (an antiviral drug used in the treatment and prevention of influenza A) are given in the United Kingdom Health Departments' publication 'Immunisation against Infectious Disease'. Recommendations on the use of Relenza (one of a new type of antiviral drugs developed for the treatment of influenza) are given in the guidance from the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) issued last year. NICE will be reviewing its advice on the use of antiviral drugs later this year, in time to give further advice for next winter's influenza season. The Department will consider the need for further guidance on the treatment of influenza in the light of this advice.

The use of antiviral treatment in an individual outbreak is a matter for the local Consultant in Communicable Disease Control and offering such treatment to healthcare staff is a decision for individual NHS trusts.

Ectopic Pregnancy Trust

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps her Department is taking to support the work of the Ectopic Pregnancy Trust. [122499]

Yvette Cooper: The Department provides financial support to the Ectopic Pregnancy Trust through the Section 64 grants scheme. This support comprises core grant funding of £20,000 in 2000–01 and up to a maximum of £20,000 in 2001–02 and £10,000 in 2002–03 to help meet the trust's running costs.

Kidderminster Hospital

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will intervene to prevent the relocation of medical services provided at Kidderminster Hospital to Worcester Royal Infirmary until the new Worcester hospital is open. [122458]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 16 June 2000]: The Secretary of State has approved the proposals in Investing in Excellence for a new hospital and for the reconfiguration of services across the district. The timing of the reconfiguration is a matter for the local trust, with due regard for their responsibility for safety and quality care.

The lead clinicians at Kidderminster Hospital have agreed to the moves of acute inpatient services to either Worcester or Redditch, in the interests of sub-specialisation and better quality care across the whole of Worcestershire. They have recently become increasingly concerned about the clinical fragility of services in Kidderminster, and the risks involved in coping with winter pressures under these circumstances. The trust proposes that acute inpatient beds currently provided at Kidderminster will be re-provided one-for-one in Worcester or Redditch, and have additional facilities to handle extra demand, including an expanded Accident and Emergency Department, a new minor injuries unit, new Medical Assessment Unit and additional ITU and coronary care beds. The Department has been assured that this work will be complete before the inpatient moves take place.

Bowel Cancer

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people were treated for bowel cancer in (a) the South and West Devon Health Authority area and (b) Torbay Healthcare Trust since 1990; and what were their survival rates. [122694]

Yvette Cooper: Information provided by the South and West Cancer Intelligence Unit on the incidence of colorectal cancer and survival rates in South and West Devon Health Authority is given in the following tables. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. David Hudson, Chairman of South Devon Healthcare NHS Trust, for details of local treatment and survival rates.

Three year rolling average colorectal cancer incidence rates—South and West Devon Health Authority residents

	Crude rate	ASR
1990–92	67.4	44.2
1991–93	66.4	43.8
1992–94	68.2	44.4
1993–95	65.9	41.7
1994–96	68.2	43.4
1995–97	68.9	44.1

Notes:
1. Crude rates relate to incident cases per 100,000 population
2. Age standardised rates (ASR) are based on European Standard Population and allow for a direct comparison between areas
3. Colorectal Cancer ICD9/10: 153, 154, C18-C21

Survival rates—colorectal cancer 1990 to 1994—South and West Devon Health Authority residents

Percentage

Survival time	All registrations proportion surviving	Treated within six months. Proportion surviving
30 days	92	95
1 year	69	75
2 years	56	62
3 years	49	54
4 years	44	48
5 years	41	45

Notes:
1. Survival analysis based on registrations made between 1990–94. This allows for full five year follow up period for all patients.
2. Persons aged over 85 at diagnosis and registrations made from a Death Certificate Only are excluded from the analysis.
3. Analysis on treated within six months looks only at those persons for whom SW Cancer Intelligence Unit have received information regarding surgery and/or radiotherapy and/or chemotherapy within six months of diagnosis.
4. Colorectal Cancer ICD9/10: 153, 154, C18-C21.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what work is being carried out by his Department to improve the services available to people suffering from ME. [123266]

Yvette Cooper: The National Health Service provides a considerable number of services to which people suffering from chronic fatigue syndrome/myalgic encephalomyelitis have access, and such patients are seen within a wide range of hospital specialties. The CFS/ME working group will produce guidance aimed at improving the quality of this care and treatment.

Health Care

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, in respect of nursing homes and community-based settings, the Commission for Health Improvement or the Care Standards Commission will have responsibility for policing the standards of care provided to NHS patients in receipt of intermediate care. [122795]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 22 May 2000]: The Commission for Health Improvement has responsibility for reviewing the quality of healthcare, including intermediate care, provided to National Health Service patients wherever they are treated. The Care Standards

Bill, currently before Parliament, will establish the National Care Standards Commission which will be responsible for regulating care homes and nursing homes. The Bill will introduce measures to enable the two bodies to work co-operatively and carry out these responsibilities in an effective way.

HPV Testing

Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the limited competition to select pilot sites for HPV testing this summer. [123379]

Yvette Cooper: We are in the process of selecting an advisory committee on human papilloma virus testing, which will also act as a selection board for choosing the pilot sites. We are working with the managers of the National Health Service cervical screening programme to develop a method of short-listing sites.

Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the membership and role will be of the advisory group that will oversee the commissioning and running of the pilot sites for HPV testing. [123378]

Yvette Cooper: The membership of the expert advisory group on the pilot for human papilloma virus testing has not yet been agreed. Prospective members will be approached shortly and will include representatives from colposcopy, cyto-pathology, virology, primary care, epidemiology and consumer groups. When the membership is finalised, details will be posted on the United Kingdom National Screening Committee's website at http://www.nsc.nhs.uk/

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the members of the expert advisory group which will oversee the commissioning and running of the pilot sites for HPV testing. [124329]

Yvette Cooper: The membership of the expert advisory group on the pilot for human papilloma virus testing has not yet been agreed. Officials have developed a pilot protocol and identified potential members of the advisory group. Prospective members will be approached shortly and will include representatives from colposcopy, cyto-pathology, virology, primary care, epidemiology and consumer groups. When the membership is finalised, details will be posted on the UK National Screening Committee's website at http://www.nsc.nhs.uk/

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the effects on (a) human and (b) animal health of methyl tertiary butyl ether; and if he will make a statement. [123448]

Yvette Cooper: A major review of the potential health effects of oxygenates, including methyl tertiary butyl ether (MTBE), carried out by the Health Effects Institute in 1996 in the United States where levels can be considerably higher than in the United Kingdom at levels of about 10–15 per cent., concluded that "it is unlikely that fuel containing oxygenates would substantially increase the overall health risk from fuel used in motor vehicles".

The Committee on the Medical Effects of Air Pollutants (COMEAP) is currently considering the possible effects on human health of the inclusion of MTBE in petrol from the point of view of exposures via air. In its examination of evidence, COMEAP is looking at data on the effects of MTBE on animals. A statement will be produced in due course.

Sudden Death Syndrome

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to make electrocardiogram community testing programmes more widely available to reduce Sudden Death Syndrome fatalities in young people; [124700]

(2) what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of electrocardiogram testing in identifying heart problems in young people likely to make them susceptible to Sudden Death Syndrome; [124701]

(3) what assessment he has made of the causes of Sudden Death Syndrome in young people. [124702]

Yvette Cooper: Sudden Adult Death Syndrome is not one single condition but a group of conditions which result in the sudden and unexpected death of apparently healthy young adults.

Many of the deaths in this syndrome appear to be caused by cardiomyopathies. Our policy is that the relatives of a family with a known high risk of contracting this disease should receive regular cardiovascular examinations. We fully recognise the importance of all patients known to be at cardiac risk being referred for specialist clinical assessment. This examination and testing—perhaps more appropriately referred to as case-finding rather than screening—has been encouraged increasingly in recent years.

The United Kingdom National Screening Committee (NSC) advises Ministers on all aspects of screening policy. The NSC assesses proposed new screening programmes against a set of internationally recognised criteria to ensure that the programme does more good than harm. A recent review of the evidence for cardiomyopathy screening showed that a programme would not yet meet these criteria. However, we will keep this position under review as new evidence emerges.

In the meantime, the Department is working closely with the medical profession and voluntary organisations with a view to raising awareness and improving the diagnosis and testing of people at risk.

Mobile Telephones

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the research projects that he has commissioned in the last six months to study the health effects of mobile telephones; indicating in each case (a) level of funding, (b) length of study, (c) whether animals will be used, (d) membership of project team and (e) relevant research body. [124639]

Yvette Cooper: No new projects on the health effects of mobile phones have been commissioned by the Department in the last six months. Research into health effects of mobile phones forms part of the World Health Organisation International Electromagnetic Fields Project to which the Department has been contributing £20,000 per year for the last four years. The organising committee for this project draws on expertise from around the world including the United Kingdom. The Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones, set up at the instigation of my right hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich and West Norwood (Ms Jowell), the former Minister for Public Health, published its findings in May. The recommendations in this report are being taken up in the development of a comprehensive programme of research costing several millions of pounds jointly funded by Government and industry.

Committee Membership

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the members of the (a) Committee on Safety of Medicines, (b) Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation and (c) Medicines Control Agency, indicating which members have registered links with pharmaceutical companies. [124753]

Yvette Cooper [holding answer 7 June 2000]: The current list of members of the Committee on Safety of Medicines, including interests held in the pharmaceutical industry, was placed in the Library on 9 May. Interests of the members of all Medicines Act Advisory Bodies are published annually in the "Medicines Act 1968 Advisory Bodies—Annual Reports", copies of which are available in the Library. The 1999 report is due to be published in July this year.

Members of the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation, as at 1 April 2000, who have declared interests in pharmaceutical companies are as follows:

Professor Lewis D. Ritchie: Single Company PEPS with Glaxo Wellcome and Zeneca; some industry support to his team for clinical trials work;

Dr. Barbara Bannister: Educational sponsorship by SmithKline Beecham to attend CISTM 6th Conference in June 1999; holds portfolio of shares (managed by asset management company) which includes Glaxo Wellcome and SmithKline Beecham; some clinical trial work for new drugs;

Dr. David Goldblatt: Occasional member of expert panels for SmithKline Beecham, Wyeth and Pasteur Merieux; research grants to support his team from Wyeth, SKB, Nava and Pasteur Merieux;

Professor Roy Anderson: Directorships of Wellcome Trust, Decode, IBHSC; share holdings in Glaxo, Zeneca and SmithKline Beecham;

Dr. Karl Nicholson: Has acted as 'consultant' for Glaxo;

Professor Keith Cartwright: industry part-funding of his team to evaluate candidate meningococcal vaccines.

The Medicines Control Agency is an executive arm of the Department of Health. There are currently over 500 staff, none of whom have registered links with pharmaceutical companies.

SOCIAL SECURITY

New Deal (Disabled People)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in the greater Portsmouth area are using the New Deal for Disabled People; and if he will make a statement. [124553]

Mr. Bayley: The information requested is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

Under the first tranche of innovative schemes set up through the New Deal for Disabled People, the greater Portsmouth area fell within the catchment area of the Gateway Partnership. This scheme was funded from October 1998 to January 2000 in order to improve the employability of disabled people within Hampshire and the Isle of Wight. The Gateway Partnership accepted 356 people into the scheme and 49 people started work.

Under the second tranche of innovative schemes, greater Portsmouth falls within the catchment area of the Prince's Trust, which assists disabled people to set up their own businesses within Hampshire, the Isle of Wight and Surrey. By the end of April 2000 the Prince's Trust had accepted 68 people onto the scheme and 12 people had started up self-employment.

Benefits Agency (Complaints)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many complaints there were against the Benefits Agency in 1999–2000; what was the cost of handling these complaints; how many of these complaints are still outstanding; and if he will make a statement. [124543]

Angela Eagle: The administration of the Benefits Agency is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Charlie MacKinnon to Mr. Mike Hancock, dated 9 June 2000:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Alexis Cleveland to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about how many complaints there were against the Benefits Agency in 1999/2000; what was the cost of handling these complaints and how many of these complaints are still outstanding. Due to annual leave I am replying on her behalf.

The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

Complaints are received centrally through the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration [PCA], from Ministers and MPs acting on behalf of their constituents, and directly by our operational business units from members of the public, customer representatives and local MPs.

For the period between 1st April 1999 and 31st March 2000, the Benefits Agency [BA] received 99 statements of complaint from the Parliamentary Ombudsman's office. The BA met all deadlines set by the Ombudsman's office. The question of outstanding Ombudsman complaints is a matter for his office and falls outside BA jurisdiction.

BA Parliamentary Correspondence Unit received a total of 6155 letters of complaint. At the end of March 2000, there were 454 in total outstanding.

There were 77,646 complaints received directly by our operational business units for the same period. At the end of March 2000, there were 18096 in total outstanding.

I hope this is helpful.

Benefit Offices

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what definition he uses of a reasonable distance when determining access to a benefits office. [124669]

Angela Eagle: This is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Charlie MacKinnon to Caroline Flint, dated 9 June 2000:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Alexis Cleveland to reply to your recent Parliamentary question about the definition of a reasonable distance when determining access to a benefits office. Due to annual leave I am replying on her behalf.

The Benefits Agency (BA) does not have a definition of a reasonable distance from benefits offices, as we provide access to our benefits and services in various ways which are designed to take account of customers' needs and circumstances. The BA Customer Charter gives details of how customers can get access to benefits, information and services. These include contact by telephone, correspondence, and calling at a benefits office or being visited at home by a visiting officer.

I hope this is helpful.

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of the population lives (a) within one mile of and (b) over three miles from a benefit office in (i) rural and (ii) urban areas. [124521]

Angela Eagle: This is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Caroline Flint, dated 8 June 2000:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about what percentage of the population lives (a) within one mile of and (b) over three miles from a benefit office in (i) rural and (ii) urban areas.

Unfortunately, neither operational business units nor Analytical Services Division hold the type of data required in order to provide this information.

I am sorry that I have not been able to be more helpful in this instance.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will make a determination on the appeal for Disability Living Allowance by Rachel Scully, of Birkenhead. [124509]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of Disability Living Allowance is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to my right hon. Friend.

Letter from Charlie MacKinnon to Mr. Frank Field, dated 9 June 2000:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Alexis Cleveland to respond to your recent Parliamentary Question about when he will make a determination on the appeal for Disability Living Allowance by Rachel Scully, of Birkenhead. Due to annual leave I am replying on her behalf.

Rachel's casepapers were forwarded to The Appeals Service (TAS) on 22 May for their continued action. TAS has sent form TAS1 to Mrs. Scully. The form gives Mrs. Scully notes about the appeal and asks her to complete a questionnaire requesting information on how she wishes to proceed with the appeal. Once returned to them Rachel's case will be treated as urgent at all stages and Mrs. Scully will be informed of her hearing date within 6 weeks of TAS receiving the form.

I hope this is helpful.

Pensions (Payment Methods)

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what estimate he has made of the total annual cost of administering weekly payments in cash for state pensions, including payments to the Post Office and other third parties; [124780]

(2) what estimate he has made of the total annual cost of making payments of pensions to pensioners by ACT; [124781]

(3) what estimate he has made of the number of pensioners who failed to switch to ACT because of the change from weekly to monthly payment. [124782]

Mr. Rooker: Information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows:

Information on total annual costs of administering payments for State Pensions, including payments to the Post Office and other third parties is collated but not split by method of payment of frequency of payment. The latest total annual cost of administering Retirement Pension for 1998/99 was £314 million.

Frequency of payment is a big issue for many pensioners and anecdotal evidence suggests that the non-availability of weekly payment by ACT is a potential issue, which may prevent some customers switching from order book to ACT. Unfortunately, information upon which a numerical estimate of the number of these pensioners could be based is not available. This is obviously an issue we are giving consideration to.

National Insurance

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the National Insurance Recording system stores the date of birth of individuals linked with their National Insurance number. [125308]

Mr. Rooker: Yes, the National Insurance Recording System stores an individual's date of birth, which is linked with the National Insurance Number.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate, for each local authority, the total amount saved in benefit expenditure in the most recent year arising from anti-fraud initiatives; if he will express this figure as a percentage of the total expenditure on social security benefits administered by each local authority; and if he will provide an aggregate estimate for Great Britain. [125309]

Mr. Rooker: The most effective way of combating benefit fraud is to stop it happening in the first place. That is why, for example, we are taking steps to improve the way local authorities deal with new claims for Housing Benefit (the "Verification Framework") which has been allowed to occur and which is to reduce the scope for fraud and error at the outset. It is therefore not possible to quantify the total amount saved by all the anti-fraud initiatives we are taking to drive fraud out of the system.

The weekly benefit savings scheme provides a measure of that part of Social Security benefit fraud (including Housing Benefit, Council Tax benefit and Income Support) based on what local authorities have subsequently detected. A weekly benefit saving is the amount of benefit fraudulently in payment multiplied by 32, the average time in weeks that benefit would have been likely to continue in payment if the fraud had gone undetected. A table providing the information requested expressed in terms of weekly benefit savings has been placed in the Library. The data in the table are for 1998–99, the latest year for which comprehensive information is available.

We have recently announced changes to the weekly benefit savings scheme. The changes mean that authorities which uncover more fraud and prosecute fraudsters can expect to receive greater financial reward than before. We will also give additional reward to those authorities which operate the Verification Framework.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Crisis Management

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much of her Department's budget has been allocated to (a) crisis management and (b) crisis prevention in the current financial year; what the figures were five years ago; and if she will make a statement. [113063]

Mr. Foulkes: We have allocated £61 million for centrally funded conflict and humanitarian assistance in 2000–01. This compares with expenditure of £57 million in the same area in 1997–98 (the earliest year in which comparable figures are available). Chapter 6 of the Departmental Report 2000, a copy of which is in the Library of the House, provides information on the Government's policy and performance in this area.

Tanzania

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the application of Tanzania for debt relief. [118038]

Mr. Foulkes: Although it is one of the world's poorest countries, over recent years Tanzania has made important progress in introducing structural reforms and stabilising its economy. Despite limited resources, with help from its international partners including Britain, Tanzania, to its credit, has met most of its very substantial external debt obligations. It has now begun to repay domestic debt arrears and is refocusing its budget on poverty reduction. As a result, the Boards of the World bank and the IMF agreed last week to support a comprehensive debt reduction package under the enhanced Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) Initiative. This will be worth about US$3 billion over 20 years from all creditors and will be used by the Government of Tanzania for additional public expenditures on poverty reduction measures. Pending achievement of a number of conditions, including preparation of a comprehensive Poverty Reduction Strategy taking account of the views of civil society, interim relief from the IMF and the IDA will begin this month.

Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development, pursuant to her answer of 8 February 2000, Official Report, columns 89–90W, concerning secondments, which of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124827]

Mr. Foulkes: None of the secondees were appointed for 12 months or less.

Albania

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress has been made with the weapons for development project in the Gramsh region of Albania; and if she will make a statement. [125014]

Mr. Foulkes: A total of 5,812 arms and 137 tonnes of ammunition have been collected in Gramsh District, Albania. Nine of the 12 projects identified by the local community for development have been completed; the remaining three are in progress.

The success of the pilot project in Gramsh has led to the formation of the Albanian Government's Weapons Collection Commission and the replication of the project by UNDP in two further districts, Elbasan and Diber, to which we have contributed an additional £600,000.

Kosovo

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the withdrawal of her Department's emergency and conflict funds for Kosovo. [125000]

Mr. Foulkes: As Kosovo enters a new phase, with the bulk of the UK's programme of immediate humanitarian support completed, so our focus, along with the rest of the international community, has switched to longer term reconstruction and development. This year we have already committed £29 million in bilateral support for reconstruction; as part of this we are developing a technical assistance programme of £5 million to support institution and capacity building. In addition, we shall contribute around £39 million as our share of the EC's programme.

We will continue to monitor the humanitarian situation and will respond accordingly should a new emergency arise. We have committed an additional £8 million for humanitarian mine action this financial year and continue to support the work of the international relief agencies.

European Community Humanitarian Office

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what proposals she has to improve the performance of ECHO. [121096]

Mr. Foulkes: Two major independent evaluations of EU humanitarian aid were carried out in 1998 and 1999. These evaluations gave a positive overall assessment of ECHO's performance, but identified a number of areas for improvement. Last October the Commission produced a Communication in response to the evaluations, which set out an Action Plan to tackle the weaknesses. We broadly support the Commission's proposals, and are engaged in ensuring the Plan is implemented effectively.

As part of this process, the Development Council has approved a resolution which will guide and encourage the Commission's actions.

Heavily Indebted Poor Countries

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much each heavily indebted poor country has spent on arms exported from the UK in each of the last three years. [118333]

Clare Short: I refer the hon. Member to Part III of the Government's 1997 and 1998 Annual Reports on Strategic Arms Control. Part III lists numbers and values of UK exports of military equipment by country where this information is available. Information on exports of military equipment during 1999 will be included in the 1999 Annual Report which will be published in due course. The hon. Member should also refer to the accompanying text and explanatory note to the table in Part III which details the sources of the information used and the extent of the coverage of that information.

China

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the projects currently funded by her Department in China. [124561]

Mr. Foulkes: The UK is working with the Government of China to build up a new poverty-focused programme, targeting the inland provinces where the majority of the poor are located. My Department is providing support to health and education; economic reform; and the environment. The programme is expected to increase from £20 million in 2001–01 to £25 million in 2001–02.

A full list of activities, together with our Country Strategy Paper, will be placed in the Library of the House.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Playgroups

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much his Department has spent in each year since 1997 on the provision of playgroups; how many playgroups have been established; and how many children have used them. [122603]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 18 May 2000]: The Department will provide £40 million of funding for three-year-old nursery education in the voluntary sector (pre-schools and playgroups) during the financial year 2000–01 and this is estimated to provide 33,000 places. This compares with estimated funding of £16 million during the financial year 1999–2000, or the provision of 17,000 places. Playgroups will also benefit from child care grants and the Working Families Tax credit.

In addition, we have announced funding of £500,000 for a further scheme to assist pre-schools and playgroups facing financial difficulties, to give them a further breathing space as policy initiatives work through to individual groups, and £250,000 for projects to help pre-schools and playgroups, develop, in partnership with others, as the early education and care places expand.

Information on the number of new playgroups which have been established since 1997 is not collected. Annual information on playgroups and other Day Care facilities is published in the Statistical Volume "Children's Day Care Facilities (as at 31 March)" which is available from the Library. The Department plans to publish provisional national estimates about playgroups (as at 31 March 2000) in a Statistical First release in July.

Around £357 million of Nursery Education Grant has been made available to fund early years places for four-year-olds in the private, voluntary and independent sectors since 1997.

Furthermore, the Department has provided over £8 million to the Pre-School Learning Alliance (PLA) since 1997 to support its training infrastructure and to help improve the quality and marketing of groups. This includes a grant under Section 64 of the Health and Public Services Act 1968 towards PLA core funding.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on his plans for the disposition of assets held by TECs in cases where it is unclear whether all or part of their acquisition costs was derived from public funds. [123977]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 5 June 2000]: We intend to seek to reach agreement with each TEC on the disposition of all assets, irrespective of how they were funded. Our aim in discussions with TECs will be to ensure that assets continue to benefit local communities and that public resources are safeguarded. We envisage there will be a range of different solutions to reflect different local circumstances.

Further Education

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of further education colleges were able to give the full recommended Association of Colleges pay award for (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000. [124175]

Mr. Wicks: This information is not held by the Department. The Association of Colleges (AoC) conducted a survey of colleges about the pay awards for 1998–99 and found that (based on a 66 per cent. response rate) 77 per cent. of colleges were able to offer their staff the AoC recommended pay award or above.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the funds which are available to local authorities on application, indicating those for which the Torbay Unitary Authority has successfully applied in each of the last two years. [124196]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table sets out the grants available to Torbay local authorities and its schools through bidding or application.

Grants subject to application or bidding (Relating to schools)

[2] 2000–01 formula allocation of £159,479
[3] 2000–01 formula allocation of £33,000
[4] 2000–01 formula allocation of £30,800
[5] Allocated £97,043 by formula under SEN grant 18a
[6] Allocated £365,229 in addition by formula
[7] Total of joint bid with Devon and Plymouth
[8] Offered £86,680 but declined to accept

Note:
Many additional grants to those above were allocated on a formulaic basis and so dit not require bids

Adult and Further Education Courses

Mr. Derek Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people aged over 50 years were enrolled in adult education courses and further education courses during the 1998–99 academic year in (a) England, (b) the North-East Region of England and (c) Bishop Auckland; and what proportion of the relevant population aged over 50 years this represents in each case. [124208]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 5 June 2000]: It is not possible to provide information for Bishop Auckland as adult education data are not collected centrally at district level and data on further education students are not yet available for 1998–99. Data on the number of people aged over 50 years enrolled in LEA maintained adult education provision are not available. The available data for further education students are shown in the table:

Students in FE sector colleges and external institutions in England, 1998–99[1]

	Students aged 50 and over [2] (Thousand)	Percentage of population
North-East Region	27.5	3.2
England	585.7	3.7

[1] Estimated from 1998–99 provisional whole year data for FEFC-funded and non-FEFC-funded students in FE sector colleges and FEFC-funded students in external institutions.
[2] Age as at 31 August 1998

Education Maintenance Allowance

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the number of additional young people who stayed on at school or college in the pilot areas for the education maintenance allowances. [124376]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 5 June 2000]: We are encouraged by the early findings from the 15 EMA pilot areas, which is why we have decided to extend the pilot to an extra 40 areas from this September. Statistical evidence gathered suggests that participation in the EMA pilot areas has increased by over five percentage points, compared with an increase of three percentage points in the control areas selected, and two percentage points nationally. We do not have information about the actual numbers involved, because the number of young people in each pilot area cohort varies from year to year.

We are undertaking a detailed evaluation exercise which will, in time, give more detailed information about the impact of the EMA on post-16 participation and achievement.

Instructors

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 25 May 2000, Official Report, column 606W, on instructors, where information on basic qualifications or subject taught is held. [124767]

Ms Estelle Morris [holding answer 8 June 2000]: Governing bodies acting with the consent of the local authority have to assure themselves that staff employed as instructors have appropriate qualifications. Governing bodies and local authorities make their own arrangements for holding information about instructors' qualifications and experience.

Information on subjects taught is held by schools.

Teacher Training

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to provide financial incentives to encourage more people to enter teacher training courses in further education colleges. [124691]

Mr. Wicks: From September 2000, all students undertaking a pre-service Postgraduate Certificate of Education (Further Education) course in England, will receive a £6,000 a year training salary—equivalent to £150 a week during term time.

The payments, in common with those being paid to trainee Primary school teachers, will be trialled for one year.

School Security

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what was the total amount spent by schools on security measures in 1999 (a) by constituency and (b) by local education authority; [123134]

(2) how much the Government have awarded to local education authorities in each year since 1995 for schools to (a) implement security reviews and (b) undertake measures to make their premises more secure. [123167]

Ms Estelle Morris [pursuant to her reply, 23 May 2000, c. 438W]: A column of figures was omitted. The correct response is as follows: My Department does not collect information in the level of detail requested. Expenditure by each local education authority in England supported by the Government's Standards Fund grant for school security, which is allocated directly to authorities, is shown in Table 1 for 1998–99, the latest year for which outturn information is available, along with the total sums available to authorities for 1999–2000.

Specific grants for school security measures have been made available since 1997–98, following a recommendation from the Government's Working Group on School Security. To date, £94 million has been made available to support a variety of security measures in schools in England, to help make a safer environment for pupils and staff. A breakdown, by year, of this total funding is given in Table 2.

Table 2: Total amount made available by Government to local education authorities (LEAs) each year since 1995 to undertake school security measures

£ million

Year	Grant	Government grant	LEA contribution	Total amount
1997–98	New Deal for Schools	6	—	6
1998–98	Grants for Education Support and Training (GEST)—Grant rate 60 per cent.	12	8	20
1998–99	Standards Fund (Grant 18)—Grant rate 75 per cent.	15	5	20
1999–2000	Standards Fund (Grant 23)—Grant rate 75 per cent.	16.5	5.5	22
2000–01	Standards Fund (Grant 26)—Grant rate 75 per cent.	16.5	5.5	22

Notes:

1. GEST and the Standards Fund grants for school security had grant rates. This means Government provide the set grant rate and local education authorities are required to contribute the remainder in order to take up the grant.

2. In 1997–98 and 1998–99, an additional £2 million per year was made available to schools in the grant-maintained sector via the Funding Agency for Schools.

3. The Standards Fund school security grant is allocated to local education authorities by formula and can be used on a variety of physical measures and on security related training for staff and governors. Local education authorities are required to devolve at least 70 per cent. of their grant allocation to schools, while being allowed to retain a maximum of 30 per cent. of their allocation to co-ordinate a training programme for staff and governors.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Ministerial Conduct

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will set out the cost to public funds of the publicly-owned property maintained for his private use. [115124]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 17 March 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) on 5 June 2000, Official Report, columns 50–51W.

GM Trial Sites

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of the GM trial sites at Kempley, Gloucestershire and Preston Wynne, Herefordshire on organic farms in Herefordshire within a six mile radius; and if he will make a statement. [122040]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 15 May 2000]: Of the particular sites mentioned in the question, fodder beet is being grown near to Preston Wynne. The beet will be carefully managed to prevent it flowering, so no pollen will be produced. The oilseed rape, being grown near Kemply, can only cross-pollinate with sexually compatible crops of the same species flowering at the same time. The separation distances reduce the chances of cross-pollination to less than 1 per cent. Also, organic farms do not tend to grow organic oilseed rape.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what research has been conducted by his Department into ways to recover pollen dispersed from field trials of GM plants; and what data his Department has obtained in respect of such research conducted abroad. [124793]

Mr. Meacher: The Department has not conducted any such research and has no data on any such research conducted elsewhere. We would not expect it to be possible to recover pollen dispersal from field trials of GM plants.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what statements have been made by the Government about the minimum number of genetically modified crop trials required to fulfil the objectives of the current crop trial programme. [122996]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 22 May 2000]: In carrying out the Farm Scale Evaluations, the Government are advised by an independent research consortium and Scientific Steering Committee, who oversee the conduct of the trials. The design of the Evaluations is that over a three-year period we should seek a total of 60 to 75 sets of data for each crop.

At present, the Scientific Steering Committee have advised that 20 to 30 fields annually should be sought for beet, in a roughly equal proportion of fodder to sugar beet. This is because the Evaluations would be investigating a potentially broader range of management practices for beet than for the other crops.

The Scientific Steering Committee met on 8 February and set minima of 12 to 15 sites for oilseed rape and maize and around 20 sites for beet, for the programme to begin. They confirmed at their meeting on 10 March that sufficient sites had been identified to ensure that a properly balanced scientific assessment could be made. I announced this year's programme on 17 March and there are currently 49 sites.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to use the provisions of the Biosafety Protocol to restrict imports of crop seeds in order to reduce the risk of contamination with GM seeds. [124152]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The import of GM seeds is already covered by EU legislation. The Cartagena Protocol (Biosafety Protocol) to the Convention on Biological Diversity is not yet in force, and to become so, requires ratification by 50 signatories. The UK signed the Protocol at the earliest opportunity at the 5th Conference of the Parties to the Convention, and by the end of the Conference, a total of 67 countries plus the European Commission had signed. Allowing for the time taken for ratification through national parliaments, the Protocol is unlikely to come into force within less than two years.

We expect that the EU legislation will be extended as necessary to incorporate the requirements of the Protocol. We and other member states are already looking at ways of reducing risks of contamination with GM seeds using Community legislation.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if any of the current licensed GM crop trials taking place in the UK include procedures to test claims of sterility in the GM varieties concerned. [124159]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Several of the current consents for deliberate release are for GM oilseed rape hybrid systems comprising a male sterile line and a fertility restorer line which, when grown together, form a hybrid seed. It is the hybrid line which would form the seed stock for trials and for commercial production. The GM oilseed rape being grown in the farm scale evaluations is a fertile hybrid formed from crossing the male sterile line Ms8 and fertility restorer line Rf3.

Construction Industry (Certification Schemes)

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what representations he has received on the rationalisation of certification schemes for the construction industry; [124704]

(2) which construction industry certification schemes his Department is evaluating; [124703]

(3) what plans he has to rationalise the certification schemes for the construction industry. [124705]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Department is evaluating two pilots of a proposed quality mark scheme for builders and other contractors working in the domestic sector, which have recently started in Birmingham and Somerset. We will use the experience of the pilots to develop a national scheme and to decide how to roll out the scheme nationally.

During the development of the quality mark, representations were made to avoid duplication with Constructionline, which is the Government's list of approved contractors and consultants for public sector as well as professional private sector clients for non-domestic works. This is why Constructionline is also providing the central services for the quality mark pilots. Further rationalisation would need to take into account the different requirements between domestic and non-domestic sectors and the different levels of expertise and requirements of the clients in the two sectors.

Departmental Policies

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in what ways his Department and executive agencies deliver services to meet the needs of the public as consumers, with particular reference to families. [124531]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Mainly through its executive agencies, my Department provides a range of services direct to the public including services to vehicle owners, drivers and operators and those appealing against planning decisions. We seek to ensure these services are responsive to the needs of the consumer, for example by carrying out customer surveys, by publishing the standards of service that users can expect to receive and, in some cases, by extending opening hours to suit customer preferences. We are also gradually extending electronic availability of services to enable users to access them when they wish.

Although none of our services is targeted specifically at families, we seek to ensure that those with families can access them conveniently.

Holyhead

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what volume of (a) freight and (b) passenger traffic passed through the port of Holyhead in each of the last 10 years. [124725]

Mr. Hill: Information on freight and passengers passing through the port of Holyhead is as follows:

[1] Because of changes in procedures for recording passenger data, the 1997 and 1998 passenger figures do not include cruise passengers. Holyhead, however does not have regular cruise passenger calls so this is unlikely to have had an impact on the figures presented.

Rail Track Safety Company

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 16 May 2000, Official Report, column 88W, on the Railtrack Safety Company, what the timetable will be for the consultation by the rail regulators on the creation of a safety company; and how passengers will be consulted before decisions are taken. [124774]

Mr. Hill: The Health and Safety Commission published a consultative document on 19 May seeking views on proposed changes to the safety regime for the railway industry. The deadline for comments is 24 July 2000. The Office of the Rail Regulator will issue shortly a separate consultative document about changes to Railtrack's Licence.

Heathrow (Runway Capacity)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assurances have been given to the Government by (a) BAA, (b) British Airways and (c) British Midland in the five years prior to the recent submission by British Airways to his Department concerning a third runway that they would not seek additional runway capacity at Heathrow; and if he will make a statement. [124845]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 7 June 2000]: Over the last five years, none of the organisations mentioned by my hon. Friend have given assurances to the Government directly that they would not seek additional runway capacity at Heathrow.

During the public inquiry into BAA's planning application for a fifth terminal at Heathrow, BAA and British Airways made reference to additional runway capacity at Heathrow in their evidence.

BAA stated that it believes that this is a matter entirely for Government, although it is the company's view that the local communities around Heathrow should be given assurances in respect of another runway. BAA would urge the Government to rule out any additional runway at Heathrow, and BAA would support a recommendation by the inquiry Inspector in his report to the Secretary of State that the Government should rule it out. Indeed, BAA invites the Inspector to make such a recommendation.

British Airways, as part of their closing submission to the public inquiry, did not advocate a third runway at Heathrow because the proposed fifth terminal did not require it. They stated that > an additional runway at Heathrow could have the potential to be of national importance, and, in BA's submission, it would therefore be wrong to prejudge the issues involved in the absence of a comprehensive understanding of all the material circumstances prevailing at that time, including Government policy, environmental impacts and the aviation and economic cases for such a development.

British Midland have made no specific reference to additional runway capacity at Heathrow.

Welsh Highland Railway

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on progress in the reopening of the Welsh Highland Railway in Gwynedd. [125071]

Mr. Hill: This is a matter for the Ffestiniog Railway Company, which as owners of the Welsh Highland Railway are responsible for its reconstruction. However, I understand that the company plan to complete the line as far as Waunfawr shortly and open it to passengers by August this year. The next section as far as Rhyd Ddu, at the foot of Snowdon, is to be built during 2001. The company then hopes to complete the reconstruction of the rest of the line through to Porthmadog by 2005.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 17 May 2000, Official Report, column 135W, on penalty clauses, if he will list the payments made by contractors in respect of each of the 17 contracts. [125363]

Ms Beverley Hughes: It is not possible within the terms of the contracts to provide specific details of each individual payment.

Terminal 5, Heathrow

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects the report of the public inquiry into the proposed fifth terminal at Heathrow Airport to be published. [124486]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 8 June 2000]: The public inquiry closed on 17 March 1999 and the Inspector has said that he expects to take up to two years to produce his report. While the Secretary of State recognises the need to bring this matter to an early conclusion, he will need to give the Inspector's report full consideration before its issue.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent information he has given the Inspector at the public inquiry into the proposed fifth terminal at Heathrow Airport concerning revised projected passenger and flight numbers for the next 10 years at Heathrow. [124489]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 8 June 2000]: None.

A30 (Noise)

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the noise tests on the A30 Honiton to Exeter have been completed; and when he expects to announce the results of the tests. [125173]

Mr. Hill: The Highways Agency has been working closely with the RTA30 Campaign Group and I am pleased to say that the site work on the noise monitoring has been completed.

Analysis work is under way and is expected to be completed this month, after which we will make an announcement.

Airline Route Applications

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when in the last 12 months the Civil Aviation Authority delivered decisions on route applications; and if he will state in each case (a) the route concerned, (b) the competing airlines, (c) the CAA's decision, (d) his decision on whether to accept the CAA's decision and (e) on those occasions when the CAA decision was rejected by him, to which airline he awarded the route. [125193]

Mr. Mullin: The following four route licence applications have been determined by the CAA during the last 12 months:

Decision 1/99 of 12 October 1999; UK-South Africa (apportionment of scarce bilateral capacity); British Airways and Virgin Atlantic; the CAA decided in favour of Virgin Atlantic; British Airways did not appeal.

Decision 2/99 of 25 November 1999; London Stansted-Geneva/Zurich; EasyJet and Go; the CAA decided in favour of Go; EasyJet did not appeal.

Decision 3/99 of 3 December 1999; London-Shanghai (apportionment of scarce bilateral capacity); British Airways and Virgin Atlantic; the CAA decided in favour of Virgin Atlantic; British Airways appealed to the Secretary of State, who upheld the CAA's decision.

Decision 4/99 of 23 December 1999; UK-South Africa(apportionment of scarce bilateral capacity); British Airways and Virgin Atlantic; the CAA decided in favour of Virgin Atlantic; the Secretary of State overturned the decision on appeal and directed the CAA to award the available capacity to British Airways.

Correspondence

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Solihull dated 15 May concerning Ceramica Trust; and if he will make a statement. [125178]

Mr. Raynsford: I have today written to the hon. Member in response to his letter.

Transport Safety Review

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the Transport Safety Review. [125715]

Mr. Hill: The terms of reference of the Transport Safety Review were announced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, North and Bellshill (Dr. Reid) in December 1998. Consultation took place last year, and the work of the review has subsequently been taken forward under the chairmanship of this Department. Following the tragic rail crash at Ladbroke Grove on 5 October the Public Inquiry ordered by the Health and Safety Commission and chaired by Lord Cullen is considering rail safety management, culture and regulation. Because it is important that the Inquiry's work is not pre-empted in any way, we have concluded that it would be wrong to take a view on potentially fundamental changes to the organisation of transport safety before the Inquiry is complete. We will then need to consider the advice on the Inquiry report which will be submitted to us by the Health and Safety Commission.

A report of the outcome of the consultation and the analysis undertaken by the Transport Safety Review has been placed in the Libraries of the House. The report is also being made available to the Ladbroke Grove Inquiry.

Mobility Centres

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what help the Government are giving to mobility centres which provide support and advice to disabled and older people on driving and personal mobility; and if he will make a statement. [125758]

Mr. Hill: We are aware of the enormously valuable contribution of these centres in enabling disabled and older people to obtain impartial professional advice on driving and vehicle choice as well as on a wide range of other aspects of personal mobility.

In recognition of this work, my Department and the Department of Health have jointly agreed to contribute over £1 million to 11 English members of the Forum of Mobility Centres. Funding will be for an initial period of three years subject to annual review.

Biodiversity

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Government will respond to the Biodiversity in the European Union reports by the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities. [125864]

Mr. Meacher: The Select Committee's reports provide a comprehensive review of the Government's actions to protect biodiversity both nationally and within Europe. Such reports merit a thorough response. This has now been completed and I have today placed a copy (Cmnd 4712) in the Library. It demonstrates how the Government's current initiatives address the Committee's concerns.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Civil Service

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the senior Civil Service, in his Department for 1999–2000; and to what extent the pay awards were staged. [121659]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 18 May 2000]: Since 1996 MAFF has had delegated authority for negotiating pay settlements. For the last pay round, the core MAFF settlement included the Pesticides Safety Directorate and the Veterinary Medicines Directorate.

In 1999 the headline pay settlement was 2.0 per cent. on the paybill. Together with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff received performance-related increases with an average cost of 3.92 per cent. The increases were not staged. Information on the 2000 pay settlement is not yet available because negotiations are still ongoing.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is also responsible for other Executive Agencies with their own negotiating remits. I have asked Chief Executives to respond direct with information on their pay settlements.

Letter from Peter W. Greig-Smith to Dr. David Clark, dated June 2000:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply to your question regarding the average percentage increase in salaries for 1999–2000. I am replying on behalf of the Centre of Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science (CEFAS).

In 1999 the headline pay settlement for the Centre for Environment, Fisheries & Aquaculture was 2.95%. This included 0.5% as the cost on the pay bill of restructuring the pay and grading system. Together with additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance related increases averaging 4.05%. The increases were not staged.

There was a separate settlement for the officers of the Research Vessels with a headline pay settlement of 2.45% on the pay bill, which did not include a restructuring element, and performance related pay increases averaging 4.05%. The increases were not staged.

Letter from Peter W. Greig-Smith to Dr. David Clark, dated 15 May 2000:

In 1999 the headline pay settlement for the Centre for Environment, Fisheries & Aquaculture was 2.95%. This included o.5% as the cost on the pay bill of restructuring the pay and grading system. Together with additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance related increases averaging 4.05%. The increases were not staged.

There was a separate settlement for the officers of the Research Vessels with a headline pay settlement of 2.45% on the pay bill, which did not include a restructuring element, and performance related pay increases averaging 4.05%. The increases were not staged.

Letter from Sarah Nason to Dr. David Clark, dated 31 May 2000:

The Minister has asked me to respond, in respect of the Farming and Rural Conservation Agency (FRCA), to your question about the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants, excluding members of the Senior Civil Service, in 1999–2000 and to what extent the pay awards were staged.

FRCA has delegated authority for negotiating pay settlements since the Agency's launch in April 1997. Payment date within the Agency is 1 August each year. The headline pay settlement for 1999/00 was 3.77% on the paybill and together with the additional funds from staff turnover, staff in post received performance related increases averaging 4.3%. This pay settlement was linked to a major restructuring of the Agency's pay and grading system. The increases were not staged.

Letter from P. I. Stanley to Dr. David Clark, dated May 2000:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply, in respect of the Central Science Laboratory, to your question concerning the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants for 1999–2000 and to what extent the pay awards were staged.

Since 1996 CSL has had delegated authority for negotiating pay settlements.

CSL operates a performance related pay system which links pay awards to job performance. It is therefore not possible to provide a single average figure which is meaningful. For 1999/2000 pay increases for satisfactory performers ranged from 2.0% to 7.0% with a few exceptional performers receiving an additional accelerated pay progression of 6%. For some unsatisfactory performers, no pay increase was received.

Pay awards were not staged, being paid in full with effect from 1 August 1999.

Letter from T. W. A. Little to Dr. David Clark, dated May 2000:

The Minister has asked me to respond to your question on the average percentage increase in salaries of non-industrial civil servants in 1999–2000. Unfortunately, information on the 1999–2000 pay settlement is not yet available because the negotiations have not been concluded.

River Fishing

Mr. Todd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has reviewed the National River Fishery Survey 1999 prepared by the National Federation of Anglers; and if he will make a statement. [124054]

Mr. Morley: We have not received a copy of the survey in question.

Agency Staff

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the whole-time equivalent numbers of staff at each of the regional service centre locations, and each of the Intervention Board Agency locations, on 1 May. [123898]

Mr. Morley: The number of substantive staff on a full-time equivalent basis at each office location on 1 May 2000 was as follows:

Location	Number
MAFF Regional Service Centres
Anglia (Cambridge)	217
East Midlands (Nottingham)	242
Northern (Carlisle)	233
North East (Northallerton)	310
North Mercia (Crewe)	185
South East (Reading)	191
South Mercia (Worcester)	208
South West (Exeter)	275
Wessex (Bristol)	191
Intervention Board Executive Agency
Reading	935
Newcastle	280

Note:

The Reading figures include out-stationed IB staff located at Wolverhampton, Bristol, Cambridge, Harrogate, Edinburgh and Belfast.

Fisheries

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 22 May 2000, Official Report, column 388W, on fisheries, if the Government intends to grant legal title to fishing quota transferred between fishermen. [124408]

Mr. Morley: Quotas are allocated to producer organisations and other groups in accordance with rules which are reviewed annually with the fishing industry. Since 1 January 1999 a system of fixed quota allocations, based on catches made during the reference period 1994 to 1996, has operated. The Fisheries Departments in the UK are currently discussing with industry representatives a number of possible modifications to the quota management rules, including arrangements for adjusting the fixed quota allocation units attached to fishing vessel licences to take account of transfers between fishermen. Any proposed changes affecting fixed quota allocations will be subject to further and full consultation with industry.

Pork and Poultry Imports

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the amount of pork and poultry meats imported into the United Kingdom during the last 12 months; and if he will give their country of origin. [124672]

Ms Quin: The table shows the volume of port and poultry meat imported into the United Kingdom, as recorded by the Overseas Trade Statistics. The imports are shown by country of despatch which is not necessarily the country of origin. The data are subject to a degree of statistical error. The overall level of errors is low, but these errors have a much greater proportional effect on countries with small values or volumes of trade. Therefore care is needed when interpreting the data.

Slaughter Premium Scheme

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of applications under the Slaughter Premium Scheme have been refused on deadline criteria. [124202]

Ms Quin: A farmer must claim slaughter premium within two months of an animal leaving the holding, but will normally submit claims forms covering several animals at a time. Claims submitted within 25 days after the end of the two-month period are accepted but receive a reduced rate of premium. It is also a requirement that animals are slaughtered within one month of the end of the retention period.

In England, these requirements have not yet been checked because the computer programme to do this will not be finalised and activated until later this month.

Holne Moor

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will pay the commoners on Holne Moor, Dartmoor, who are signatories to the Environmentally Sensitive Area Agreement; and if he will make a statement. [124755]

Mr. Morley: The Holne Moor commoners should by now have received their ESA payments.

SCOTLAND

Forms

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123943]

Dr. Reid: My Department has not issued any forms to charities or voluntary bodies since 1 July 1999, when devolution took effect. Collecting information for the period before 1 July 1999 would incur disproportionate cost.

No-smoking Policy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness of his Department's no-smoking policy and (b) the proportion of his Department's offices that do not allow smoking. [125168]

Dr. Reid: My Department's policy operates effectively, with two smoking rooms provided in Dover House and at 1 Melville crescent, Edinburgh, and access to smoking rooms in two other buildings shared with the Scottish Executive.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place copies of the results of all market and opinion research carried out by his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies since May 1997, in the Library. [123807]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 25 May 2000]: In order to help to ensure that proposed policy or public information initiatives are effective and represent best value for public money, my Department commissions various research exercises every year.

Decisions on whether to publish the results of each research project, or place a copy in the House of Commons Library are taken on a case-by-case basis. Some research reports contain commercially confidential information.

However, copies of the results of most quantitative research reports are available on request and my Department will compile a summary list of research projects to be placed in the Library.

Information on research projects commissioned by Departmental Agencies and NDPB's is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the opinion research projects undertaken on behalf of his Department in the financial year 1999–2000, broken down by (a) focus group research, (b) quantitative surveys and (c) other market research surveys; and in each case, when and where the results were published. [124631]

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the opinion research projects undertaken on behalf of his Department in the financial year 1999–2000, broken down by (a) focus group research, (b) quantitative surveys and (c) other market research surveys; and, in each case, when and where the results were published. Mr. Prescott: In order to help to ensure that proposed new policy or communication initiatives are informed, effective, and represent best value for public money, my Department commissions various research exercises every year. Connex South Central

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with the management of Connex South Central rail company on the reduced service level from Wandsworth Common Station to Victoria; and if he will make a statement. [124698]

Mr. Hill: I have had no discussions with the train operator about this matter, but the Franchising Director is monitoring the situation. He has agreed an emergency timetable with Connex as a rest-day working ban by drivers has meant that the original timetable could not be met. While this is a far from ideal situation, the Franchising Director agreed that it is in passengers' interests to have information on which services will run and which are cancelled. Connex are currently recruiting more drivers and services will be re-introduced as they complete their training.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the reasons for the elimination of South West Trains from the competition process for the Connex South Central franchise. [125605]

Mr. Hill: The shortlisted counterparties for a replacement South Central franchise were selected following the Franchising Director's evaluation of their initial proposals against the criteria given to him by the Deputy Prime Minister in his Instructions and Guidance of September 1999. In summary these are: commitment to secure better performance and customer services; the extent to which extra or earlier investment can be secured; the extent to which passengers will be given a greater voice in the level and standard of services; and value for money to the taxpayer. The Franchising Director has outlined in further detail the criteria for evaluating bids in his Outline Guide to Franchise Replacement of 25 May.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what directions he has given to the Environment Agency about increasing the proportion of its staff recruited from ethnic minorities; and how many board members of the agency are from ethnic minorities. [124795]

Mr. Meacher: No direction has been given to the Environment Agency, by the DETR, about increasing the proportion of its staff recruited from ethnic minorities. However, the Environment Agency does have its own Diversity Policy and statement and it is widening its links with ethnic organisations.

None of the current Environment Agency board members are from an ethnic minority background. However, the DETR is taking rigorous action as part of its current equal opportunities plan for public appointments, to appoint more people from this group to the boards of public bodies as a whole. Currently 5.8 per cent. of all appointments are filled by people from ethnic minorities against the Department's present end-2000 target of 6 per cent..

MOT Tests

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to improve the accuracy of measures of a vehicle's emissions as part of the MOT test; and if he will make a statement. [124942]

Mr. Hill: The Department intends to commence further research later this year on the effectiveness of catalyst testing and to determine whether the diesel smoke test may need to be changed to enable better testing of low-smoke emission diesels. The projects are due to be completed in phases and we will be reviewing emerging findings as they progress. Additionally, the Vehicle Inspectorate has undertaken a comprehensive programme of re-training for MOT testers to ensure that they are able to carry out testing more consistently and to the standard required.

Stone Lodge Leisure Complex

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will announce his decision on the planning application for the Stone Lodge Leisure Complex in Dartford. [124935]

Ms Beverley Hughes: To progress with the Stone Lodge application it was necessary to seek further representations from the parties on the question of need for the proposed facilities. We have now analysed these responses and we will be informing all the parties of the outcome very soon.

Local Government Act 1988 (Reliefs)

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many local authorities granted relief under the Local Government Act 1988 in each year since 1990–91. [125070]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Every billing authority in each year specified granted at least one of the reliefs under the Local Government Act 1988.

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the amount of hardship relief granted under the Local Government Act 1988 in England in each year since 1990–91. [125069]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The information requested on the amount of hardship relief granted under the Local Government Act 1988 in each year since 1990–91, is shown in the table.

Year	Amount
1990–91	23,941
1991–92	139,908
1992–93	758,026
1993–94	1,438,306
1994–95	1,734,622
1995–96	2,041,549
1996–97	1,972,004
1997–98	2,238,775
1998–99[1]	1,848,208

Road Accidents (A40)

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 22 May 2000, Official Report, column 323W, on road accidents, how many fatalities due to road accidents there have been on the A40 over the last three years (a) in total and (b) between Witney and Oxford. [124420]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 7 June 2000]: The following numbers of fatalities occurred on the total length of the A40 in the last three years for which national records are available: 27 in 1996, 28 in 1997 and 25 in 1998. On the single carriageway section of the A40, between the Wolvercote roundabout in Oxford and the eastern end of the Witney bypass at Hill Farm, there were two in 1996, three in 1997 and none in 1998.

Byker Heat Station, Newcastle

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what changes have been made in the authorisation of releases from the Byker Heat Station, Newcastle over the years of its operation; and at whose request the changes were made. [125138]

Mr. Meacher: The following changes have been made in the authorisation of releases:

Variation AJ3042: Changes made 15 July 1993 by HMIP.

Condition 1.1.2—Added wood chip as a permitted fuel.

Condition 5.1.10—Specified the composition of wood chip fuel.

Variation AJ6955: Changes made 27 September 1993 by HMIP.

Variation at request of operator.

New conditions relating to the visibility of the plume were added.

Variation AN2927: Changes made by HMIP 31 December 1995.

Variation at request of operator.

Condition 5.1.10—specified that spent ash and lime shall only be discharged via skips.

In addition a number of changes have been made to the requirements to report releases.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the unquantified toxic releases to air in the 1995 incident at the Byker Heat Station posed a risk to health; what area may have been affected by this release; and if (a) the regulator required and (b) the operator undertook an investigation as to the possible health effects to workers at the site and nearby residents. [125140]

Mr. Meacher: There is no evidence to suggest that the incident in 1995 posed a risk to health. Analysis of the incident in question suggested that a lower mass probably was released than in an equivalent period of normal operation. However, a precise estimation of distribution effects would be impracticable.

The Agency did not require the operator to conduct an investigation into possible health effects and is not aware of such an investigation being conducted by the operator.

Strategic Planning (London)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what conclusions he has reached following the consultation exercise on the detailed arrangements for strategic planning in London; and if he will make a statement. [125732]

Mr. Hill: The Mayor of London will assume responsibility for strategic planning matters in the capital on 3 July 2000. The main elements and principles of the new planning arrangements are incorporated in the Greater London Authority Act 1999. In January the Government issued, for consultation, a draft circular and statutory instruments setting out detailed aspects of the new arrangements. A copy of the consultation responses has been placed in the Library of each House of Parliament and is also available for inspection at the Government Office for London.

Following careful consideration of the responses received, we have decided that no significant changes are needed to the detailed arrangements, but some revisions have been made, mainly to provide additional clarification of the Governments proposals.

I am pleased to announce that the Town and Country Planning (London Spatial Development Strategy) Regulations 2000 and the Town and Country Planning (Mayor of London) Order 2000 have been laid in both Houses of Parliament. Both the Regulations and the Order will come into force on 3 July.

I am also pleased to announce the publication of the Government Office for London Circular 1/2000 "Strategic Planning in London".

The Town and Country Planning (London Spatial Development Strategy) Regulations 2000

These Regulations set out the minimum supplementary statutory procedures that the Mayor will have to follow when preparing the Spatial Development Strategy (SDS). They cover aspects such as the form and content of the SDS, consultation and publicity procedures, the availability of documents and the examination in public.

A regulatory impact assessment has been prepared and copies can be obtained from the Government Office for London and a copy has been placed in the Library of each House of Parliament.

The Town and Country Planning (Mayor of London) Order 2000

This Order details the statutory procedures for notifying the Mayor of planning applications of potential strategic importance, and the associated power to direct refusal of planning permission.

A regulatory impact assessment has been prepared and copies can be obtained from the Government Office for London and a copy has been placed in the Library of each House of Parliament.

Government Office for London Circular 1/2000—Strategic Planning in London

The circular explains and gives guidance to the Mayor and others on the operation of the new arrangements set out in the Act and the two statutory instruments. The circular provides guidance on the purpose, scope and format of the Spatial Development Strategy. It explains the procedures for its production and advises on the implications for boroughs and others. It also gives guidance on the Mayor's role in planning applications and in representing London's planning interests.

Transport for London

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the procedures set out by the Nolan Committee in respect of public appointments have been observed with regard to the appointment of the Director of Transport for London; and if he will make a statement. [125455]

Mr. Hill: Mr. Anthony Mayer was appointed as a Transitional Chief Executive of Transport for London in February this year. This was not an appointment to a public body within the ambit of the Office of the Commissioner for Public Appointments but an appointment as an employee of the Secretary of State under the provisions of Section 407 of the Greater London Authority Act 1999. Nevertheless, the recruitment followed a search and selection process involving the use of head hunters and an independent element. This is a temporary appointment. The recruitment of a permanent Chief Executive will be a matter for Transport for London.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will answer the question tabled by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham for answer on 17 March on the cost to public funds of publicly owned property maintained for his private use. [125685]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I replied to the hon. Member on Friday 9 June 2000, Official Report, column 4192W.

Dorneywood

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what has been the cost of official entertainment at Dorneywood to his Department's budget in each year since May 1997; [125679]

(2) if he will list the occasions on which Dorneywood has been used for official purposes since 1 May 1997, listing the guests who attended on each occasion; [125678]

(3) how many staff paid out of his Department's budget have been employed at Dorneywood since May 1997. [125684]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Under the terms of the endowment providing for its use by successive Governments since the 1950s, Dorneywood is maintained at no cost to the taxpayer. The same arrangement applies now as under previous administrations: no staff from any Government Department are employed at Dorneywood, and Government Ministers pay their own personal expenses on items such as food and drink when visiting Dorneywood privately.

When Ministers from my Department use Dorneywood for official Government business, expenses are paid by the Department. Since May 1997, Dorneywood has been used for meetings with a range of Ministers and officials on a number of occasions. The approximate total cost to the Department for each year since May 1997 was as follows:

Year	£
May 1997-March 1998	3,000
April 1998-March 1999	2,000
April 1999-March 2000	1,300

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Treaty of Nice

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what bilateral discussions with other EU members are planned prior to the meeting to agree the Treaty of Nice in December. [124792]

Mr. Vaz: We are in constant contact with our European partners. On the IGC in particular, there has been regular contact at official and Ministerial level since the beginning of this year. Foreign and Europe Ministers discuss the IGC collectively at monthly meetings of the General Affairs Council. This will continue until the Nice European Council in December.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Sierra Leone citizens have had their fares paid to Britain by his Department since the entry of the Parachute Regiment into Sierra Leone; how many of these cases relate to asylum applications; what the circumstances were of the others; and how many were arranged on the initiative of the United Kingdom High Commission. [124836]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 7 June 2000]: All British and Sierra Leonean passport holders evacuated from Sierra Leone undertook to repay the costs of their RAF flights from Freetown to Dakar. Consular staff in Dakar provided financial assistance to enable 55 Sierra Leonean nationals, all of whom either had close family in the UK or held resident status, to return to the UK. They all signed undertakings to repay the costs. As far as we know none of these has applied for asylum.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what medical advice his Department is giving to UK visitors to Sierra Leone; and if he will make a statement. [125192]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 9 June 2000]: Our travel advice gives advice on safety and security to British nationals travelling overseas. Unless there are specific concerns, travel advice does not cover medical issues. Callers requesting medical advice are referred to their GPs or the Department of Health.

At present we advise against all travel to Sierra Leone.

Kosovo (MOD Police)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason his Department's police officers were disembarked from their aircraft on the tarmac at Stansted on 4 June, instead of flying to Kosovo; when the detachment will now fly to Pristina; and if he will make a statement. [124936]

Mr. Hain: It is usually the responsibility of the United Nations to finance and arrange the transport for civilian police officers deploying to Kosovo. On this occasion, the UN requested that the UK make the travel arrangements.

The FCO therefore arranged to charter a plane for 4 June to transport the 56 Ministry of Defence police officers to Kosovo. However, delays in baggage handling and a minor technical fault resulted in the plane's revised estimated arrival time in Pristina being after 17:00 hours, the time at which Pristina airport closes.

The police officers' departure was therefore re-arranged for 6 June (no aircraft were available on 5 June) on a different plane. I can confirm that the officers did indeed reach Kosovo on that day.

No-smoking Policy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness of his Department's no-smoking policy and (b) the proportion of his Department's offices that do not allow smoking. [125154]

Mr. Hain: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office's Smoking Policy restricts smoking to designated smoking rooms and single occupancy offices. It is therefore effective in protecting all staff from the responsibility of passive smoking.

Fewer than 5 per cent. of offices are single occupancy.

International Criminal Court

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he proposes to ratify the Rome Treaty to establish the International Criminal Court. [125395]

Mr. Hain: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) on 3 May 2000, Official Report, column 122W.

EU Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of the Government's response to the questions in the document CONFER 4743/00, prepared by the Conference of the Representatives of the Governments of the member states for the intergovernmental conference; [124864]

(2) if he will place in the Library a copy of the Government's response to the options for determining the method for fixing the allocation of seats in the European Parliament, as set out in document CONFER 4740/00, prepared by the Conference of the Representatives of the Governments of the member states for the intergovernmental conference; [124866]

(3) if he will place in the Library a copy of the Government's response to the suggested approach to the extension of co-decision procedures, set out in document CONFER 4740/00, prepared by the Conference of the Representatives of the Governments of the member states for the intergovernmental conference; [124865]

(4) in which areas the UK delegation has objected in principle to specific points in relation to the list of Articles suggested for an extension of qualified majority voting in Annex I of paper CONFER 4757/00, prepared for the intergovernmental conference; [124867]

(5) if he will place in the Library a copy of the UK delegation's response to the questions asked in the document CONFER 4728/00, prepared by the Conference of the Representatives of the Governments of the member states for the intergovernmental conference. [124869]

Mr. Vaz: Discussion at the level of the Preparatory Group and at Ministerial level has been based on conference papers produced by the Presidency. These papers do not require a formal response from member states' Governments, but form a basis for discussion. The Government's approach to the issues raised in these discussions is set out in the White Paper "IGC: Reform for Enlargement".

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the Government's response to the options for (a) the Economic and Social Committee and (b) the Committee of the Regions, set out in document CONFER 4741/00, prepared by the Conference of the Representatives of the Governments of the member states for the intergovernmental conference. [124868]

Mr. Vaz: Conference papers are produced by the Presidency for discussion at both Preparatory Group and ministerial levels. They do not require a formal response from member states' Governments. Discussion so far has focused mainly on the size and composition of the Economic and Social Committee and Committee of the Regions. For reasons of cost and effectiveness, the Government would not like to see either the Economic and Social Committee or the Committee of the Regions grow much above their present size after enlargement, although we shall ensure that the UK continues to be fairly represented on both Committees.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will introduce legislation to extend similar protection to the value of pensions paid by the Zimbabwean Government to British subjects recruited from Britain for appointments in the Public Service of Southern Rhodesia before November 1965 who now live outside Zimbabwe, as that given under the Overseas Pensions Act 1973 to HMOCS officers. [124260]

Mr. Foulkes: I have been asked to reply.

The Government have no current plans to introduce legislation to expand the pension protection arrangements under the Overseas Pensions Act 1973 to former employees of the Southern Rhodesia public service.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

European Community Humanitarian Office

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if contributions to ECHO are voluntary for members of the European Union; and if she will change her contribution to ECHO based on its past performance. [121098]

Clare Short: No. ECHO is funded, as are other EC external programmes, from the EC budget, to which member state contributions are mandatory. The UK contribution, under a formula agreed in 1992, will be 17.95 per cent. this year.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will provide accounts regarding the distribution of United Kingdom public money to Zimbabwe in the 1980s and 1990s to fund the acquisition of white-owned farms; and if she will set out the number of such farms acquired, the approximate acreage of each farm, the cost of acquiring each farm, to whom ownership of each farm was subsequently transferred, and how much of the original acreage acquired remains in productive operation. [120933]

Clare Short: A grant of £20 million was agreed with the Government of Zimbabwe in 1981. This funded 42 resettlement projects for the benefit of refugees and landless people following the Independence war. British funds were used for land demarcation and fencing, provision of water and sanitation, construction of schools, clinics and other buildings, and also for crop packs and training. The Grant was largely disbursed by 1989; however it was eventually closed in 1996 with £3 million unspent. Over a similar period, the counterpart funds to £27 million in programme aid were used by the Government of Zimbabwe to fund their share of the programme.

An ODA evaluation in 1988 found that the majority of families settled had benefited considerably through the provision of increased opportunities for income generation and the availability of services such as health and education. The programme had also been successful from the national economic perspective, having an economic rate of return of approximately 21 per cent. The Zimbabwean Comptroller and Auditor General carried out a value for money study of the programme in 1993. Despite identifying a number of shortcomings, the study concluded that the exercise was well planned in accordance with clear policies and procedures. It had benefited mainly the landless rural poor, most of whose standard of living had significantly improved.

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) how much money has been given to the Government of Zimbabwe under the Land Reform and Resettlement Programme, since May 1997; [124335]

(2) how many Zimbabwean families have benefited from land acquired using Her Majesty's Government funds since 1997; [124337]

(3) how many farms the Zimbabwean Government have acquired using funds provided by Her Majesty's Government since May 1997. [124336]

Clare Short: In 1996 a land resettlement grant signed in 1981 was closed with £3 million undisbursed because the Government of Zimbabwe had not produced suitable plans to spend it. We have not disbursed funds for land acquisition and resettlement since. We have made clear that land reform and resettlement should be an important part of a poverty reduction programme in Zimbabwe, and supported the principles to govern a future land reform programme agreed at the Donors Conference in 1998. These include poverty reduction, transparency and the rule of law. The Government of Zimbabwe have not implemented the 1998 principles. We made £5 million available to support land resettlement initiatives led by civil society and the private sector.

PRIME MINISTER

Public Question-time Meetings

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Prime Minister on what dates, and at which venues, he held question-time meetings with members of the public in (a) 1999 and (b) 2000 to date. [122984]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 19 May 2000]: I answer questions from members of the public all the time.

Queen Mother's Birthday

Mr. Burns: To ask the Prime Minister if he will designate the Queen Mother's birthday in August as a public holiday; and if he will make a statement. [124752]

The Prime Minister: The Government receive a variety of suggestions for additional bank holidays to celebrate special occasions. However, it was felt that another additional bank holiday, following so soon after the Millennium bank holiday, would be inappropriate. This followed consultation with the Royal Household who were content with the decision.

Post Office

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister when he will publish the Performance and Innovation Unit report on the Post Office. [125314]

The Prime Minister: Shortly.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Solicitor-General if he will accelerate the programme for modernising the information technology of the Crown Prosecution Service to match the introduction of the new police IT for managing casework. [124913]

The Solicitor-General: I am pleased to report that all CPS offices, including those in Staffordshire, will benefit from a significant investment in IT in 2000–01.

The CPS was awarded £12 million from the Government's Capital Modernisation Fund in July 1999 and this money, together with existing CPS resources, will fund the Connect 42 project. Connect 42 will provide lawyers and caseworkers with access to modern PCs across the 42 CPS Areas for the first time. It will also enable the CPS to have secure electronic mail connections with its partners in the Criminal Justice System, including the police.

A pilot of Connect 42 has been running in Sussex since March 2000. The national roll-out timetable is demanding and is scheduled to start in August 2000 and to be completed in July 2001, in advance of the new police casework system in most Areas. I understand that the detailed timetable for the new police casework system is being developed. The intention is to implement the system in police forces by the end of 2002.

Connect 42 will be followed by step 2 of the Modernisation Programme, the Compass project, which is procuring a Managed Service through a PFI contract. This will use the IT infrastructure of Connect 42, and complement it with a case management system designed to meet the needs of front line CPS staff. It will provide the ability to work with electronic case files and allow information to be exchanged much more easily with other organisations in the criminal justice system through speedier electronic communications between computer systems.

The CPS plans to advertise its requirement for the Compass project in the Official Journal of the European Communities in the 3rd quarter of 2000. Following procurement and development in 2001 and 2002, implementation of the system is planned for 2003. The CPS does not think that it is possible to accelerate this demanding timetable.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Solicitor-General what was the funding of the Crown Prosecution Service (a) in real terms and (b) as a proportion of GDP for each year of its existence. [124910]

The Solicitor-General: The funding of the Crown Prosecution Service in real terms and as a proportion of GDP for each year of its existence is listed as follows:

£000

Year	Total expenditure in real terms	Proportion of GDP (Percentage)
1986–87	124,124	0.019
1987–88	212,691	0.031
1988–89	233,487	0.033
1989–90	255,755	0.035
1990–91	274,902	0.038
1991–92	294,325	0.041
1992–93	321,371	0.045
1993–94	344,510	0.047
1994–95	350,410	0.045
1995–96	345,281	0.044
1996–97	339,536	0.042
1997–98	331,139	0.039
1998–99	328,347	0.038
1999–2000	323,408	0.035

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Solicitor-General by what formula the funding of the Crown Prosecution Service nationally is distributed to the area offices. [124911]

The Solicitor-General: Decisions on how much of the CPS's resources should be allocated to individual CPS Areas are for the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Chief Executive. They are informed by a number of analyses, including activity based costing (ABC), estimated payroll costs of staff not included in ABC analyses, accommodation costs, indicators of the type and nature of Areas, specific local factors, and the involvement of individual Areas in new initiatives.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Solicitor-General what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the budget of the Staffordshire CPS. [124912]

The Solicitor-General: Decisions on how much of the CPS's resources should be allocated to individual CPS Areas are for the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Chief Executive. The allocation of the CPS's budget to the 42 CPS Areas is informed by a detailed analysis of the costs of the prosecution process and caseload. This analysis is used to inform decisions on the budget for CPS Staffordshire and for all other CPS Areas.

Performance Indicators

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Solicitor-General if he will make a statement on how each of the agencies and non-departmental bodies relating to his Department performed against their key performance indicators in (a) the last year and (b) the previous two years. [125332]

The Solicitor-General: A summary of performance for work in England and Wales is set out in the tables.

Treasury Solicitor's Department

[1] The information in this column is provisional, pending the preparation of the final accounts for 1999–2000.

[2] Since the Key Performance Target for Bona Vacantia Division was introduced it has become apparent that the methodology used to assess the number of cases is statistically biased towards non-achievement as it makes no allowance for the differing complexity of individual cases. The target will remain as set for 1999–2000 but the baseline against which performance is judged will be assessed and, if necessary, adjusted to recognise the differing complexity of cases.

Note:

Further information on performance against these targets can be found in the Executive Agencies 1999 Report (Cmnd 4658).

Government Property Lawyers

Target	1997–98	1998–99[1]	1999–2000

[1] The Government Property Lawyers Agency was the subject of a Quinquennial Review from November 1997 to November 1998 and no formal targets were set for 1998–99 pending its outcome. The eventual outcome was that the Agency should close by 30 September 1999 and as a result no further key performance indicators were set.

Serious Fraud Office

The Serious Fraud Office's key performance indicators were published on 17 December 1998 as part of the Law Officer's Department's Public Service Agreement. They are:

(i) caseload;

(ii) time from accepting a case to completing investigations; and

(iii) length of the prosecution stage between transfer/committal and verdict.

The targets set were:

(i) to increase caseload from 73 cases per year in 1998–99 to 77 cases per year within resources provided;

(ii) to reduce average time from accepting a case and completing investigations from 18 months in 1998–99 to 17.5 months;

(iii) to reduce the average length of the prosecution stage between transfer/committal and verdict from 16.5 months in 1998–99 to 16 months.

Outturn data which show that the Office has met its key targets are set out in the following table. Figures for the year 1997–98 are included to enable comparison.

Financial year	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000
Caseload	78	73	85

DEFENCE

Non-deployable Estate

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the terms of reference for the review of the non-deployable estate; when he expects it to be complete; and if he will place a copy in the Library. [121940]

Mr. Spellar: As part of the continuing effort to maximise value for money from the Defence Budget, the Army is currently engaged in an internal review of non-deployable posts. The review is due to be completed in the autumn. There are no formal terms of reference for the review, which is being undertaken by the Army chain of command. The aim is to carry out an audit of military posts in the non-deployable Army, in order to inform judgments on the requirement for and priorities for the deployment of military manpower. There are no plans to publish the outcome of the review.

Special Investigations Branch

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 24 January 2000, Official Report, column 67W, on the Royal Irish Regiment (a) for what reasons the report of the Special Investigations Branch of the Royal Military Police has not been made and (b) how many of the sub-sections of the Question he is in a position to respond to. [123885]

Mr. Spellar: The investigation by Special Investigations Branch, Royal Military Police is now complete and I can confirm the following information.

There have been four Parliamentary Questions on this matter including this one and two Parliamentary Inquiries. The photograph was taken on Monday 12 July at Drumadd Barracks, Armagh and shows 59 Officers and soldiers from F Company the 8th Battalion the Royal Irish Regiment (8 R IRISH). The photoshoot was supervised by a Major who took some of the photographs before joining the Company for further photographs, which were taken by a Warrant Officer. The flag was produced by a soldier of the Company who had just come off duty. A commercial photographic service establishment in Belfast developed the film and approximately 40 copies were made and given to members within F Company. No disciplinary action is to be taken against the officer but formal administrative action procedures have been initiated.

Photographs can be taken in all sorts of circumstances which can subsequently be misinterpreted. F Company was deployed on 12 July along with other Army units precisely in order to prevent sectarian violence and it is wrong to label a whole Regiment, or the individuals in the photograph, as bigoted. We expect the highest standards of conduct from all soldiers, and in particular that they should be aware of community sensitivities in Northern Ireland. During 1999 the Royal Irish Regiment collected over £133,000 for cross-community charities. 8 R IRISH also won the prestigious Wilkinson's Sword of Peace for its cross-community work in Armagh. These are examples of their cross-community activities and are not indicative of a biased Regiment.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 8 February 2000, Official Report, columns 109–10W, concerning secondments, which of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124829]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 7 June 2000]: My Department had nine inward secondments of 12 months or less from the following companies:

BMT Defence Systems
Vickers
Vosper Thorneycroft
BAe
Gardiner and Theobald
Simmons and Simmons
Defence Acquisition Group (x2)
PA Consulting Group

Slovenia

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the extent is of joint working with Slovenia on military matters; how many UK personnel work in Slovenia on training and related matters; and if he will make a statement. [124884]

Mr. Spellar: Slovenia is one of the countries of Central and Eastern Europe included in the Ministry of Defence's Outreach Programme of bilateral assistance. My officials hold annual Defence Staff Talks with their Slovenian counterparts and from these discussions a programme of bilateral assistance is constructed. The main area of assistance is in English language training, but we also conduct seminars on various Defence related subjects, discussions on codification and standardisation, and arms control training. There are also VIP and working level short visits to UK by Slovenian Ministry of Defence officials and members of their Armed Forces, including attendance on TA summer camps, and reciprocal visits by UK Ministry of Defence officials and members of UK Armed Forces.

At present there are no MOD UK personnel working in Slovenia, however the UK Defence Attaché to Slovenia, who is currently cross-accredited to Austria and resident in Vienna, is moving to Slovenia on 13 June 2000. Additionally, an MOD civil servant is due to take up post as Adviser on Defence Policy and Planning in the Slovenian Ministry of Defence in September 2000.

Latvia

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the extent of joint working with Latvia is on military matters; how many UK personnel work in Latvia on training and related matters; and if he will make a statement. [124887]

Mr. Spellar: The UK has an extensive programme of defence assistance to Latvia as part of the MOD's "Outreach" initiative to promote stability and security in central and eastern Europe. The UK's programme of assistance to Latvia is underpinned by English language training, defence management training and military training which is provided both in-country and in the UK. We also assist Latvia through our contribution to the joint Baltic projects: the Baltic Security Assistance forum; the Baltic Peacekeeping Battalion; the Baltic Naval Squadron; the Baltic Defence College; and the Baltic Air Surveillance Network. Another substantial area of co-operation is the deployment of a 10 strong Latvian contingent with BRITFOR in Kosovo.

Currently we have six personnel working permanently in Latvia on training and related matters, with a civil servant seconded to the Latvian Defence Ministry to advise on programming and budgeting systems and five Royal Marines working with the Baltic Peacekeeping Battalion Training Team. However, Short Term Training Teams (STTTs) provide most of the military training, visiting Latvia for between two weeks to three months each summer; this year the STTTs will involve approximately 15 personnel. In addition to those involved directly in training, the Defence Attaché in Riga, assisted by an Assistant Defence Attaché, liaises with the Latvian Defence Ministry to ascertain their training and assistance requirements for each year.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the cost has been so far of UK involvement in Sierra Leone; if any of that cost will be claimed from the United Nations; and if he will make a statement. [124886]

Mr. Hoon: The additional costs of Operation Palliser, the evacuation deployment to Sierra Leone which commenced on 5 May, are still being established, but it is estimated that they will amount to some £8 million. As Operation Palliser is not a United Nations operation, we do not expect to claim any of those costs from the United Nations.

Missile Defence Systems

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason the Exocet missile launcher has been removed from HMS Sheffield; what plans there are to replace it; and what similar work has been undertaken on other ships of this class. [125083]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 8 June 2000]: The Exocet missile launcher has been removed from the batch 2 Type 22 Frigate HMS Sheffield because the variant of the missile used by the RN is now obsolete and no longer in Naval service. There are no plans to replace the launcher. HMS Sheffield remains armed with a potent mixture of weapons and sensors including Seawolf Anti-Air Missiles, Stingray Anti-Submarine Torpedoes and a helicopter able to carry the Sea Skua Anti-ship missile. There are no plans to remove the launchers from the remaining batch 2 vessels in this class as, given their relatively short remaining life, it would not be economic to do so. The latest Batch (3) Type 22 Frigates carry the Harpoon anti-ship missile system.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the programme of work that is being undertaken by his Department in relation to ballistic missile defence. [125009]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 8 June 2000]: Following the policy on ballistic missile defence set out in the Strategic Defence Review, the Ministry of Defence is undertaking a three-year programme of studies known as the Technology Readiness and Risk Assessment Programme. This programme is monitoring developments in the risks posed by ballistic missiles and in the technology to counter them. It is due to be completed next summer. The terms of reference for the programme were announced on 27 July 1999, Official Report, column 203W. In addition, we are contributing to NATO preparations for studies into the feasibility of theatre ballistic missile defence. We expect these studies to start next year.

Project Aquatrine

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when his Department will issue invitations to submit outline proposals for Project Aquatrine; and if he will make a statement. [125317]

Dr. Moonie: In accordance with the timetable announced at the Project Aquatrine bidders conference in March this year, I expect that invitations to submit outline proposals for the initial package of the project will be issued very shortly.

Rudloe Manor

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what considerations other than price will affect the sale of Rudloe Manor. [125392]

Dr. Moonie: When selling surplus property the Ministry of Defence follows Government Accounting procedures seeking to achieve the full market value. This is usually best determined by offering the property for sale on the open market with a specific date for the submission of bids. In selecting a preferred purchaser for Rudloe Manor, my Department also paid regard to the proposed uses, the ability of bidders to finance the purchase and their timescales for completing the sale.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what account he will take of the potential for job creation in his decision on the purchaser of Rudloe Manor. [125393]

Dr. Moonie: Rudloe Manor has been offered for sale with reference to the policy for the site, identified in the North Wiltshire District Council Local Plan and the modifications to the Draft Local Plan which the Council has agreed. It is for the Local Planning Authority properly to consider the issue of job creation, as part of any future planning application for the site.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many tenders there were for the purchase of Rudloe Manor; and how many of them were within the original specification. [125394]

Dr. Moonie: Sixteen bids were received, all of which complied with the original specification.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will reach a conclusion about the sale of Rudloe Manor: and if he will make a statement on the sale. [125391]

Dr. Moonie: A purchaser has now been identified for Rudloe Manor and the terms of sale have been agreed, subject to contract. Considerable interest was shown in the property and all unsuccessful bidders have now been notified.

Asbestosis

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the level of compensation paid to civilian dockyard workers for work-related asbestosis contracted while working (a) on Royal Navy vessels and (b) in Royal Naval dockyards. [124934]

Mr. Spellar: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

RAF St. Mawgan

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many personnel stationed at RAF St. Mawgan have been subjected to (a) combat survival and rescue training and (b) conduct after capture courses; how many personnel have refused to participate in this training; and what sanctions have been employed to ensure participation. [125200]

Mr. Spellar: Conduct After Capture (CAC) training is an integral element of the current Aircrew Combat Survival Course (ACSC) held at the RAF School of Combat Survival and Rescue at RAF St. Mawgan. Attendance on the course is a mandatory training requirement for all RAF personnel engaged on operational duties that may make them prone to capture or interrogation. Since September 1992, 1,029 students have entered training on the ACSC at RAF St. Mawgan. Of these, five withdrew voluntarily from the practical CAC phase of the training but one returned at a later date to complete the training.

All students on the (CAC) training phase of the course must give their written consent to undergo the training. Prior to participation, all students are made aware of what they will encounter during the training, and they remain at liberty to withdraw from the training at any time, either before participation or during it. Individuals who choose not to undergo the training, or who do not complete the course, will be moved to duties where they would not be prone to capture or interrogation.

Medals

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the answer given on 22 May 2000, Official Report, column 313W, on medals, in relation to each clasp listed, what was (a) the scale of the deployment, (b) the number of people wounded and (c) the number of people killed; if troops were deployed in active service; and if the area was designated an operational zone. [125556]

Dr. Moonie: This information is not held centrally. I will write to my hon. Friend and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Employment (Alyn and Deeside)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people are employed by his Department in the constituency of Alyn and Deeside; and if he will make a statement. [125558]

Dr. Moonie: There are 1,859 people employed by the Ministry of Defence in the constituency of Alyn and Deeside.

D Notices

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many D Notices have been published with regard to the responsibilities of his Department in the last six months (a) relating to Northern Ireland and (b) relating to other matters. [124692]

Mr. Spellar: No DA Notices have been published specifically with regard to the responsibilities of the Ministry of Defence in the last six months. There are standing DA Notices which apply to all Departments, where matters of National Security are concerned, and these contain advice to editors and others which can be applied to any appropriate circumstances. From 1993 there were six such standing notices, until 24 May 2000 when, after revision of the Notices by the independent Defence, Press and Broadcasting Advisory Committee, a new set of five standing DA Notices was promulgated. Details have been passed to the House of Commons Library, and can be found also on the internet at www.dnotice.org.uk.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Frozen Beef Imports

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much frozen beef was imported to the UK by country of origin, in each of the last five years; and in each case what was the percentage of total UK consumption. [124623]

Ms Quin [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The following table shows the volume of frozen beef imported into the United Kingdom, as recorded by the Overseas Trade Statistics from 1995 to 1999. The import figures have been converted to carcase weight equivalent for comparison with consumption figures. The imports are shown by country of despatch which is not necessarily the country of origin.

Farmers (Reskilling)

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what funds the Government have made available for retraining and reskilling farmers and agricultural workers in each of the past 10 years through the Agricultural Training Board and Lantra. [123464]

Ms Quin [holding answer 23 May 2000]: Payments made by the Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food to the Agricultural Training Board, ATB-Landbase and Lantra are as follows:

Year	£000
Payments to the Agricultural Training Board
1990–91	10,349
1991–92	7,303
1992–93	6,700
1993–94	9,755
Payments to ATB-Landbase
1994–95	4,156
1995–96	2,471

1997–98	[1]1,508
Payments to Lantra
1998–99	[1]1,333
1999–2000	[1]797
2000–01[3]	[1,2]2,328

[1] Includes payments under the Government's Sector Challenge Scheme
[2] Included payments under the Agriculture Development Scheme
[3] Budgeted

Payments to the Agricultural Training Board included costs associated with the restructuring of the Board prior to privatisation in 1994. The payments to ATB-Landbase were for the provision of Industry Training Organisation services and the payments to Lantra were for the delivery of National Training Organisation services.

The figures given in the table do not include funding provided by other Government Departments including Department for Education and Employment and the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority, the devolved administrations and the European Commission.

Agricultural Wages

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to announce the results of the consultation on the future of the agricultural wages boards. [125170]

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the Government's consultation on the future of the agricultural wages boards. [125398]

Ms Quin: The consultation period closed on 31 March and some 250 comments have been received. Independent research was also commissioned to complement the consultation exercise and the results are due later this month. We will announce the outcome of the review as soon as possible when we have considered all the responses and issues raised.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the present proportion of farm costs which are represented by labour costs. [125196]

Ms Quin: In 1998–99, labour costs are estimated to have represented an average of 16.2 per cent. of the total farm costs of full-time farm business in England. These labour costs include an imputed estimate of the wholly or mainly unpaid labour carried out on the farm, principally by farmers, spouses and other family workers. Estimates for 1999–2000 will be published early in 2001.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on rates of pay in the horticulture industry. [125355]

Ms Quin: Minimum rates of pay for the horticulture industry are set by the Agricultural Wages Board, which is an independent body. The most recent Agricultural Wages Order came into force on 1 June 2000.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the role played by Agricultural Wages Board rates of pay in the rural economy. [125197]

Ms Quin: As part of the quinquennial review of the Agricultural Wages Board, announced in December 1999, independent research is being undertaken to evaluate the impact of the provisions in the Agricultural Wages Order. The results will be made available when the outcome of the review is published.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the effect of Agricultural Wages Board rates of pay on rural pay levels generally. [125199]

Ms Quin: We have made no special assessment of the effect of the Agricultural Wages Board on rural rates of pay in general. Over the years some rural employers have based the pay for non-agricultural workers on the rates set by the Agricultural Wages Board.

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the final draft of the second report of the Independent Scientific Group on cattle TB will be published. [125172]

Ms Quin [holding answer 9 June 2000]: The report was published on 7 February this year and copies were placed in the Library of the House, as set out in the reply, 7 February 2000, Official Report, column 80W.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many and what proportion of badgers trapped and killed in the TB trial in Wiltshire, in May, were lactating females; and if he will make a statement. [125258]

Ms Quin [holding answer 9 June 2000]: Of the badgers trapped and killed in the recent trial operations in Wiltshire, 35 (5.8 per cent.) were lactating females.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what resources have been allocated (a) within the public sector and (b) as grants to private sector research for the development of a prophylactic bovine TB treatment. [125175]

Ms Quin [holding answer 9 June 2000]: We are spending about £1.4 million a year on developing a vaccine against bovine TB. Research at the Veterinary Laboratory Agency accounts for approximately 70 per cent. of this expenditure; work at the Institute of Animal Health, Compton, accounts for the rest. This research also draws on significant amounts of work being undertaken in related fields internationally.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what risk analysis has been carried out on (a) the provision of a prophylactic bovine TB treatment and (b) the proposals advanced by the Krebs/Bourne Study. [125177]

Ms Quin [holding answer 9 June 2000]: Risk assessments on TB vaccines will be carried out as part of the normal regulatory process if and when suitable candidate vaccines have been developed. Proposals which emerge from the epidemiological investigation into TB in cattle being undertaken by Professor Bourne's Independent Scientific Group will be assessed against a range of factors including the impact on public health, on animal health and welfare, on the environment and on the economy.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the intended timescale for making publicly available information arising from an audit assessing the effectiveness of the surveying and social group delineation of badger culling. [125257]

Ms Quin [holding answer 9 June 2000]: We intend to publish the report, together with the Government's response, as soon as possible after the final report is received from the independent auditor. On current expectations, this will be during the summer.

Fisheries Multi-annual Guidance Programme

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what reduction in British fishing effort has been achieved so far in MAGP IV; and what reduction he hopes to gain by the end of that programme. [124453]

Mr. Morley: Between 1 January 1997 and 31 December 1999 the capacity of the UK fleet was reduced by 3.2 per cent. in tonnage and 7.7 per cent. in engine power.

Between 1997 and 1999 the effort of those segments of the fleet for which there are MAGP effort objectives (that is, pelagic, beam trawl, demersal, seines, nephrops and distant water vessels), has been reduced by 5.7 per cent. (tonnage effort) and by 8.5 per cent. (power effort).

The UK has achieved its intermediate effort objectives and is on course in most segments to achieve its full capacity and effort objectives under the programme. However, capacity of the pelagic segment is currently some way outside its MAGP IV objective.

TREASURY

Top-rate Taxpayers

Mr. Portillo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many top rate income tax payers (a) there were in (i) 1996–97, (ii) 1997–98, (iii) 1998–99 and (iv) 1999–2000 and (b) he expects there to be in (i) 2000–01 and (ii) 2001–02. [120351]

Dawn Primarolo: Latest published estimates for the number of higher rate income taxpayers are in table 2.1 of Inland Revenue Statistics (IRS). The latest version of table 2.1 consistent with the March 2000 Budget is available on the Inland Revenue website at www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk/stats/table2–1.htm.

Estimates for 2000–01 will be published in the 2000 edition of IRS, which will be available around October 2000.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what the expenditure on the Working Families Tax Credit was (a) for each month since October 1999 and (b) for the period April to October 1999, (i) in total, (ii) minus the projected expenditure on Family Credit, (iii) minus the savings on Council Tax Benefit and (iv) minus the savings on Housing Benefit; [122392]

(2) pursuant to his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 47W, what is the average amount by which other benefits have been reduced for families with incomes of less than £12,000 as a result of the Working Families Tax Credit. [122988]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answers 16 and 19 May 2000]: Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) and Disabled Person's Tax Credit (DPTC) were introduced on 5 October 1999. Total expenditure on these tax credits in 1999–2000 is estimated at £0.9 billion, but reliable estimates for each month are not available.

Given the difference in income rules in relation to maintenance, and the fact that it is not possible to isolate behavioural effects (such as the number of families who may have entered work or increased their hours because WFTC provides a more generous work incentive than Family Credit), it is not possible to determine how much would have been spent on FC in 1999–2000 had WFTC not been introduced.

The receipt of Housing Benefit (HB) and Council Tax Benefit (CTB) cannot be determined from information processed for applications for WFTC. The receipt of WFTC by families in receipt of HB and CTB, and hence the saving in HB and CTB for these families, can be determined from the information processed for claims for those benefits. However, for some families the award of WFTC, together with other income available, will mean that there is no entitlement to HB or CTB. The general level of saving on HB and CTB for these families can only be estimated using household survey data on families receiving WFTC. Such data will become available, in sufficient sample numbers to yield reliable estimates, at some time from the second half of 2001.

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out for each financial year between April 1999 and April 2002 the gross actual and planned expenditure on (a) the working families tax credit and (b) the working families tax credit minus the savings on housing benefit and council tax benefit attributable to the working families tax credit. [123780]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 25 May 2000]: The total expenditure on Working Families' Tax Credit (WFTC) and the Disabled Person's Tax Credit (DPTC) in 1999–00, and the Budget projections of expenditure on these credits for 2000–01 and 2001–02, are shown at Table C12 of the March 2000 Financial Statement and Budget Report (FSBR).

No estimate for 1999–00 of the saving on Housing Benefit (HB) and Council Tax Benefit (CTB) is yet available, for the reason given in a separate answer I am today giving my right hon. Friend. I understand from the Department of Social Security that the projections of expenditure on HB and CTB in the FSBR were net of the following savings attributable to WFTC.

2000–01	100
2001–02	115

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the number of recipients of the child care tax credit in WFTC who do not use eligible child care. [124937]

Dawn Primarolo: The child care tax credit in Working Families' Tax Credit can only be claimed by people who pay for eligible child care.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the child care tax credit will relate to the reformed employment tax credit and integrated child credit. [124938]

Dawn Primarolo: The child care tax credit is an integral part of the Working Families' Tax Credit, and provides help with child care costs for parents who are working. It will continue to provide help with child care costs for working parents in the new generation of tax credits. The precise position of the child care tax credit within the new tax credits depends on detailed design of the new generation of credits, on which decisions have not yet been made.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many families are in receipt of the child care tax credit in the Working Families Tax Credit and Disabled Person's Tax Credit in each (a) parliamentary constituency and (b) local authority. [124986]

Dawn Primarolo: It is estimated that about 103,000 families benefited from the child care tax credit among the 1.03 million families with awards of the Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) made to the end of March in the United Kingdom.

There are too few cases in the 5 per cent. sample used for the analysis of WFTC awards to provide reliable estimates for each parliamentary constituency or local authority. However, estimates of the total number of WFTC awards made to the end of March in each parliamentary constituency are in tables which have been deposited in the Library following my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden) on 17 April 2000, Official Report, column 370W.

Diesel Fuel

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average retail price per litre of diesel fuel two weeks (a) before his 1999 Budget and (b) after his 2000 Budget; and in each case how much of the price was attributable to (i) fuel duty and (ii) VAT. [125195]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 9 June 2000]: The retail price and duty rate for diesel fuel in February 1999 are published in Tables 9.14 and 9.16 in the Department of Trade and Industry publication "Digest of United Kingdom Energy Statistics 1999".

The average retail price for a litre of diesel fuel in April 2000 was 81.07p. The duty rate is 48.82p per litre.

The rate of VAT for diesel fuel is 17.5 per cent..

VAT (Youth Organisations)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received in favour of the restoration of zero rating for value added tax on (a) new scout hall buildings, (b) scout hall extensions and (c) other community youth organisations; when the decision was taken that VAT should be levied; if he will rescind that decision; and if he will make a statement. [R] [125073]

Dawn Primarolo: When VAT was introduced the construction and extension of any building was zero-rated. In 1984 the relief for extensions was withdrawn. Following infraction proceedings by the European Commission, the relief for constructing new buildings became restricted to only certain types of building in 1989. New buildings used by charities for non-business purposes or as village halls can still be zero-rated. Agreements with our European partners mean that we cannot re-introduce any zero rates that we have given up.

In common with all charities Scout and other youth halls will benefit from the zero rate where the conditions for relief are met. Treasury Ministers have received a number of representations on this matter on behalf of the Scout Association.

ECOFIN Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the outcome of the ECOFIN Council held in Luxembourg on 5 June; and if he will make a statement. [125123]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The Chancellor of the Exchequer attended the Economic and Finance Council of Ministers.

ECOFIN approved the text of the Broad Economic Guidelines for submission to the Feira European Council, with slight amendment.

There was a discussion of the Code of Conduct group and the proposed Savings Directive. It was agreed that ECOFIN would meet ahead of the Feira European Council for a further discussion.

Correspondence

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire will receive a reply to his letter of 3 April on behalf of his constituent, Mrs. Hall. [125399]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I replied to the right hon. Gentleman on 5 June.

Government Borrowing

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the Government's borrowing plans. [125981]

Miss Melanie Johnson: In light of recent developments which have increased cash receipts this financial year by £19.5 billion more than the Budget forecast, the Government are making the following changes to the Debt Management Office's gilt remit for 2000–01.

Quantity of Gilt Sales

The DMO will aim for gilt sales of £10 billion in 2000–01, a reduction of £2.2 billion on previous plans. There will be no further reductions in gilt sales this financial year.

Amount and Maturity Mix of Conventional Gilt Issuance

DMO will hold two further conventional auctions in the long (15 years and over) maturity area. DMO should aim for total conventional gilt sales of £6.5 billion for 2000–01.

Exercise of contingency measures in the Debt Management Report

HM Treasury will accommodate £5.9 billion of the receipts by pre-financing £3.9 billion of foreign currency debt due to mature in 2001–02 and £2.0 billion of foreign currency debt due to mature in 2002–03. This differs from the £5.7 billion figure in the Debt Management Report due to the fall in sterling against the dollar since the Budget.

The planned Treasury Bill stock will also be reduced by £0.7 billion to £8 billion.

Buy-backs of debt

The buy-back programme may be increased later in the year to a maximum of £5 billion. This will be decided at the time of the Pre-Budget Report.

Net short term debt

The remaining proceeds (£10.7 billion before any increase in buy-backs) will be used to reduce net short term debt (the Ways and Means balance, Treasury Bills less short term assets). Given that £10 billion of the proceeds are not expected until later in the year, decisions on the composition of the reduction in net short term debt will also be made at the time of the Pre-Budget Report, also taking into account any revision to the forecast Central Government Net Cash Requirement.

The reduction in net debt will be unwound in 2001–02 and 2002–03, reducing gilt sales during this period.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Welsh and Scottish Universities

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what incentives for collaboration between business and universities are to be offered to Welsh and Scottish universities. [121664]

Ms Hewitt: In addition to support from the devolved Administrations, Scotland and Wales also benefit from the LINK programme that supports collaborative R&D projects involving HEIs and business, and from the TCS Programme which supports high quality graduates working in companies, normally for two years, on technology transfer projects central to the needs of participating companies. In addition, institutions in both Scotland and Wales are eligible to participate in Science Enterprise Challenge and University Challenge.

The Government intend to publish a Science and Innovation White Paper following the Spending Review 2000. Among other things, it will consider how we can further promote university-industry collaboration, and how we might better encourage our scientists, engineers and business people to take full advantage of the UK's expertise in science and technology, to create wealth and improve the quality of our lives.

Assisted Areas Map (Angus)

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he will take to offset the losses to Angus if the revised assisted area boundaries proposals are introduced. [123576]

Mr. Caborn: None. Local economic development is a matter for the Scottish Executive.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what analysis he has made of the impact on the local economy of the loss of assisted area status to the four Angus wards. [123577]

Mr. Caborn: The needs of all areas including Angus were considered in drawing the revised assisted area proposals.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reason the four Angus wards were included on the original assisted area map submitted in July 1999; and what economic factors have changed in the meantime to form the basis for their exclusion from the revised map. [123579]

Mr. Caborn: The exclusion of the four Angus wards from the revised assisted areas proposals did not reflect a change in the needs of those wards but rather was a consequence of changes made to meet the European Commission's concerns about our July proposals.

ECGD

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what is the total sum of (a) premiums received by the Export Credits Guarantee Department and (b) claims paid out by the ECGD for each of the last 10 years in respect of defence exports; [124659]

(2) what was the net cast outflow from the Export Credits Guarantee Department attributable to defence exports, broken down by (a) cost of interest rate support, (b) claims paid, (c) interest paid and (d) operating expenses, for each of the last 10 years. [124661]

Mr. Caborn: The following table details Claims Paid and Premium Earned in request of Defence related business in each of the last ten Financial Years. The cost of Interest Rate supported has been estimated on the proportion of ECGD credit business constituted by defence related business. For completeness the table also includes details of recoveries of claims on defence related business.

£ million

Year	Premium Earned	Claims Paid	Estimate of Interest Rate support	Recoveries received
1990–91	16	79	81	3
1991–92	11	79	2	24
1992–93	44	94	26	21
1993–94	38	83	−7	9
1994–95	16	92	−1	17
1995–96	23	90	2	28
1996–97	8	50	1	2
1997–98	12	39	4	3
1998–99	18	31	3	6
1999–2000	27	152	1	9
Total	213	789	112	122

As for the further information my hon. Friend requests, I am afraid ECGD does not hold its records on a basis which would enable it to provide the level of details he has requested. It would involve disproportionate cost to produce it.

Postal Services

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what representations Her Majesty's Government made at the Lisbon Council concerning liberalisation of postal markets; [125563]

(2) if it is his policy to support the timescale for liberalisation of postal markets proposed by the European Commission; and if he will make a statement; [125599]

(3) what assessment he has made of the effect the liberalisation of postal markets, agreed at the Lisbon Council, will have on the Universal Service Obligation. [125597]

Mr. Byers: The Government strongly supported the Lisbon agreement on the need to speed up liberalisation in areas such postal services. That is why we have made it a priority for the new postal regulator, the Postal Services Commission, to come forward with proposals for liberalisation in the context of maintaining the universal service. That is also why we have supported a process of phased liberalisation of the postal services market in Europe. The European Commission has now agreed and will shortly publish a new proposal proposing a framework for the scope and timing of the next phase of postal liberalisation. There can now be a substantive discussion, between the member states and the Commission, about the issues the proposal raises. In the UK, we have a commitment to consult with the Postal Services Commission and with other interested parties in reaching a view. Our key objective in considering this issue is to promote the interest of consumers and to ensure the maintenance of the universal service. We should oppose measures which put at risk the universal service.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if it is his policy to support a levy on postal service licence holders to create a fund to support the universal service obligation. [125596]

Mr. Byers: No.

Synchrotron

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Technology Authority has made to the (a) Minister for Science and (b) the Office of Science and Technology on the siting of the synchrotron project. [124808]

Ms Hewitt: The United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority has made no representations on the issue of the siting of the new synchrotron project to either the Minister for Science or the Office of Science and Technology.

Research Council Spending

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much Research Council money was spent in each region in each of the last three years for which figures are available, broken down in each case between (a) universities and (b) other organisations. [124809]

Ms Hewitt: Details of the Research Councils' gross spend by region for the three years 1996–97 to 1998–99, analysed between universities and other organisations, mainly their institutes, is shown in the table.

Research Council spend by region

£000

	Universities	Other
1996–97
England	585,475	417,469
Scotland	88,874	51,229
Wales	18,238	5,245
Northern Ireland	6,881	326
1997–98
England	630,296	397,230
Scotland	88,200	45,888
Wales	21,739	6,998
Northern Ireland	6,204	350
1998–99
England	627,752	407,179
Scotland	86,730	46,673
Wales	22,243	5,022
Northern Ireland	5,982	515

Notes:
1. Figures are Councils' gross expenditure, financed from the Science Budget grant-in-aid and other sources.
2. 'Universities' includes both research grants and postgraduate studentships.
3. 'Other' is largely Research Council institutes.
4. Overseas expenditure, international subscriptions and central headquarters expenditure are excluded.

Science Base

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the recent initiatives that have been introduced to expand the North West science base, indicating how they relate to the development and expansion of the regional economy. [124810]

Mr. Caborn: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Ms Southworth) on 9 June 2000, Official Report, column 388W.

Razzaq v. Pala

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact of the decision in the case of Razzaq v. Pala on his plans to establish a rescue culture for companies. [125762]

Mr. Byers: The decision in that case is a matter for some concern and I therefore propose to undertake an urgent consultation on the issues raised by that decision against the possibility of their being addressed in the context of the current proposed legislation on insolvency.

A consultation paper has been issued asking whether or not landlords should continue to be able to effect peaceable re-entry (without the leave of the court) while a company or an individual is the subject of a statutory moratorium in the context of an insolvency procedure. I have placed copies of that document in the Libraries of the House.

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place in the Library copies of the results of all market and opinion research carried out by his Department, agencies and non-departmental public bodies since May 1997. [123815]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 25 May 2000]: This information is not held centrally and cannot be provided except at disproportionate costs.

The Department's Executive Agencies and non-departmental public bodies have been asked to respond separately. Copies of the letters have been placed in the Library.

Regeneration

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 20 April 2000, Official Report, column 645W, on regeneration, where in his Department's annual report the information requested is given. [124410]

Mr. Caborn [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Chapter 4 of the Department's Annual expenditure Plans provides details of regional economic development expenditure. Such expenditure contributes to regional and local regeneration.

Call Centres

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact on the level of service to residential telephone subscribers of the operation of call centres. [124813]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 7 June 2000]: The Department has not made an assessment of the quality or level of services provided by the very large number of call centres in the UK.

This is a matter for individual call centres businesses.

The call centre industry is a relatively new one. The Trade Association for this industry—the Call Centres Association—is working now with its members to establish standards of service and operation.

Employment Agencies

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans that the new regulations on employment agencies and businesses will come into force. [R] [125182]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 9 June 2000]: I expect the revised regulations to come in to force later this year or at the beginning of 2001, subject to Parliamentary approval.

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many complaints were made by end-users about the imposition of temporary to permanent fees by recruitment agencies in 1999; [R] [125183]

(2) how many temporary workers suffered detriment because of the imposition of temporary to permanent fees by recruitment agencies in 1999. [R] [125184]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 9 June 2000]: Temporary to permanent fees, provided they are notified by bureaux to hirers before they enter into a contract, are not at present regulated and my Department does not therefore maintain any systematic record of the complaints it receives about their imposition. Representations about the adverse effects of transfer fees were received from end-users, agencies, various trade associations and others during the course of the consultation last year. My Department has reason to believe that a substantial number of hirers, who have not negotiated satisfactory terms with bureaux, are deterred from offering permanent work to temporary workers because of the inclusion of transfer fee clauses in bureaux' terms of business.

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what assessment his Department has made of the impact on recruitment companies which place non-specialist manual workers in temporary contracts of the proposed four-week quarantine period included in his Department's current proposals for regulating temporary to permanent fees; and if he will make a statement; [125188]

(2) for what reasons his Department has proposed to limit the proposed quarantine period for the regulation of temporary to permanent fees on recruitment companies to four weeks; and if he will make a statement; [125187]

(3) what assessment his Department has made of the impact on recruitment companies placing information technology contractors in temporary contracts of the proposed four-week quarantine period included in his Department's current proposals for regulating temporary to permanent fees; and if he will make a statement; [125186]

(4) what assessment his Department has made of the case for regulations to ensure that recruitment agencies can protect themselves from end-users, or other agencies, poaching from their contractor base; and if he will make a statement. [125185]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 9 June 2000]: Our proposal to limit the period of quarantine that bureaux may impose, to a maximum of four weeks, seeks to protect the interests of those using bureaux, to secure the proper conduct of bureaux and to promote labour market flexibility. I do not have power under the Employment Agencies Act 1973 in relation to the conduct of hirers. Bureaux will be able to protect their interests by a variety of means, such as by settling satisfactory transfer terms with hirers or by offering attractive employment terms to workers. In sectors such as IT, bureaux will continue to be able to arrange fixed length contracts with hirers and workers so that they have certainty over the period during which they may recoup costs. Bureaux supplying non-specialist manual workers will continue to be able to negotiate terms that suit them and their clients such as, for example, by providing that no transfer fee is payable once a minimum number of weeks' hire have elapsed.

HEALTH

Disabled People

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received on extending the advocacy system for disabled people to the disabled in hospital; and if he will make a statement. [121725]

Mr. Hutton: We are not aware of any recent representations on extending the advocacy system for disabled people to the disabled in hospital.

Models of advocacy have been explored as part of the development of a New National Health Service Charter. This work, including the advocacy role in the NHS, is now being considered as part of the work of the Modernisation (Patient Empowerment) Action Team. The modernisation action teams will produce a National Plan for the NHS in July.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure equal access to the NHS census for disabled people through alternative formats. [125121]

Mr. Hutton: In the week leading up to National Health Service census day on 31 May 2000, 12 million consultation leaflets were made available at supermarkets, high street chemists and other NHS facilities. It was also published on the worldwide web. For those who may have had difficulty reading the text or completing the form in these formats, the leaflet was also made available on tape with the facility to either record responses on that tape or by dictating over the telephone.

Meat Hygiene Service

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reason Mr. Yogaratnam was withdrawn from day-to-day duties in the Mead Webber plant by the Meat Hygiene Service; and what were the specific grounds for suspending him from his current post in the Meat Hygiene Service. [122050]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that Mr. Yogaratnam was released from his official veterinary surgeon (OVS) duties in the Mead Webber plant by the Meat Hygiene Service to enable him to spend more time working as a principal official veterinary surgeon (POVS) overseeing contract OVS performance in other licensed premises in the area.

Mr. Yogaratnam is suspended pending an investigation into his performance as OVS and POVS at the Mead Webber plant.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to whom Official Veterinary Surgeon contracts have been awarded by the Meat Hygiene Service in respect of the Merthyr Tydfil abattoir. [122045]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that there is currently no licensed abattoir operating at Merthyr Tydfil. An abattoir is however currently under construction there. This has yet to be licensed.

The contract to provide official veterinary surgeon duties to the premises has yet to be put out to competitive tender by the Meat Hygiene Service.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what instructions are given to official veterinary surgeons regarding the calculation of HAS scores; and what steps the Meat Hygiene Service takes to ensure the instructions are followed. [122041]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: Chapter 2 of the Meat Hygiene Service Operations Manual provides Official Veterinary Surgeons (OVSs) with very detailed advice on carrying out a hygiene assessment system (HAS) evaluation and calculating the overall HAS score.

Extensive training is provided to all OVSs by the MHS to promote consistency.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the status is of the HAS score recorded in Mead Webber's day book for 19 April. [122062]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that an independent investigation is to be carried out as soon as possible into the actions of the Meat Hygiene Service at Mead Webber's plant at Eardisley. This will include scrutiny of the records including comments made in the plant day book.

It would be inappropriate to comment further until this investigation has been completed. However, the hon. Member will be informed of its outcome.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what responsibilities Mr. Ivor Pumfrey of the Meat Hygiene Service has had in respect of (a) Mr. Yogaratnam and (b) the operation of the Mead Webber plant; and when he assumed those duties. [122053]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that Mr. Ivor Pumfrey is the Meat Hygiene Service Regional Director (Wales). He is Mr. Yogaratnam's line manager and the Mead Webber plant is one of the plants in Mr. Pumfrey's area of responsibility. As such Mr. Pumfrey is responsible through MHS official veterinary surgeons and inspection teams, for ensuring that meat that is health marked is fit for human consumption, and that animal welfare is fully protected.

Mr. Pumfrey commenced employment with the MHS on 1 November 1994.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the Meat Hygiene Service's policy is on giving explanations of HAS scores. [122061]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that full guidance notes for undertaking Hygiene Assessment System scores are included in Chapter 2, Volume I of the Meat Hygiene Service Operations Manual, copies of which are available to plant management.

MHS official veterinary surgeons (OVSs) undertake Hygiene Assessment System (HAS) scores every month for full throughput premises and every quarter for low throughput premises. The OVS responsible for the premises is available to discuss the plant HAS score with plant management. Principal official veterinary surgeons (POVSs) who oversee the work and performance of plant OVSs are also available to discuss plant HAS scores with plant management. If plant management remain unhappy with the OVSs assessment of the HAS score he/she can appeal, and an independent POVS will review the HAS score and consider the concerns expressed by plant management.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which officials of the Meat Hygiene Service Mr. Pumfrey informed on the day of or the day after the decision to close the Mead Webber plant of that decision. [122069]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: The Food Standards Agency has advised me that the management of Mead Webber informed Mr. Ivor Pumfrey, the Meat Hygiene Service Regional Director (Wales), of their intention to close the Mead Webber plant at 8am on 20 April 2000. This was confirmed by facsimile later that morning.

Mr. Pumfrey informed the following MHS officials on the day that Mead Webber Ltd. informed him of their intention to close the plant:

Mr. J. McNeill (MHS Chief Executive)
Mr. P. Soul (MHS Director of Operations)
Ms M. Redmond (MHS Director of Human Resources)
Mr. D. Simmons (MHS Area Resource Manager)
Mr. L. Wood (MHS Principal OVS)
Mr. Yogaratnam (MHS POVS and OVS at the Mead Webber plant)

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if it remains the Meat Hygiene Service's policy that Official Veterinary Surgeons, in consultation as necessary with their POVs, should determine whether it is acceptable for MHS staff to undertake minor trimming or rectification at their plants; [122058]

(2) if minor trimming by meat inspectors is permitted by the Meat Hygiene Service as long as it does not interfere with their official duties. [122059]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: The Meat Hygiene Service policy on carcase contamination and trimming is detailed in the MHS Operations Manual, chapter 6 page 4. It states:

> Carcases and offal presented for inspection with evidence of visible contamination must be appropriately trimmed to your satisfaction before application of the health mark. Trimming of contamination is normally a task for premises staff working under your direction. However, you may trim minor contamination provided it does not interfere with the inspection routine. Where this cannot be done on the dressing line the affected carcase or offal must be detained for more detailed attention.

If in doubt a plant Official Veterinary Surgeon (OVS) may discuss what level of trimming should be permitted by MHS meat inspectors with the Principal Official Veterinary Surgeon (POVS) responsible for the plant.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health at what time and on what day the decision was taken by the Meat Hygiene Service to suspend Mr. Yogarathnam. [122063]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: The decision was taken on Monday 26 April 2000. Mr. Yogarathnam was informed at approximately 12.40 pm the same day.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what account the Meat Hygiene Service takes when undertaking checks on abattoirs of their need for repair and maintenance; and to what extent Meat Hygiene Service officials discount repair and maintenance defects when calculating HAS scores. [122044]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that during routine monitoring of the hygiene of production, the Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) ensures that the structure of the premises complies with the requirements laid down in the relevant legislation. Should the occupier fail to maintain the premises in a satisfactory state the MHS will take appropriate enforcement action.

The Hygiene Assessment System (HAS) scores are intended to evaluate the risk to meat arising from various factors. One section of HAS relates to the risk to meat from the structure and maintenance of the premises.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on relations between Mead Webber and Meat Hygiene Service staff up to 10 April. [122052]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: An independent investigation is to be carried out as soon as possible into the actions of the Meat Hygiene Service at Mead Webber's plant at Eardisley. This will include scrutiny of the working relations between Mead Webber and Meat Hygiene Service staff.

It would be inappropriate to comment further until this investigation has been completed. However, the hon. Member will receive a copy of the findings as soon as the investigation is completed.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when Mr. Richard Turner was appointed by Official Veterinary Surgeon to the Mead Webber plant. [122047]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that the St. David's Farm and Equine Veterinary Practice, of which Mr. Richard Turner is a partner, was awarded the contract to supply an official veterinary surgeon to the Mead Webber plant on 10 April 2000.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the evidence and results of the inquiry into Mead Webber's closure by the Meat Hygiene Service will be published immediately on the internet. [122066]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I understand from the Food Standards Agency that it intends to publish the findings of the independent investigation of Mead Webber Ltd.'s complaints against the Meat Hygiene Service and that these will be made available on the internet. It is expected that the investigation will be reliant on the voluntary co-operation of the parties concerned, who will need to agree what evidence is published.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what Mr. Yogaratnam's position in the Meat Hygiene Service was at the time he was appointed Official Veterinary Surgeon to the Mead Webber plant; and what his duties were in respect of the plant. [122055]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that Mr. Yogaratnam was a principal official veterinary surgeon (POVS) at the time he was appointed official veterinary surgeon (OVS) to the Mead Webber plant. He was also a POVS overseeing contract OVS activities in a number of other plants in the area.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what official responsibilities Mr. Richard Turner has had in respect of plants owned or operated by the St. Merryn's Group; and what contracts the St. David's Practice has had with the Meat Hygiene Service in respect of the provision of Official Veterinary Surgeons to plants owned or operated by the St. Merryn's Group. [122048]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that Richard Turner has had no official responsibilities in respect of plants owned or operated by the St. Merryn Group.

The St. David's Farm and Equine Practice has had no contracts with the Meat Hygiene Service for the provision of Official Veterinary Surgeons to plants owned or operated by the St. Merryn Group.

Northwick Park Hospital

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reasons underlay the decision to sell the waste incinerator plant at Northwick Park Hospital. [123580]

Mr. Denham: The then Northwick Park and St. Mark's Hospitals National Health Service Trust made a decision in 1996 to pursue the sale of its waste incinerator plant. This was based upon the view that, with waste disposal forming a non-core element of the Trust's activities, it would be prudent to explore the possible benefits of a partnership with the private sector that might facilitate the integration of clinical waste disposal into a wider and more environmentally-friendly waste management strategy.

Nurses, Midwives and Health Visitors

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the work of the Reference Group in respect of structural arrangements in the NHS as they affect (a) midwives, (b) nurses and (c) health visitors. [124446]

Mr. Denham: The Reference Group will ensure that key stakeholders (including Professional, National Health Service and Consumer interests) have an opportunity to inform the development of proposals to establish a new regulatory body for Nurses, Midwives and Health Visitors prior to statutory public consultation.

"Fit for the Future?"

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library copies of the responses received to the Centre for Policy on Ageing draft document, entitled, "Fit for the Future?" [124493]

Mr. Hutton: We received 1,250 comments on "Fit for the Future?" during the extended consultation period. We have no plans to place these in the Library.

However, we intend to publish a summary of the responses shortly, along with the finalised standards for care homes for older people and a timetable for implementing them. These will be placed in the Library.

Laron Dwarfism

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what treatment is available on the National Health Service for Laron Dwarfism; and what assistance his Department provides to support groups for children with growth problems as a result of this condition. [124492]

Mr. Hutton: Children with short stature resulting from Laron Dwarfism and other rare conditions are provided diagnostic and follow up care from paediatric endocrinologists who work closely with other specialists. Each region has such a service and for exceptionally rare disorders care can be provided from a national centre. Where growth is limited, psychological and practical support is available through the National Health Service. Voluntary organisations also play a key part in supporting children with growth problems. Although my Department does not at present provide assistance to these organisations, there is provision for them to apply under Section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 for assistance.

Health Authority Funding

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many health authorities are (a) closer to and (b) further from their capitation funding targets fair share than Bedfordshire; [124475]

(2) if he will publish figures showing how each health authority ranks in relation to their capitation funding target. [124474]

Mr. Denham: In 2000–01, 95 health authorities are closer to, and three health authorities are further away from, their weighted capitation target than Bedfordshire Health Authority.

Allocation, target and distance from target for each health authority in England are given in the table. A negative distance from target denotes an undertarget health authority.

Air Ambulance Service

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make additional funds available to support the work of the Air Ambulance Service. [125076]

Ms Stuart: The need for helicopter air ambulance services is a matter for local health economies.

Staff Accommodation (South-East)

Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 24 May 2000, Official Report, column 507W, concerning accommodation for public health care staff in south-east England, what estimates the National Housing Co-ordinator for the National Health Service has made of the provision of residential accommodation required for public health care staff in (a) the south-east region and (b) Oxfordshire. [124803]

Ms Stuart: The National Housing Co-ordinator for the National Health Service has contacted all National Health Service trusts in the south-east region of the NHS, to identify details of accommodation needs for their personnel. When this work is complete, estimates of accommodation requirements can be made, and details are expected to be available by the end of July.

This information will include the needs of the National Health Service personnel in Oxfordshire.

Hip Joints

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if metal on metal resurfacing of hip joints is available on the NHS. [124487]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 8 June 2000]: This procedure is available on the National Health Service. However, it is a relatively new and unproven procedure and as such should normally be performed as part of a controlled clinical trial. The Safety and Efficacy Register of New Interventional Procedures (SERNIP), run by the Academy of Medical Royal Colleges, is the mechanism for assessing new surgical procedures. SERNIP considered there was not yet sufficient information to make a full assessment of the safety and efficacy of metal on metal resurfacing of hip joints.

Mid Essex Hospital Trust

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the latest figures for the Mid Essex Hospital Trust area for (a) how many people are waiting for treatment and (b) how many have been waiting 12 months or more for treatment. [125268]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 9 June 2000]: The information is as follows:

Total number of patients waiting and the number of patients waiting over 12 months for hospital treatment at Mid Essex Hospital Services National Health Service Trust at 30 April 2000

Month	Total waiting	Number waiting over 12 months
April 2000	9,953	986

Waiting Lists

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will define the social reasons leading to a patient's temporary suspension from hospital inpatient waiting lists, in relation to the NHS Executive's inpatient waiting times data as published in the Green Book and the Yellow Book. [125468]

Mr. Denham: The social reasons for suspension referred to in the Green and Yellow Books published by the Department refer to situations where a patient is unavailable for admission because of family commitments, holidays or other reasons.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will reply substantively to the question (ref. 115126) on waiting lists tabled by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham. [125708]

Mr. Denham: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply to his earlier question as soon as possible.

Breast Implants

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice and information his Department makes available to women considering breast implants. [125464]

Mr. Denham: We will shortly be publishing an information leaflet for women considering having breast implants.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent report he has received of adverse incidents relating to silicone gel implants; and what further action he has taken as a result. [125473]

Mr. Denham: In the 12 months prior to 31 May 2000, the Medical Devices Agency (MDA) received 19 reports of adverse incidents involving silicone gel breast implants. MDA have not identified any trends which suggest there is a problem with the performance of any particular model of silicone gel breast implant. MDA continues to record and review all reports of problems with silicone gel breast implants received via the Adverse Incident Centre. This information is regularly reviewed by the Independent Review Group.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence he has recently received that silicone gel breast implants are causing illness. [125463]

Mr. Denham: The Department has received no new evidence recently that silicone gel breast implants are causing illness. The Independent Review Group on silicone gel breast implants continues to meet twice a year to monitor emerging scientific data on this subject. In March 2000, the Group confirmed that there was no need to revise the conclusions reached in 1998.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action has been taken by his Department through the Advertising Standards Authority implant procedure, stating the possible health and safety implications of breast implants. [125470]

Mr. Denham: Our response to the Health Committee's Fifth Report on the regulation of private and other independent healthcare (Command 4540) made it clear that the powers given in the 1988 Control of Misleading Advertisements Regulations are adequate to control advertising. We were however concerned to ensure that the information patients receive in the independent sector is of an acceptable standard.

We are addressing this in two ways. We will soon be publishing a Department of Health information leaflet for women considering breast implants. In addition, the Care Standards Bill, as drafted, will allow us to introduce regulations covering standards of information given to patients in the independent sector.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if information on the Breast Implants Register is made available to recipients of implants in (a) NHS and (b) private hospitals. [125467]

Mr. Denham: The National Breast Implant Registry produces an annual report which is available, upon request, to recipients of breast implants, regardless of whether they received their implants in a National Health Service or a private hospital.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce legislation to make registration of breast implants compulsory. [125466]

Mr. Denham: We support the collection and provision of as much information as possible and the Medical Devices Agency has increased funding of the National Breast Implant Registry to improve compliance monitoring. Any legislation would however be coercive and would invalidate the individual's consent to surgery.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made on the European Commission's investigation into silicone breast implants. [125474]

Mr. Denham: It is understood that the European Commission currently plans to review breast implants taking account of the options presented in the draft report from the Scientific Technological Options Assessment Committee (STOA) of the European Parliament. The Commission intends to give a report to STOA in November 2000. It is further understood that the investigations will involve action in three areas:

Reviewing the requirements for conformity assessment of implantable breast prostheses;

Addressing the provision of information to patients for these products;

Possible revision of the published standards for manufacturers of breast implants.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many breast implants have been registered through the National Breast Implant Registry since 1997; and what estimate he has made of the number not registered. [125469]

Mr. Denham: The total number of breast implants registered on the National Breast Implant Registry (NBIR) in each complete calendar year since 1997 is as follows:

Year	Number of implants registered
1997	14,800
1998	16,161
1999	18,173

Based upon compliance studies carried out by the NBIR, it is estimated that this represents about 60–70 per cent. of the breast implants used in the United Kingdom.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how recipients of breast implants and doctors are informed of the reporting facility of the Adverse Incident Centre within the Medical Devices Agency. [125462]

Mr. Denham: At the beginning of each year, the Medical Devices Agency (MDA) writes to chief executives of trusts, health authorities and primary care trusts reminding them of their obligation to report adverse incidents involving medical devices, including breast implants, to the Adverse Incident Centre. MDA also encourages trusts to appoint MDA liaison officers, whose role is to co-ordinate adverse incident reporting and the dissemination of safety information about medical devices within the trust.

As the adverse incident reporting system is focused upon healthcare professionals and medical device manufacturers, MDA does not systematically inform recipients of breast implants of the system. Information on the system is however publicly available via the MDA worldwide website.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision he has made for the financial year 2000–01 to meet the costs incurred by the East Kent Health Authority through the provision of interpreters to assist the treatment of asylum seekers and economic migrants. [125274]

Mr. Hutton: East Kent Health Authority's unified allocation for 2000–01 is £431.8 million, an increase of £32.9 million (8.25 per cent.)

It is for health authorities, in partnership with primary care groups and other local stakeholders, to determine how best to use their funds to meet national and local priorities for improving health, tackling health inequalities and modernising services.

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the cost to the National Health Service of the provision of interpreters to assist asylum seekers, for the latest period for which figures are available; how much of this money has been refunded by central Government to (a) local health authorities and (b) hospital trusts; and if he will make a statement. [125273]

Mr. Hutton: Information on the costs of interpretation services for asylum seekers is not collected centrally.

Correspondence

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the hon. Member for North Thanet will receive a reply to his letter of 18 May 2000 in respect of the answer of 11 May 2000, Official Report, column 460W, on the General Osteopathic Council. [125682]

Yvette Cooper: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply to his letter of 18 May as soon as possible.

Surgery Statistics

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of morbidity and mortality rates associated with surgical intervention for similar operations between (a) 10 pm and 6 am and (b) 6 am and 10 pm. [125458]

Mr. Denham: This information is not collected centrally in this way. The National Confidential Enquiry into Peri-operative Deaths, known as NCEPOD, reports each year on deaths in hospital following surgery. Their 1995–96 report "Who operates when" gives information on operative practice for three periods, between the hours of 6 pm and midnight, midnight and 8 am and 8 am and 6 pm. A summary of their reports can be accessed via their website www.ncepod.org.uk.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Performance Cost Management Unit

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the cost is of setting up a performance cost management unit from 1 April in his Department; what are the key benefits of this; what savings to the cost of operating the Department will arise; what estimate he has made of the annual cost of the unit; and if he will make a statement. [124556]

Angela Eagle: The Department is undergoing a fundamental review of its central and support functions in order to focus resources on delivering front line services to customers. A small Performance Management Unit (PMU) has been established within the Benefits Agency to drive out performance improvement in the Agency's 13 Area Directorates (AD) and the Disability and Carer Benefits Directorate (DCBD). The additional annual cost of this team is estimated at £100,000. There were no set up costs. In addition to the PMU, each AD and the DCBD has a Performance Improvement Action Team (PIAT) to provide support to local managers.

The aim is to improve significantly front line service delivery within the resources already set and allocated in the Comprehensive Spending Review. Work is also in hand to see how productivity can be improved which will potentially lead to cost reduction in the medium term.

By the end of 2000–01, this programme is expected to demonstrate improved benefit payment accuracy, better customer service and to have contributed to the reduction of losses through fraud and error.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how much was spent in (a) Scotland, (b) Dumfries and Galloway and (c) Galloway and Upper Nithsdale parliamentary constituency in each of the last five years on tackling benefit fraud; [124720]

(2) what estimate he has made of the amount lost to benefit fraud in each of the last five years in (a) Scotland, (b) Dumfries and Galloway and (c) Galloway and Upper Nithsdale parliamentary constituency; [124722]

(3) what estimate he has made of the amount lost to benefit fraud in each of the last five years in (a) Scotland, (b) Dumfries and Galloway and (c) Galloway and Upper Nithsdale parliamentary constituency as a direct result of pensions and benefits being paid via the Post Office. [124721]

Mr. Rooker: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Amount allocated in Scotland in each of the last five years to spend on investigating benefit fraud

Year	£ million
1995–96	8.35
1996–97	9.20
1997–98	19.12
1998–99	18.94
1999–2000	20.27

Notes:

1. Area Benefit Reviews results estimate that the level of fraud in Scotland for 1998–99 was £55 million. This figure does not include all benefits and relates only to Income Support and income-based Jobseeker's Allowance.
2. We are unable to provide details of all Instruments of Payment (IOP) fraudulently encashed through post offices.
3. The estimated level of losses associated with IOPs for 1999–2000 nationally is £106.9 million. It is not possible to provide a geographical breakdown for this figure.
4. Information is not available for anywhere less than the whole of Scotland. It is also not possible to provide the full amount spent in tackling fraud as some aspects of fraud expenditure such as Housing Benefit and organised fraud are controlled centrally.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the level of benefit fraud in the Coventry area; and what targets have been set for the relevant anti-fraud teams. [125616]

Mr. Rooker: Area Benefit Reviews provide a continuous measurement of fraud and error in Income Support and Jobseeker's Allowance in each of the Benefits Agency's 13 Area Directorates. The data collected are rolled up to provide a national picture.

We are unable to provide estimates of levels of fraud for specific towns, cities or counties.

Our target is to reduce by 30 per cent. benefit losses from fraud and error in Income Support and Jobseeker's Allowance by March 2007, with at least a 10 per cent. reduction by 2002.

The weekly benefit savings scheme gives local authorities the opportunity to earn a financial reward where they detect Housing Benefit/Council Tax Benefit fraud. Each local authority is set an individual threshold and can begin to earn additional payments of subsidy where they exceed this. Coventry's threshold for 2000–01 is £848,413.

Benefit Delivery

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he is taking to ensure services to the customers of the Benefits Agency are delivered effectively and that benefits are secure against fraud and abuse; how much this costs; how many people are being investigated for fraud; and if he will make a statement. [124544]

Mr. Rooker: In March of this year, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced the creation of a new organisation that will radically change the way the Government provide support for people of working age. The new agency will draw together those elements of the Benefits Agency which support people of working age and the Employment Service. The agency will deliver a single, integrated service to benefit claimants and employers. Information on job vacancies, training, and child care will be available as well as help and support to those who, for whatever reason, are not able to work, providing a more responsive service tailored to individual needs.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has also announced the creation of a single organisation responsible for pensions, distinct from the Benefits Agency. This new organisation will be solely focused on the needs of pensioners and pensions policy.

We are committed to improving and modernising the welfare services offered to people, and the creation of separate, client focused organisations is the next step to achieving this.

The prevention and detection of fraud will be at the heart of he new organisational arrangement. The Government set out the strategy for tackling fraud in the White Paper "Safeguarding Social Security" presented to Parliament in March 1999.

For the financial year 2000–01, £351,447,403 of Programme Protection Funds are being deployed within the BA to combat fraud and error. However all benefit paying processes and all the BA staff involved have a role in preventing and identifying fraud and abuse.

On 31 March 2000, 163,138 people were recorded as currently under investigation by the Benefit Fraud Investigation Service, while between April 1999 to March 2000 there were 436 individual suspects accepted for prosecution from the Benefits Agency Security Investigation Service.

In addition, between April 1999 and March 2000 there were in excess of 280,000 referrals for investigation identified by the datamatching computer systems; the Generalised Matching Service and the Housing Benefit Matching Scheme. This however includes cases of customer and official error as well as fraud.

Regeneration

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 4 May 2000, Official Report, column 213W, on regeneration-related initiatives, if he will list the details requested for (a) New Deal for Disabled people, (b) New Deal for Lone Parents, (c) New Deal for the Long-term Unemployed aged 25 plus: 12 to 18 months unemployed, (d) New Deal for Long-term Unemployed aged 25 plus: 2 years plus unemployed and (e) ONE. [124412]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Details regarding sums budgeted and expended on these initiatives are set out in the tables.

Under the New Deal for Disabled People (NDDP), we have been piloting and testing ways in which to help Disabled People in to work. Over the coming months we will develop proposals for extending the NDDP nationally. Expenditure to date is set out in the following table.

[5] All figures rounded to nearest £1 million, actual 1997–98 expenditure £0.175 million.

Note:

Over £50 million has been allocated to pilot initiatives, including the pilot Personal Adviser Service, Innovative Schemes and evaluation. We are also considering what funds will be allocated for the proposed retention and rehabilitation pilots and the national extension of NDDP.

New Deal for Lone Parents

The New Deal for Lone Parents (NDLP) aims to help lone parents on Income Support move into work. The following table details the sums expended throughout the planned lifetime of this programme.

[4] The remainder of the national budget, based on current projections, will be spent by the end of 2001–02.

Notes:

1. The sum of £182 million has been made available for the NDLP national programme.

2. The cost of implementing the NDLP in eight prototype areas was £8 million, incurred between July 1997 and October 1998.

New Deal for long-term unemployed persons aged 25 plus—12 to 18 months unemployed

This information refers to provision for pilot schemes in 28 different local areas. Of these, 18 are targeted at people who have been unemployed for 18 months or more, with the rest targeted at those who have been unemployed for 12 months or more. The following table details the amounts budgeted or expended on these schemes.

Pensions

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate for each financial year since 1996–97 the extra expenditure on pensions and the amount of this year's pension if the link between pensions and earnings had been restored immediately before the year in question. [124345]

Mr. Rooker: The information requested is in the table.

Year	Assumed rate of basic Retirement Pension (£ per week)	Gross cost (£ billion)	Net cost (£ billion)
1996–97	—	0.7	0.6
1997–98	—	1.3	1.1
1998–99	—	1.5	1.3
1999–00	—	2.1	1.8
2000–01	73.60	3.5	3.1

Notes:
1. Assumed rates of basic Retirement Pension have been uprated by the higher prices or earnings growth at each uprating from April 1995 onwards. Rates have been rounded to the nearest 5p at each uprating.
2. Earnings growth is based on the seasonally adjusted average earnings index in the three months to July of the previous year, as originally published. Price inflation is the previous September figure.
3. Gross costs have been estimated by the Government Actuary's Department. Costs net of income-related benefit savings have been estimated using the DSS Policy Simulation Model.
4. Costs include benefits whose rates are linked to the rate of basic Retirement Pension.
5. Costs are rounded to the nearest £100 million, are in £ billion and are expressed in 2000–01 prices.

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the length of time taken between an application for ACT payment for pensions and the date when payment is received into the pensioner's bank account. [124779]

Mr. Rooker: The administration of benefit payments is a matter for Alexis Cleveland the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Fiona Mactaggart, dated 9 June 2000:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary question asking what estimate he has made of the length of time taken between an application for Automated Credit Transfer (ACT) payment for pensions and the date when payment is received into the pensioner's bank account.

Customers wishing to receive payment by ACT must fill in the appropriate form of application, which includes a declaration that they have read and accept the conditions under which it is offered.

Applications for ACT payment can be received with new claims, which are subject to a clearance target of 60 days, or as a change to an existing pensioner's method of payment. The length of time taken has therefore been gauged from the time of processing the application, which in both instances should be the same.

Except in the case of weekly sums under £5, which are paid annually, currently customers have the option of receiving ACT payments at 4 weekly or 13 weekly intervals. Payment is received in the pensioner's bank account on the last banking day of the 4 or 13 week period.

If there are two full weeks or more left in the current ACT period when the application is processed a payment for that period is made accordingly. Where only one week remains this is added to the payment for the first full period. The longest time a customer must wait for payment is therefore normally limited to 5 weeks or 14 weeks.

I hope this is helpful.

Minimum Income Guarantee

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the cost of implementing a national minimum income guarantee for pensioners; how he will ensure that pensioners are made aware of what they can claim; how much he is expecting to spend on public awareness campaigns; and if he will make a statement. [124547]

Mr. Bayley: During the lifetime of this Parliament the extra total cost of the minimum income guarantee (MIG) for pensioners over and above the cost of Income Support for which pensioners were previously eligible is estimated to be £2.2 billion pounds in real terms.

One 29 May the MIG Take-up Campaign was launched to encourage pensioners who may be entitled to claim their MIG. Around £15 million will be spent over the course of the campaign which includes national TV advertising, writing to around two million pensioners whose records indicate that they may be entitled, and the introduction of a tele-claims centre with specially trained operators who can help complete the paperwork to claim the MIG.

Since the launch was announced at the end of March, there have already been around 50,000 calls to the tele-claims centre, and 24,000 MIG claim packs have been sent to pensioners.

Benefit Take-up

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much was spent in (a) Scotland, (b) Dumfries and Galloway and (c) Galloway and Upper Nithsdale parliamentary constituency on increasing benefit take-up in each of the last five years. [124719]

Mr. Bayley: No specific allocation was made to the Benefits Agency either nationally or locally for increasing benefit take-up. However, we have recently launched a national take-up campaign for the minimum income guarantee. Around £15 million will be spent over the course of the campaign, which includes intense activity on a number of fronts. This includes television advertising, writing to around two million pensioners and a new tele-claims centre which allows pensioners to make a claim over the telephone.

Benefit Costs

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the cost to the Exchequer would be of providing to all households with children under (a) three years of age, (b) two years of age and (c) one year of age, a weekly benefit of (i) £25, (ii) £50, (iii) £75, and (iv) £100. [124777]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Annual cost for families

£ million

Weekly payment	Children under age of One	Two	Three
£25	750	1,590	2,330
£50	1,510	3,190	4,650
£75	2,260	4,780	6,980
£100	3,020	6,370	9,310

Notes:

1. Proportions of families with children in the relevant age group have been taken from the February 2000 5 per cent. scan of the Child Benefit computer system.
2. Based on forecast 2001–02 Child Benefit caseloads.
3. Rounded to the nearest £10 million.
4. If there is more than one family in a household with children in the relevant age group we are assuming that they will both receive a payment.
5. Increases are assumed to be carried through into the income-related benefits.

Incomes

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the average weekly income is of mothers with children under three. [124776]

Angela Eagle: The average gross weekly individual income of mothers with children under three is £139. However, the majority of mothers live in families with a partner, and the latest estimate for the gross income of families with children under three is £517 a week.

Notes:

1. Figures quoted are derived from the Family Resources Survey and are therefore subject to sampling error.
2. The individual income refers to the income accruing to women in their own right and includes earnings, income from self-employment, investments and occupational pensions/annuities, benefit income and income from miscellaneous and other sources. This estimate is from the Women's Individual Income 1996–97 dataset and is at 1996–97 survey prices.
3. Family income has been provided because the majority of mothers live with a partner and it is generally assumed that there is a certain amount of sharing of income within families. This estimate is based on 1997–98 data and is set at April 1999 prices.

Student Loans

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will review the rules under which mature students with dependent families have their student loan classed as family income; and if he will make a statement. [124787]

Angela Eagle: I refer the hon. Member to the Written Answer I gave the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on 26 November 1999, Official Report, column 219W.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many liability orders were sought by the Child Support Agency from courts in Scotland during the last calendar year for which figures are available; how many were (a) granted and (b) granted and subsequently registered in each relevant judicial area in Scotland; and what the average waiting time between submission of papers to the court and the granting of liability orders was (i) in total and (ii) in each judicial area. [125112]

Angela Eagle: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Faith Boardman to Mr. Ian Davidson, dated 12 June 2000:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency.

You ask about the number of liability orders sought by the Agency from courts in Scotland during the last calendar year.

The Agency's policy is to encourage compliance by non resident parents, but where this fails, to use the full range of powers given by Parliament to enforce payment of child maintenance. Where arrears do arise, the Agency will take firm and prompt enforcement action if the non resident parent does not make an acceptable offer to pay. Each case is considered on it merits and the Agency will take account of the likely effect of enforcement action on the welfare of any children involved.

Wherever possible the Agency will use a Deduction from Earnings Order to enforce payment. This is an administrative mechanism operated on the Agency's behalf by the non resident parent's employer and does not involve the court. Where it is not appropriate the Agency will take action through the courts.

In the last reporting year, April 1999 to March 2000, the Agency applied to the Sheriff's Court for 686 liability order, 354 of which were granted, 26 were withdrawn, dismissed or not granted and the remainder are still undergoing Court action. The information requested regarding liability orders granted and subsequently registered and average waiting time between submission of papers to the court and their action is not collected by the Agency.

I hope this is helpful.

Housing Benefit

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much each local authority spent in the most recent available year on Housing Benefit to tenants of Registered Social Landlords to which their housing stock has been transferred. [124878]

Angela Eagle: The information requested is not available. This is because the data local authorities provide on Housing Benefit spending do not enable us to distinguish between spending on tenants who live in stock that has been transferred and those who live in other stock owned by Registered Social Landlords.

Employment Zones

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will introduce employment zones; where they will be; when the greater Portsmouth area will benefit from such a scheme; and if he will make a statement. [124551]

Ms Jowell: I have been asked to reply.

Fifteen Employment Zones were introduced in April 2000 in Glasgow, Liverpool, North West Wales, Heads of the Valleys, Doncaster, Birmingham, Brighton and Hove, Plymouth, Brent, Haringey, Newham, Southwark, Tower Hamlets, Nottingham, and Middlesbrough, Redcar and Cleveland (one Zone). We have no plans to introduce an Employment Zone in Greater Portsmouth.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Elections

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) when the Government will implement the recommendations contained in the report entitled, "Administering Elections in Northern Ireland"; [119565]

(2) what measures he will introduce to counter abuse and reinforce the integrity of the Electoral Register; and if he will make a statement; [120703]

(3) what further progress he has made on combating electoral malpractice since May 1998; [120707]

(4) if he will introduce the electoral card proposal as outlined in the Second report of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, Session 1997–98, HC 316, on Electoral Malpractice; [120706]

(5) what improvements to electoral procedure he has announced since May 1998; [120704]

(6) when he will establish the team to investigate applications for absent and proxy votes that was referred to in the response from the Government to the Second report of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee of Session 1997–98, HC 316, on Electoral Malpractice. [120705]

Mr. George Howarth: The report entitled "Administering Elections in Northern Ireland" contained a number of recommendations to counter the issue of electoral abuse and it is our intention to implement as many of them as is practical.

One of the major recommendations was the introduction of smart cards for voters. This remains our objective but further work is needed before we can be confident that a reliable, cost-effective system exists that would be resistant to abuse. However, the Government have already introduced legislation to extend the time available to the Chief Electoral Officer to scrutinise absent vote applications and has extended to Northern Ireland the provisions of the Representation of the People Act which makes provision for rolling registration and hence a more accurate electoral register. Additionally, officials are exploring the role which enhanced computerisation and increased staffing might play in assisting the Chief Electoral Officer in the scrutiny process.

Many of the other recommendations contained in the report will require legislation by bill. We would hope to find Parliamentary time for this before the General Election, but the timing of this will depend on the time of the election.

Sellafield

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will establish a study into the health effects of the operation of Sellafield on the people of Northern Ireland. [120710]

Mr. George Howarth: A major independent study which reported in 1989 sought to identify possible links between the incidence of Down's Syndrome and leukaemia and radiation in the Irish Sea. The report concluded that the data examined did not obviously implicate radioactive pollution in the Irish Sea as an underlying factor in determining the patterns in Northern Ireland of the conditions studied. To facilitate ongoing research and surveillance, the report recommended that a system of cancer registration should be established. Since the establishment of the Northern Ireland Cancer Registry in 1993, there is now a complete and accurate database on cancer incidence in Northern Ireland which facilitates the monitoring of the health of the population on an ongoing basis. Analysis so far continued to support the findings of the 1989 study.

As regards monitoring of radiation levels, currently the Environment and Heritage Service's Industrial Pollution and Radiochemical Inspectorate in Northern Ireland conducts routine monitoring of the impact of Sellafield discharges on the Northern Ireland coastline. In addition, independent monitoring is conducted by District Council Environmental Health Officers under the auspices of the Norther Ireland Radiation Monitoring Committee. Both sets of monitoring continue to indicate that the levels of radioactivity measured are of negligible radiological significance.

Travellers

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for what (a) reason travellers are being prevented from using the St. Christopher's Park site, (b) what attempts have been made to offer them alternative accommodation, (c) for what reasons vacating travellers are prevented from returning to the official site in Newry and (d) which bodies have responsibility for looking after the housing and education needs of traveller families. [123055]

Mr. George Howarth: The management of the Travellers' site at St. Christopher's Park, Newry is a matter for the Newry and Mourne District Council. As far as accommodation for Travellers in concerned, as present it is a function of District Councils to provide transit and serviced sites, while housing (including group housing) is provided through the Northern Ireland Housing Executive.

The Department of Education and the relevant Education and Library Board have responsibility for the education of children of compulsory school age and those who remain in school past 16.

Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Security Situation

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps have been taken in the last month to reduce the security presence consistent with the level of threat; and what steps will be taken in the next 12 months. [123060]

Mr. Ingram: In light of the lowering of the overall threat following the recent statement by the IRA, the Chief Constable announced on 9 May that the following steps would be taken as soon as logistically possible, with work to commence within weeks:

Demolition of the Cookstown base

Vacation of Fort George Army Base and return of the land to the Londonderry Harbour Commissioners

Demolition of the Cloghogue observation base in South Armagh; and Vacation of the observation posts at Broadway and Templer House in Belfast.

He also announced that, subject to a continuing reduction in the level of threat, these steps would be followed within three months by demolition of the observation sangar overlooking the square in Crossmaglen. A further review of possible normalisation steps would be conducted in three months' time in the light of the security threat prevailing at the time and the circumstances on the ground.

RUC

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will list the criminal convictions in which statements by or evidence of RUC Officers Darren James Neill and Michael Magowan was given or taken into account; how many individuals are currently serving a custodial sentence as a result of such convictions; what mechanisms he will establish to ensure that those individuals who may be eligible to have their convictions reviewed are informed of their rights; and how many individuals are so affected; [123574]

(2) how many officers were questioned in connection with the investigation of complaints made by Mr. Bernard Griffin; what issues of fact were established during the criminal proceedings; and how many disciplinary cases are still pending; [123558]

(3) if he will make a statement on the convictions of Darren James Neill and Michael Magowan; [123559]

(4) what measures have been taken to ensure that there is public confidence in the ability of officers in Oldpark RUC barracks to treat all individuals and sections of the community equally; [123560]

(5) if he will investigate reports of an alleged breakdown of discipline at Oldpark RUC barracks in February 1998. [124414]

Mr. Ingram: While there have been criminal proceedings in respect of complaints made by Mr. Bernard Griffin, other legal and disciplinary actions have yet to be finalised. It would therefore be inappropriate, at this time, to place any further information into the public domain.

11-plus

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the report commissioned by his Department, from Mr. Tony Gallagher of The Queen's University of Belfast, into the Transfer Procedure at 11 plus, will be (a) completed and (b) published; what were the costs of commissioning and producing this report; and if he will make a statement. [123872]

Mr. George Howarth: The report will be completed in July 2000. The cost of the research is £110,000. The report will be published in September 2000. Printing costs are not yet known. The report is intended to inform a widespread debate on selection and future arrangements for post-primary education in Northern Ireland to which all interested parties will be invited to contribute their views.

Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Ambulances

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the cost of providing ambulance services for the annual 12 July celebrations. [123889]

Mr. George Howarth: The estimated cost of providing ambulance services for the 12th July celebrations in 1999 was £10,760. It is estimated that the cost of providing ambulance services for this year's 12th July celebrations will be of the same magnitude.

Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what income was derived in each of the past three years by each of the district health boards from charges levied for the provision of ambulance services required for open air public events; if he will list the top 10 consumers of ambulance services and the income derived from each; and what policy considerations must be taken into account in deciding whether to charge for services provided for a particular event. [123888]

Mr. George Howarth: The income derived in each of the past three years in each Health Board area in Northern Ireland from charges levied for the provision of ambulance services was:

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–00
Eastern	831	13,567	8,355
Northern	3,500	3,762	3,950
Southern	1,000	—	—
Western	1,690	451	2,230

Charges are levied for open-air events organised and run by individuals or organisations, usually for profit or charity, on a one-off basis. No records are therefore maintained of regular "consumers".

The Northern Ireland Ambulance Service will raise charges for private events, at which the public may be present, when the organisers request specific services such as supplying vehicles, staff or a treatment centre. Charges are based on aspects such as the skill mix and availability of staff, the number of vehicles required, an estimation of potential number of patient journeys and the potential usage of drugs and medical equipment.

Responsibility for this subject has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is therefore no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Garvaghy Road

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many illegal gatherings, assemblies, parades and marches have taken place in the Garvaghy road area so far this year; in how many instances (a) organisers were identified by the police, (b) the gathering was dispersed by the police, (c) individuals were warned they were breaking the law and (d) arrests were made; what charges were brought against individuals; and what was the outcome of proceedings. [123890]

Mr. Ingram: To date there have been no illegal parades in the immediate Garvaghy road area this year. But there have been two illegal parades involving persons parading from Drumcree Church to the bridge and dispersing. The bridge is located approximately 600m from the Garvaghy road.

In both incidents, no individuals were warned they were breaking the law, no arrests were made, and the participants dispersed quickly themselves.

Shootings (Weapon Serial Numbers)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the serial number of (a) the weapon used in the shooting of Private Neil Clerk in Derry on 23 April 1984, (b) the weapon used in the shooting of Martin Patten of the Royal Anglian Regiment on 21 September 1985 and (c) the weapon used in the shooting of army caterer Kurt Konig on 21 November 1985; in how many other attacks and on what dates each of these weapons are believed to have been used; and where and in whose keeping they are stored. [124326]

Mr. Ingram: While three persons were convicted of the murder of Private Clark, the investigations of the murders of Martin Patten and Kurt Konig remain open. To release any information in connection with them would not be appropriate, as it may prejudice any future legal proceedings.

Oversight Commissioner

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions the Chief Constable of the RUC was present, for how long; and for which interviews, for the post of the Oversight Commissioner. [125527]

Mr. Ingram: The Chief Constable was not present at any of the interviews.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Disestablishment

35. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what discussion the Church Commissioners have had with the Government since May 1997 about the possibility and financial implications of disestablishment. [123705]

Mr. Stuart Bell: None.

Redundant Churches

36. Mr. Paterson: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, if he will make a statement on the role of congregations on deciding priorities for the disposal of redundant churches. [123706]

Mr. Stuart Bell: The procedure for settling the future of redundant Church of England churches gives priority to dioceses seeking and achieving suitable alternative uses. Dioceses are also encouraged to keep informed the local parochial church councils, which are also given the opportunity to make representations for or against the proposed use.

Hunting with Hounds

37. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what action the Commissioners plan to take in response to the report of the Burns Inquiry. [123707]

Mr. Stuart Bell: I understand the results of the Burns inquiry—to which the Commissioners were not invited to give evidence—are expected to be made public shortly. Until then it is not possible to answer my hon. Friend's question, but we will look forward to seeing the report.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Millennium Dome

12. Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the future of the Millennium Dome after 31 December. [123681]

Mr. Chris Smith: On 16 May the Government announced that two proposals had been selected to advance to the final stage of the competition. These two bids were chosen from a strong field of five bids which had been invited in January to submit detailed proposals and indicative financial offers.

The bids in the final shortlist are:

Dome Europe, an advanced leisure, business and retail attraction, proposed by the Principal Finance Group of Nomura International plc.

Legacy plc, a high technology industrial campus of workspace, leisure and retail uses, proposed by Robert Bourne.

We are now working with the bidders to develop these proposals further, and will proceed to a decision in the summer on the winning proposal.

24. Mr. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the financial situation of the Millennium Dome. [123693]

Mr. Chris Smith: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Stewart) on 25 May 2000, Official Report, columns 579–80W.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many of the Millennium Dome's sponsors have paid their full agreed amount of sponsorship funding. [124479]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Under the terms of the individual sponsorship contracts, sponsors are on a rolling and varied schedule of payments. The New Millennium Experience Company are continuing to receive payments.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the grant payments made from the Millennium Commission to fund the Millennium Dome including the value of those payments, and the date on which they were agreed. [124741]

Mr. Chris Smith: This is a matter for the Millennium Commission. I will write to the hon. Member in my capacity as Chairman of the Commission, and place copies of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

National Lottery

16. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement about additionality in respect of the national lottery awards for health and education projects. [123685]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Government remain committed to the principle of additionality and established the NOF, after extensive public consultation, to support innovative health, education and environment projects which are additional to programmes funded from taxation. The National Lottery through the New Opportunities Fund has so far committed £1.5 billion to specific, time limited health and education initiatives.

20. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what support has been given by the National Lottery Charities Board to youth work in support of policy against social exclusion in (a) urban and (b) rural areas in (i) 1998, (ii) 1999 and (iii) 2000 to date. [123689]

Kate Hoey: The majority of grants awarded by the National Lottery Charities Board (NLCB) help to promote social inclusion, although they are not separately categorised. During 1998, 1999 and 2000 to date, the NLCB awarded the following grants to projects in urban and rural areas specifically targeted at young people aged 25 or under.

Urban areas

1998: 785 grants worth £32.8 million

1999: 2,448 grants worth £87 million

2000: 1,212 grants worth £22.3 million

Rural areas

1998: 933 grants worth £8.8 million

1999: 1,864 grants worth £20.9 million

2000: 780 grants worth £6.3 million

22. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to ensure that former coalfield areas receive an increased share of the proceeds from the national lottery. [123691]

Mr. Chris Smith: Following the publication on 5 June of research into the impact of the National Lottery on coalfield areas, I announced a package of measures intended to ensure that coalfield and former coalfield areas receive more benefit from National Lottery money. My Department and Lottery distributors, who jointly commissioned the research, have set up an action team to consider the recommendations made in the report and to identify ways of actively encouraging applications from coalfields and other areas of low take up.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the average cost to organisations of making National Lottery funding applications. [124724]

Kate Hoey: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has directed the independent Quality Efficiency and Standards Team (QUEST), which he established last year to examine issues of standards and good practice across the range of this Department's responsibilities, to look at the costs of making applications for Lottery grants and consider how these costs could be contained without compromising the demands of proper accountability in decisions about how to spend public money. QUEST plans to publish the first phase of its report, which focuses on applications for Lottery grants of up to £100,000, shortly. The second phase, dealing with applications for grants of £100,000 plus, will be published later in the year.

Excellence in Sport

17. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proposals he has for the development of excellence in sport in the Eastern region. [123686]

Kate Hoey: Sport England have made it clear that the Eastern Region will be an integral part of the English Institute of Sport. Discussions remain ongoing about the services and facilities that may be required to support the development of sporting excellence in the Region.

Space for Sport and Arts

19. Mr. Hopkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he expects the first grants will be made to primary schools under the Space for Sport and Arts scheme. [123688]

Kate Hoey: Officials from my Department and the Department for Education and Employment are now in the process of working up further details about the scheme with members of the sports strategy implementation group and Lottery distributors and we hope to be in a position to invite applications in the autumn with the first grants being made in the early part of next year.

Free Television Licences

21. Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many families in the Elmet constituency will benefit from the introduction of free television licences for households with a member aged 75 years or over. [123690]

Mr. Chris Smith: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Film, Tourism and Broadcasting to my right hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) on 2 March 2000. Official Report, column 350W.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps the Department is taking to liaise with the television licensing authorities to ensure that all pensioners over the age of 75 will be fully informed of when they become eligible for a free television licence; what efforts his Department is making to ensure that pensioners are given accurate information in respect of this; and if he will make a statement. [124545]

Janet Anderson: Officials at both the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department of Social Security are in regular contact with the BBC as Licensing Authority to ensure the effective implementation of free television licences for the over-75s. The BBC is providing me with regular progress reports covering a range of issues, including publicity for the concession. Progress to date includes the establishment of a dedicated TV Licensing helpline, publication of explanatory leaflets, television trailers and the start of direct mailings to all domestic addresses on the TV Licensing database. DCMS has prepared a separate question and answer guide to the concessionary scheme.

Football (Community Involvement)

23. Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on his policy as regards encouraging football clubs to be involved in their local communities. [123692]

Kate Hoey: The Government fully support the efforts of football's governing bodies and individual clubs to become more involved in their local communities, and encourages the football authorities to continue to implement the recommendations of the Football Task Force's third report, "Investing in the Community".

School Sport

25. Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received about sport in schools in Yorkshire; and if he will make a statement. [123694]

Kate Hoey: I have received one letter recently from a school in Rotherham about the provision of a sports hall under the Private Finance Initiative. This is a matter primarily for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, whom I am consulting. I am also aware of the series of articles which have appeared in the Yorkshire Post recently about sport and PE in schools in Yorkshire. Our sports strategy—A Sporting Chance for All—recognised that in too many of our schools sport and PE have declined, and the need to find a new approach which will support teachers, parents and young people. That is why the strategy set out a five part plan aimed at raising standards of physical education and sport in all schools to match those of the best. The plan proposes:

i) the rebuilding of sports facilities at primary schools with £150 million of funding;

ii) the creation of 110 Specialist Sports Colleges to provide the lead in innovative practice and to work with partner secondary and primary schools to share good practice and raise standards;

iii) the provision of £240 million to encourage and support schools in a range of out of school learning opportunities including physical education and sport;

iv) the establishment of 600 school sports co-ordinators in areas of greatest need which will provide opportunities for young people to compete regularly for their school and take part in a wide range of sports; and

v) that our most talented 14 to 18-year-olds have access to the coaching and support which will enable them to fulfil their potential.

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the introduction of school sports co-ordinators. [123673]

Kate Hoey: As part of the aims of raising the standards of Physical Education and sport in schools, 600 School Sports Co-ordinators will be appointed by 2002. They will work in 150 'families' of schools. This means that 600 secondary schools and the 110 sports colleges will be linked to 3,000 primary schools. We aim to have the first tranche of 40 school sports co-ordinators in place by the autumn term 2000.

Football (Youth and Amateur)

26. Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to increase investment in youth and amateur football facilities. [123696]

Kate Hoey: I am pleased to say that the Football Foundation, a new body, which will distribute funding from the Premier League, the FA and Sport England will be launched shortly. This follows the Premier League's commitment last year to investing 5 per cent. of its next broadcasting contract for the good of the sport. It is envisaged that the majority of the Foundation's income will be used to fund initiatives designed to develop football at the grass roots.

Museums and Galleries

27. Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to improve pensioners' access to museums and galleries. [123697]

Mr. Alan Howarth: I refer my hon. Friend to the oral answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson), Official Report, column 499W.

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to give pensioners easier access to museums and galleries. [123672]

Mr. Alan Howarth: From 1 April free entry for the over 60s was introduced to those museums funded by my Department which currently charge for admission, including the National Museums and Galleries on Merseyside, the National Museum of Science and Industry, the Natural History Museum, the Imperial War Museum, the National Maritime Museum, and the Victoria and Albert Museum.

Seaside Resorts

Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to promote family-friendly holidays at traditional seaside resorts. [123687]

Mr. Chris Smith: Later this year the English Tourism Council, which is sponsored by my Department, will be undertaking a new programme of research to examine the current provision for family holidays in England. The research will aim to gain a better understanding of the market and to identify opportunities for growth particularly at seaside resorts.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 28 February 2000, Official Report, column 100W, concerning secondments, if the secondee listed was appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124823]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 7 June 2000]: The secondee listed in my response of 28 February 2000, Official Report, column 100W was appointed for a period of more than 12 months.

King Edward VII Convalescent Home

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what the average bed occupancy rate was at King Edward VII Convalescent Home at Osborne (a) in each of the five years between 1989 and 1993 and (b) in 1999, broken down between (i) residents and (ii) convalescents. [125131]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Figures are not available for 1989 and 1990. The information for the other years requested is as follows:

Percentage

Year	Residents[1]	Convalescents[2]
1991	100	85
1992	99	58
1993	100	63
1999	57	64

[1] Average occupancy per year.
[2] Average occupancy per week.

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many beds have been available for (a) residents and (b) convalescents (i) in each of the five years from 1989 to 1993 and (ii) in 1999 at King Edward VII Convalescent Home at Osborne [125132]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Figures are not available for 1989 and 1990. The information for the other years requested is as follows:

Year	Residents[1]	Convalescents
1991	15	5
1992	20	23
1993	21	19
1999		30[2]

[1] Any unfulfilled residents beds were offered to convalescents whenever there was demand.
[2] Registered beds reduced from 40 to 30 in 1998 with no distinction between residents and convalescents.

Missing Works of Art

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list those works of art and other artefacts from national collections that have gone missing, been stolen or are otherwise unaccounted for in the period from 1990 to date. [125547]

Mr. Alan Howarth: We have contacted the National Museums and Galleries sponsored by DCMS to request information for a reply to my hon. Friend's question. I will write to him as soon as this is available, placing copies of my letter in the Library.

National Lottery (Computer Failures)

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 5 June 2000, Official Report, column 96W, if he will ask the National Lottery Commission to consult with him before the best course of action in respect of unidentified income is determined by Camelot; and what estimate he has received from Camelot of the number of unidentified prize winners to whom the full amount has not been paid. [125672]

Kate Hoey: This is properly a matter for the National Lottery Commission as the relevant regulatory body and I do not intend to ask it to consult me before reaching its decision. I understand that Camelot estimate that 78,187 players were underpaid by a matter of pounds and 34,897 were overpaid. The total amount underpaid in prizes was £85,974 and the total amount overpaid was £94,380.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 5 June 2000, Official Report, column 96W, what representations he has received from (a) Camelot and (b) others in respect of the responsibility for the computer defect. [125686]

Kate Hoey: The only representation received by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was from an ex-GTECH employee. Since then he has been kept informed of developments by the National Lottery Commission.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 5 June 2000, Official Report, column 96W; if, when he was informed of the defect in the National Lottery computer, he was told when the defect was identified and by whom; if he was informed of estimates Camelot had made of how long the defect affected its operation before it was corrected; and if he has been informed as to when the National Lottery Commission will complete its investigations. [125673]

Kate Hoey: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was informed when the defect was identified and by whom, and was also informed of how long the defect had affected operations.

The defect was first drawn to the National Lottery Commission's attention in a letter from an ex-GTECH employee on 29 February 2000. The defect affected operations from the start of the Lottery until it was corrected 27 July 1998.

The Commission intend to complete its investigations as soon as possible.

Commonwealth Games 2002

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assistance he has given to development of the site in Manchester and services for the Commonwealth Games in 2002. [123678]

Kate Hoey: Manchester has received approximately £73 million of Government assistance for their earlier Olympic bids and £115 million is currently available from the Lottery Sports Fund for capital projects for the Commonwealth Games within Manchester; with up to a further £6 million for the redevelopment of Bisley in Surrey for the shooting events.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office is co-ordinating the Government's interests in the Games and chairs a Games Task Force ensuring a joint departmental approach to supporting the Games across Government.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police and Immigration Services (Interpreters)

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the level of fees payable to interpreters per hour by (a) the Immigration Service and (b) the Metropolitan Police in respect of (i) illegal entry matters and (ii) criminal matters; and if travelling time is also reimbursed. [123900]

Mrs. Roche: The level of fees payable to interpreters by the Immigration Service and the Metropolitan Police are set out in tables. Neither Service distinguishes between illegal entry and criminal matters.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what statistics relating to the responsibilities of his Department are collated by parliamentary constituency, indicating the dates covered in each case. [123847]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 25 May 2000]: Statistics of candidates' election expenses at United Kingdom Parliamentary General Elections and certain other associated details relating to postal voting and rejected ballot papers have been collected and published, listed by United Kingdom parliamentary constituency, in the form of a House of Commons paper. The series covers every General Election since 1883, with the exception of that of December 1918.

Figures on the votes cast, postal and proxy voting and rejected ballot papers in the 1999 European Parliamentary Election will be published on a parliamentary constituency basis. This information will be contained in a Home Office statistical paper to be published later this year.

No other Home Office statistics are collected on a parliamentary constituency basis.

Departmental Policies

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what ways his Department and its executive agencies deliver services to meet the needs of the public as consumers, with particular reference to families. [124541]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 5 June 2000]: As part of the wider drive to modernise Government, the Home Office and its agencies are working to ensure that its various services fully meet the needs of the public. Supporting families is a key priority for the Home Office. When providing services we bear the needs of families in mind.

Services for families: 1999–2002

£7 million provided through the Family Support Grant for work carried out by voluntary organisations to support parenting and family life.

£1 million funding given to ParentLine Plus to establish a freephone national helpline service capable of taking up to 500,000 calls a year. The helpline has extended its opening hours to 9.00 am to 9.00 pm Monday to Friday, 9.30 am to 5.00 pm Saturday and 10.00 am to 3.00 pm Sunday to be available when parents most need the service.

£666,000 (part of cross Government funding of £2 million) was given to help establish the National Family and Parenting Institute. In its first year, the Institute is mapping services available to families and will report on gaps by December 2000.

Probation Service

The Home Office, through Probation services, also currently supports the work of Family Court Welfare Service. Where marriages or relationships have broken down the Service works with all courts dealing with family matters to ensure protection of children, provide relevant information to the court and work towards enabling parents to co-operate as separated parents. Much of this work is undertaken in partnership with the voluntary sector, funded through partnership grants from probation services. Partnership expenditure on Family Court Welfare related projects amounts to approximately £1 million per annum. This includes funding for out of court dispute resolution and contact centres.

The service will be transferred to the Lord Chancellor's Department from April 2001 under the new arrangements for a Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service (CAFCASS).

Through direct grant to the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders (NACRO), the Home Office supports the Resettlement Information and Advice Service. The service deals with resettlement inquiries from serving prisoners, ex-offenders, their families and from organisations working with them.

Immigration service

Agencies such as the Immigration and Nationality Directorate (IND) are key service providers for the Home Office. The National Asylum Support Service (NASS) is responsible for providing support to destitute asylum seekers. Customers, including families, might be required to attend their offices at Voyager House, Croydon, for a short assessment of eligibility. There are no special facilities for children because, in NASS's view, the duration of the assessment interview does not warrant them. If, however, a family appeals against refusal to give support, there are play facilities at the appeal hearing centre at Christopher Wren House, Croydon.

Grants are given by NASS to the voluntary sector to deliver Reception Service and One-Stop Services for asylum seekers. For 2000–01 these have been apportioned as follows:

Services	£
Refugee Council	6,895,619
Refugee Arrivals Project	1,913,351
Migrant helpline	2,102,975
Refugee Action	2,024,216
Welsh Refugee Council	537,864
Scottish Refugee Council	561,222
Northern Ireland Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders (NIACRO)	41,216

In addition, NASS will be grant-funding each organisation to provide emergency accommodation to asylum seekers pending their application for support. The annual indicative costs are estimated to be in the region of £7.2 million. This amount will of course be dependent on the numbers of asylum seekers who apply for emergency accommodation.

IND Headquarters is currently dispersed in buildings around Croydon while Lunar House is being totally refurbished. The Public Caller Unit at the Integrated Casework Directorate (ICD) is at present housed in the Whitgift Centre. It offers vending machines and telephones but regrettably there is no space for a play area. There will be a large play area in the "new" Lunar House which is due to open next summer. As an interim measure, the ICD is currently collecting toys for children of parents attending for interview.

At Oakington Reception Centre there are family facilities which include an indoor play area, a crèche with qualified nursery nurses and a collection of books and games for older children. At Tinsley House Detention Centre near Gatwick Airport a family suite is under construction. This will have a play area and computer games for older children.

The Home Secretary makes grants in aid under section 23 of the Immigration Act 1971 to the Refugee Legal Centre and the Immigration Advisory Service to provide services of advice, assistance, and representation to those who have rights of appeal under the 1971 Act. In 1999–2000 the total amount of grants paid was £6.7 million. In 2000–01, the Home Office is also paying a grant in aid to the Northern Ireland Law Centre.

Prison Service

The Prison Service fully recognises the needs of prisoners' families, particularly with regard to the need for support; maintaining regular contact with imprisoned family members; and the opportunity to contribute to regimes and rehabilitation programmes. Much of this is achieved through working in partnership with prisoners' families support groups, listening to people's concerns. The Prison Service co-ordinates the Family Ties Consultative Group which includes a number of these groups and is tasked with assisting the development of policy and good practice.

Further support is provided by way of funding to the umbrella organisation, the Federation of Prisoners' Families Support Groups, as well as to CLINKS which is working with the Service to develop the relationship between the voluntary sector and prisons. An increasing number of establishments also provide facilities for visiting families such as visitors' centres and play areas in visits rooms. The latter has been supported by funding for the lead organisation in this area, Kids Visiting In Prisons (KIDS VIP).

Youth Justice Board

The Youth Justice Board for England and Wales is a Non-departmental Public Body of the Home Office that has been in operation since September 1998. One of its functions is to advise the Government on standards for service delivery in the youth justice system.

Reinforcing the responsibilities of parents is one of the Youth Justice Board's key aims and objectives.

Projects are delivered by youth offending teams in partnership with a wide range of specialist organisations such as ParentLine, Coram Family and Barnardos.

Some of the projects the Youth Justice Board have sponsored include:

an 18 month project in Liverpool to extend support for parents involved or at risk of being involved in the youth justice system. The project will focus on support provided to families with persistent young offenders and those involved in Final Warnings; and an 18 month project in Liverpool to help the Youth Offending Teams and other practitioners understand the impact family breakdown and change can have on young people and the functioning of their families. Project findings will be delivered to Youth Offending Teams and other practitioners.

Services to promote racial equality

The Home Office has recently launched a new race equality grants programme, "Connecting Communities", to help marginalised minority ethnic communities at grass roots level. The grants aim to empower communities, enabling them to have greater access to and influence over policy makers and service providers. £12 million will be made available through the programme over three years.

The programme aims to:

help people in marginalised communities gain new skills and combat disaffection and disengagement within communities; work on joint initiatives with other faith and community groups to build strong community networks;

provide opportunities for young people to participate in seminars, mentoring and job shadowing opportunities with Home Office services, for example, the police and fire service; celebrate minority ethnic achievements to counteract racist and negative stereotyping.

Football (Offences and Disorder)

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been required to surrender their passports in connection with football events in the last five years. [124377]

Mr. Straw: There are currently 100 people subject to international football bans, all of whom are required to report to a police station throughout the period of Euro 2000. The Football (Offences and Disorder) Act 1999, which came into force in September 1999, includes provision for the court to require an individual to surrender their passport for designated periods as a condition of their banning order. The courts have imposed nine such conditions to date.

The Dutch and Belgian authorities have extensive powers to refuse entry to any England supporter who poses a threat to public order, including those subject to domestic bans. Acting on information provided by the National Criminal Intelligence Service, police will be monitoring all England supporters at every United Kingdom exit point throughout the tournament and sharing the intelligence gathered with the Dutch, Belgian and French authorities and the English police team operating in all these countries.

Local Authority Grants

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the funds which are available to local authorities on application, indicating those for which the Torbay Unitary Authority has successfully applied in each of the last two years. [124194]

Mrs. Roche: Local authorities can claim the costs of accommodating and supporting asylum seekers plus an element of administrative costs. Prior to 1 April 1999, all grants were administered by the Department of Health. That Department retains responsibility for the payment of a special grant for the support of unaccompanied asylum seeking children.

From 1 April 1999 to 5 December 1999, costs to local authorities for adult asylum seekers were covered in a special grant report. From 6 December 1999 until 31 March 2000, these costs were covered by grant paid under the Asylum Support (Interim Provisions) Regulations 1999.

In addition, the costs incurred by local authorities in supporting Kosovan evacuees, who arrived as part of the Humanitarian Evacuation Programme, is being reimbursed under the terms of Special Grant Report (No. 49).

The Torbay Unitary Authority has not applied for any grants from the National Asylum Support Service or under the terms of the Kosovo Special Grant Report.

On 31 May 2000, we announced the introduction of a new race equality support grants programme—Connecting Communities—which will address racial disadvantage by helping marginalised minority ethnic communities at grass roots level. There are four support programme areas—Community Networks, Opportunity Schemes, Towards More Representative Services, and Positive Images.

Local authorities will be eligible to bid for funding under the new support programmes, which are expected to start in October 2000.

Asylum Seekers

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements his Department has made for identifying suitable accommodation for asylum seekers under the Government's dispersal policy. [125116]

Mrs. Roche: Accommodation providers are responsible for identifying suitable accommodation. They are bound by contract to provide accommodation to certain specifications. These specifications were drawn up with other organisations, including the Refugee Council. The National Asylum Support Service check all proposed addresses for suitability of location for asylum seekers and access to Post Offices and the retail network.

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the result of consultations with (a) the North West Consortium and (b) Liverpool City Council prior to the decision to award contracts to place asylum seekers in The Landmark and The Inn on the Park in Everton, Liverpool; and when these consultations took place. [125114]

Mrs. Roche: Officials in the National Asylum Support Service wrote to the North West Consortium, including Liverpool City Council, on 9 February seeking comments on proposed providers. No comments were received.

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements have been made to monitor contracts entered into in respect of the Government's dispersal policy for asylum seekers. [125115]

Mrs. Roche: The National Asylum Support Service (NASS) has established dedicated contract managers to oversee all accommodation contracts. In addition, a dedicated contract management team oversees the contract with Sodexho. NASS also has a network of regional managers monitoring support provision for asylum seekers.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many bed spaces are contracted for by the Home Office in its asylum seeker allocation and dispersal schemes in each district of the counties of (a) Tyne and Wear, (b) Northumberland, (c) Durham and (d) Cleveland; through which bodies these bedspaces have been contracted; and if he will estimate the (i) average annual unit cost per bedspace and (ii) total annual cost of these bedspaces. [125141]

Mrs. Roche: The number of bed spaces contracted are as follows: Tyne and Wear 485; Northumberland 0; Durham 0; and, Cleveland 50. The accommodation contracts in these areas are with private sector providers Roselodge, Angel and Adelphi. To avoid prejudicing negotiations currently taking place with potential further accommodation providers, I am unable to provide information on unit costs as this is commercially sensitive.

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many contracts have been entered into with (a) local authorities, (b) the private sector and (c) the voluntary sector in relation to the Government's scheme for the dispersal of asylum seekers. [125118]

Mrs. Roche: Contracts have been entered into with one local authority, one housing association, one YMCA and seven with the private sector.

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much money has been received by public funds in the last five years in fines levied upon foreign lorry drivers apprehended for importing asylum seekers into the United Kingdom. [125271]

Mrs. Roche: Since the coming into force of the civil penalty provisions of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999, a total of £12,000 in penalties has been paid by foreign lorry drivers or their employers. In addition, a further £105,829 has been paid by foreign lorry drivers or their employers to secure the release of vehicles which had been detained pending payment of the penalty. These provisions of the Act came into force only on 3 April this year, so no sum actually fell to be paid until 4 June 2000.

Statistical information relating to the sums of money imposed in fines on those convicted in the courts for the offence of facilitation of illegal entry does not record separately the amounts paid by foreign lorry drivers

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost to police budgets, for the latest year for which figures are available, of the provision of interpreters to assist asylum seekers and economic migrants; how much of this money has been refunded by central Government to local police authorities; and if he will make a statement. [125276]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is not centrally collected. The Home Office does not refund the cost of interpreters to police authorities. The cost of using interpreters is a matter for Chief Officers of police and as part of their operational activities the cost would be met from within force budgets.

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what provision he has made for the financial year 2000–01 to meet the costs incurred by Kent Police through the provision of interpreters to assist asylum seekers and economic migrants. [125272]

Mr. Charles Clarke: No specific provision has been made in the allocation of Government funding to Kent Police Authority for the cost of using interpreters. The arrangements for the employment of interpreters are a matter for the Chief Constable.

The funding allocation for the Kent Police Authority in 2000–01 has recognised the costs to the local police of asylum seekers and other policing demands that arise from Dover being the main route between the United Kingdom and Europe. Government supported funding for Kent Police Authority increased by 4.4 per cent. or £8 million, and around 20 per cent. of this extra funding was in consequence of the growing pressures from illegal immigration and other "Gateway to Europe" policing demands on the Kent Constabulary.

Chinese President (State Visit)

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he will take following the criticism made in the judgment of Mr. Justice Burton on the actions taken by police during the visit of the President of China; and if he will make a statement. [124890]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand that the judgment in this case, while noting that there remained some disagreement between the parties on matters of fact, supported the declarations granted by the Metropolitan Police and considered the matter settled.

It is for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to determine in the light of this case what changes should be made to policing arrangements for future events.

Hereford (City Status)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has had about the future status of the city of Hereford; and if he will make a statement. [125129]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Hereford Town Council has applied for the honour of city status to be restored to Hereford, which lost its previous status as a city when the new Parish of Hereford came into existence on 1 April 2000. It is for Her Majesty The Queen, acting on the advice of Ministers, to decide whether city status should be restored. The application is under consideration.

Firefighters

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of front-line firefighters do not hold a current first aid qualification; and what plans the Government have to increase the number who do hold such a qualification. [125002]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 8 June 2000]: Information about the number of firefighters with first aid qualifications is not held by the Home Office and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The Home Office issued advice to Fire Authorities in 1993 recommending that all firefighters be trained to either 'Trained First Aider' or 'Emergency First Aider' standards. Also, there is an expectation that all firefighters are competent in casualty handling and first aid by virtue of their role.

Fire Authorities are required to comply with the Health and Safety (First-Aid) Regulations 1981.

Local Elections

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to promote postal ballots in local elections. [125389]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Representation of the People Act 2000 contains provisions, which will shortly be brought into force, which will allow for postal votes on demand.

Seven local authorities ran pilot schemes involving all postal ballots at the recent local elections and we are looking forward to receiving the evaluation reports of those schemes.

We hope that more local authorities will apply to run such schemes at future local elections.

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to extend the practice of increasing the number of voting days in local elections. [125388]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Fifteen local authorities ran pilot schemes involving voting on more than one day at the recent local elections and we are looking forward to receiving the evaluation reports of those schemes.

We hope that more local authorities will apply to run such schemes at future local elections.

Alcohol Licences (River Boats)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reason (a) trains and aeroplane will be exempt and (b) river boats will not be exempt, from obtaining a premises licence under the proposals for the amendment of licensing laws. [125447]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Paragraphs 2 to 7 of Appendix 3 to "Time For Reform" sets out the thinking behind the proposals that boats selling alcohol should require a premises licence but that trains and aeroplane should not. We shall consider comments on these paragraphs when preparing legislation.

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received about resources available to the Crown Prosecution Service to pursue prosecutions; and if he will make a statement. [125321]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 9 June 2000]: I am not aware of having received very recent representations from outside Government, though I have received representations in the past from the First Division Association and from staff of the Crown Prosecution Service and others about the organisation's resources. Expenditure plans for the criminal justice system as a whole in resource terms for 2000–01, including the Crown Prosecution Service, were set out in the Criminal Justice System Business Plan published on 23 May 2000.

Passport Agency Computer System

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what software language is used in the National Passport Centre Computerisation; and if it is programmed as a totally integrated relational database. [125542]

Mrs. Roche: The new United Kingdom Passport Agency Computer system, ("PASS") is an integrated relational database solution using the industry-standard ORACLE Relational DataBase Management System (RDBMS). The programming language and database tools used include Oracle Forms, Sequel (SQL), Visual Basic and "C".

Road Accidents

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his policy is on breath testing and blood sampling of individuals involved in serious road traffic accidents. [124694]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Under the Road Traffic Act 1988, the police have the power to breath test any motorist who has been involved in a car crash. We support the Association of Chief Police Officers' policy that breath tests should be carried out at all crashes which the police attend. Those motorists who fail that screening test are then normally required to take an evidential breath test at the police station. Failure of that test provides the evidence for prosecution. In certain situations detailed in the Act, a blood sample may be taken by the police in place of an evidential breath sample and it is required where the motorist is suspected of driving when unfit through drugs.

Immigration Services Commissioner

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the role of the Immigration Services Commissioner. [124768]

Mrs. Roche: The role and responsibilities of the Immigration Services Commissioner are set out in Part V of, and in Part I of Schedule 5 and Schedule 6 to, the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999. The Act prohibits any person or organisation from providing immigration advice or services unless that person or organisation is registered with the Immigration Services Commissioner, authorised to practise by a designated professional body, or is exempt under the terms of the scheme.

The Immigration Services Commissioner will publish the criteria for registration, will receive applications for registration and will determine whether individuals and organisations are competent and otherwise fit to provide immigration advice and services. The Commissioner will also consider cases for exemption. Exemption is likely to be sought by organisations from the voluntary, health and education sectors and the Commissioner will ensure that these organisations meet satisfactory standards.

The Commissioner will establish a complaints scheme and may investigate and determine complaints made against immigration advisers, including members of the designated professional bodies. Remedies available to the Commissioner on finding a complaint proven include powers to require a registered person to re-apply for registration without delay, to withdraw an exemption or to refer a disciplinary charge to the Immigration Services Tribunal. The power to discipline members of a designated professional body remains with the relevant professional body, but the Commissioner has power to refer his findings to the relevant professional body and to impose a timetable for that body to consider the complaint and, where appropriate, to take disciplinary action.

The Commissioner also has a duty to promote good practice by those who provide immigration advice or services.

The Government believe that the activities of the Commissioner, together with other initiatives such as the establishment of the Community Legal Service, will provide a comprehensive and coherent strategy for rooting out unscrupulous and incompetent immigration advisers and service providers, while supporting those providing a quality service. In this way standards in the immigration advice sector will be improved. The Commissioner is in the process of consulting widely within the advice sector in order to formulate the rules and standards, which will govern the regulatory scheme.

Extradition

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 2 May 2000, Official Report, column 76W, on extradition, (a) what is his policy on requests for consent certificates, when the requesting state has withheld information (i) which would have enabled them to have included further offences in the initial extradition request and (ii) which was relevant to the original offences and (b) what effect the Northern Ireland peace process has had on his practice in relation to extradition requests. [125557]

Mr. Straw: Each case is decided on its own merits weighing up all relevant considerations and excluding irrelevant ones. I am not aware of any cases in which the requesting state has asked for the rule of specialty to be waived, and has withheld information relating to either the original, or further offences. The Northern Ireland peace process has not had any effect on my handling of extradition requests.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applicants sought to join the Metropolitan police force in each month since January 1999; how many were accepted for training; and what the rate of take-up was for each course at Hendon since May 1997. [125270]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is set out in the tables. The selection process is a rolling programme and therefore those who have applied since January 2000 are unlikely to have completed all selection elements. The percentage take-up rates of places offered is based on those individuals who were offered employment and accepted.

Prison Service

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much was spent on prisoners' wages in each of the last two years. [125339]

Mr. Boateng: Expenditure on prisoners' earnings in England and Wales was £20.270 million in 1998–99 and £21.210 million in 1999–2000.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women received into prison (a) under sentence and (b) on remand who had children under the age of 18 months were given a place in a mother and baby unit in each of the last five years. [125340]

Mr. Boateng: There are 64 places in total available in mother and baby units at four prisons. On 5 June 2000, there were 54 mothers and their babies in the units.

Centrally available data only give figures for the past 19 months. The information is given in the table.

Numbers of mothers admitted to prison Mother and Baby Units for the period 2 November 1998—31 May 2000

	Number
Remands	22
Sentenced	184
Total	206

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of prison service staff is registered disabled; how many (a) applicants for jobs and (b) employees in the Prison Service are registered disabled; and if he will make a statement. [125335]

Mr. Boateng: Most recruitment undertaken in the Prison Service is for unified grades (prison officers, governors) who are currently exempt from the provisions of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995.

From the statistics gathered for the quarter October—December 1999, of those who applied for jobs, a total of 13 declared a disability and one person with a disability was appointed.

Out of 43,683 staff in post on 31 March 2000, a total of 139 were identified as disabled.

The Prison Service will be undertaking a staff disability survey towards the end of this year which should allow a more accurate database to be established. This, in turn, will inform decisions on the level of resources required to assist staff to carry out their duties.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many disabled people visited prisons in England and Wales in each of the last three years. [125336]

Mr. Boateng: I regret that this information is not available.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to repeat the 1991 National Prison Survey in 2001; and if he will make a statement. [125333]

Mr. Boateng: There are no plans to repeat the 1991 National Prison Survey in 2001. A survey of prisoners is being carried out this year for the Home Office to investigate factors related to criminality. This covers much of the same information.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many hours per week on average remand prisoners spent out of cell in each local prison in England and Wales in 1999; and if he will make a statement. [125334]

Mr. Boateng: The Prison Service does not monitor time out of cell for remand prisoners separately. The average time out of cell on weekdays and weekends for all prisoners in local prisons in England and Wales for the year 1999–00 are given in the table.

1999–2000 Average time out of cell

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce privacy screening in shared prison cells fitted with integral sanitation. [125338]

Mr. Boateng: A significant proportion of shared prison cells with integral sanitation already have privacy screening. This work has been carried out by establishments under local management.

The Prison Service is currently evaluating options to standardise the type of privacy screen and to extend the installation to all shared cells with integral sanitation. A decision has not yet been taken as to when this work might be carried out.

Criminal Justice

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list those measures on just processes and outcomes which his Department is monitoring as described on page 4 of the Criminal Justice System Business Plan 2000–01; [125621]

(2) if he will list those measures on just processes and outcomes which his Department is monitoring, as referred to on page 4 of the Criminal Justice System Business Plan 2000–01. [125619]

Mr. Charles Clarke: On just processes, the Lord Chancellor's Department, the Home Office and the Law Officers Department are jointly monitoring the number of cases that are dismissed because the magistrates find that there is no case to answer, and non-jury acquittals in the Crown Court.

For just outcomes, the three Departments are monitoring the number of successful appeals against sentence; the number of successful appeals by the prosecution on the basis that the original sentence is unduly lenient; and the number of criminal cases in which there is a successful appeal to the Divisional Court by way of case stated or judicial review.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how his Department measures the satisfaction of jurors with their treatment by the criminal justice system; and if he will place in the Library details of the opinion research on jurors mentioned on page 4 of the Criminal Justice System Business Plan 2000–01. [125625]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Lord Chancellor's Department is to conduct an annual survey of jurors to measure their satisfaction with their treatment by the criminal justice system. We are placing in the Library the results of the survey conducted to inform the new measure and target for juror satisfaction.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his definition of a public disorder incident as referred to on page 4 of the Criminal Justice System Business Plan 2000–01. [125617]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Business Plan follows the definition of disorder used by the police service, i.e. a breach of the peace of which the police are aware, which may require police intervention or action in partnership with others. Racist or homophobic incidents and incidents involving or arising out of disturbances in public places, licensed premises or private property, drunkenness, domestic incidents, marches and demonstrations, civil disputes, neighbour disputes, public or sports events, hunt sabotage, and other unlisted types of disorder or nuisance will all count towards the total.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if a decision not to prosecute or to discontinue a prosecution will count as a disposal for the purposes of meeting the Government's objective of reducing the time taken from arrest to disposal, as set out on page 4 of the Criminal Justice System Business Plan 2000–01. [125623]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The timeliness measure for the time taken from arrest to sentence or other disposal for all offenders is currently collected from charge. It excludes cases where there is a decision not to prosecute before the first listing at a magistrates court. Cases discontinued at or after first listing at a magistrates court are counted as disposals in the calculation of the measure; cases that are discontinued at the Crown court also count as disposals except where the indictment is left to lie on file as a result of a prosecution application before the first main hearing.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many public disorder incidents, as defined in his list of performance measures on page 4 of the Criminal Justice System Business Plan 2000–01, were recorded per 1,000 of the population in each of the last 10 years; what the baseline figure is against which his reduction target will be measured; and when he expects that target to be achieved. [125615]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information is not available in the form required for the last 10 years. The baseline will be that recorded during 2000–01 and the target will be for achievement by 31 March 2002.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the principal cities whose robbery figures will be taken into account in measuring the performance of the criminal justice system under its business plan 2000–01; and what is the baseline figure for robbery against which his reduction target will be measured. [125612]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The following police authorities have set targets under Best Value for reduction of robbery:

Police authority	Percentage
Greater Manchester	10
Merseyside	15
Metropolitan police	15
West Midlands	34
West Yorkshire	22

Police authorities have used the baseline year of 1999–2000. The full figures for 1999–2000 will be published on 18 July.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the baseline levels of vehicle crime and domestic burglary are against which he has set the performance targets listed on page 4 of the Criminal Justice System Business Plan 2000–01. [125613]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Based on the 1998–99 recorded crime figures, the baseline levels used are as follows:

	Number of offences
Vehicle crime[1]	1,077,732
Domestic burglary	473,352

[1] Theft of and from vehicles

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of the ingredients of the basket of measures on the rights of defendants mentioned on page 4 of the Criminal Justice System Business Plan 2000–01; and if he will give details of the performance targets in each case. [125626]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The measures on the rights of the defendants contained in the basket are listed on page 5 of the Business Plan.

Work is continuing on targets for the underlying measures to be in place by 31 March 2001.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his baseline figure is for public confidence in the criminal justice system against which he will measure his target, described on page 4 of the Criminal Justice System Business Plan 2000–01; and if he will place in the Library details of how he measures public confidence. [125627]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The public confidence measure is going to be based on questions in the British Crime Survey. The baseline figure will come from the British Crime Survey 2000. The results will become available for analysis this summer. When available, details of the calculations will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his latest estimate is of the overall cost of the criminal justice system per person (a) proceeded against, (b) found guilty or admitting guilt and (c) found not guilty. [125628]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information on the overall cost of the criminal justice system per person is not yet available. Information on the average costs of court proceedings in 1997–98 (including disposals, but excluding police investigation, for which no unit costs were available), was published in 1999, in Home Office Research Findings 103, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the economic cost of crime in each of the last 10 years; what is the baseline against which the reduction target set out on page 4 of the Criminal Justice System Business Plan 2000–01 will be measured; and if he will make a statement on the methodology used in calculating the economic cost of crime. [125618]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Information on the economic cost of crime in each of the last 10 years is not available. A baseline is to be established to enable a target to be set by 31 March 2001 and research will be published in the next few months setting out the data available and the work proposed to improve data.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reason he has replaced the measure of reducing the long-term rate of growth of crime which he proposed in the 1999 Criminal Justice System Business Plan. [125622]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We decided that the challenging and specific crime reduction targets which we have set would provide a better focus for the work of the police, crime and disorder reduction partnerships and the criminal justice system.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements he has made in respect of those travelling to the Euro 2000 Football Championship. [123695]

Mr. Straw: In December 1999, I established a Euro 2000 Co-ordination Group, involving government agencies, the police and the Football Association. The aim was to ensure that comprehensive and complementary measures were put in place for minimising the risk of disorder involving England supporters during the tournament. The measures taken are outlined in the Home Office report of the Co-ordinating Group's work, a copy of which was placed in the Library on 7 June.

Global Cultural Diversity Congress

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to receive the report from the Chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality on the collapse of Global Cultural Diversity Congress Ltd. [125614]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The report was submitted to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 7 June 2000.

Home Detention Curfew

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a breakdown by ethnic group of those prisoners who were (a) eligible for release on home detention curfew in the last year and (b) released on home detention curfew in the last year. [125337]

Mr. Boateng: A breakdown by ethnic group prisoners who were eligible for release on home detention curfew and of those who were actually released on the scheme, and the release rate for each group during the period from 1 June 1999 to 31 May 2000 is shown in the table.

HDC eligibility/release figures and release rates by ethnic group between June 1999 and May 2000

	Eligible	Released	Release rate
Total	55,175	16,108	29%

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Damages

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many responses he has received to his consultation document CP3/00 on the discount rate for levels of damages; how many were from (a) hon. Members, (b) the general public, (c) the legal profession and judges and (d) the insurance industry; in each case, how many favoured (i) a rate of return of 2 per cent., (ii) a rate of return of 3 per cent. and (iii) a rate of return of 4 per cent. or more; and when he plans to publish his proposals in response to the consultation. [124846]

Mr. Lock: The deadline for responses to the Lord Chancellor's damages consultation paper was 31 May. Eighty responses have been received and are being analysed. Two responses have been received from academics, one from a member of Parliament, 44 from the legal profession, 13 from the insurance industry, 11 from financial specialists and nine others. The remaining information requested by my hon. Friend will be made available to him when the analysis is complete. The Lord Chancellor expects to announce his conclusions in the early Autumn.

Reserved Judgments

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department in respect of reserved judgments in the High Court for each of the last three years, (a) what was the longest period of time between conclusion of submissions and delivery of judgment, (b) what was the average period and (c) in how many cases judgment was reserved for over one month; what guidance he issues on the length of the period between the conclusion of submissions and the delivery of judgment in the High Court; what plans he has to introduce systems to ensure the prompt delivery of judgment; how much has been paid, earmarked, or is estimated as likely to be paid in compensation due to delayed judgments; and if he will make a statement. [124880]

Jane Kennedy: The Court Service has kept no information centrally in respect of reserved judgments over the past three years. The information could not be collected except at disproportionate cost to taxpayers.

The Lord Chancellor does not give guidance on the length of the period between the conclusion of submissions and the delivery of judgment in the High Court. He has, however, agreed with the senior judiciary that in future they will make known to him any reserved judgment which is outstanding after three months, providing an explanation of the delay and the measures which will be taken in order to ensure delivery of the judgment.

There has been no claim for compensation due to delayed judgments within the Supreme Court Group. However, the Lord Chancellor's Department expects to receive claims for compensation in respect of one case from the Supreme Court Group and one High Court case on Circuit. The amount of any compensation that may be paid for these two cases is unknown at present and no funds have been earmarked for this purpose.

Tribunal System

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what are the terms of reference of the inquiry by Sir Andrew Leggatt into the tribunal system. [124879]

Mr. Lock: I refer my hon. Friend to the written answer I gave to the hon. Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Mr. Fitzpatrick) on 18 May 2000, Official Report, columns 206–07W.

Magistrates Courts (Wales)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many magistrates courts closed in Wales in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [125559]

Jane Kennedy: Three Magistrates courts closed in Wales in 1995; three in 1996; five in 1997; one in 1998; and none in 1999. Earlier data are not held centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The Government's policy is that the administration of magistrates courts is best decided locally. It is for each Magistrates Courts Committee to decide how best to deploy its resources, in order to carry out its statutory responsibility to provide an efficient and effective service to court users. Decisions concerning the location and number of magistrates courts in their area are for the relevant Courts Committee to determine.

Performance Indicators

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on how each of the agencies and non-departmental bodies relating to his Department performed against their key performance indicators in (a) the last year and (b) the previous two years. [125331]

Mr. Lock: A summary of the performance in 1998–1999 and 1997–98 for those agencies and executive NDPBs for which the Lord Chancellor is responsible is shown in the table. A more detailed explanation of their achievements can be found in the respective published Annual Reports. Finalised performance figures for last year will be published in the Annual Reports for 1999–2000 which will shortly be laid before Parliament.

Executive NDPBs/Commentary on performance in 1997–98 and 1998–99[3]

Legal Aid Board[4]

The Board has 17 operational performance targets. In 1997–98 it met or exceeded 15 of its targets. In 1998–99, the Board's performance fell slightly and only 10 targets were met or exceeded. This drop in performance was expected as work in each of the Board's area offices was disruped during the phased implementation of the Board's new computer strategy, the Corporate Information System (CIS). Prior to implementation, each area office was meeting or exceeding the targets. Following the successful implementation of CIS, performance recovered and stabilised. New and more challenging targets for some types of work were set for 1999–2000.

Information on the Legal Aid Board's performance against targets is also included in the 'Report on Executive NDPBs', published annually by the Cabinet Office.

WALES

New Deal (Over-50s)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary concerning the New Deal for the over 50s; and if he will make a statement. [125562]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the First Secretary on a weekly basis to discuss a variety of issues including the New Deal for over 50s, which is a UK Government scheme. The national roll-out of the New Deal for over 50s was launched on 3 April this year at Merthyr College by the Prime Minister, although a pilot has been in operation in Flintshire and Wrexham since October 1999. Early indicators suggest that the programme will benefit Wales and the 50-plus jobseeking community. The Employment Service will be releasing statistical information on New Deal 50 plus in September.

Airbus A3XX

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary concerning the application for £25 million RSA grant from the Wales Assembly to the Airbus A3XX project; and if he will make a statement. [125600]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I meet the First Secretary on a regular weekly basis and we discuss a wide range of issues including the Airbus A3XX project. I understand the Company has submitted a new application with a new cast for £25 million RSA. This is entirely a matter for the Assembly and I know that it will give the application full consideration and make a decision based on sound economic analysis and a set of fixed criteria.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry concerning the application by Airbus UK for £503 million repayable launch investment for the A3XX project; and if he will make a statement. [125601]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have regular discussions with my Whitehall colleagues and we discuss a wide range of issues including the A3XX project. I was pleased to learn of the £530 million Launch Investment decision. It is good news for the UK and the plant at Broughton.

Assisted Areas Map

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary concerning the assisted area status map as it concerns the constituency of Alyn and Deeside and the county of Flintshire; and if he will make a statement. [125603]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Assisted Areas map is a matter for the UK Government, but I have, of course, discussed the designation of Welsh areas with the First Secretary. I have also met with a delegation from Flintshire county council to hear their concern first hand.

The Government are still in discussion with the European Commission and are pressing for early approval of the Assisted Areas map. Within the framework set by the European Commission, all concerned have tried to include, so far as possible revised proposals reflecting local and national priorities. The Government will make an announcement when the map is approved.

Shotton Steelworks

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry concerning the future of the Shotton Steelworks and the impact of the strength of sterling; and if he will make a statement. [125602]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I am in close contact with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry regarding all aspects of the steel industry. I have also met representatives from the Corus Group plc and from the ISTC and discussed a range of issues with both.

The Government understand the difficulties that the current fall in the euro is causing for British industry. In a wider international context, it is clear that the problem is one of Euro weakness rather than sterling strength. Recently the pound depreciated to a six-year low against the dollar.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many staff from his Department were seconded to private sector companies in (a) May 1997 to April 1998, (b) May 1998 to April 1999 and (c) May 1999 to April 2000; and if he will list in each case the companies to which staff were sent, the names and ranks of the staff involved and the duration of the secondment. [123427]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 24 May 2000]: Secondments and attachments are part of the Government's approach to interchange which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: voluntary, public and private. Interchange is a key component of the Government's agenda for Civil Service reform.

Secondments from DfEE to other organisations generally last between three months and three years. The number of secondments from the DfEE to private sector companies, beginning in the years since May 1997, were:

New Deal

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the impact of the New Deal on employment in (a) Lancashire, (b) the North-West Region and (c) Burnley. [123556]

Ms Jowell: 3,971 young people in Lancashire had found work through the New Deal by the end of March 2000. The equivalent figures for the North-West and Burnley are 30,921 and 260 respectively.

It is likely to prove difficult to assess the impact of New Deal on specific localities. Independent evaluation at national level has, however, shown that New Deal helps people leave unemployment more quickly and has increased employment, and reduced unemployment, by more than would otherwise have happened. It has also suggested that the programme will be close to self-financing.

With the help of New Deal, long-term youth unemployment has been virtually eliminated. Since April 1998 the number of 18–24 year olds claiming JSA for more than a year has fallen from 400 to 50 in Lancashire, from 6,700 to 800 in the North-West and from 12 to two in Burnley.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures he is taking to alert school leavers to the availability of New Deal options. [123878]

Ms Jowell: General information about New Deal and the options is available to school leavers through the Careers Service. There are, however, no plans to promote options in any detail to this group as we hope that they will move into work before they become eligible to join New Deal through the help and advice offered either by the Careers Service or by the Employment Service.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what research his Department has (a) carried out and (b) commissioned into the reasons for which people leave the unemployment register while remaining unemployed instead of entering the New Deal Gateway. [123880]

Ms Jowell: Young people leave Jobseeker's Allowance at all stages of their unemployment duration and not just at the point of joining New Deal. Information on the reasons for leaving Jobseeker's Allowance by duration of unemployment is published monthly by the Office for National Statistics in Labour Market Trends.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what help is given to prisoners on leaving prison to enter the New Deal Gateway; and if this help is monitored; [123879]

(2) if discharged remand prisoners are given help to enter the New Deal Gateway. [123881]

Ms Jowell: Unemployed offenders and discharged remand prisoners have equal access to employment, training and education and are able to count the period of detention towards the qualifying period for Employment Service programmes. They may enter New Deal from the first day after being released.

Separate management information is not collected on the number of offenders who enter ES programmes, so monitoring of progress overall cannot be undertaken nationally. However, the progress of individuals may be monitored locally by the Employment Service and Probation Service as part of working in partnership with each other.

To help with the transition from custody to employment, the Employment Service have developed a National Framework Document that assists agencies to establish and develop local agreements. The National Framework has been developed in close working partnership with the Prison Service, the Probation Service, the Benefits Agency and the TEC National Council. Local agreements ensure that offenders are aware of employment, training and education opportunities open to them and their responsibility to find work.

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people in each month since April 1997 were unemployed for over six months but were excluded from the claimant count because they were undertaking a New Deal Option, broken down into those aged (a) 18 to 24 and (b) under 18 or over 24 years. [125179]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 9 June 2000]: Since the national roll out of New Deal in January 1998, 163,800 young people have started New Deal options. The claimant count includes only those persons claiming Jobseeker's Allowance. People undertaking a New Deal option are not in receipt of Jobseeker's Allowance and are therefore, by definition, not included in the count.

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people who have completed the New Deal once have (a) re-entered the gateway to New Deal for a second time and (b) gone onto a second New Deal option. [125180]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 9 June 2000]: In the period ending March 2000, 34,870 young people had re-entered the New Deal Gateway. Of these, 10,170 had started a New Deal option.

Specialist School Status

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many applications for specialist school status have been received for the current bidding round (a) nationally and (b) in the Eastern Region. [124891]

Ms Estelle Morris: In the March 2000 Technology and Language College competition, 77 applications were received, of which nine were from schools located in the Eastern region. In the June 2000 Arts and Sports competition, 113 applications have been received, including 23 from the Eastern region.

Jobcentres

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what definition he uses of a reasonable distance when determining access to a jobcentre; [124667]

(2) what percentage of the population lives (a) within one mile of and (b) over three miles from a job centre in (i) rural and (ii) urban areas. [124671]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Caroline Flint, dated 12 June 2000:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your questions concerning the distances people live from a Jobcentre and the definition of a reasonable distance when determining access to a Jobcentre. These are issues which fall within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

I am afraid that we do not collect information about the distances at which jobseekers, or the population more generally, live from their nearest Jobcentre. However, with over 1000 Jobcentres nationwide, very many people will live within 3 miles of the one nearest to them.

As to the definition of a "reasonable distance", it may be helpful to explain that jobseekers are normally required by regulations made under the Jobseeker's Act 1995 to attend a Jobcentre in person each fortnight in order to confirm that they are available and actively seeking work and that their circumstances have remained unchanged. Where, however, a jobseeker lives more than one hour, by public transport (in either direction), from their nearest Jobcentre; or if their attendance would result in an absence from home of more than four hours; or if they have a mental or physical disability which restricts their mobility, then they will be offered the opportunity to have their claims dealt with by post.

In addition Jobcentre Managers may also exercise discretion in offering this facility to other jobseekers, even if their journey is possible within the time limits set out above, in circumstances where it would be unreasonable to expect a jobseeker to attend; for example, where they would have to use a form of transport which they could not be expected to use on a fortnightly basis, such as an Intercity train, a ferry or a plane.

National Childcare Strategy

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many places under the National Childcare Strategy Early Years Development and Childcare Partnership have been provided in the Colchester constituency; what plans he has to extend the scheme in the Colchester constituency; and if he will make a statement. [125074]

Ms Hodge: Essex Early Years Development and Childcare Partnership reported that there were 20 new out of school child care places created in the Colchester constituency during 1999–2000. The Partnership also reported that 215 new childminder places were created in the Colchester borough during 1999–2000. Childminder places are not broken down to constituency level.

The Essex Early Years Development and Childcare Plan includes plans to create a total of 2,650 new child care places across the county in 2000–01. The Plan sets out arrangements for involving Area Partnerships which cover district and borough council areas in Essex in planning places at a local level. (The North East Essex Area Partnership covers Colchester and Tendring).

Teaching Assistants

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to expand the availability of training places for classroom teaching assistants in (a) Staffordshire and (b) England. [125146]

Ms Estelle Morris: We are making available to local education authorities in England £350 million over three years to recruit and train an additional 20,000 teaching assistants by 2002. In addition, we are providing Standards Funds to support the training of more experienced teaching assistants, so that they may develop their skills and further their careers. Staffordshire has received £2.109 million for this purpose in 2000–01.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what instructions and guidance have been issued to jobcentres in connection with the admissibility of job advertisements referring to the application, enthusiasm or capacity of potential applicants, in connection with their obligation to comply with disability and other equal opportunities legislation. [125400]

Ms Jowell: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Tim Boswell, dated 12 June 2000:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question concerning the instructions and guidance given to Jobcentres in the administration of job advertisements, in connection with their obligation to comply with disability and other equal opportunities legislation. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Guidance to Jobcentre staff instructs them that job advertisements should avoid language that might unfairly discriminate against groups of unemployed jobseekers.

However, all Jobcentres have now been reminded that terms such as "hard working", "enthusiastic", and "reliable" are normal descriptions, which can be freely used in vacancy advertisements. We have also asked Jobcentre staff to apply common sense and accept an employer's wording, unless it would be clearly inappropriate to do so.

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many limited jobseeker's agreements for disabled people and people suffering long-term illness were in force in (a) 1997, (b) 1998, (c) 1999 and (d) 2000 to date. [125402]

Ms Jowell: Jobseeker's Allowance Regulations allow people with physical and mental health problems to restrict their availability in any way providing the restrictions are reasonable in the light of their condition. Jobseekers agree any restrictions with advisers when they draw up their Jobseeker's Agreement when they first claim Jobseeker's Allowance. By detecting health problems at an early stage we can help jobseekers who may be entitled to alternative benefits; identify circumstances which may affect their attendance and offer any help or special arrangements that are needed.

We do not hold information about how many jobseekers there are who place restrictions for the reasons about which the hon. Gentleman asks. Statistics are available on the number of claims referred to and decisions made by the adjudication authorities, now decision makers, where there is a doubt on availability because an unreasonable restriction has been identified.

The hon. Gentleman may be interested to know that since the introduction of Jobseeker's Allowance in October 1996, the number of decisions given by the adjudicating authorities on questions of restricted availability has reduced considerably. In the year from April 1995 to March 1996, 27,851 claims were disallowed because of restrictions placed on claimant's availability. In the year to April 1997 only 17,243 disallowances were recorded. The figures for 1997–98, were 14,273; for 1998–99, were 8,627; and for year ending April 2000, were 7,906. These reductions reflect not only the fall in numbers of unemployed but the way in which Jobseeker's Allowance is underpinned by an individually tailored Jobseeker's Agreement for each client taking into account their personal circumstances.

This information, together with statistics on the other adjudication officer and decision makers decisions and disallowance rates, is contained in a published document entitled "Analysis of Adjudication Officers Decisions". This provides information on all main entitlement questions arising on claims. The latest information relates to the quarter ending March 2000.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on developments in reaching a common European Union approach towards improvement of the condition of disabled people as regards access to (a) employment, (b) services and (c) premises, indicating where appropriate the policy of the UK Government and the balance between common Community policy and subsidiarity of national decision-making. [124948]

Ms Hodge: Article 13 of the European Community Treaty empowers the European Council, acting unanimously on a proposal from the Commission, and after consulting the European Parliament, to take appropriate action to combat discrimination based on disability. On 25 November 1999 the European Commission published a proposal under Article 13 for a framework directive dealing with discrimination in employment and training on grounds which included disability. The UK welcomes proposals under Article 13 to improve the condition of disabled people in the European Union. The framework directive on employment and training, which is currently being negotiated, will set out the broad principles to be achieved, but will leave implementation to individual member states. The UK Government are seeking to secure certain changes to the drafting of the proposed directive to meet the approach and framework developed on disability discrimination in the United Kingdom. The Commission has not put forward any legislative proposals relating to the provision of services or access to premises for people with disabilities.

School Sixth Forms

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list (a) each local authority with more than three 11 to 18 years schools whose sixth forms contain 50 pupils or fewer and (b) each local authority with more than four 11 to 18 years schools whose sixth forms contain 100 pupils or fewer. [124693]

Ms Estelle Morris: The requested information follows.

Final figures on maintained secondary schools with sixth forms will be published in the Annual Statistical Volume "Statistics of Education: Schools in England (2000 edition)" in September.

Departmental Advertising

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much has been spent by his Department on advertising in each year since May 1997. [125687]

Mr. Wills: Department for Education and Employment expenditure on advertising since May 1997 is as follows:

Year	£
1997–98	9,992,350
1998–99	15,673,258
1999–2000	11,900,968

HOME DEPARTMENT

Criminal Justice

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the baseline against which he will measure his target of improving the satisfaction of (a) victims and (b) witnesses with their treatment by the criminal justice system; how that baseline was measured; and how he proposes to measure levels of satisfaction by 31 March 2002. [125624]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The baseline for victim satisfaction is the British Crime Survey 1998.

There is presently no reliable indicator of witness satisfaction. A new cross Criminal Justice System survey on witness satisfaction has accordingly been put in hand. The results will be available in the autumn, enabling a baseline to be set.

Future levels of victims' satisfaction will be measured by the British Crime Survey, and of witness satisfaction by a further survey.

Departmental Expenditure Limits

Maria Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has for changes to the 2000–01 Department expenditure limits within his responsibility. [126025]

Mr. Straw: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL), which covers Class IV Vote 1 (Home Office administration, police, probation, immigration and other services, England and Wales) and Vote 2 (Prisons, England and Wales), will be increased by £42,050,000 from £8,068,786,000 to £8,110,836,000.

The changes are the net effect of the following transfers: £1,200,000 to the Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Class III Vote 1) in respect of neighbourhood wardens; £20,200,000 from the DEL Reserve for police modernisation; £2,900,000 from the Capital Modernisation Fund for the electronic chipping of goods; and £20,150,000 from the Capital Modernisation Fund for the national strategy for police information systems.

The increases will be offset by a charge on the Reserve and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Changes to the budgeted amount for the Immigration and Nationality Directorate, which includes the costs of dealing with the asylum seekers, have yet to be confirmed.

Prison Service Race Relations Group

Maria Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the report of the Prison Service race relations group. [126026]

Mr. Boateng: A copy of the ninth report of the Prison Service race relations group to the Prison Service Management Board has been placed in the Library.

Interception of Communications Tribunal

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements have been made following the expiry of the term of appointment of the President of the Interception of Communications Tribunal on 4 April; and if he will make a statement. [126027]

Mr. Straw: Mr. Justice Burton has been appointed as President of the Interception of Communications Tribunal for a period of five years.

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received the annual report for 1999 of the Complaints Audit Committee of the Immigration and Nationality Directorate; and if he will make a statement. [126067]

Mr. Straw: A copy of the report has been placed in the Library. It is a useful and informative document and I am grateful to the Committee for its comments and its recommendations which will all be followed up. The report also includes details of the broadening of the Committee's terms of reference to reflect their role in monitoring complaints arising from the enhanced powers of Immigration Officers under Part VII of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) of 15 May 2000, Official Report, column 53W, on animal experiments, whether the review of section 24 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1966 in the context of freedom of information legislation has been completed; and if he will make a statement. [125902]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Section 24 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 prevents the disclosure of information about the use of animals in scientific procedures that has been provided in confidence. Under the proposals for the Freedom of Information Bill, all statutory bars are being reviewed, including Section 24.

The maintenance of the necessary protection for individual scientists and their research institutions and for the commercial confidentiality of their work is a priority in the review of Section 24.

No decision has yet been taken on whether to repeal or amend Section 24.

Health and Safety

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the criminal sanctions in his proposed Health and Safety legislation come into force which official or Minister will be criminally liable for deaths caused in or by each Government department and agency; and if he will list the job title of each such official or Minister in each Government department or agency. [125810]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The consultation paper published on 23 May, "Reforming the Law on Involuntary Manslaughter: the Government's Proposals", set out proposals for a new offence of corporate killing and invited views on the application of Crown immunity to the offence. The closing date for comments on the proposals is 1 September 2000.

Once we have been able to consider responses to the consultation paper, we will reach a decision on the possible application of Crown immunity to the offence.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum applications were (a) lodged, (b) outstanding and (c) decided in the years 1995–96, 1996–97, 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000. [125691]

Mrs. Roche: The information requested is given in the table.

Applications for asylum to the United Kingdom, initial decisions and cases awaiting an initial decision[1]

	Asylum applications[2]	Initial decisions[2]	Cases awaiting an initial decision[2,3]
1995–96	43,365	28,915	69,165
1996–97	27,685	38,895	54,950
1997–98	33,855	36,020	50,950
1998–99[4]	51,255	26,525	74,405
1999–2000[4]	76,115	51,445	98,365

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the arrangements are for assessing the suitability of individual retail outlets for receiving vouchers allocated to asylum seekers; what criteria are applied in the assessment; and what monitoring arrangements are in place. [125119]

Mrs. Roche: The retail outlets have been selected to provide a wide range of retail opportunities to asylum seekers. In excess of 19,000 outlets are signed up to the voucher scheme. Sodexho is responsible for the maintenance of this retail network. The National Asylum Support Service monitors the growth of the retail network in terms of overall numbers, geographical spread, and retail mix.

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are applied in assessing the suitability of (a) contractors and (b) accommodation in relation to the Government's dispersal policy for asylum seekers; and what weight is given in that assessment to factors concerning management arrangements and care of the asylum seekers. [125117]

Mrs. Roche: Independent property surveyors were appointed to inspect property proposed by all potential providers prior to contract. An ongoing programme of inspection is in place for all providers to ensure providers maintain acceptable standards.

Potential providers were assessed in terms of their financial standing, nature of accommodation offered, commercial offer and support infrastructure. This process included seeking references from past and present customers and consultation with Local Authority Consortia.

The assessment model for assessing the suitability of contractors includes management arrangements and care of asylum seekers. I am unable to give further details since this information could prejudice negotiations with additional accommodation providers.

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) failed asylum seekers and (b) others have been (i) deported and (ii) removed to Zimbabwe in each month since May 1999. [125124]

Mrs. Roche: The requested information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Firearms Legislation

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he has issued to police forces since 1 May 1997 with regard to the implementation and enforcement of firearms legislation; if the guidance suggested a reduction in approval or renewal of firearm licences or shotgun certificates; and if he will place copies in the Library. [125799]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Since 1 May 1997, the Home Office has issued three circulars on firearms licensing matters to all police forces in England and Wales: Home Office Circular (HOC) 32/97 on the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997, HOC 68/97 on the Firearms (Amendment) (No. 2) Act 1997 and HOC 41/98 on the Firearms Rules 1998. In addition, a letter to all chief officers on 19 October 1999 provided guidance on fittedness to possess firearms and a letter to all chief officers of 10 March 2000 provided guidance on the secure storage of firearms.

The Home Office has not suggested to chief officers that the number of firearm and shotgun certificates on issue should be reduced as a matter of policy. Home Office guidance on firearms licensing has always made clear that each case should be dealt with on its own merits. The aim of our controls on firearms is to protect public safety rather than to reduce the overall number of firearms in lawful hands.

Copies of the three Home Office circulars were placed in the Library at the time of their issue. I will arrange for copies of the guidance on security and the guidance on fittedness to be placed in the Library.

Correspondence

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the letters from the hon. Member for Broxbourne dated 21 February, 13 April, 11 May and 8 June in connection with Mr. Doug Eve of Cheshunt, a constituent. [125798]

Mrs. Roche: I will be responding to the letters of 21 February, 13 April and 11 May from the hon. Member shortly. I am sorry for the delay in replying. I will reply to the letter of 8 June as soon as I receive it.

Horse Racing

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will initiate a review of the procedures which were implemented on 22 May for calculating starting prices in horse racing. [125638]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Whether, and if so how, the calculation of starting prices should be regulated is an issue which is within the terms of reference of the independent review of gambling chaired by Sir Alan Budd, whose report we expect next summer.

Lord Archer

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated (a) number of person hours and (b) cost to date of the Metropolitan police investigation in to the allegation of perjury made against Lord Archer of Weston-super-Mare. [125313]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand from the Metropolitan police that to date, an estimated 1,446 person hours have been devoted to the investigation and that the cost is approximately £36,000. Most of the work has been undertaken by police officers and civilian staff in normal duty time.

Police Helicopters

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 5 June 2000, Official Report, column 159W, on police helicopters, what the helicopter supplied by Veritair Ltd. is used for in addition to tracking stolen cars. [125431]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The helicopter is used to support officers on the ground in a range of policing activities, including vehicle pursuits; searching for suspects; missing person searches; surveillance; public order; command and control; and to provide direct support for tactical operations.

Software Language

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what software language is used in the new Central Immigration and Nationality Directorate computerisation; and if it is programmed as a totally integrated national database. [125541]

Mrs. Roche: The new computerised system for dealing with immigration and nationality casework uses a number of standard applications and programmes. The system uses Microsoft NT and Office products.

Government Technical Assistance Centre

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the work and objectives of the Government Technical Assistance Centre. [125667]

Mr. Charles Clarke: When established, the Technical Assistance Centre will be a twenty-four hour facility. Our intention is that it shall be operated by the National Criminal Intelligence Service on behalf of the law enforcement, security and intelligence agencies. It will undertake complex processing needed to derive intelligible material from lawfully intercepted computer-to-computer communications and will provide improved facilities for deriving evidence from lawfully seized computer data.

The Technical Assistance Centre will not analyse the intelligible content of any intercepted or seized material. That will remain a function of the agency which applied for the interception warrant or executed the warrant for seizure of the material.

The primary objective of the Technical Assistance Centre will be to sustain law enforcement capabilities in the face of criminal use of new information and communication technologies. Day-to-day operating procedures for the Centre are being developed by a Home Office-led Project Team.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members' Lockers

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee for what reason hon. Members' lockers are being refurbished and renumbered; what is the cost of the work; and if he will make a statement. [125739]

Sir Sydney Chapman: This is a matter for the Serjeant at Arms; I have asked him to write to the hon. Member.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agricultural Wages

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of Agricultural Wages Board rates of pay in tackling social exclusion in rural areas. [125198]

Ms Quin [holding answer 12 June 2000]: We have made no specific assessment of the effect of the Agricultural Wages Board rates of pay in tackling social exclusion in rural areas.

Bovine TB

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects a prophylactic bovine TB treatment to be available. [125176]

Ms Quin [holding answer 9 June 2000]: This work is taking place in an international context at the frontiers of scientific knowledge and could take between 10 and 15 years to complete. As with any such scientific endeavour at such an early stage, there is no guarantee of success.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she will reply to the question tabled by the hon. Member for Leyton on 1 March concerning her Department's budget (ref 113063). [125670]

Mr. Foulkes: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given on 9 June 2000, Official Report, column 409W.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Appointments Commission

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Council, pursuant to her reply of 2 February 2000, Official Report, column 633W, on the Appointments Commission, how much time was spent by PricewaterhouseCoopers in helping to recruit the Appointments Commission. [125361]

Mrs. Beckett: PricewaterhouseCoopers Executive Search and Selection assisted the Cabinet Office and independent selection panel to recruit the Chairman and independent members of the House of Lords Appointments Commission.

They employed a number of consultants and administrators and invested well in excess of 300 hours in the generation, administration and evaluation of applications.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Council, pursuant to her reply of 2 February 2000, Official Report, column 633W, on the Appointments Commission, what expenses were incurred in recruiting the Appointments Commission and what were the advertising costs. [125362]

Mrs. Beckett: The expenses incurred in the process of recruiting members of the House of Lords Appointments Commission came to £4,186.50.

The advertising costs, including VAT, were £35,878.63.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Solicitor-General what was the total expenditure by the Crown Prosecution Service in each of the last five years; what is the planned total expenditure for the current year and subsequent two years; what is the total and percentage real terms change in each year; and if he will make a statement. [125311]

The Solicitor-General: The total expenditure by the Crown Prosecution Service in cash terms in each of the last five years; the planned total expenditure for the current and subsequent year; and the total and percentage real terms change in each year are as follows.

Year	Total expenditure £000	Total real terms change £000	Percentage real terms change
1995–96	315,083	—	—
1996–97	319,823	–5,745	1.7
1997–98	320,602	–8,398	2.5
1998–99	328,347	–2,792	–0.8
1999–2000	331,493	–4,939	–1.5
2000–01	350,530	11,048	3.4
2001–02	336,930	–20,817	–6.2

The increase in total planned expenditure in 2000–01 includes, for example, an additional £9 million from the Capital Modernisation Fund to fund new investment in information technology. Planned total expenditure is available for one subsequent year only. The expenditure plan for 2001–02 is subject to the outcome of the current spending review, which will also set the expenditure for 2002–03.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Solicitor-General how many contested cases were conducted by the Crown Prosecution Service in (a) magistrates courts and (b) Crown courts and (c) in total, in each of the last five years and in the current year to date; and if he will make a statement. [125312]

The Solicitor-General: The following table shows the number of contested hearings recorded by the Crown Prosecution Service in magistrates courts, in the Crown court, and in total, for each of the last five calendar years and for the period January to March 2000.

The table also shows the number of guilty pleas recorded in each period, and the number of magistrates courts cases which were proved in the absence of the defendant. Also shown are the proportion of cases which proceeded to a contested hearing and the proportion dealt with by way of guilty plea and proof in absence.

The overall number of contested hearings dealt with by the Crown Prosecution Service has fallen over the period under review, from 105,707 in 1995 to 82,355 in 1999—a fall of 22.1 per cent. However, the pattern of change in magistrates courts and in the Crown court has been rather different: the proportion of contests in magistrates courts has fallen with each succeeding year, from 9.2 per cent. in 1995 to 6.2 per cent. in 1999; and the proportion of contests in the Crown court has risen over recent years, from 22.8 per cent. in 1997 to 26.9 per cent. in 1999.

The reasons for these trends are believed to be as follows:

There has been an increase in the number of magistrates courts cases proved in the absence of the defendant rather than proceeding to a contest, from 92,251 in 1995 to 114,880 in 1999: an increase of 24.5 per cent. Proofs in absence have increased since 1995 largely in response to a simplified procedure for prosecuting minor road traffic offences;

The Plea Before Venue procedure, introduced in November 1997, has led to an increasing number of guilty pleas being entered in magistrates courts rather than in the Crown court. This has had the effect of lowering the proportion of contests in magistrates courts and increasing it in the Crown court.

[1] January to March

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Railways

16. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has met the Director General of the Association of Train Operating Companies to discuss the future of the railways. [124005]

Mr. Hill: I last met the Director General of ATOC on 1 November 1999 when among other topics, we discussed the Transport Bill, railway performance and railway safety. Officials from my Department have met with ATOC to discuss train operator's concerns about station leases, and to explore the extent to which the existing regulatory provision can safeguard against the public interest.

Housing

17. Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent representations he has received concerning the construction of new houses on greenfield land and the green belt. [124006]

Mr. Raynsford: The Secretary of State has received a number of representations in the context of various reviews of regional planning guidance currently under way and in exercise of his other statutory planning functions. Most recently, I met the leaders of local authorities with strategic planning functions in the South East. I emphasised the Government's commitment to re-use brownfield land and existing buildings before building on greenfields.

Croydon Tramlink

18. Mr. Geraint Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received about the extension of the Croydon tramlink and its linkage to the London underground. [124007]

Mr. Hill: I understand that London Transport are conducting a study into the extension of Croydon tramlink to other areas and its interchange with other forms of public transport including the London underground. Ultimately, it will be for the Mayor to decide if any such extensions and linkages should be taken forward.

Railway Lines

20. Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what Government support is available to industry to reopen disused railway lines to reduce the number of journeys by heavy lorries. [124009]

Mr. Hill: Support is available through my Department to assist companies in moving goods from road to rail where payment is justified by the environmental benefits.

A capital grant is available towards the cost of new or refurbished freight facilities, which might in principle include the reopening of disused railway lines.

Pensioner Transport Concessions

21. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions are taking place between his Department and transport undertakers on concessionary transport for pensioners. [124010]

Mr. Hill: This has been one of the topics discussed at meetings between the bus industry and my Department which take place from time to time.

Traffic Reduction Policy

22. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the progress of the Government's traffic reduction policy. [124011]

Mr. Hill: As we set out in "Tackling Congestion and Pollution", published in January, our policies focus on improving the outcomes that matter to people, such as congestion, pollution and road safety, rather than national traffic volume figures. The Transport Bill currently before Parliament, and the 10-year plan we will be publishing this summer, demonstrate our commitment to put in place the policies and resources that are needed.

Waste Incineration

23. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received concerning the waste incineration directive. [124012]

Mr. Meacher: Representations on a range of different aspects of the proposed Directive have been received from various environmental and rural organisations, industry representatives and individuals. As the hon. Member may be aware, recent interest has been focused on the implications of the proposal for operators of small-scale animal carcase incinerators.

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the number of UK incinerators that fail to meet the terms of the EU Waste Incineration Directive. [125305]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 9 June 2000]: The proposed waste incineration directive, the precise scope of which is yet to be finalised, requires upgrading of incineration plant to the specified standards within five years of its adoption. The consultants Entec UK Ltd. undertook a cost-benefit analysis of the proposed directive to underpin a regulatory and environmental impact assessment, and their report (copies of which are in the House Library) largely identified numbers of incinerators in different sectors, although subsequently we have received information that the report significantly underestimated the number of animal carcase incinerators. The National Farmers Union have suggested there are some 3,000 on-farm small scale animal carcase incinerators.

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the organisations he has consulted over the EU Waste Incineration Directive. [125329]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 9 June 2000]: Copies of the various drafts of the proposed directive and the cost-benefit analyses DETR commissioned from Entec UK Ltd. were distributed as they arose to the trade representative organisations listed over the period since 1994, as well as to relevant Government Departments and environmental organisations. Trade representative organisations were also invited to meetings with DETR on the following dates: 27 April 1994, 25 September 1997 and 6 October 1998.

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effect of the EU Waste Incineration Directive on the disposal of animal carcases in the UK; and if he will make a statement. [125306]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 9 June 2000]: No assessment has been made of the effect of the proposed waste incineration directive on options for disposing of animal carcases in the UK. The Waste Strategy 2000, published on 25 May, indicates that wastes should be managed in accordance with the Best Practicable Environmental Option, and should be disposed of as close to the point of production as possible, consistent with the need for effective environmental controls.

Congestion Taxes (London)

24. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the introduction of congestion taxes and car bans in London. [124013]

38. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the introduction of congestion taxes and car bans in London. [124027]

Mr. Hill: This is a matter for the Mayor of London.

Traffic Congestion

25. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if it is his policy to support the approval of ring roads as a means of reducing traffic congestion and pollution. [124014]

Mr. Hill: Our policy is to support road schemes if, after consideration of alternative options and full appraisal, it is concluded they provide sustainable solutions to transport problems and should be accorded priority having regard to available resources. In the case of local roads it is for authorities to justify road schemes as part of their Local Transport Plans.

Waste Disposal (Worcestershire)

26. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the level of fly-tipping and other illegal waste disposal in Worcestershire; and if he will make a statement. [124015]

Mr. Mullin: None. There are strict controls in place to ensure that waste is disposed of without danger to the public or the environment. The responsibility for their enforcement rests with the Environment Agency and, in some circumstances, with local authorities as waste collection authorities and planning authorities.

The Environment Agency is investigating allegations of illegal waste disposal in Worcestershire in co-operation with Worcestershire County Council, Wychavon District Council and, because of the nature of the allegations, the West Mercia Police. The allegations concern activities at Mucknell Farm, Badgers Hill, Crabbe Yard and other locations in central Worcestershire. The purpose of the Environment Agency's investigation is to establish whether the waste management controls of Part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 have been contravened and, if there is evidence of contravention, action will be taken in line with the Agency's published Enforcement Policy.

Parish Council Names

27. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received from parish councils concerning cyber-squatting of parish council names. [124016]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I am not aware of any representations on cyber-squatting of parish council names. UK Governmental bodies, including parish councils, are entitled to set up websites using the ".gov.uk" suffix, making it clear that the site is an official part of Government.

Household Waste

28. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his target for recycling household waste. [124017]

Mr. Mullin: The Government's waste strategy sets ambitious targets for increasing recycling of household waste—doubling recycling in three years, and nearly trebling it in five. This is a substantial step forward, which will require authorities to provide householders with doorstep recycling services.

Housebuilding Targets

29. Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to issue new regional planning guidance on housebuilding targets. [124018]

31. Mr. Grieve: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the proposed regional planning guidance on new housebuilding targets. [124020]

Mr. Raynsford: The timetable for the production of new Regional Planning Guidance (RPG) is set out in the table. RPG includes guidance on the future level of provision of housing, which may be provided either through new build or conversion of existing buildings.

Region	Draft RPG advice from Regional Planning Body to Secretary of State	Public Examination	Target for issue of revised RPG by Secretary of State
Eastern (RPG6)	August 1998	February 1999	Summer/autumn 2000
North East (RPG1)	December 1999	'June/July 2000	Spring/summer 2001
East Midlands (RPG8)	November 1999	'June 2000	Summer 2001
South East (RPG9)	December 1998	May 1999	Autumn 2000
South West (RPG10)	August 1999	March/April 2000	Winter 2000/01
West Midlands (RPG11)	'End 2001	'Early 2002	Autumn 2002
Yorkshire and the Humber (RPG12)	November 1999	'June/July 2000	Spring/summer 2001
North West (RPG13)	'June/July 2000	'February 2001	Winter 2001

' Target

Notes:

1. The entry against Eastern Region is for RPG6 covering East Anglia. Draft RPG in this case was issued for consultation by the Government Office.
2. The review of RPG9 covers London, the Government Office area for the South East and Bedfordshire, Essex and Hertfordshire.
3. In London the GLA will produce a statutory spatial development strategy (SDS) instead of non-statutory Regional Planning Guidance. Hence there is no separate entry for London.

Telecommunications Masts

30. Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on planning controls on mobile phone masts. [124019]

Mr. Raynsford: In its response to the report of the Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones, issued on 11 May 2000, the Government said that they were minded to introduce a requirement for an application for full planning permission for all new telecommunications masts, but would need to consult widely before doing so, including on the principle and precise scope of any new arrangements. We shall issue a consultation paper on this and related guidance as soon as practicable.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of the announcement of a review of planning policy with respect to telecommunications masts on the number of new planning applications to build such masts. [125888]

Ms Beverley Hughes: In their response to the report of the Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones, issued on 11 May 2000 and placed in the Libraries of both Houses, the Government said that they were minded to introduce a requirement for an application for full planning permission for all new telecommunications masts, but would need to consult widely before doing so, including on the principle and precise scope of any new arrangements.

We have made no assessment of the impact of the response on the number of applications to build telecommunications masts. In considering applications, local planning authorities should continue on the basis of current legislative arrangements and policy guidance.

New Deal for Communities

32. Mr. Woodward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on progress in ensuring that the needs of ethnic minorities are recognised in the New Deal for Communities. [124021]

Ms Armstrong: We assess all New Deal for Communities proposals for evidence of their capacity to work with, and involve, people from ethnic minorities. To help partnerships achieve this objective, we have issued specific race equality guidance, developed by a steering group of experienced practitioners. We will monitor progress at our annual reviews with partnerships.

Neighbourhood Renewal

33. Ms Blears: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what responses he has received to the consultation on the national strategy for neighbourhood renewal. [124022]

Ms Armstrong: Consultation on the National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal continues until 30 June. Later in the year, the Social Exclusion Unit will make known the number of responses and the main issues raised.

Road Charging (Motorways)

34. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on plans for road charging on motorways. [124023]

Mr. Hill: We have no current plans to introduce widespread charging on the motorway network. The Transport Bill contains tightly defined powers to charge on limited parts of the trunk road network (which includes most motorways). These are on tunnels and bridges of at least 600 m, or in order to support a local authority charging scheme (and then only at the request of the charging authority). We have no plans to charge on bridges and tunnels that are currently free from tolls.

Brownfield Sites

35. Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what further proposals he plans to bring forward for the use of brownfield sites in rural areas. [124024]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Planning Policy Guidance note 3: Housing, sets out the Government's policy for maximising the re-use of previously-developed land for housing. It requires local planning authorities to make sufficient land available either within or adjoining villages to meet the needs of local people.

Directly Elected Mayors

36. Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the benefits of directly elected mayors. [124025]

Ms Beverley Hughes: There is considerable international experience of the benefits which directly elected mayors can bring for local communities.

The Local Government Bill [HL] will give local people the choice of three broad frameworks for effective, dynamic and accountable leadership, including the option of a directly elected mayor.

Local Government

37. Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the planned Cabinet-style operation of local government. [124026]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The proposals in the Local Government Bill [HL] will introduce three broad frameworks for new constitutions for councils (including a mayor and cabinet and leader and cabinet framework) which will increase the efficiency, transparency and accountability of council decision making. Councils will have to consult their local community about how, within these broad frameworks, they wish to be governed in the future. Where local people express a preference for an elected mayor to lead their community, the council will first have to put this option to them in a referendum.

Flaxmill Project

39. Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on funding for the Flaxmill project in Shrewsbury. [124028]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I understand the Flaxmill project is the restoration of an old iron frame building in Shrewsbury. It has received an approval for a grant from Advantage West Midlands (AWM) towards this restoration, to be given when funds are available.

Light Rail Services

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on funding for light rail services. [123990]

Mr. Raynsford: Light rail and similar rapid transit systems can have a role to play in delivering integrated transport in major conurbations, particularly in densely used transport corridors. Government funds can be provided to authorities for such systems where these deliver net benefits that are greater than those offered by the available alternatives; cannot be entirely funded from local sources or the private sector; provide good value for money and are essential to the achievement of the objectives of the relevant authority's local transport plan.

Air Service Agreements

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on progress in the bilateral negotiations with the United States of America on air service agreements for transatlantic routes. [123999]

Mr. Mullin: The latest round of UK/US talks, aimed at liberalising our bilateral aviation relations, resumed today. I expect further rounds of talks during the course of this year and it would be premature, at this early stage, to anticipate any agreements which may eventually be reached.

Rail Safety

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to improve safety at railway stations. [124008]

Mr. Hill: We are continuing to work with the rail industry, the British Transport Police and others to improve safety at railway stations. For example, we are seeking further accreditations under the Secure Stations Scheme that we introduced in April 1998, which is designed to improve and standardise good security practices at all overground and underground stations.

I very recently met my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department to explore further joint initiatives on the rail safety and security.

My Department is also taking a close interest in the current North-West pilot scheme aimed at improving security in the whole public transport journey: walking, bus/rail interchange, as well as security at stations and on trains.

Runways (South-East)

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Government expect the South East Regional Airports study into runway capacity in the South-East to report. [125122]

Mr. Mullin: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 6 June 2000, Official Report, column 203W.

Airworthiness Certificates

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the (CAA) (a) requires manufacturers and operators to provide complete checklists, including emergency checklists, before granting an airworthiness certificate and (b) considers full authority digital engine control systems as flight safety critical. [125301]

Mr. Mullin: The CAA requires routine and emergency checklists to be provided by the manufacturers before a certificate of airworthiness is granted. These are included in the aircraft flight manual. Operators also have to produce emergency checklists but this is not related to the issue of the Certificate of Airworthiness.

The CAA considers full authority digital engine control systems with no manual back up systems to be flight safety critical. The process of certification ensures that the level of design assurance applied to the digital software of such systems is in proportion to the level of criticality.

Small Farm Incinerators

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the number of small farm incinerators in each EU member state. [125166]

Mr. Hill: No such assessment has been made. We understand, however, that the practice of small-scale animal carcase incineration is less widespread in other member states than in the UK.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the dangers to human health posed by small farm incinerators. [125165]

Mr. Hill: The study undertaken on behalf of the Department by the consultants Entec UK Ltd. (copies of which are in the House Library) to underpin a regulatory and environmental impact assessment of the proposed waste incineration Directive considered the health impacts of incineration processes generally (section 1.4) and the health benefits of the proposal in respect of animal carcase incinerators of different capacities (Appendix 1.5.4). The report, however, significantly underestimated the number of small-scale animal carcase incinerators, of which there are some 3,000 operating, and health benefits are accordingly underestimated.

Marine Surveyors

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 430W, on marine surveyors, what plans he has to ensure that practising marine surveyors operating in the private sector are professionally qualified and covered by professional indemnity insurance. [125136]

Mr. Hill: There are no plans to ensure that practising marine surveyors operating in the private sector are professionally qualified and covered by professional indemnity insurance.

Private sector surveyors acting on the MCA's behalf must hold professional qualifications equivalent to the MCA's own surveyors. Certifying authority surveyors carry professional indemnity insurance as a contractual requirement. A classification Society's liability to the MCA is unlimited in the case of wilful omission, in the case of negligence it is limited to £500,000. These levels of liability are currently under review.

Aircraft Safety (Mobile Phones)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what tests have been undertaken on the level of interference by mobile telephones on the safety of aircraft; what tests are planned on the effect of such telephones on aircraft safety; what guidance his Department has given to airlines about the use of mobile phones and lap top computers on (a) landing and

(b) taking-off; and when a system of checking that all such equipment is detected and switched off before aircraft are boarded will be introduced. [125669]

Mr. Mullin: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer of 8 June 2000, Official Report, column 312W. In addition to the blanket prohibition on the use of mobile phones on aircraft, the Civil Aviation Authority also require lap top computers and similar electronic equipment to be switched off during landing and take-off.

The CAA is also promoting the evaluation by the airlines of on-board detection equipment, and if its use proves effective will propose its introduction to the Joint Aviation Authorities.

Bicycle Lanes (Central London)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) when he last met representatives of Chelsea and Kensington Borough Council to discuss increasing the number of bicycle lanes in central London; [124849]

(2) when he last met representatives of Islington Borough Council to discuss increasing the number of bicycle lanes in central London; [124850]

(3) when he last met representatives of Camden Borough Council to discuss increasing the number of bicycle lanes in central London; [124851]

(4) when he last met representatives of Hammersmith and Fulham Borough Council to discuss increasing the number of bicycle lanes in central London; [124852]

(5) when he last met representatives of Westminster Borough Council to discuss increasing the number of bicycle lanes in central London; [124853]

(6) when he last met representatives of the Greater London Assembly to discuss increasing the number of bicycle lanes in central London; [124854]

(7) when he last met representatives of the City of London Corporation and Council to discuss increasing the number of bicycle lanes in central London; [124855]

(8) when he last met representatives of Southwark Borough Council to discuss increasing the number of bicycle lanes in central London; [124856]

(9) when he last met representatives of Lambeth Borough Council to discuss increasing the number of bicycle lanes in central London; [124857]

(10) when he last met representatives of Hackney Borough Council to discuss increasing the number of bicycle lanes in central London. [124858]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 9 June 2000]: We have not met recently with representatives of the individual inner London local authorities or members of the Greater London Assembly to discuss bicycle lanes. However, all London local authorities have been given additional support, as part of the Local Transport Capital Expenditure Settlement for 2000–01, for advancing the 2,900km London Cycle Network.

Copies of the London Cycle Network map have been placed in the Library.

Parliament Square

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent representations he has received about safety for (a) pedestrians and (b) cyclists in Parliament Square. [124859]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 9 June 2000]: The safety of pedestrians and cyclists in Parliament Square received extensive consideration as part of the "World Squares for All" Masterplan. We look forward to the implementation of the Masterplan proposals.

Bicycle Parking Facilities

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he provides external bicycle parking facilities for visiting members of the public at his departmental sites. [124860]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 9 June 2000]: The facilities available for cyclists vary between our 1,250 plus sites but visitor parking provision is made at our three headquarters sites in London and at most of our buildings outside London. In some instances, where no facilities are provided, there are plans to rectify this situation.

Bicycle Use

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each year since 1990 the number of (a) people using bicycles, (b) miles cycled and (c) journeys made by bicycle. [124862]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 9 June 2000]: The available information for Great Britain, from the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions' National Travel Survey, is shown in the table:

	1990–92	1993–95	1996–98
Percentage of households with at least one cycle	36	38	40
Stages per person per year[1]	20	18	17
Miles per person per year[1]	41	37	38

[1] The figures for journeys and miles per person per year are averages over all people in the survey

Further information is given in the Transport Statistics Report "Cycling in Great Britain" available from the House of Commons Library.

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made towards achieving the National Cycling Strategy's objective of doubling the proportion of journeys made by bicycle by 2002. [124863]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 9 June 2000]: We have endorsed the targets set by the National Cycling Strategy when it was launched in 1996, i.e. to double the number of cycle trips (based on 1996 figures) by 2002 and to double it again by 2012.

However, we now recognise that it is unlikely that the 2002 target will be achieved. It has become apparent that more preparation was needed than was originally anticipated in 1996. But with the increased provision of infrastructure and other measures by local authorities, following the introduction of Local Transport Plans and the Launch of the Road Safety Strategy, we are confident of achieving the target of a fourfold increase in the number of cycle trips by 2012.

London Buses

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the increase in journey times resulting from the replacing of two-person crews with one-person crews on central London bus routes in the last five years. [125607]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 12 June 2000]: This is a matter for London Bus Services Ltd. (LBSL), formerly London Transport Buses, as the organisation responsible for providing bus services in London.

LBSL have estimated that replacing open platform, crew-operated buses with one person operated vehicles increases journey times by between 12 per cent. and 20 per cent. The smallest increases in journey time are achieved on the latest generation of fully accessible low-floor buses, which have wide 'easy flow' entrances.

Gas Safety

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Health and Safety Executive started its investigation into gas safety due to be reported this summer. [124873]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The Health and Safety Executive, on behalf of the Health and Safety Commission, started work on a fundamental review of the health and safety regime for the installation and use of gas at the end of 1998. A Discussion Document was published on 4 November 1999 with a formal consultation period to 4 February 2000.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment his Department has made of the use of excess gas flow valves in housing in the USA. [124875]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 12 June 2000]: No assessment has been made.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the cost of installing excess gas flow valves in all local authority housing in England. [124871]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 12 June 2000]: No estimate has been made.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what safeguards exist to protect public sector housing against excess gas flow arising from (a) vandalism, (b) accident and (c) carelessness. [124874]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 12 June 2000]: Legislation covering the installation and use of gas requires that all gas fittings are properly supported and so placed or protected as to avoid any undue risk of damage to the fitting due to (a) vandalism, (b) accident and (c) carelessness.

DVLA (Lost Passports)

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many passports submitted with driving licence applications have been lost by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency in the last three years; and how much compensation has been paid by the DVLA in relation to this. [125454]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 12 June 2000]: Since April 1999, when customers had to provide original identity documents with their photocard driving licence applications, the DVLA has reimbursed the replacement cost of 682 identity documents, of which 417 were passports, at a total cost of £17,000.

Of these cases Royal Mail accepted Responsibility for the loss of 487 documents and have reimbursed DVLA accordingly. In this same period DVLA has issued over 4 million photocard licences.

Diabetic Pilots

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the implications of the ruling by the Canadian Federal Government allowing the restoration of pilots' licences to pilots diagnosed with diabetes. [125711]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The international standards for pilots' licences established by the International Civil Aviation Organisation do not permit individuals with insulin dependent diabetes to hold a pilot's licence. Under the terms of the Chicago Convention, any licence which has not been issued in accordance with ICAO standards must be endorsed to that effect and may be used in other states only with the permission of the state concerned. The CAA will not grant permission for any pilot with insulin dependent diabetes to operate in UK airspace.

Park Homes Working Party

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the report of the Park Homes Working Party will be available; and if he will make a statement. [125868]

Mr. Mullin: My Department will publish the recommendations of the Park Homes Working Party in July this year, with a deadline of 31 October for any comments interested individuals and bodies may wish to make. We will announce our conclusions in due course after that date.

Our Lady of Perpetual Help, Middlesbrough

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what decision he has taken concerning a possible second inquiry into the future of Our Lady of Perpetual Help, St. Hilda's, Middlesbrough. [125871]

Ms Beverley Hughes: None. The listed building consent applications to demolish the former Middlesbrough Cathedral, now known as the Church of Our Lady of Perpetual Help, and its former Presbytery, were called in by the Secretary of State on 13 April. Following a major fire on 30 May, the church building is beyond reasonable hope of being repaired and is to be demolished on grounds of public safety. The Secretary of State therefore on 7 June withdrew his direction to call in the application to demolish the church building. The adjacent presbytery survived the fire reasonably intact and remains called in. The public local inquiry will now be held into finding possible alternative uses for the presbytery building only. The length of the inquiry will therefore be shorter than was originally proposed for the joint inquiry into both buildings.

Aircraft (Organophosphates)

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 14 December 1999, Official Report, column 103W, if his review of incidents involving possible organophosphate air pollution on board civilian aircraft has reached conclusions. [125342]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The investigation of these incidents is still under review. The report will be published following its outcome. I am unable to comment until that stage has been reached.

Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what his policy is on planning protection for areas of outstanding natural beauty; and if he will make a statement. [125979]

Mr. Raynsford: The Government accept the view put by the then Countryside Commission in section 4 of their publication "Protecting our finest landscapes: advice to Government (1998)", that the landscape qualities of National Parks and Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty (AONBs) are equivalent. Conserving and enhancing the beauty of the landscape are objectives for both types of designation. The Government therefore believe that the protection given to both types of area by the land use planning system should also be equivalent.

The Government's planning policies for AONBs are set out in Planning Policy Guidance Note (PPG) 7: "The Countryside—Environmental Quality and Economic and Social Development (Revised February 1997)". PPG7 states that:

> The Government regards National Park Designation as conferring the highest status of protection as far as landscape and scenic beauty are concerned.

This reflects the National Park Authorities' primary objective to conserve and enhance the natural beauty, wildlife and cultural heritage of the Parks. It does not mean that the landscape beauty of AONBs is in any way inferior to that of National Parks. AONBS should therefore share the highest status of protection in relation to landscape and scenic beauty.

In relation to major projects, it is the Government's view that, henceforth, the assessment required in paragraph 4.5 of PPG7 in National Parks should also apply in to proposals for major development in AONBs. Such proposals should be demonstrated to be in the public interest before being allowed to proceed. Consideration of applications should therefore normally include an assessment of:

> (i) the need for the development, in terms of national considerations, and the impact of permitting it or refusing it on the local economy;
> (ii) the cost of and scope for developing elsewhere outside the area or meeting the need for it in some other way;
> (iii) any detrimental effect on the environment and the landscape, and the extent to which that should be moderated.

The guidance in the preceding paragraph therefore replaces the last two sentences of paragraph 4.8 of PPG7.

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will make an announcement about new measures to conserve and enhance areas of outstanding natural beauty; and if he will make a statement. [125980]

Mr. Meacher: I am very pleased to announce today that the Government will shortly bring forward amendments to the Countryside and Rights of Way Bill, as part of a series of measures to safeguard the status of Areas of Outstanding Natural Beauty (AONBs) and provide for their proper protection and management. The amendments will make provision for the creation of Conservation Boards for individual, larger AONBs where this would benefit their cohesive management and where there is local support for such a move. They will also require the adoption of a Management Plan for each AONB.

The Government have already indicated its support for AONBs through increasing the budget available to them, via the Countryside Agency, almost threefold over three years (from £2.1 million in 1998–99 to £5.9 million this year). We will continue to ensure that Government funding is available to work alongside local authorities in managing AONBs in partnership.

Air Traffic Control

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) of 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 266W, on air traffic controllers, if he will make a statement on progress made with achieving a full complement of air traffic controllers at Heathrow. [124403]

Mr. Mullin: Good progress has been made. The full complement of air traffic controllers is now in place at Heathrow.

Singapore Airlines

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will grant Singapore Airlines regulatory approval to operate transatlantic services from London Heathrow to the United States; for how many years this application has been outstanding; and if he will make a statement. [125896]

Mr. Mullin: UK/Singapore air services arrangements already provide routeing rights for airlines of Singapore to operate across the Atlantic from Heathrow to the United States. What they do not provide for, and what Singapore Airlines has been seeking specifically since 1989, are fifth freedom traffic rights for airlines of Singapore across the Atlantic to the US. During recent UK/Singapore air services negotiations, we have said that we would review the case for offering fifth freedom rights once the UK/US market had been liberalised.

Local Government Pensions

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the rights of employees whose jobs have been compulsorily transferred from local government to other service providers as a result of the Local Government Pension Scheme Amendment Regulations. [125746]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Any compulsory transfer of staff, which occurs as part of the delivery of Best Value, involves local authorities having to consider the question of future pension rights as part of their contract specification and subsequent negotiations. The Local Government Pension Scheme (Amendment etc.) Regulations 1999 provide private sector employers, bidding for a contract to deliver local government services, with an option of access to the Local Government Pension Scheme for those staff who transfer under the contract and who remain engaged in the delivery of those services. Alternatively, private sector employers can choose to provide broadly comparable pension arrangements and, within the statutory framework of the Local Government Pension Scheme, can negotiate the fair transfer of the accrued pension rights of the staff involved in the contract who decide not to leave their pension rights in the local authority scheme.

Other transfers which do not come within the prescribed ambit of the Local Government Pension Scheme (Amendment etc.) Regulations 1999 can be dealt with in a similar way so as to ensure that in all cases transferring staff are treated equitably and fairly.

Departmental Running Costs

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals there are to amend his Departmental Expenditure Limit and running costs limit for 2000–01. [126028]

Mr. Prescott: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates for Class III, Votes 1 and 8, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions' Departmental Expenditure Limits for 2000–01 will change as follows.

The DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit will be increased by £22,928,000 from £10,838,414,000 to £10,861,342,000. This increase reflects transfers from other Government Departments of £1,390,000, a transfer of £24,000 from the Invest to Save Budget and a claim on the DEL Reserve of £21,514,000. The changes are set out in greater detail as follows.

(i) The changes for Class III, Vote 1 (Housing, construction, regeneration, regional policy, planning, and countryside and wildlife, England) are as follows: £1,200,000 will be transferred from Class IV, Vote 1 (Home Office administration, police, probation, immigration, and other services, England and Wales) to the New Deal for Communities in respect of the Neighbourhood wardens unit; a transfer of £190,000 from Class I, Vote 1 (Department for Education and Employment: programmes and central services) for the Rough Sleepers Initiative; and a transfer of £24,000 to English Nature for an Invest to Save programme.

(ii) The change for Class III, Vote 8 (Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency) is an increase of £21,514,000 for the implementation of the second phase of the Graduated Vehicle Excise Duty programme

(iii) As a consequence changes to Class III, Vote 8 the DETR gross running cost limit will be increased by £16,372,000 from £684,556,000 to £700,928,000. This is the result of an increase in running costs on Class III, Vote 8 for the Graduated Vehicle Excise Duty programme.

The increase in the DETR Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit will be offset by transfers and by a charge on the DEL Reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Hazardous Wastes

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the United Nations Basel Protocol on Liability and Compensation for damage resulting from transboundary movements of hazardous wastes and their disposal, which opened for signature on 6 March. [126234]

Mr. Meacher: The Basel Liability and Compensation Protocol was concluded on 10 December 1999 at the 5th Conference of the Parties to the Basel Convention, after nearly 10 years of negotiation. It provides for a comprehensive regime for liability and for adequate and prompt compensation for damage resulting from the transboundary movement of hazardous wastes and their disposal.

We shall shortly be consulting widely on the potential implications of the United Kingdom signing and ratifying this Protocol. These views will be taken into account in reaching a decision as to whether the United Kingdom should proceed with signature.

DEFENCE

Munitions Stocks

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what steps have been taken to restore stocks of precision guided and non-precision guided munitions back to pre-operation levels following operation Allied Force; and if he will make a statement; [124207]

(2) what contracts have been placed to replace (a) Paveway II, (b) Paveway III, (c) RBL 755, (d) 1,000 lb bomb, (e) ALARM and (f) TLAM expended during operations in Kosovo, listing in each case the (i) company involved, (ii) estimated date of delivery, (iii) value of the contract and (iv) cost per unit; and if he will make a statement. [124221]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Rather than simply replace all of the weapons used, we have evaluated the need to retain the capability provided by each weapon system and whether replenishment of that weapon represents the most cost effective means of restoring that capability. Where necessary, replacement weapons were ordered both during and immediately after the conflict, with due consideration to previous stockholding and usage rates, to restore an appropriate level of War Reserve.

Since the Kosovo campaign, contracts have been placed for these munitions as follows:

Munition	Company	Approximate value (£ million)	Unit price (£)	Delivery date
Paveway II	Portsmouth Aviation	18	8,000	August 2000
RBL 755	Hunting Engineering Ltd.	7	7,000	August 2000
TLAM	Raytheon	23	1,100,000	—

No further orders are currently required for Paveway III, 1,000 lb bombs or ALARM missiles.

Given TLAM's unique capability, knowledge of its delivery schedule could allow a potential adversary to assess the UK's stock level and operational capability; this information is, therefore, withheld in accordance with Exemption 1 (Defence, Security, and International Relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

RAF Feltwell

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons there are no RAF personnel at RAF Feltwell. [125174]

Mr. Spellar: There is no operational requirement for RAF personnel to be based at RAF Feltwell.

Unmanned Combat Vehicles

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department has to develop unmanned combat vehicles; and if he will make a statement. [125424]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence currently does not have any plans to develop an unmanned land combat vehicle. We are, however, conducting broad research into robotics technologies and remote operation for military vehicles.

Remote control is at present used only for explosive ordnance disposal vehicles but Terrier, the replacement engineer tractor, will be fitted for, but not with, an ability for remote operation; it is likely the Future Engineer Tank will also be so fitted. The possibility of remotely operating armoured vehicles for obstacle and mine clearance roles in Bosnia was examined but not pursued.

Kosovo (Internet)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the infrastructure components he has procured to provide internet access to all military personnel in Kosovo. [125807]

Mr. Spellar: The infrastructure components currently being procured using public funds are routers, a switch, a server, printers and modems, together with the necessary software licences.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when, and with which companies and providers, he contracted the procurement of infrastructure for access to the internet by all military personnel in Kosovo; and what the contractual in-service date is. [125806]

Mr. Spellar: Contracts for infrastructure equipment were placed with Honeywell Controls, DELL Electronics and Tangible Benefit on 7 June. The MOD's Defence Communication Services Agency will provide the communications infrastructure and, to enable the service to be set up rapidly, the Permanent Joint Headquarters will act as the internet service provider. The service is expected to be in place by the end of this month.

Navy E-mail

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) overseas garrisons and (b) Royal Navy ships where all military personnel have access to e-mail services. [125808]

Mr. Spellar: All personnel in the Cyprus and Gibraltar garrisons have access to e-mail services via local providers, as do most personnel in the Falkland Islands.

All Royal Navy ships of frigate size and above are capable of accessing the internet, enabling the ship's company to send and receive e-mail. Minor War Vessels can access the internet when alongside, and are also fitted with the necessary equipment when deployed on operations for a prolonged period.

Communication and Information Services

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on arrangements for the delivery of communication and information services to his Department. [126065]

Mr. Spellar: The Defence Communication Services Agency (DCSA) was established on 1 April 1998 and is responsible for the end-to-end delivery of communication and information services across Defence. The RAF Signals Engineering Establishment (RAFSEE) was formed in 1982 and became a Defence Agency in November 1994. The DCSA, RAFSEE and a number of non-Agency organisations responsible for aspects of the delivery of communication and information services and supporting activities were brought together to form a single Communication and Information Services and Support (CISS) organisation under the Defence Logistics Organisation on 1 April 2000. In order to strengthen the focus of the overall CISS organisation on service delivery and to reinforce the alignment of the DCSA's responsibility, authority and accountability it has been decided to remove Agency status from the RAFSEE organisation and to expand the DCSA to encompass the entire CISS organisation.

The removal of RAFSEE's Agency status and the expansion of the DCSA to encompass the entire CISS organisation are, of themselves, administrative procedures and will not result in any geographical relocation or redundancies for staff.

Special Investigations Branch

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many officers and of what rank comprise the Special Investigations Branch; and what is the annual expenditure of the SIB broken down into relevant headings. [123887]

Mr. Spellar: The Special Investigations Branch (SIB) comprises 25 Officers and 158 soldiers, of the following ranks:

Rank	Total
Lieutenant Colonel	3
Major	12
Captain	10
Warrant Officer Class I	14
Warrant Officer Class II	27
Staff Sergeant	49
Sergeant	68
Total	183

The full cost of operating the SIB does not currently fall to a single, discrete budgetary area. For example, support costs may be satisfied at local level by the military unit with whom the SIB personnel are collocated; and, moreover, such costs are not separately apportioned. To determine the cost of operating the SIB worldwide could not, therefore, be achieved without disproportionate effort.

A provisional estimate of expenditure on the three major SIB units which operate in the United Kingdom, Northern Ireland and Germany, for the present financial year, is detailed in the table.

Expenditure	£
Military pay	7,122,261
Civilian pay[1]	1,020,969
Contracts[2]	32,500
IT[3]	29,989
Lands and buildings[4]	28,000
Travel and subsistence[5]	244,658
Fuel and utilities	60,638
VAT receipts	−33,000
Miscellaneous[6]	423,603
Total	8,929,618

[1] In the UK and NI the SIB's functions are supported by civil servants, and in Germany by Locally Employed personnel
[2] Cleaning; Technical cleaning
[3] Installation and upkeep of both hardware and software
[4] Rents, legal fees, and minor estate improvements
[5] Vehicle hire, detached duty and daily travel
[6] Telephone costs, office supplies and logistical support

Sierra Leone (Malaria)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what precautionary treatment was given to troops deployed to Sierra Leone in respect of malaria before they left the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [125191]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 9 June 2000]: For Sierra Leone the most effective anti-malaria drug is considered to be mefloquine and current policy recommends that treatment begins three weeks before personnel are due in the area of risk. This is to allow time for those who cannot tolerate mefloquine to exhibit adverse reactions and be placed on an alternative regimen: the drug itself starts to take preventative effect within 12 hours. Aircrew are not given mefloquine because of the possible side effects which can degrade concentration and coordination. Aircrew, therefore, take chloroquine and proguanil tablets instead, although these do not offer the same degree of protection in Sierra Leone which is a chloroquine resistant area.

Issuing the Spearhead Battalion permanently with mefloquine, as a preventative measure, is not an option since the drug is only licensed for one year's continuous use; long term treatment with mefloquine is not medically advisable. The great majority of personnel deployed to Sierra Leone began taking anti-malaria tablets prior to embarkation although not for the full three weeks because of the short notice to deploy. However, a small number did not begin the preventative course of treatment and arrived in theatre without anti-malaria tablets. The reasons for this are currently being investigated. This omission was quickly remedied by procuring a French anti-malaria drug which was available locally, and this was subsequently replaced by supplies of the preferred British drug.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what medical advice was given to troops deployed to Sierra Leone concerning malaria; and if he will make a statement. [125189]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 9 June 2000]: All UK forces that deployed to Sierra Leone were advised, in accordance with the Surgeon General's policy, that the preferred anti-malarial drug for ground forces deployed ashore is mefloquine. While most effective, this drug carries a risk of side effects when first taken and, for that reason, personnel carrying out certain operational duties cannot be treated with it. Those forces unable to take mefloquine were advised that the recommended alternative is chloroquine and proguanil. Personnel deployed ashore were also provided with the opportunity to impregnate their uniforms and mosquito nets with mosquito repellent.

South Atlantic Medal

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what length of service was laid down in MOD Command Paper 544/82 for the award of the South Atlantic Medal; and how many medals were awarded to non-military personnel from (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the Falkland Islands, (c) St. Helena and (d) elsewhere. [125594]

Dr. Moonie: Information about the length of service required to qualify for the award of the South Atlantic Medal is contained in Command Paper 8601, which was presented to Parliament in July 1982. A copy of this document is in the Library of the House.

My Department does not hold a definitive list of those civilians who were awarded the South Atlantic Medal, although our records show that the following categories did receive it, with or without a rosette depending on where they served:

South Atlantic Medal with Rosette:

35 Falkland Islands Defence Force

49 UK civilians (includes eight NAAFI personnel)

South Atlantic Medal without Rosette:

15 UK civilians (includes five NAAFI personnel).

The numbers given include those NAAFI personnel who were members of the Expeditionary Forces Institute (EFI), who were enlisted into the Royal Navy or Royal Army Ordnance Corps on short service engagements. It has not been possible to break the figures down further to determine how many NAAFI civilian personnel who were not members of the EFI received the medal, as the relevant NAAFI records no longer exist.

A number of laundrymen working on RN ships also qualified for the medal. It has not been possible to establish whether records still exist detailing the numbers who received the medal, although it is known that of those currently working on RN ships three were recipients of the medal. A number of Royal Fleet Auxiliary personnel also received the medal, but it has not been possible to determine how many.

In addition to the numbers quoted above we are advised by the Registry of Seamen and Shipping that 2,321 Merchant Navy personnel were awarded the medal. It has not been possible to break the information down further to establish their nationality.

As information relating to the award of this medal to non-Service personnel is not held centrally and records are kept by a number of different agencies and organisations, we have been unable to determine how many other civilians might have been awarded this medal.

Sierra Leone (Parachute Regiment)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) on what date the Parachute Regiment was first told to prepare to deploy to Sierra Leone; and if he will make a statement; [125450]

(2) on what date members of the Parachute Regiment who were deployed to Sierra Leone were first given anti-malaria treatment; and if he will make a statement; [125451]

(3) on what date the Parachute Regiment first moved to deploy to Sierra Leone; and if he will make a statement. [125452]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The notice to move for the Spearhead land element, which included the 1st Battalion The Parachute Regiment, was reduced from the usual level of readiness to six hours for the lead element and 24 hours for the main body at 1500 hours on 6 May. All elements started to move later that same day. Anti-malaria treatment commenced also on 6 May, shortly after the notice to move had been reduced.

Recruitment Targets

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effect the introduction of (a) increased telephone time, (b) the increase in leave at the end of operational tours and (c) introduction of e-mail will have on reducing the time the Government will take to achieve its recruitment targets set out in the Strategic Defence Review. [125564]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The doubling of telephone call time to 20 minutes, the introduction of post operational tour leave, and the on-going introduction of e-mail facilities were measures aimed at alleviating pressure on families, and were primarily designed to assist retention. All the measures have proved highly popular since their introduction and it is hoped that they will also have a beneficial, although indirect, effect on recruiting.

Organophosphate Air Pollution (Aircraft)

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his review of incidents involving possible organophosphate air pollution on board aircraft, and their implications for military personnel, has reached conclusions. [125343]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 12 June 2000]: We have no evidence of organophosphate pollution on military aircraft affecting personnel, but we will consider carefully any conclusions from an on-going BAe Systems investigation into an incident involving a civil BAe 146 aircraft last year.

Chinook Disaster

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will undertake that all files held by public bodies relating to the Chinook disaster will be preserved. [125269]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 9 June 2000]: When the original Board of Inquiry papers, written evidence and papers held by the branch with lead responsibility for matters concerning the crash are eventually archived, they will be assigned a review date of 25 years, with a recommendation for permanent retention. At the 25 year point they will be examined for their suitability for transfer to the Public Record Office in accordance with the provision of the Public Records Act 1958 and 1967.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department requires manufacturers to provide complete flight reference cards prior to releasing an aircraft into operational service; if the Chinook Mk2 had a complete set of flight reference cards at the time of the fatal crash of ZD576 in June 1994; and if these included drills covering the possibility of FADEC malfunctions. [125300]

Mr. Spellar: All manufacturers of new Ministry of Defence aircraft are contractually required to provide full aircrew documentation prior to release to operational service. This documentation includes both Aircrew Manual and Flight Reference cards. The Chinook Mk2 had a complete set of Flight Reference Cards in June 1994. This contained all the normal and emergency operating drills in force at that time, including drills for a possible FADEC malfunction.

Joint Helicopter Command

Ms Osborne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will report on the outcome of the study to determine the best location for the new Joint Helicopter Command; and if he will make a statement. [125801]

Mr. Spellar: The Headquarters of the Joint Helicopter Command is based at Headquarters Land Command at Wilton in Wiltshire, and there are no current plans to move it. A team from the Joint Helicopter Command Headquarters is currently at the very early stages of conducting a strategic review to identify the most effective and efficient solution for the basing of Joint Helicopter Command units. The review consists of two phases—a scoping exercise (phase one) and full investment appraisal and review of the estate rationalisation candidates that arise out of the scoping exercise (phase two). Phase one is due to be completed next month, after which it should be possible to give further details of the sites under review. It is too early to say when the comprehensive investment appraisal that will comprise phase two will be completed.

RAF Buchan

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to visit RAF Buchan. [125570]

Mr. Hoon: I have a full programme of visits to Service establishments but have no plans at present to visit RAF Buchan.

Hydrographic Office

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the United Kingdom Hydrographic Office for the financial year 2000–01. [126064]

Dr. Moonie: The key targets set for the United Kingdom Hydrographic Office in 2000–01 are as follows:

Process and promulgate priority safety information within stated time scales from receipt of data.

To achieve 100 per cent. of the endorsed and funded Defence Programme to cost, quality and timeliness targets, in particular short notice operational requirements as defined in Tasking Authorisation Forms (TAFs).

Prepare changes to the Framework Document by October 2000, and agree the principal changes as part of the Quinquennial Review by June 2001.

Achieve efficiency measure of 13.5 per cent. growth in "Value Added" per member of staff (based on FY 1995–96) by 31 March 2001.

Review Pay Policy, and Reward and Performance Management, and implement a new system for the FY 2000–01 pay round.

A Technical Programme, addressing infrastructure and new product development, to be communicated and delivered to time and budget—as set each year.

Break even taking one year with another and achieve an average Return on Capital Employed (ROCE) during the plan period of 7.5 per cent.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when, during the past six months, he, his Ministers or the Chief of Defence Procurement have met the chairman or chief executive of (a) Aerospatiale, (b) BAE Systems, (c) Boeing, (d) Daimler Chrysler Aerospace, (e) General Dynamics, (f) Lockheed Martin, (g) Raytheon and (h) Rolls Royce. [117152]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 3 April 2000]: During the period October 1999 to March 2000, the Secretary of State for Defence, the Ministers for Defence Procurement and the Armed Forces, the Chief of Defence Procurement and I have met the Chairman or Chief Executive of the companies mentioned as follows:

	Secretary of State for Defence	Minister for Defence Procurement	Minister for the Armed Forces	Under-Secretary of State for Defence	Chief of Defence Procurement
(a) Aerospatiale	29 March 2000	22 October 1999	None	22–24 February 2000	6 May 2000
(b) BAE Systems	30 November 1999	23 November 1999	29 March 2000	22–24 February 2000	None
(c) Boeing	None	None	None	None	None
(d) Daimler Chrysler Aerospace	None	None	None	None	13 December 1999
(e) General Dynamics	None	None	None	None	23 March 2000
(f) Lockheed Martin	17 February 2000	None	None	None	None
(g) Raytheon	7 December 1999	None	None	None	None
(h) Rolls Royce	4 March 2000	None	29 March 2000	None	21 December 1999

RNAS Prestwick

Ms Osborne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the cost to his Department of rescinding the lease of the site of RNAS Prestwick (HMS Gannet); and if he will make a statement. [125802]

Dr. Moonie: I will write to my hon. Friend and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Type 45 Destroyers

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the planned in-service date is for the first Type 45 destroyer; and if he will make a statement. [124996]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the armed forces gave him on 2 November 1999, Official Report, column 87W.

Type 42 Destroyers

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to ensure the effectiveness in the air defence role of Type 42 destroyers prior to all Type 45 destroyers entering into service; and if he will make a statement. [124995]

Dr. Moonie: The introduction into service of the Type 45 destroyer equipped with the Principal Anti-Air Missile System will provide the improved naval air defence capability which the Royal Navy will need. In the meantime, we have a programme of enhancements to the Type 42 destroyer and its GWS30 Sea Dart weapon system under way. We will continue to consider what further enhancements may be required while Type 42 destroyers remain in service.

Weapons Systems (Funding)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what additional funding has been made available in (a) this and (b) the previous financial year to restore deficiencies in weapons systems and spares of critical equipment, listing in each case the (i) weapons system or type of spare, (ii) deficiency identified and (iii) estimated date of deficiency rectification. [124220]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The Strategic Defence Review contained a number of specific measures targeted at improving the sustainability of our forces, on which we spent £11.4 million last year and £11.3 million this year on Priming Equipment Packs for Tornado GR1/4 and Harrier GR7 aircraft to enhance their deployability. Other funding has been directed at our medical services as previously announced. Work on weapon systems and spares is an on-going process and affects systems across Defence: a more detailed answer could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Challenger II

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress his Department has made in purchasing track for Challenger II to a new design. [125315]

Dr. Moonie: The Department is shortly to enter a competition phase for the selection of a track which might be taken forward into a trials and assessment phase. Subject to successful trials it is possible that production of new track could begin in 2002 and that there would then be a phased transition over a number of years from old to new track.

Asbestosis

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what compensation is available to former service personnel for work-related asbestosis. [124988]

Mr. Spellar: Compensation arrangements for Service personnel and former Service personnel who suffer illness as a consequence of exposure to asbestos are the same as for those killed or injured or who develop a disease from any other cause attributable to their service. Service personnel were, however, prevented by Section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 from suing for compensation until 15 May 1987 when The Crown Proceedings (Armed Forces) Act 1987 repealed Section 10. Since then Service personnel have, like any other employee, been entitled to sue the Ministry of Defence for compensation where they have suffered as a result of the Department's negligence. The repeal of Section 10 was not made retrospective. The War Pensions Agency pays compensation to former Service personnel for illness caused before the repeal of Section 10, in the form of a war pension and other allowances.

National Missile Defence System

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of (a) the cost and (b) the length of time required to upgrade RAF Fylingdales in the event of a request from the United States for United Kingdom assistance in the deployment of the proposed National Missile Defence System. [125077]

Mr. Hoon: We have not received a request from the US regarding the use of any facilities in the UK as part of the proposed US National Missile Defence system. Nor would we expect one until after a US decision to proceed with deployment of the proposed system. We would consider such a request carefully, taking into account a wide range of factors, including a detailed assessment of the proposed nature and duration of any works requested. The question of financial costs associated with proceeding with deployment of the proposed US National Missile Defence system is first and foremost a matter for the US.

POWs (Japan)

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which Government Departments he is consulting on the issue of a gratuity payment to former prisoners of war held in Japan. [125459]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Department of Social Security and the Department of Health are being consulted.

Statistics

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what statistics relating to the responsibilities of his Department are collated by parliamentary constituency, indicating the dates covered in each case. [123835]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 25 May 2000]: The Ministry of Defence collects a wide range of manning and establishment statistics on a regional basis, not all of which are centrally held. Many of these statistics can be analysed on a constituency basis using Geographic Information Systems. It is therefore not possible to give a meaningful list of statistics collected by parliamentary constituency as this would incur disproportionate cost.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Briefing Documents

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his Department's policy on producing briefing documents giving information about senior businessman, politicians and other public figures in overseas countries; and if he will place in the Library copies of all such documents. [124334]

Mr. Robin Cook [holding answer 8 June 2000]: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office and posts abroad collect a vast amount of information on all subjects, including information about personalities in other countries, in order to provide briefing and assessments for Ministers and officials. Such information is often acquired on a confidential basis and in some cases is subject to statutory restrictions on disclosure. It would not be appropriate, therefore, to make it available as the hon. Member suggests.

British Council

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what work has been done to expand the work and upgrade the facilities of the British Council in Lithuania; and if he will make a statement. [125666]

Mr. Hain: Since opening in refurbished premises in 1992, the British Council offices in Lithuania have been further renovated and developed, and electronic information sources have been installed. The Council intends to ensure its operations remain appropriate and its premises suitably equipped.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what work is being undertaken by the British Council in Kosovo to show films to the local population; what types of film the Council plans to show; what funding has been made available from his Department to support this activity; and if he will make a statement. [125595]

Mr. Hain: The British Council plans to show recent British feature films in the newly opened cinema in Pristina. It will fund a visit by the cinema's manager to the UK to select films and discuss commercial access to UK films. The Council has also negotiated rights to enable Kosovo TV to broadcast a selection of British television programmes during the coming year. The FCO contributed £114,000 to help the Council set up its operation in Kosovo.

India

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on a permanent membership of the United Nations Security Council by India. [125550]

Mr. Hain: We are committed to early enlargement of the permanent and the non-permanent membership of the UN Security Council, including the creation of a new permanent seat for the Asian electorial group. It would be for the Asian group to decide who would occupy any permanent seat allocated to them; no doubt others could have claims too.

Nigeria

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received concerning attacks on the Christian population in Kaduna, Nigeria. [125734]

Mr. Hain: We monitor closely the religious tensions in Kaduna and elsewhere in Nigeria. Following a demonstration against the possible imposition of the Sharia penal code, violent riots broke out in Kaduna in February. Christians and Muslims burned each others' properties, businesses and places of worship. An estimated 500 people, both Christian and Muslim, were killed. The violence spread to southern Nigeria where around 500 people, mostly Muslims, died.

Violence flared up again in Kaduna in May, in which it is reported that about 200 people died. The reason for this outbreak of violence is not clear.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions his Department has had with the President of Nigeria concerning the attacks on Christians in Nigeria. [125733]

Mr. Hain: We are monitoring closely the religious tensions in Nigeria, which have led to the deaths of hundreds of Christians and Muslims. I have expressed my deep concern to the Nigerian authorities. Our High Commission in Abuja is in regular contact with the local and Federal authorities, and with leaders of both communities. We welcome their efforts to diffuse tension and work towards reconciliation.

South Lebanon

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received concerning the whereabouts and welfare of the civilian population who have fled South Lebanon. [125892]

Mr. Hain: Most recent reports indicate that of the 6,000 or so Lebanese (civilians and former SLA) who fled to Israel from southern Lebanon during and after the Israeli withdrawal, about one quarter have already returned to Lebanon. Those that remain in Israel have been housed and given residency for one year initially. They are entitled to work and to benefit from Israeli healthcare.

Egypt

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received regarding the conviction of the Egyptian Christian, Shaiboob William Arsal, to 15 years hard labour. [125890]

Mr. Hain: Shaiboob William Arsal has been sentenced to 15 years hard labour for the murder of two people in 1998. We understand that he is likely to appeal to a higher criminal court.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government are supporting the request of UNHCR to interview the Cuban citizens, Dr. Noris Pena Martinez and Dr. Leonel Cordova Rodriguez, currently held in Zimbabwe; and if he will make a statement. [125803]

Mr. Hain: We understand that the two doctors are in the care of UNHCR who are hoping to relocate them to a third country. We urge the Government of Zimbabwe to abide by its obligations as a signatory to the 1951 Convention on the Status of Refugees.

WALES

Council House Sales

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary concerning the increased release of receipts from council house sales; and if he will make a statement. [125560]

Mr. Paul Murphy [holding answer 12 June 2000]: I meet the First Secretary regularly and discuss a number of issues, including this one.

Both the First Secretary and I are aware that, currently, the only significant requirement for local authorities to set aside receipts for debt redemption relates to capital receipts from the sale of council houses. The Assembly has therefore asked that the issue of whether this position can be improved upon be considered as part of the general review of capital finance regulations being undertaken in conjunction with the Welsh Local Government Association.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Millennium Dome

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to sell the Millennium Dome; and if he will make a statement. [124940]

Janet Anderson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and the Regions gave my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) on 17 January 2000, Official Report, column 255W.

Millennium Projects

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) how much partnership funding has been secured, and how much remains to be secured, for each of the major capital projects funded by the Millennium Commission; [125907]

(2) what the original planned completion date was for each of the Millennium Commission's major capital projects; and what the present expected completion date is in each case; [125905]

(3) how much of the total Lottery grant awarded to the Millennium Commission's major capital projects has been paid in each case. [125906]

Mr. Chris Smith: This is a matter for the Millennium Commission. I will write to the hon. Member in my capacity as Chairman of the Commission, and place copies of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

Royal Armouries Museum, Leeds

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the financial position of the Royal Armouries Museum in Leeds. [125904]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Following re-structuring of the Royal Armouries' relationship with their private sector partner in July last year, I announced on 19 October that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had provided additional grant-in-aid of £1 million per annum to cover the cost of the responsibilities transferred. Since then, the Royal Armouries has managed its expenditure successfully within the additional grant provided. We will continue to work closely with the Royal Armouries on the necessary improvements in management.

NMEC

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what is the average amount of money spent by visitors to the Dome on (a) food and drink and (b) merchandise; and how much in each case is retained by NMEC. [118510]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 10 April 2000]: The average amount of money spent by visitors to the Dome on (a) food and drink and (b) merchandise is just over £3 in both cases. NMEC retains between 20 and 50 per cent., depending on the individual contractual arrangements with suppliers. Where NMEC is the supplier, the percentage depends on its pricing strategy, taking into account value for money and prices in the open market.

TREASURY

VAT (Listed Properties)

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates he has made of the annual cost to the Exchequer of applying a rate of VAT to renovation work on listed properties of (a) 12 per cent., (b) 10 per cent., (c) 7.5 per cent. and (d) 5 per cent. [125909]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs and Excise do not have estimates of the costs of reducing the VAT rate on renovation work on listed buildings because reliable estimates of amounts of VAT which have been paid in the past on such work are not available.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the annual cost is to the Exchequer of zero-rated VAT on alterations to listed buildings. [125908]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs and Excise do not have an estimate of the cost of zero-rated VAT on alterations to listed buildings. This is because reliable estimates of the amount of expenditure on such work are not available.

Credit Unions

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many credit unions operate in the UK; and what links his Department has with them; [125643]

(2) what plans he has to (a) extend the areas from which credit unions can borrow and (b) amend the legislation in respect of credit unions. [125644]

Miss Melanie Johnson: There are currently 860 credit unions in operation in the UK of which 675 are in Great Britain. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment in Northern Ireland is responsible for credit unions in Northern Ireland. The Government announced on 16 November 1999 a package of measures designed to help credit unions to grow, some of which have been included in the Financial Services and Markets Bill. There will be further consultation on extending the areas from which credit unions can borrow.

Expenditure Limits

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes are proposed to the Inland Revenue departmental expenditure limit and running costs limit for 2000–01. [126071]

Dawn Primarolo: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the Supplementary Estimate for Class XVI, Vote 5 the Inland Revenue Departmental Expenditure Limit for 2000–01 will be increased by £147,608,000 from £2,097,763,000 to £2,245,371,000. The Inland Revenue running cost limit will also be increased by £154,608,000 from £2,222,471,000 to £2,377,079,000.

The increase is mainly to cover increased workloads and measures introduced in the Budget and also in respect of some interdepartmental transfers.

The increase will be offset by transfers or charged to the DEL reserve and will not add therefore to the planned total of public expenditure.

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes are proposed to HM Treasury's departmental expenditure limit and running costs limit for 2000–01. [126072]

Dawn Primarolo: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate for Class XVI Vote 1 (HM Treasury), the Departmental Expenditure Limit for 2000–01 will be increased by £26,376,000 from £220,417,000 to £246,793,000.

The increase is the net effect of an increase in other current expenditure of £20,950,000 and capital of £7,450,000, to meet new commitments in respect of the costs associated with the new Partnerships UK, and a decrease in running costs of £1,400,000 to meet the continuing costs in other current expenditure of the Treasury Taskforce, giving a net total increase of £27,000,000 which will be drawn from the Capital Modernisation Fund. The running costs limit for HM Treasury will accordingly be decreased by £1,400,000 from £64,923,000 to £63,523,000.

A reduction included in the Revised Estimate for Class XVI Vote 3, (HM Treasury: Office of Government Commerce) will decrease HM Treasury's DEL by £224,000, and a further reduction due to transferring responsibility for Class XVI Vote 15 (1999–2000), (Repayments to the Contingencies Fund) to Class XVI Vote 7, (Inland Revenue: Payments in Lieu of Tax Relief) will decrease HM Treasury's DEL by £400,000; giving a net increase to HM Treasury's DEL of £26,376,000.

The increases will be offset by transfers and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes are proposed to HM Customs and Excise departmental expenditure limit and running costs limit for 2000–01. [126073]

Dawn Primarolo: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Revised Estimate for Class XVI, Vote 4 (HM Customs and Excise: administration) the Customs and Excise Departmental Expenditure Limit for 2000–01 will be decreased by £2,100,000 from £888,958,000 to £886,858,000. The running costs limit will be decreased by the same amount from £863,057,000 to £860,957,000. The decrease covers a transfer of Invest to Save funds to the Inland Revenue to support the joint Closer Working Programme. There is no overall change to the planned total of public expenditure.

Forms

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123948]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The number of forms that a charity or voluntary organisation is required to complete will depend on the size and nature of the organisation and the purposes for which they need to complete forms.

Public Sector Workers (Home Loans)

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the Housing Green Paper, how, for (a) taxation and (b) national insurance contribution purposes, his Department's revenue bodies would treat preferential loans made by the Government to public sector workers wishing to buy housing in London and the South East of England; and if he will make a statement. [119425]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 17 April 2000]: Under current rules, if a Government Department were to make preferential loans for key workers, whether in the public, private or voluntary sectors, there would be no tax or national insurance charges arising provided that the employees were not directly employed by a Government Department and the loans were neither guaranteed nor facilitated by their employers.

Stakeholder Pensions

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what advice he has received on (a) the costs of full concurrency in stakeholder pensions in tax revenue forgone and (b) changes in administrative costs borne by the Inland Revenue. [115907]

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the revenue implications of allowing for (a) partial concurrency and (b) full concurrency of the proposed new stakeholder pension regime with other existing occupational and personal pension products or schemes; and if he will make a statement. [123721]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Ministers are currently examining this issue.

Windfall Tax

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects the Windfall Tax to have been fully spent on employment programmes; and if he will make a statement. [125397]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Information on the estimated allocation of the Windfall Tax receipts between different programmes, including employment programmes, is set out in Table 4.1 of the Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report published at the time of the 2000 Budget. Future funding plans for employment programmes are being considered as part of the current Spending Review.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer under what circumstances a Working Families Tax Credit award can be amended, once finalised, due to a change in the claimant's circumstances. [125386]

Dawn Primarolo: The circumstances by which a Working Families Tax Credit award can be amended, once finalised, are:

If the applicant in a one-parent family dies, or both the applicant and their partner in a two-parent family dies.

If the family breaks up during an award period and Working Families Tax Credit, Disabled Person's Tax Credit, Income Support or income based Jobseeker's Allowance are awarded to someone else for a child who was included in the original award.

If the only child in the family in a WFTC award is aged 16 or over and leaves full-time non-advanced education.

Ms Buck: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average Working Families Tax Credit payment in each region of the UK for those households making claims in the six months October 1999 to April 2000 (a) in gross terms and (b) net of housing benefit and council tax benefit. [125414]

Dawn Primarolo: The average weekly value of Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) awards made in the six months from October 1999 to the end of March 2000 are estimated to be as follows:

Region	Average weekly value of awards
North East	70.97
North West	73.17
Yorkshire and Humberside	72.59
East Midlands	71.21
West Midlands	73.72
East of England	70.44
London	75.08
South East	70.70
South West	69.81
Wales	71.37
Scotland	70.55
Northern Ireland	76.34
United Kingdom	72.09

Note:
The figures for the regions of England, for Wales and for Scotland are estimates based on a 5 per cent. sample of awards, and are therefore subject to sampling error.

No reliable estimate of the overall effect of WFTC on Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit for families receiving WFTC can yet be made, for the reasons given in my reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on 12 June 2000, Official Report, column 459W.

PRIME MINISTER

Bill of Rights

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Prime Minister if he will assess the benefits of introducing a written constitution and bill of rights. [124914]

The Prime Minister: We have no plans to do so.

Women's Institute Conference

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will place in the Library a copy of the invitation to him as Prime Minister to address the Women's Institute Conference at Wembley. [125725]

The Prime Minister: The invitation to address the Women's Institute was extended verbally.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister if his prepared speech for the Women's Institute Conference included an explicit reference to Clause 28. [125726]

The Prime Minister: No.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will place in the Library a verbatim record of the Downing street media briefings on Tuesday 6 June concerning the Women's Institute speech the following day. [125727]

The Prime Minister: Verbatim records of Downing street media briefings are not routinely kept; however a record of all media briefings can be found on the Downing street website at www.number-10.gov.uk.

Special Advisers

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister what decisions he has reached on Lord Neill's recommendations on Government special advisers; and if he will make a statement. [125729]

The Prime Minister: We intend to present our full response to Parliament before the summer recess.

Vasili Mitrokhin

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Prime Minister when he expects to publish the Intelligence and Security Committee's report into the handling of the information provided by Vasili Mitrokhin; and if he will make a statement. [125947]

The Prime Minister: I have today laid before both Houses of Parliament a copy of the Intelligence and Security Committee's Report into the Security and Intelligence Agencies' handling of the information provided by Mr. Mitrokhin. In consultation with the Committee, a small number of excisions from the original text have been made on grounds of national security. I have also today laid before both Houses of Parliament the Government's Response to the Committee's Report.

The Government are very grateful to the Committee for the Report of its Inquiry. Mr. Mitrokhin's information is uniquely valuable. Its authenticity has been proved beyond doubt. The Government have drawn a number of conclusions from the information itself, from the publication project and from the findings of the Intelligence and Security Committee's Inquiry. The most significant are:

i. The KGB posed a major threat to British interests but the United Kingdom's Security and Intelligence Agencies were notably successful in containing this threat. After the expulsion of more than 100 Soviet intelligence officers in 1971, the KGB found the United Kingdom an extremely difficult target and operational environment.

ii. Mr. Mitrokhin himself is a brave man who was determined in his efforts to expose the KGB. The Government pay tribute to him.

iii. Credit is due to the Secret Intelligence Service for its role in getting Mr. Mitrokhin and his material safely to the United Kingdom. This was a tremendous intelligence coup. Credit is also due to the Security and Intelligence Agencies for their work in exploiting the material. This has been beneficial not only for the UK but also for many other countries.

iv. The publication project, leading to "The Mitrokhin Archive", allowed Mr. Mitrokhin's material to be made available to a wider readership. The Government believe that it was right to put this historic record into the public domain.

v. Lessons have been learned from the handling of Mrs. Norwood's case.

Finally, I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to our intelligence and security agencies for their dedication and professionalism in protectir our vital national interests.

HEALTH

Mead Webber Plant

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when Professor Sir John Krebs was first informed about problems at Mead Webber; by whom; and what action he took. [122067]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that Ms Suzi Leather, the agency's deputy chair, was fully informed of the situation at Mead Webber by the chief executive of the Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) on Saturday 22 April. Ms Suzi Leather and Professor Sir John Krebs, Chairman of the Food Standards Agency, discussed the situation at this plant with the chief executives of the Meat Hygiene Service and the Food Standards Agency over the following week.

The MHS is an executive agency of the Food Standards Agency and the Food Standards Agency holds the Chief Executive of the MHS responsible for the operation and management of the MHS and its staff. Given the concerns expressed about the Mead Webber closure, Professor Sir John Krebs has taken and maintains a close interest in the situation at the plant, and was as a consequence fully informed of the outcome of a meeting which took place on Sunday 30 April between the Chief Executive of the MHS and Dr. Richard North, Food Safety Adviser representing Mead Webber Ltd. At this meeting, it was agreed that, given Mead Webber Ltd.'s concerns:

An independent investigation into the actions of the Meat Hygiene Service at the Mead Webber plant would take place;

The outcome of this independent investigation would be placed in the public domain; and

No Hygiene Assessment System score would be published for the plant for the first month after re-opening, to enable plant management and the Meat Hygiene Service to work constructively together to address any remaining concerns.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what conclusions had been reached by Official Veterinary Surgeons in the five years prior to 10 April on the acceptability of trimming by meat inspectors at the Mead Webber plant. [122060]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that there is no formal record of the conclusions reached by official veterinary surgeons (OVSs) in the five years prior to 10 April 2000 on the acceptability of trimming by meat inspectors at the plant operated by Mead Webber Ltd.

The Meat Hygiene Service's policy and instruction to inspection staff on carcase trimming is detailed in the MHS Operations Manual, Chapter 6, Page 4. It states:

Carcases and offal presented for inspection with evidence of visible contamination must be appropriately trimmed to your satisfaction before application of the health mark. Trimming of contamination is normally a task for premises staff working under your direction. However, you may trim minor contamination provided it does not interfere with the inspection routine. Where this cannot be done on the dressing line the affected carcase or offal must be detained for more detailed attention.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if Mr. Yogaratnam of the Meat Hygiene Service had sole responsibility for the Mead Webber plant; to whom in the MHS he reported; what responsibilities he had in respect of other plants at the time he had responsibility for Mead Webber; and how many other plants he had responsibility for. [122054]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that Mr. Yogaratnam was the official veterinary surgeon (OVS) and principal official veterinary surgeon (POVS) for the Mead Webber plant, and as such had sole responsibility for ensuring its full compliance with public health and animal welfare regulations. While contract OVSs were used to provide locum cover during the times that Mr. Yogaratnam carried out his POVS duties, they reported to Mr. Yogaratnam as the responsible OVS and POVS for the Mead Webber abattoir.

Mr. Yogaratnam reported to his line manager, Mr. Ivor Pumfrey, Meat Hygiene Service Regional Director (Wales). Mr. Yogaratnam's technical line manager was Mr. Peter Soul, MHS Director of Operations.

Mr. Yogaratnam was also OVS and POVS at three licensed cutting premises. Mr. Yogaratnam was POVS for 16 other plants in the area. As a POVS he was responsible for contract performance management of Contract OVSs working in 10 other plants in the area.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reason the faxed communication of 24 April from Mr. Webber of Mead Webber to the chief executive of the Meat Hygiene Service asking for an explanation of the changes in the MHS's trimming policy was not (a) acknowledged and (b) answered. [122068]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that as Monday 24 April 2000 was a Bank Holiday, the Meat Hygiene Service offices were closed. Following this, the chief executive of the Meat Hygiene Service was due to be on annual leave until 2 May. However, having been made aware of the situation at the plant operated by Mead Webber Ltd., he returned early and on 28 April 2000 answered Mr. Webber's undated fax which had been sent on 24 April 2000.

In his response, the chief executive of the Meat Hygiene Service acknowledged receipt of the fax sent by Mr. Webber and informed him that he had commissioned an investigation into Mr. Webber's concerns and would write again with the conclusions of that investigation.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what brief was given to Mr. John Cartwright by the Meat Hygiene Service prior to his attendance at the Mead Webber plant on 26 April. [122064]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that an independent investigation is to be carried out as soon as possible into the actions of the Meat Hygiene Service at Mead Webber's plant at Eardisley. This will include scrutiny of the actions of Mr. Cartwright.

It would be inappropriate to comment further until this investigation has been completed.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reason the prohibition by Mr. Turner of the Meat Hygiene Service on carcase trimming by the meat inspectors at the Mead Webber plant was reversed on 20 April; and by whom and for what reason the decision was subsequently changed again. [122057]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that the Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) have met with a representative of Mead Webber Ltd. and agreed to an independent inquiry into MHS's actions at Mead Webber and the publication of its findings. The events of 20 April 2000 are to be fully investigated as part of that independent investigation. It would be inappropriate to comment further until this investigation has been completed.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reason a letter was sent by an official veterinary surgeon to Mead Webber on 19 April concerning remedial works prior to the meeting planned for 26 April; and what account the letter took of remedial works and redecoration already agreed. [122043]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that an investigation is to be carried out as soon as possible into the actions of the Meat Hygiene Service at Mead Webber's plant at Eardisley. This will involve scrutiny of correspondence.

It would be inappropriate to comment further until this investigation is completed.

Departmental Statistics

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what statistics relating to the responsibilities of his Department are collated by parliamentary constituency, indicating the dates covered in each case. [123839]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 25 May 2000]: Statistics collected in the Department are largely by health authority, local authority or National Health Service trust reflecting local lines of responsibility and accountability. The Department publishes a wide range of detail at these levels. Comprehensive information at constituency level could be collected and published only at disproportionate cost.

The Library provides a tailored service for hon. Members; statistics which can often be provided at parliamentary constituency level include economic statistics (employment, unemployment and inactivity), claimant count, employees jobs, average earnings and census data.

Following the publication of the Social Exclusion Unit's report on the National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal we are working closely with the Office for National Statistics on improving information across Government at a local level and a consultation report on better information was produced in April 2000. This, along with information which will emerge from the 2001 census will allow a wider range of health data to be available at a local level.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 23 May 2000, Official Report, columns 420–22W, on penalty clauses, what was the cost to the private sector providers of their failure to perform to time or to standard. [124132]

Public Consultation Procedures

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last issued guidance to health authorities in England and Wales with regard to public consultation procedures. [124619]

Mr. Denham: Guidance on the process and legal requirement for consultation on substantial variations in service was issued in 1990. The legal requirement has not changed but we plan to issue more comprehensive guidance on public consultation procedures later in the year. We are presently consulting on a draft. Colleagues in the Welsh Assembly are aware of this work. It is for them to decide whether or not they wish to produce similar guidance for their health authorities.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he gives to hospitals regarding the definition of waiting lists; and if he will make a statement. [124943]

Mr. Denham: Guidance on waiting list definitions is given in the National Health Service Data Manual and the NHS Data Dictionary which are distributed to all NHS trusts and health authorities.

Relenza

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 27 January 2000, Official Report, column 334W, to the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge), when he will publish the results of the appraisal by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence of the drug Relenza; and if he will make a statement. [125110]

Mr. Denham: The National Institute for Clinical Excellence has completed a rapid appraisal on Relenza, which was disseminated to the National Health Service in October 1999. The outcome of NICE's appraisal is therefore already on the public record. A full appraisal is currently being carried out and the revised guidance is expected to be published in October 2000.

Mental Health

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate (a) the present and (b) the projected number of sufferers from mental illness in the UK. [125373]

Mr. Hutton: It is estimated that about one adult in six in the United Kingdom aged between 16 and 64 suffers from some form of mental illness.

This estimate is based on a survey conducted on adults in Great Britain in 1993. Applying this rate of mental illness to the projected UK population aged 16–64 at mid year 2000 suggests that about six million adults between the ages of 16 to 64 in the UK suffer from some form of mental illness, mainly anxiety and depressive episodes.

It is also estimated that about one child in 10 between the ages of five and 15 suffers from a mental disorder.

The source for the prevalence of mental disorder in children is a survey on the mental health of children and adolescents in Great Britain in 1999. By applying the survey rate to the mid year UK population aged five to 15, we estimate that about 800,000 children in this age range suffer from some form of mental disorder.

There are no equivalent estimates at a national level of the prevalence of mental illness among older people. It is not, therefore, possible to give a reliable figure for the total number who suffer from mental illness in the UK. However research suggests that around 600,000 people aged over 65 in the UK have dementia. Figures for older people with other psychiatric disorders are less precise.

The Department does not produce projections of the numbers of mental illness sufferers in future years. However a survey on the prevalence of mental illness in adults aged 16–74 in Great Britain is currently being carried out, and a report of the findings is due in the summer of 2001.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps is he taking to promote the use of direct payments for people with mental health problems. [125713]

Mr. Hutton: We issued revised guidance in February which makes clear that local authorities can make direct payments for any community care service except permanent residential care, and that they should consider this option for service users from all client groups including those with mental health problems. Officials have been meeting local authority officers to explain how local authorities should plan their direct payment schemes in order to reflect the guidance. The Department is funding the Centre for Mental Health Services Development for a project which will aim to promote independent living by implementing Direct Payments for people experiencing mental distress.

Mileage Rates (Nurses)

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish the new mileage payment rates for nurses working in the community. [125282]

Mr. Denham: Mileage and travelling entitlements for National Health Service staff on national contracts are determined by an agreement of the General Whitley Council. A working group of the Council which includes representatives from trades unions and employers is reviewing existing provisions with the aim of recommending new arrangements which are fair to staff, meets service needs and reflects our wider environmental policies. We are aiming to complete these negotiations shortly.

Mortality Statistics

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients (a) of Weston General Hospital, (b) of Avon Health Authority and (c) nationally have died of an illness for which they were awaiting treatment in each of the last three years for which figures are available. [125366]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Etanercept

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the current prescribing status is of Etanercept as a treatment for rheumatoid arthritis and Crohn's disease. [125137]

Ms Stuart: Etanercept's marketing authorisation is for the treatment of rheumatoid arthritis where other drug treatments have proved inadequate. Etanercept may be prescribed on the National Health Service.

Royal Shrewsbury Hospitals NHS Trust

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will review the appointment of Mrs. Jenny Upshall as a non-executive director of Royal Shrewsbury Hospitals NHS Trust, taking account of the operation of Integrate Services; and if he will make a statement. [124876]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 12 June 2000]: My right hon. Friend will keep Mrs. Upshall's appointment under review.

Primary Care Trusts

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of (a) shortlisted applicants for and (b) those appointed as (i) chairman and (ii) non-executive director of primary care trusts have declared political activity for (A) the Labour Party, (B) the Conservative Party and (C) the Liberal Democrat Party. [125899]

Ms Stuart: The information requested is given in the table.

Political activity of candidates for primary care trust appointments in 2000

Percentage

Party	Shortlisted candidates	Appointed candidates
Non-executives
Labour	28.9	17.3
Conservative	4.6	13.5
Liberal Democrat	3.1	3.8

Chairs
Labour	30.6	23.5
Conservative	13.9	11.8
Liberal Democrat	5.6	11.8
Ind./no political party	59.9	52.9

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) Labour, (b) Conservative and (c) Liberal Democrat councillors have been (i) shortlisted and (ii) appointed (1) to the chairmanship of and (2) as non-executive directors of primary care trusts. [125900]

Ms Stuart: The information requested is given in the table.

NHS Patients

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for how many patients NHS trusts have funded treatment in the private sector in each month of the last three years; and what was the total amount spent in each case. [124131]

Ms Stuart: The total amount of National Health Service funds spent on the provision of hospital and community services for NHS patients treated outside the NHS (in the independent sector comprising of for profit hospitals, not for profit hospitals, voluntary hospitals/ hospices and independent clinics) for the last three years are as follows:

Percentages are of NHS expenditure on hospital and community services

	Billion	Percentage
1998–99	1.25	4.8
1997–98	1.08	4.6
1996–97	0.87	3.8

Information on patient activity and annual expenditure in the independent sector, comprising of for profit hospitals, not for profit hospitals, voluntary hospitals/hospices and independent clinics for the last three years available has been placed in the Library.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Higher Education Funding

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will itemise and quantify current public sector funding to higher education institutions which (a) is and (b) is not subject to statutory limitations on control of funding by reference to criteria for the selection and appointment of academic staff and the admission of students. [125401]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The Secretary of State funds the higher education sector for England via the Higher Education Funding Council for England and the Teacher Training Agency. Section 68(3) of the Further and Higher Education Act 1992 precludes the Secretary of State from putting conditions on the grant to the Funding Council relating to the selection and appointment of academic staff and the admissions of students. He has not done so.

Television Advertisements

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many television advertisements have been commissioned by his Department since 1 May 1997; and, of those, how many were provided with closed caption subtitling. [125609]

Mr. Wills [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The Department for Education and Employment has run five television advertising campaigns since 1 May 1997. In line with the Department's mainstreaming policies, all of these used closed titles, to ensure that viewers with hearing difficulties have access to the advertisements.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what provision he has made for the financial year 2000–01 to meet the costs incurred by Kent County Council Education Authority through the provision of interpreters to assist unaccompanied minors and the children of asylum seekers and economic migrants; [125275]

(2) what has been the cost to the schools budget, for the latest year for which figures are available, of the provision of interpreters for unaccompanied minors and the children of asylum seekers and economic migrants; how much of this money has been refunded by central Government to local education authorities; and if he will make a statement. [125277]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The Ethnic Minority and Traveller Achievement Grant is a key element of our strategy for raising standards for minority ethnic pupils, including unaccompanied minors and children of asylum seekers, who are at risk of underachieving, and for meeting the particular needs of pupils for whom English is an Additional Language. The total allocation of the Ethnic Minority and Traveller Achievement Grant for Kent in 2000–01 is £2,459,221. The costs of providing interpretation can be met from within this Grant.

The information on the cost to the whole school budget of the provision of interpretation for unaccompanied minors and children of asylum seekers is not kept centrally by the Department, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Initiatives

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 19 May 2000, Official Report, column 292W, on departmental initiatives, if he will list the amount originally budgeted for in (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000, stating for each year the funds budgeted for which were not spent and if they were carried forward. [124411]

Mr. Wicks [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The following table shows, for each of the initiatives listed in the previous reply, the budget for 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000, along with the outturn figures for 1997–98 and 1998–99. Estimated outturn figures for 1999–2000 are as given in the response to the previous question. Final outturn figures will not be available until the publication of the Appropriation Accounts in October.

Arrangements for carry forward of unspent funds have changed over the period. There was no facility to carry forward within the Department unused recurrent funds from 1997–98 to subsequent years. As announced in the Comprehensive Spending Review White Paper in July 1998, end year flexibility for Departments was introduced in 1998–99.

The New Deal for Schools, funded from the windfall tax, was announced in the Budget in July 1997, and now totals some £1.376 billion over the Parliament, including the extra £250 million announced in the March Budget and the further £43 million announced in the pre-Budget report in November 1999. A total of £452 million from 1999–2000 to 2001–02 was announced in July 1998 for the Sure Start programme. The budgets for both these programmes are ringfenced and any underspends are automatically carried forward.

The footnotes in the table indicate whether the 1998–99 underspends on other programmes were carried forward rather than being allocated to other priority areas.

[1] Employment Zones: funding in 1997–98 and 1998–99 was for prototype EZs. The underspends result from the fact that these took longer to set up and develop than anticipated—the first prototype did not start until February 1998. There has been no carry forward of unspent funds within the initiative.

[2] Sure Start is a cross-departmental programme, which is overseen by a steering group involving Ministers from the Departments of Education and Employment, Health, Social Security, Environment, Transport and the Regions, Culture, Media and Sport and the Home Office, the Lord Chancellor's Department and the Treasury. Spending in the first year was lower than originally planned. The budget for Sure Start is ringfenced and any underspends are automatically carried forward.

[3] Early Excellence Centres: the programme was established in year in 1997–98, and no money was budgeted, but £0.12 million was spent from savings from the wind up of the Nursery Voucher Scheme and a small contribution from New Deal for Schools. Build up of the programme was phased, resulting in slower draw on allocation than expected. The Manifesto commitment was 25—there are 29 EECs and they are receiving full funding contribution. There has been no carry forward of unspent funds within the initiative.

[4] New Start: underspends were due to projects taking longer than anticipated to progress. In 1998–99 £0.90 million was carried over to 1999–2000, and is included in the budget figure for that year.

[5] Millennium Volunteers: although no budget/underspend is shown, £0.4 million was spent and met from the Windfall Tax.

[6] Community Champions: underspend due to the development and launch of the initiative in year which meant it was not fully under way until January 1999.

[1] Adult and Community Learning Fund: the budget/outturn figures given for 1998–99 do not include the £3.27 million spent on the Laptop Programme for Adult and Community Learning Tutors, which was not part of the original budget. Programme underspend is due to the fact that the initial application process took longer than expected and projects therefore started later in the year. Money for the Adult and Community Learning Fund has been re-profiled over the lifetime of the initiative so that the £20 million originally announced for the fund remains available.

[2] New Deal for Schools: underspends denote slippage in claiming funds by LEAs. All NDS funds have been allocated to schools. The budget for NDS is ringfenced and any underspends are automatically carried forward.

No-smoking Policy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness of his Department's no-smoking policy and (b) the proportion of his Department's offices that do not allow smoking. [125156]

Mr. Blunkett: The Department for Education and Employment restricts smoking to designated areas. This effectively provides a non-smoking working environment for staff. All DfEE Headquarter buildings restrict smoking in this way.

Key Stage 2 (Marking)

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what inter-marker reliability data are available for end of Key Stage 2 English tests. [124896]

Jacqui Smith: External Marking Agencies collect data about relative marking performance of markers engaged in marking each subject at each key stage.

Two types of data are collected.

Judgmental data about the general marking performance of markers together with information about how well they have managed the marking process and adhered to administrative procedures and deadlines.

The variation in marking standards between the team leaders and the markers who report to them is measured. This is known as the absolute mark difference (AMD) criterion. This measurement is taken at more than one stage during the marking process—twice for all markers and three times for some markers. The values for each marker are compared with pre-determined bands of marking acceptability and a judgment is made about any corrective action which may be required or, in some cases, the requirement to stop a marker from carrying out any further marking. (In cases where markers are stopped, all scripts from the marker's allocation are re-marked by an approved marker.)

The Qualifications and Curriculum Authority, who are responsible for the development and administration of the National Curriculum on behalf of the Secretary of State, collect the AMD data from all external marking agencies to enable the monitoring of marking variation year-on-year and to establish whether or not the pre-determined bands of marking acceptability require adjustment in future years.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many schools returned end of Key Stage 2 English test papers for a review of marking last year. [124893]

Jacqui Smith: Last year 2,210 schools returned end of Key Stage 2 English test papers for a review of marking. In 1999, 16,364 schools with 629,000 pupils nationally took part in the end of Key Stage 2 tests.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many Key Stage 2 English markers were removed last year on grounds of unsatisfactory performance. [124892]

Jacqui Smith: There were 45 Key Stage 2 English markers removed last year on grounds of unsatisfactory performance. This represents 2.2 per cent. of the total markers involved in marking the end of Key Stage 2 English tests nationally.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the correlation between the year-on-year increase in the number of end of Key Stage 2 English test papers returned for a review of marking and exam marking standards. [124895]

Jacqui Smith: The Qualifications and Curriculum Authority, responsible for the development and administration of the National Curriculum on behalf of the Secretary of State, has not established any direct relationship between the number of review requests received and the information which it has available concerning marking standards. As the percentage of review requests is very small, less than 1 per cent., it would not be statistically valid to attempt to draw any conclusions from the data which are available.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Hilary Benn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proposals he has to amend the Departmental Expenditure Limit for 2000–01. [126068]

Mr. Wills: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Revised Estimate for Class I, Vote 1 (Department for Education and Employment: programmes and central services), the overall DfEE Departmental Expenditure Limit (DEL) for 2000–01 (excluding Welfare to Work) will be decreased by £190,000 from £18,355,709,000 to £18,355,519,000.

This change in Vote 1 is the result of a transfer to Class III, Vote 1 (Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions: Housing, construction, regeneration regional policy, planning and countryside and wildlife, England) of £190,000 for the rough sleepers initiative.

Sixth Forms

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the average A level points score per pupil for 11 to 18 years schools, with sixth forms containing (a) 50 or fewer, (b) 51 to 100, (c) 101 to 150, (d) 151 to 200, (e) 201 to 250 and (f) more than 250 pupils. [124695]

Mr. Wicks: The average GCE A/AS point score per pupil for schools with an age range of 11 to 18, with sixth forms containing:

(a) 50 or fewer pupils: 7.4

(b) 51 to 100 pupils: 9.4

(c) 101 to 150 pupils: 11.9

(d) 151 to 200 pupils: 14.6

(e) 201 to 250 pupils: 15.7

(f) more than 250 pupils: 15.8.

Education Council (Luxembourg)

Mr. Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the outcome was of the Education Council held in Luxembourg on 8 June; and if he will make a statement. [125786]

Ms Jowell: The Council of EC Education Ministers, at which the UK was represented by Nicol Stephen MSP, Deputy Minister for Enterprise and Lifelong Learning in the Scottish Executive, adopted a Decision to establish the European Year of Languages 2001.

Ministers held an open debate on the future challenges and objectives of education systems in the learning society. The Council agreed that education and training policies would play a key part in ensuring the successful follow-up to the conclusions agreed at the Lisbon European Council, and on the need for Education Ministers to feed into the Luxembourg Employment Process. Ministers recognised that benchmarks and the exchange of good practice could be useful tools in supporting appropriate action at member state level. Ministers put forward proposals for policy areas which should be covered by the report of Education Ministers to the Stockholm European Council in spring 2001. Discussion covered the Commission's work on the e-learning initiative, which was welcomed by member states.

The Commission presented a report on quality indictors in school education. It also gave progress reports on the Recommendation on Quality Evaluation in School Education, and the Recommendation on Mobility within the Community for students, persons undergoing training, young volunteers, teachers and trainers.

A copy of the Council minutes will be placed in the Library.

Social Affairs Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the outcome was of the Social Affairs Council held in Luxembourg on 6 June; and if he will make a statement. [125171]

Ms Jowell: The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), and I represented the UK at the Social Affairs Council meeting on 6 June.

Political agreement was reached by the Council on a Directive implementing the principle of equal treatment of persons irrespective of their racial or ethnic origin. This is the first legislative proposal brought under Article 13 of the Treaty. The Directive covers a range of issues including employment, access to social protection and social security; access to education; and access to goods and services. All member states with scrutiny reserves, including the UK, lifted them. The Presidency gave a progress report on negotiations on the other proposals brought forward under Article 13—a draft Directive establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation and a Community Action Programme.

The Council debated its role in following up the Special European Council held in Lisbon in March and its input to the Spring European Council to be held in 2001. The Council agreed conclusions which would be transmitted to the Presidency of the EU before the European Council, in Feira. The Council noted the Employment Committee's work programme for 2000.

The Council unanimously adopted a decision setting up a Social Protection Committee. The Council endorsed a report of the High-Level Working Group on Social Protection and agreed to submit it to the European Council at Feira. The report sets out two priorities—a pensions study and the identification of common objectives and indicators of social protection.

The Council discussed three outstanding issues arising from the Commission's proposals for simplification of Regulation 1408/71. The Regulation concerns the co-ordination of member states' social security systems—including healthcare—and is aimed at assisting free movement of workers within the Community. None of the issues was resolved. Technical negotiations will continue at official level.

The Council adopted a mixed Resolution (of the Council and of the Ministers for Employment and Social policy meeting within the Council) on the balanced participation of men and women in working and family life.

The Council reached broad agreement on the draft Directive on temporary work at height (the "Scaffolding Directive").

The Commission made a presentation on its study of the implications of the European Court of Justice rulings (Decker and Kohll) concerning reimbursement for medical treatment: these will be made available to member states following further relevant rulings from the Court.

Supply Teachers

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures are in place to replace supply teachers from Australia and New Zealand. [125130]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Government welcome the contribution which teachers from Australia and New Zealand have made, particularly since the 1980s, and continue to make in English schools. However, they do not seek to replace teachers from particular countries who leave. Rather, we have introduced a range of measures to attract people into teaching, and to encourage those with Qualified Teacher Status who have spent time away from the profession to return. Since we announced £6,000 training salaries and £4,000 new-style "golden hellos" on 30 March, 1,119 more people have applied for postgraduate teacher training than in the same period last year. We are also introducing additional funding to help schools take people onto the Graduate Teacher

Programme. Alongside the improvements we are making to teachers' pay, school leadership and the support and continuing professional development available to teachers, these initiatives will make it much easier for schools to attract the number and quality of teachers they need and so reduce the need for supply teachers generally in the longer term.

LEA Funding

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the expenditure per pupil was in (a) primary and (b) secondary education in the London boroughs of (i) Kensington and Chelsea and (ii) Westminster in 1996–97 and 1999–2000; and what is his estimate for 2000–01. [125416]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table sets out the funding per primary and secondary pupil through Standard Spending Assessment and special and specific grants for each of the years requested.

	Primary	Secondary
Kensington and Chelsea
1996–97	2,664	3,647
1999–2000	3,559	4,404
2000–01	3,907	4,766
Westminster
1996–97	2,703	3,497
1999–2000	3,489	4,127
2000–01	3,801	4,422

New Deal

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people (a) in the greater Portsmouth area and (b) nationally are using the New Deal for partners; and if he will make a statement. [124552]

Ms Jowell: By the end of April 2000, 2,622 partners of unemployed people nationally had attended an initial interview to discuss their participation in New Deal for Partners of Unemployed People.

We do not collect information on the greater Portsmouth area specified.

We are pleased to be able to provide targeted help to assist members of workless households back to work through the New Deal for Partners of Unemployed People.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

BNFL

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the reports prepared by external advisers in relation to BNFL since 1 January. [125585]

Mrs. Liddell: Since 1 January my Department has received advice and reports from its advisers in relation to BNFL. This material, which is commercially confidential, covers a range of issues including accounting and contractual topics relating to BNFL's business operations.

Gas and Electricity Consumer Council

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his policy is on regional offices for the proposed Gas and Electricity Consumer Council; and if he will make a statement. [125584]

Mrs. Liddell: Proposals for the structure of the new Gas and Electricity Consumers' Council (GECC) were the subject of an extensive consultation exercise undertaken by Ann Robinson, the Chairman designate of the new organisation. I shall make a further statement once decisions are taken on the outcome of that exercise.

ECGD

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will publish the results of his review of the Export Credit Guarantees Department. [125586]

Mr. Caborn: The review of ECGD's Mission and Status, which was announced last July, is nearing completion. The public consultation exercise and a number of independent studies into certain aspects of ECGD's operations have provided valuable evidence. These inputs will enable Ministers to determine the right way forward for ECGD, and I expect an announcement of the outcome of the Review to be made in the House shortly.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which Department is responsible for commenting on the human rights aspects of applications for ECGD support in the case of (a) those countries qualifying for overseas development assistance and (b) those countries which do not qualify for such assistance. [125202]

Mr. Caborn: Responsibility for assessing all the risks and issues connected with applications for ECGD support lies with ECGD. For countries which are only eligible for highly concessional International Development Association (IDA) loans from the World Bank, we would seek the views of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Department for International Development as part of ECGD's procedure for assessing whether Productive Expenditure criteria have been met. Applications for ECGD support in countries which are not eligible for IDA only loans would be referred to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for advice on human rights where ECGD has concerns about the issue.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which Department had responsibility for scrutinising the human rights aspects of the request for ECGD assistance for the Ilisu dam project; and what comments were made. [125203]

Mr. Caborn: Responsibility for assessing the risks and issues connected with the application for ECGD support lies with ECGD. However, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) provided advice to ECGD which was reflected in the statement made regarding the project on 21 December by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. ECGD is in regular contact with FCO regarding this project.

Limited Liability Partnerships

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what restrictions he proposes to place on limited companies re-incorporating as limited liability partnerships. [125427]

Dr. Howells: Part II of the Companies Act 1985 provides a mechanism by which a company may alter its status by way of re-registration. There is no similar provision in the Limited Liability Partnerships Bill.

If, therefore, the members of a limited company decide that they wish to cease to trade through their current vehicle—the limited company—and to commence trading through a limited liability partnership, they will have to go through a three stage process. First, they will have to set up the limited liability partnership complying with the conditions set out in the LLP Bill and regulations. Second, they will have to transfer the assets and liabilities of the company to the LLP. This may give rise to transaction and taxation charges; the LLP Bill and regulations do not provide any tax exemptions for such a transfer, nor do they facilitate the transfer in any other way, e.g. by providing for an automatic transfer of assets. Finally, the members of the company would either have to keep the company in being in parallel to the LLP, and so continue to comply with the regulatory requirements set out in the Companies Act 1985, or they would need to seek to wind up the company by a members' voluntary winding up.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimates he has made of the number of public and private limited companies likely to re-incorporate as limited liability partnerships as a result of the provisions of the Limited Liability Partnerships Bill [Lords]; and what consultations he has had with the Treasury about the tax revenue consequences of such changes. [125429]

Dr. Howells: No estimates have been made. I would refer my hon. Friend to replies to two of his earlier written questions. The first is my reply on 9 June 2000, Official Report, column 385W to his question asking what estimate had been made of the number of plcs likely to register as limited liability partnerships which gave the reasons why we would be surprised if plcs converted to LLPs. The second is the reply made by my hon. Friend the Paymaster General on 5 June 2000, Official Report, column 77W, to the question asking the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultations he has had with the DTI on this subject. My hon. Friend the Paymaster General confirmed that officials at the DTI have been in close contact with Inland Revenue officials, and went on to note that because of the possibility that some LLPs might be set up solely because of their taxation of LLPs. Depending on what this work finds, consideration will be given to bringing forward further tax legislation in due course.

Letters and Packets

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry under what statutory provisions the European Commission determines the limits to monopoly public services for letters or packets to a given upper value or weight. [125700]

Dr. Howells: The statutory provisions under which the European Commission may propose changes to the reserved area for letter post are found in Directive 97/67/EC of the European Parliament and the Council dated 15 December 1997, which was made under Articles 57(2), 66 and 100a of the Treaty establishing the European Community (now Articles 47(2), 55 and 95 in the consolidated version of the EU Treaty and the EC Treaty made by the Treaty of Amsterdam). Such proposals are submitted for consideration to the European Parliament and to the Council of Ministers.

Civil Plutonium and Uranium

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish figures for the United Kingdom's stocks of civil plutonium and uranium as at 31 December 1999. [126232]

Mrs. Liddell: I have today placed in the Libraries of the House figures for the United Kingdom showing national holdings of civil plutonium and uranium as at 31 December 1999. In accordance with our commitment under the "Guidance for the Management of Plutonium", I have today sent a copy of the figures to the Director-General of the International Atomic Energy Agency, who will be circulating it to member states in due course.

Research Councils

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the quinquennial review of the Council for the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils will take place; and what the terms of reference for the review will be. [126231]

Mr. Byers: My noble Friend the Minister for Science is today launching the Quinquennial Review of the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils.

Reviews of non-Departmental Public Bodies (NDPBs) are an important part of our modernisation programme. The Government are committed to achieving better public services that are of higher quality and are more responsive to the needs of the people who use them. Regular NDPB reviews are an important element in ensuring that we have in place the right structures to deliver the Government's agenda effectively and to provide a strong focus on improving future performance.

The terms of reference for the Review of the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils are:

CCLRC was established in February 1995 and so it is due for review in the course of 2000.

The review of CCLRC will have two stages.

The first stage will examine the role, organisation and composition and funding mechanisms for CCLRC, by reference to its Charter and mission, its past performance, recent CCLRC instigated studies on future vision and funding, current best practice for NDPBs and its contribution to the work of other Research Councils. All relevant options for the future of the Council will be considered, including abolition, continued NDPB status, rationalisation, privatisation or strategic contracting out.

The conduct of the second stage will be dependent on and informed by the outcome of the first. If the first stage confirms the continued operation of CCLRC in its present or another form, this stage will examine the opportunities for improving performance by reference to such issues as management structures, aims and objectives, performance targets and service standards, use of new technology, levels of delegated authority and effective accountability. In that event, the review will take account of evidence of work already undertaken to review and improve performance. Opportunities for expanding the present range of users of facilities and services and optimising the contribution of facilities and services to exploitable research will also be considered.

The review will be conducted in accordance with the latest Cabinet Office guidance (published on 31 January 2000) and will include consultation, either in person or in writing, with members of Council, staff of the Executive and CCLRC's customers and key stakeholders.

The Review Team will report at intervals to a Review Board. It will be the task of the Review Board to respond flexibly to the Reviewer's proposals during the progress of the Review, each member contributing guidance and knowledge, including where appropriate the good offices of his or her parent department or organisation. The Review Board will ensure that Ministers, the Treasury, the Cabinet Office, and the staff and customers of the CCLRC are kept informed of the progress of the Review and will facilitate the gathering of information for the Reviewer and his or her communication with staff and customers.

The Review will be supported by officials in the Office of Science and Technology, with specialist advice as appropriate. The Review Board will be chaired by Sir Peter Williams and include key stakeholder representatives. The aim will be to complete each stage of the review within a period of about approximately three months, as recommended in the Cabinet Office guidance.

As indicated in the terms of reference, the Review Team is seeking the views of interested parties. A questionnaire is available from the CCLRC website http://www.clrc.ac.uk/qreview or from:

Nuclear Reprocessing

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with BNFL in respect of the statement by British Energy that it wishes to end the reprocessing of its spent fuel. [125566]

Mrs. Liddell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has not discussed this matter with BNFL. Through my normal contacts with BNFL and British Energy, I am aware of the respective positions of both companies concerning the contracts they have entered into. The contracts are a commercial matter for the two companies.

Expenditure Limits

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes will be made to his Departmental Expenditure Limit and running costs limit for his Department and the Office of Telecommunications. [126230]

Mr. Byers: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the voted element of the Departmental Expenditure Limit for the Department of Trade and Industry will be increased by £58,372,000 from £3,445,344,000 to £3,503,716,000 and the gross running costs limit will be increased by £1,000,000 from £400,002,000 to £401,002,000. The net provision of Class IX Vote 1 will be increased by £58,372,000, which results from:

(i) additional provision of £45,000,000 for operating aid to coal producers;

(ii) additional provision of £15,000,000 from the Capital Modernisation Fund for the promotion of innovation clusters and business incubators in the regions;

(iii) the transfer of £866,000 to the Scottish Executive, £496,000 to the National Assembly for Wales, and £266,000 to the relevant Northern Ireland Department representing their share of the Phoenix fund to promote enterprise among disadvantaged groups and in deprived areas;

(iv) the reclassification as running costs of £1,000,000 of programme expenditure provision for the Small Business Service.

The £45,000,000 for operating aid to coal producers will be charged to the Reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

In addition, subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the Departmental Expenditure Limit for the Office of Telecommunications will be increased by £2,399,000 from £1,000 to £2,400,000 and the gross running costs limit will be increased by £1,484,000 from £11,347,000 to £12,831,000. These changes result from:

(i) an increase of £1,484,000 in the running costs provision to ensure a competitive market in internet access which underpins e-commerce;

(ii) an increase of £946,000 in the current expenditure provision for co-operation with economic regulators overseas;

(iii) an increase of £250,000 in the capital expenditure provision to implement an electronic records management system.

These increases will be offset by a compensating increase in appropriations in aid. However, adoption of the EC Telecoms Licensing Directive will result in a reduction of £2,399,000 in the overall appropriations in aid provision.

The consequential increase of £2,399,000 in the net provision will be charged to the Reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Gas-fired Power Stations

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce his decisions on Veridian Power Resources Ltd.'s proposals to build gas-fired power stations at the Rockware Glass factories at Knottingly and Doncaster. [126233]

Mrs. Liddell: I have today decided to give directions under section 14(3) of the Energy Act 1976 to prevent Viridian Power Resources Ltd.'s building 13 MW generating stations to be fuelled by natural gas at the Rockware Glass factories at Knottingly and Doncaster.

Copies of the Press Notice and decision letter are being placed in the Libraries of the House.

Assisted Areas

Mr. Khabra: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the reasons for certain areas being (a) removed from and (b) added to the assisted areas map. [124004]

Mr. Caborn: The reasons for the amendments to the Government's assisted area proposals are set out in "Amendments to the Government's Proposals for new Assisted Areas". A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

"Made in Britain"

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what advice he gives to British companies wishing to include a "Made in Britain" emblem on their products. [125676]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 12 June 2000]: British companies are free to apply a made in Britain emblem if their products meet the definition of origin in section 36(1) of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968. This states that for the purposes of the Act goods shall be deemed to have been manufactured or produced in the country in which they last underwent a treatment or process resulting in a substantial change. My Department has issued a guidance note on this aspect of the Act, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Post Office Users' Council

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the cost was of the system of Post Office advisory committees and the Post Office Users' Council in the latest full year for which figures are available; and what the cost will be of the new arrangements he is proposing. [125456]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The cost of the Post Office Users' National Council (POUNC); the Post Office Users' Councils for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland and the Post Office Advisory Committees was approximately £800,000 in 1999–2000.

Peter Carr (the Chairman of POUNC and the Chairman designate of the CCPS) issued a consultation document on the structure of the new Council on 17 April. I am now awaiting a report on the outcome of the consultation together with proposals about the structure and costs of the CCPS.

Departmental Responsibilities

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what statistics relating to the responsibilities of his Department are collated by parliamentary constituency, indicating the dates covered in each case. [123840]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 25 May 2000]: My Department has wide-ranging responsibilities. The majority of statistics used in this Department are collated by the Office for National Statistics (ONS). The ONS collects a wide range of statistics that can be provided at parliamentary constituency level including economic statistics on employment, unemployment and inactivity, claimant count, employee jobs, average earnings and Census of Population data. Details of all these data could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Pylons

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the recent inquiry commissioned by the National Farmers Union into the alleged link between skin cancer and pylon lines; and if he will make a statement. [123906]

Mrs. Liddell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health on 8 June 2000, Official Report, columns 328–29W.

Miners (Compensation)

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many cases have been lodged by former miners living in Amber Valley for compensation for emphysema and other respiratory diseases. [123940]

Mrs. Liddell: The Department's claims handling agents have registered 1,565 claims for respiratory diseases from former miners living in the Amber Valley region, centring on the towns of Alfreton, Heanor and Ripley. Of these the Department has settled 69 claims and made interim payments to a further 394, totalling nearly £900,000.

No-smoking Policy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness of his Department's no-smoking policy and (b) the proportion of his Department's offices that do not allow smoking. [125147]

Dr. Howells: My Department operates a smoking policy designed to minimise staff exposure to environmental tobacco smoke in order to ensure their health, safety and welfare, and prevent significant discomfort. Advice and guidance is available to staff who wish to give up, cut down, or control their smoking. In buildings occupied and controlled by my Department, smoking is only permitted in a small number of designated rooms or areas.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Expenditure Limits

Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to amend his Department's expenditure limit and running costs limit for 2000–01. [126157]

Mr. Rooker: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Revised Estimate for Class XII Vote 3 (Department of Social Security: administration) the Department of Social Security's Departmental Expenditure Limit will be reduced by £16,869,000 from £3,207,614,000 to £3,190,745,000. The reduction is the net effect of the continuing consequences of the transfer of the Department of Social Security Contributions Agency and Working Family Tax Credit Unit to Inland Revenue. There will be a corresponding increase on Class XVI, Vote 5, Inland Revenue: administration.

As a result of this change the running cost limit of this department will be reduced by £16,869,000 from £2,958,599,000 to £2,941,730,000.

Single Room Rent

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 5 June 2000, Official Report, column 101W, regarding single room rent, if he will make available the methodology used in calculating the cost of abolishing the single room rent restrictions. [125898]

Angela Eagle: The methodology used to estimate the cost of abolishing the single room rent is based on a number of data sources, for example, rent officer statistics, departmental forecast of the Housing Benefit caseload and administrative data following the introduction of the single room rent restriction. These data sources have been used to, for example, estimate the proportion of cases restricted by the single room rent and the shortfall in the amount of rent used to assess Housing Benefit.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 5 June 2000, Official Report, column 101W, regarding single room rent, if he will publish the full range of the estimate of the cost of abolishing the single room rent restrictions, including the lowest point of the range. [125887]

Angela Eagle: The range is between £10 million and £160 million but these figures are heavily dependent on how single young people, landlords and the rental market would react to the abolition of the single room rent.

Mrs. Maud Beaver

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will review the decision of the Benefits Agency on a winter fuel payment in respect of Mrs. Maud Beaver of Buckfastleigh. [124916]

Angela Eagle: The administration of Winter Fuel payments is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Anthony Steen, dated 12 June 2000:

The Secretary Of State has asked me to respond to your recent Parliamentary Question concerning your constituent Mrs. Maud Beaver and a question arising as to her entitlement to a Winter Fuel payment (WFP) and a review of that decision.

As you will appreciate, individual customers' cases are confidential. I will therefore, write to you privately on this matter.

Lone Parents

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many initial invitation letters have been sent to lone parents in the target group for the New Deal for Lone Parents since the national programme began in October 1998. [125635]

Angela Eagle: The total number of initial invitation letters issued since the full national programme began in October 1998 was 482,874.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone parents, broken down into the target and non-target groups for the New Deal for Lone Parents have claimed Income Support for (a) less than a year, (b) between one and two years, (c) between two and three years, (d) between three and four years, (e) between four and five years and (f) over five years. [125629]

Angela Eagle: The target group for the New Deal for Lone Parents (NDLP) is all lone parents on Income Support. Invitation letters are sent to lone parents on Income Support with a youngest child aged at least five years and three months. From 22 May lone parents whose youngest child is aged three or four have also started to receive invitation letters.

This information is in the table.

Lone parents receiving Income Support as at February 2000

Thousand

Duration of current claim	All lone parents	Of those receiving invitation letters
All cases	918.6	448.3
Less than 1 year	216.5	83.3
1 to 2 years	149.1	53.2
2 to 3 years	105.6	40.0
3 to 4 years	74.2	30.3
4 to 5 years	60.5	27.8
5 years and over	312.7	213.8

Notes:

1. Numbers are based on a five per cent. sample and are therefore subject to sampling error.
2. Numbers are rounded to the nearest hundred and expressed to the nearest thousand therefore totals may not sum.
3. Lone parents are defined as single people with dependants not in receipt of a pensioner or disability premium.
4. Numbers do not include lone parents who choose to sign unemployed and are in receipt of Income-based Jobseeker's Allowance.
5. In some cases, when claims are first entered on the Income Support Computer System (ISCS), the date of claim was incorrectly input as the date of conversion of the ISCS system. This means that for some cases (which we are unable to identify) the length of claim is inaccurate for claims made before the end of 1992 when the conversion period ended.
6. Lone parents on Income Support with a youngest child aged at least five years 3 months receive NDLP invitation letters. From May 22 lone parents whose youngest child is aged three or four have also started to receive invitation letters.

Income Support Quarterly Statistical Inquiry—February 2000

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security of the lone parents who successfully find work after participating in the New Deal for Lone Parents, how many had previously been claiming Income Support for (a) up to six months, (b) six months to one year, (c) one year to two years, (d) between two and three years, (e) between three and four years, (f) between four and five years and (g) over five years. [125630]

Angela Eagle: The information is not currently available. However, developmental work is currently being undertaken which will facilitate the link between a New Deal for Lone Parents participants' records and their Income Support details.

In the period ending March 2000, 50,911 lone parents have gained employment from the New Deal for Lone Parents since the programme began.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average length of time on Income Support of a lone parent; and what had been the average length of time on Income Support of a lone parent who found work after participating in the New Deal. [125633]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available. A total of 50,911 lone parents have found jobs through the New Deal to March 2000.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone parents joined the target group for the New Deal for Lone Parents in the last month for which figures are available; and how many initial invitation letters have been sent to these people. [125636]

Angela Eagle: The target group for the New Deal for Lone Parents is all lone parents on Income Support. The information is not available in the format requested. However, 84,200 joined this category during the quarter ending February 2000.

Initial invitation letters are sent to all lone parents on Income Support with a youngest child aged over 5 years 3 months eight weeks after claiming Income Support except those in receipt of Invalid Care Allowance, Incapacity Benefit, or Severe Disability Allowance. In the quarter to February 2000, 40,100 lone parents qualified for letters. From 22 May lone parents on Income Support with a youngest child aged 3 or 4 have also started to receive invitation letters.

Notes:

1. Numbers obtained by looking for claimants who were not in the relevant category in November 1999 but who subsequently appear in it in February 2000. This method will underestimate the true number of people who "flow" into the group as people who join and leave benefit between quarters, or those who leave Income Support before the second quarter will not be counted.

2. Numbers are based on a 5 per cent. sample and are therefore subject to sampling errors.

3. Numbers are rounded to the nearest hundred and expressed in thousands.

4. Lone parents are defined as single people with dependants not in receipt of a pensioner or disability premium.

5. Numbers do not include lone parents who choose to sign unemployed and are in receipt of income-based Jobseeker's Allowance.

Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiry

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone parents have been in the target group for the New Deal for Lone Parents in total since the national programme began in October 1998. [125634]

Angela Eagle: The target group for the New Deal for Lone Parents is all parents on Income Support. Over the Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiries for November 1998 to February 2000, there have been a total of 1,248,700 who fall into this category, of whom 482,874 have received invitation letters.

Notes:

1. Numbers are based on a 5 per cent. sample and are therefore subject to sampling error.

2. Numbers are rounded to the nearest hundred and expressed in thousands.

3. Lone parents are defined as single people with dependants not in receipt of a pensioner or disability premium.

4. Numbers do not include lone parents who choose to sign unemployed and are in receipt of income-based Jobseeker's Allowance.

5. From 22 May 2000 lone parents on Income Support with a youngest child aged 3 or 4 have started to receive invitation letters.

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone parents who have found work through the New Deal for Lone Parents have a youngest child aged between three years and five years and three months; and how many have a youngest child aged below three years, broken down on a monthly basis. [125637]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested.

Figures are available for the numbers of lone parents whose youngest child is aged under 5 years and 3 months gaining jobs after the full national phase of the programme in October 1998. The information is in the table.

Notes:

1. Figures in above table are for Phase 3 of the programme (from 26 October 1998). Information is not available in this format for phases 1 and 2 because results were kept clerically and it is not possible to accurately break them down on a monthly basis.

2. Figures for the most recent months may subsequently rise slightly. This is due to the backdating of jobs gained by leavers to unknown destinations which we subsequently discover have found employment.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were in receipt of Jobseeker's Allowance in each constituency in Devon, Torbay and Plymouth, broken down by age group for the period from August 1998 to the latest date for which figures are available. [124992]

Angela Eagle: The administration of Jobseeker's Allowance is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Adrian Sanders, dated 12 June 2000:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent question asking if he will list the number of people in receipt of Jobseeker's Allowance for each constituency in Devon, Torbay and Plymouth, broken down by age group for the period from August 1998 to the latest date for which figures are available.

The information is in the attached tables.

I hope this is helpful.

Automated Credit Transfer

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what assessment he has made of the percentage of benefit payments which will still be made in cash following the transfer to automated credit transfer in 2003; [125254]

(2) what changes he intends to make to the mechanism for cash payments of benefit following the transfer to automated credit transfer in 2003. [125255]

Mr. Rooker: From 2003 we intend to move from the traditional paper-based methods of benefit payment to a more secure and efficient method of paying benefits through Automated Credit Transfer (ACT). All benefit recipients will still be able to collect their cash from the post office after 2003 if they wish, and we anticipate that a number will wish to take advantage of this option.

No-smoking Policy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness of his Department's no-smoking policy and (b) the proportion of his Department's offices that do not allow smoking. [125149]

Mr. Rooker: The Department has a policy statement on smoking at work. Its objective is to provide a smoke-free environment at all workplaces and most other areas within its offices not covered by a mandatory ban on smoking.

In practice, the needs of smokers are taken into account, when necessary, by the provision of properly vented smoking rooms isolated from staff working areas when they can be accommodated within the structure of the building; otherwise staff must smoke outside the building.

This policy effectively means that no member of staff is put in a position whereby they are exposed to passive smoking while carrying out their duties on DSS occupied premises.

The proportion of the Department's offices which do not allow smoking anywhere in the building is not known. The decision not to allow smoking will have been taken only after a staff consultation exercise has taken place in each building and either, staff have decided in favour of a total ban, or, suitable accommodation cannot be found in the building to adapt as a smoking room. It is estimated that the number of buildings with a total ban on smoking is low.

Social Security Administration (Fraud) Act

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the local authorities that do not have a serving inspector appointed under section 110 of the Social Security Administration (Fraud) Act 1997. [125099]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 8 June 2000]: 209 local authorities have reported the appointment of a total of 719 inspectors empowered to make relevant inquiries and examine documents.

Local authorities fraud investigators are also able to ask their local Benefits Agency inspectors to use their powers in order to obtain information for the authority.

A list of local authorities, which have not reported the appointment of a currently serving inspector, has been placed in the Library.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will estimate the cost of removing the top two bands of housing benefit non-dependant deductions and capping the maximum non-dependant deduction to 50 per cent. of the rent due; [125292]

(2) how many claimants are subject to each level of housing benefit non-dependant deductions; [125289]

(3) if he will estimate the cost of not imposing housing benefit non-dependant deductions where this would leave non-dependants with an income below income support level; [125293]

(4) if he will estimate the cost of abolishing housing benefit non-dependant deductions; [125290]

(5) if he will estimate the cost of capping the maximum housing benefit non-dependant deduction to 50 per cent. of the rent due. [125291]

Angela Eagle: The cost of removing the top two bands of Housing Benefit non-dependent deductions and capping the maximum non-dependant deduction to 50 per cent. of the rent due is estimated to be £40 million a year[1].

At May 1998, the latest date for which information is available, the numbers of claimants subject to each level of Housing Benefit non-dependant deductions[2] are in the table.

Housing Benefit (HB)—Non-dependant deductions—May 1998

Non-dependants deduction level	Number of HB recipients to whom deduction applies
£7	125,000
£16	21,000
£22	19,000
£36	12,000
£41	7,000
£45	15,000

Note:

All estimates were obtained using the Policy Simulation Model, which uses as base data the Family Resources Survey for 1997–98. Estimates are uprated to 2000–01 prices and benefits levels and are consistent with Departmental forecasts of the number of non-dependants in 2000–01. These forecasts are themselves based on extrapolations of Housing Benefit administrative data.

The cost of not imposing Housing Benefit non-dependant deductions where this would leave non dependants with an income below Income Support level is estimated to be £30 million a year.

The cost of abolishing Housing Benefit non-dependant deductions is estimated to be £230 million a year.The cost of capping the maximum Housing Benefit non-dependant deduction to 50 per cent. of the rent due is estimated to be £35 million a year[1].

[1]Costed on basis that no deduction on behalf of any individual exceeds 50 per cent. of rent, rather than having a 50 per cent. cap on the total deduction for each household.

[2]Some HB recipients may be subject to more than one non-dependant deduction Housing Benefit Management Information System, annual 1 per cent. sample inquiries, taken on the second Thursday of May 1998.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many Housing Benefit recipients have been assessed under the 6 October 1997 scheme; [125296]

(2) how many Housing Benefit recipients are still assessed under the pre-January 1996 rules on rent restrictions for private sector tenancies; [125294]

(3) how many Housing Benefit recipients are assessed under the Local Reference Rent (January 1996) scheme. [125295]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Private tenants receiving Housing Benefit in August 1999 by Housing Benefit scheme—Great Britain

Scheme	Housing Benefit recipients

Winter Fuel Payments

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for what reason men aged 60 to 64 years have been required to provide their original birth certificate in connection with a claim for Winter Fuel payments; and what alternative documents will be accepted. [125307]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 9 June 2000]: The best evidence of age than can be provided is a certified copy of an entry, which has by law to be made in a register concerning the event. This is classed as primary evidence. Photocopies of original documents carry little or no weight of evidence. This is because the original document has authenticating features not available in a photocopy. However, photocopies that are certified as a true copy of the original are more acceptable.

If primary evidence is not available, then items of secondary evidence will be requested. Examples of these are:

A certificate of baptism

A marriage certificate

A certificate of service in HM Forces

A certificate of employment under the Crown

A certificate of service in the mercantile Marine

A certificate of membership of a Trade Union or Friendly Society

Membership cards or papers of an Approved Society or unemployment insurance

Apprenticeship indentures

Early certificate or testimonial from an employer

Certificate of Naturalisation, Alien's Registration card, Home Office travel documents or passport

Life insurance policy

Certificate of confirmation

National Health Service medical card

Adoption certificate.

Note:

This list is not exhaustive.

Employment Service

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when all areas will have organisational boundaries co-ordinated with those of the Employment Service; if he will set out the programme for such co-ordination; and if he will make a statement. [125441]

Angela Eagle: In March of this year my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced the creation of a new agency for people of working age that will draw together those elements of the Benefits Agency which support people of working age, and the Employment Service. The agency will launch as soon as possible during 2001. Organisational boundaries will be considered in the design of the new agency.

Pensions

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many letters he has received from pensioners expressing views on the recent increase in the state retirement pension; and if he will make a statement. [125764]

Mr. Rooker: Further to my oral answer to the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) on 3 April 2000, Official Report, columns 624–25, we have received about 4,000 further letters that mention the level of the State Pension.

Income Support

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners he expects to claim Income Support as a result of his Department's take-up campaign. [125749]

Mr. Bayley: We have not set a target for the Minimum Income Guarantee take-up campaign, but we will carry out a comprehensive evaluation of the campaign, early next year.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the reasons for which pensioners who are eligible to claim Income Support do not claim. [125748]

Mr. Bayley: Research on barriers pensioners face in claiming Income Support was detailed in the Departmental report "Overcoming barriers, older people and Income Support", published last October. It provides a comprehensive analysis of the complexities surrounding pensioner take-up. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the number of Income Support claimants by constituency in the county of Devon, Torbay Unitary Authority and Plymouth Unitary Authority for each year from August 1998 to the latest date for which figures are available. [124987]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of Income Support is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency to answer. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Adrian Sanders, dated 12 June 2000:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking if he will list the number of income support claimants by constituency in the county of Devon, Torbay Unitary Authority and Plymouth Unitary Authority for each year from August 1998 to the latest date for which figures are available.

The information is in the table attached.

I hope this is helpful.

Income Support claimants by parliamentary constituency

	August		February
	1998	1999	2000
Plymouth, Devonport	8.3	8.0	8.1
Plymouth, Sutton	7.8	7.8	7.7
Torbay	9.6	9.4	9.4
East Devon	4.3	4.4	4.1
Exeter	6.5	6.7	6.5
North Devon	5.7	5.7	5.6
South West Devon	3.4	3.2	3.2
Teignbridge	6.2	6.5	6.7
Tiverton and Honiton	4.6	4.5	4.5
Torridge and West Devon	5.6	5.3	5.2
Totnes	6.0	5.7	5.8

Notes:

1. Figures have been rounded to the nearest hundred and quoted in thousands.

2. Cases in August 1998 are allocated to each Parliamentary Constituency by matching postcodes against the 1999 version 1 of the Postcode Directory and in August 1999 and February 2000 against the 1999 version 2 of the Postcode Directory; as such represents Constituency boundaries as at May 1997.

3. Sample sizes 5%, therefore subject to sampling error.

Agoraphobia

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to recognise agoraphobia within the eligibility rules for Disability Living Allowance. [125712]

Mr. Bayley: Eligibility for Disability Living Allowance is based on a person's needs, and not on recognition of their specific medical condition. However, guidance available to decision makers includes agoraphobia as a potentially disabling condition, and the eligibility criteria for the lower rate mobility component of Disability Living Allowance, need for guidance or supervision on unfamiliar routes, may be of particular relevance for people suffering from agoraphobia.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

No-smoking Policy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness of his Department's no-smoking policy and (b) the proportion of his Department's offices that do not allow smoking. [125151]

Jane Kennedy: (a) My Department has a well established "Smoking Policy" designed to provide smoke-free working conditions for those staff who want them, while offering limited, designated, smoking facilities for smokers and help for those who wish to stop smoking. (b) Practical arrangements for the implementation of the smoking policy are the responsibility of local offices located throughout England and Wales and statistics are not held centrally on how many offices do not allow smoking.

I also refer my hon. Friend to the replies given to the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) on 14 December 1999, Official Report, column 125W, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby) on 20 January 2000, Official Report, column 527W.

Legal Aid Board

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the (a) capital value of assets charged to the Legal Aid Board and (b) the interest which accrued in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available. [125359]

Mr. Lock: The capital value of the charge placed on assets by the Legal Aid Board for the last 10 years is shown in the table and is taken from the Legal Aid Board's annual accounts for each of the past 10 years.

Calculation of the interest accrued in each year can be provided only at disproportionate cost as only information on the amount accrued on charges still live at each year-end is readily available.

£000

Financial year	Total value of principal quantified charges	Non-interest bearing principle	Interest bearing principle	Interest accrued as at 31 March of date shown[1]
1990–91	68,019	60,340	7,679	824
1991–92	86,034	62,346	23,688	4,018
1992–93	107,261	63,583	43,678	7,573
1993–94	128,872	66,740	62,132	12,517
1994–95	146,846	67,964	78,882	17,587
1995–96	170,516	71,726	98,790	23,987
1996–97	185,906	72,238	113,668	30,623
1997–98	196,156	72,586	123,570	36,631
1998–99	206,792	74,776	132,016	41,261
1999–2000	209,824	78,258	131,566	43,878

[1] The figures shown in the above table cover live cases at each year end. No data is available on the make up of the movement from one year to the next in terms of new charges added and old ones redeemed.

Crown Court (Ex Post Facto Taxation)

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what estimate he has made of the savings in administrative costs which would result from replacing the present system of the ex post facto taxation of counsels' fees in the Crown court with a combination of an extended graduated fees scheme and individual case contracts. [125358]

Jane Kennedy: No estimates have been made. It will only be possible to do so once the extent of the graduated fee scheme and the contracts have been agreed.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the cost of administering the system of ex post facto taxation of counsels' fees in the Crown court in each of the last 10 years. [125357]

Jane Kennedy: The information requested is not available.

Salaried Defence Service

Mr. Leslie: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he will publish consultation papers on (a) establishing a salaried defence service and draft code of conduct for salaried defenders employed by the Legal Services Commission and (b) choice of representative in criminal proceedings. [126069]

Mr. Lock: Copies of both consultation papers have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. Copies are also available on the Lord Chancellor's Department's website at http://www.open.gov.uk/lcd.

Departmental Expenditure Limits

Mr. Leslie: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what proposals he has to amend the Lord Chancellor's Department's departmental expenditure limit for 2000–01. [126070]

Mr. Lock: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate for Class V, Vote 1, the Lord Chancellor's Department's Departmental Expenditure Limit for 2000–01 will be increased by £10,000,000 from £2,515,609,000 to £2,525,609,000. The increase is in respect of an award from the Capital Modernisation Fund for the "Crown Court Programme".

The increase will be offset by a transfer from the Capital Modernisation Fund and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Penalty Clauses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his answer of 16 May 2000, Official Report, column 16W, on penalty clauses, what penalty payments were made by CSL Group Ltd. [125360]

Mr. Lock: The totals for each financial year are as follows:

Date	Total
1998–99	33,600
1999–2000	113,250
2000–01 to date	1,400
Total	148,250

CABINET OFFICE

No-smoking Policy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness of her Department's no-smoking policy and (b) the proportion of her Department's offices that do not allow smoking. [125160]

Mr. Stringer: (a) The effectiveness of my Department's no-smoking policy is not specifically measured.

(b) 100 per cent. However, designated smoking rooms are provided in each of the offices occupied by my Department. I also refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) on 21 December 1999, Official Report, column 574W.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office, pursuant to her answer of 19 January 2000, Official Report, column 443W, concerning contracts, if she will list the companies concerned and whether these contracts were subject to a competitive tendering process. [124825]

Mr. Stringer: Details of companies concerned and whether they were subject to a competitive tendering process are given in the table:

Name of company	Competitively tendered
AT Kearney	No
BMRB International	No
Close, Morton and Company	No
Competitive Contract Services	No
Garavi Gujarat	No
Hymans Robertson[1]	Yes
Opinion Leader Research	No
Pannell Kerr Forster/Knight Frank	Yes
PriceWaterhouseCoopers[1]	Yes
Rawlings and Co.[1]	No
Schneider-Ross	Yes
South Thames Consultancy	Yes

[1] Two contracts

Specified Advisers

Miss Kirkbride: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many Special Advisers employed by the Government are (a) men, (b) women and (c) from ethnic minorities; and how many attended (i) a state school and (ii) Oxford or Cambridge. [125565]

Mr. Stringer: At 12 June, of the 79 Special Advisers in post, 20 are women. In response to a voluntary survey, the number identified from ethnic minorities are five or less. The exact number is not identified in order to protect the identity of the individuals in line with guidance in the Government Statistical Service Code of Practice. Information relating to the educational background of Special Advisers is not held centrally.

Government Car and Despatch Agency

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many cars the Government Car and Despatch Agency has purchased since May 1997. [125555]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Since May 1997 the Government Car Service, which is part of the Government Car and Despatch Agency, has purchased 126 cars.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 14 June 2000

HEALTH

Mead Webber

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the (a) lowest and (b) highest HAS scores formally awarded to the Mead Webber plant since the introduction of HAS scores; what was the average score; and what were the (a) lowest, (b) highest and (c) average HAS scores awarded to the plant by Mr. Yogaratnam. [122051]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 15 May 2000]: I am advised by the Food Standards Agency that the lowest hygiene assessment system (HAS) score awarded to the Mead Webber plant since the system was introduced is 65; the highest 87 and the average 82.

The lowest HAS score awarded to the plant by Mr. Yogaratnam is 80; the highest 87; and the average 84.

NHS Patients (Food)

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average cost was of food for each patient in each year since 1985 in (a) Bolton Hospitals NHS Trusts, (b) North West NHS hospitals and (c) NHS hospitals in England. [122594]

Mr. Denham: Information on the cost of food was collected centrally for the first time in the 1998–99 financial year.

The cost of meal provision per patient per day for Bolton Hospitals National Health Service Trust was £4.39.

The total cost of meal provision for the North West Region was £41,291,201.

The total cost of meal provision for England was £255,868,647.

NHS Hospitals (Cleaning)

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what the average cost was of directly provided cleaning per square metre for each year since 1985 in (a) Bolton Hospitals NHS Trust, (b) North West NHS hospitals and (c) NHS hospitals in England; [122596]

(2) what the average cost was of contracted-out cleaning per square metre for each year since 1985 in (a) Bolton Hospitals NHS Trust, (b) North West NHS hospitals and (c) NHS hospitals in England. [122595]

Mr. Denham: Information was collected centrally for the first time in the 1998–99 financial year. However these data cannot be split between contracted out and directly provided services.

Xenotransplantation

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many incidents of (a) virus infection and (b) horizontal gene transfer, broken down by the (i) place, (ii) date and (iii) exact nature of each incident, have occurred as a result of xenotransplantation procedures; and if he will make a statement; [125265]

(2) what safety precautions are implemented (a) during and (b) after xenotransplantation research procedures in order to minimise (i) virus infection and (ii) horizontal gene transfer. [125264]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 9 June 2000]: The safety of research into xenotransplantation is governed by various regulations. A summary of the agencies involved and regulations that might apply is contained in guidance on making proposals to conduct xenotransplantation on human subjects (UKXIRA 1998). Copies are available in the Library.

The Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1995 (RIDDOR) requires employers to notify the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) of incidents occurring in the workplace that result in the ill health of employees. The HSE has advised that data sets for reports under RIDDOR for the financial years 1994–95 to 1998–99 contained no reports of infection attributed to xenotransplantation procedures.

No clinical trials involving humans have yet been approved in the United Kingdom. Our position remains that clinical trials in xenotransplantation involving humans will be allowed to take place only when we are fully satisfied that the risks associated with such procedures are acceptable, taking account of all the available evidence at the time.

Diabetes

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the report, "Diabetes in the UK-the Missing Million"; and if he will make a statement. [125738]

Mr. Denham: We welcome the report, which will help to raise awareness of the seriousness of diabetes. We announced last year the development of a National Service Framework for diabetes in England. The diabetes National Service Framework will be published in 2001 for implementation in the National Health Service from 2002. Its aim is to improve health outcomes for people with diabetes, by raising the quality of services and reducing variations between them.

Air Ambulance Services

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much funding the Government contributed towards the financing of the North West air ambulance, and how many times the air ambulance has been called out in the North West, in the last year for which figures are available. [125959]

Ms Stuart: Air ambulances are not funded from National Health Service central funds. The North West air ambulance launched 480 missions in its first year, 1999–2000.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fishing

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the financial effect on the Government of the EU Commissioners' proposal to achieve the required reduction in fishing for MAGP IV exclusively through cuts in fleet capacity; and what fleet cuts would be required in Britain for the remaining 18 months of the programme. [124452]

Mr. Morley: If adopted, the suggested measures would require a cut in the UK fishing fleet of 8 per cent. over the two years 2001–02, representing about 22,000 tonnes of capacity.

It is not possible to make an accurate estimate of the likely cost of decommissioning this tonnage through a voluntary grant scheme. Based on the average level of successful bids under the most recent scheme in 1997, it would be about £75 million. But the cost would be substantially higher since there would have to be sizeable cuts in those profitable fleet segments which have hitherto shown little interest in voluntary decommissioning schemes. Cuts of this scale over such a time period are not ones we think are feasible or that we could support.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Presser: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 3 May 2000, Official Report, column 140W, on live animal exports, what steps he plans to take to reduce the number of sheep originating from Kent which need to be removed by his staff at Dover port from consignments of slaughter/further fattening sheep; and if he will make a statement. [124888]

Mr. Morley: Careful consideration is already given to the reasons why individual sheep are found to be unfit at Dover so that steps can be taken to deal with any remediable cause.

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 1 March 2000, Official Report, column 286W, on live animal exports, how many sheep were rejected by local veterinary inspectors from 31 May to 31 December 1999 as unfit to travel, broken down by county in England and Wales. [125135]

Mr. Morley: The updated numbers of sheep rejected by local veterinary inspectors as unfit to travel for the period 31 May to 31 December 1999 according to counties of origin are as follows:

Country/county	Number
England
Herefordshire	506
North Yorkshire	3,726
Shropshire	3
Scotland
Dumfries and Galloway	17
Lanarkshire	6
Mid-Lothian	1
Wales
Denbighshire	6,547
Monmouthshire	10
Powys	600
Wrexham	1,143
Total	12,559

Notes:
1. Nil returns for all other counties
2. All figures are provisional and subject to change

Tuberculosis

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the terms on which compensation is granted to farmers in the tuberculosis study areas; and what allowance there is for consequential loss. [125800]

Ms Quin [holding answer 13 June 2000]: When cattle are slaughtered following a positive reaction to the tuberculin skin test, the farmer receives compensation of 100 per cent. of their market value. No compensation is given for consequential losses. Compensation arrangements are the same both inside and outside badger culling trial areas.

Pigs (Transportation)

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his policy on the transportation of pigs in farrowing crates. [125747]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 13 June 2000]: Farrowing crates are used to prevent sows from crushing their young piglets. They are not used to transport pigs.

Animal Import Licences

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the current importation licences which permit the importation of cynomolgus monkeys and wild-caught baboons into the UK for xenotransplantation research, indicating for each licence (a) the number of non-human primates involved, (b) the origin of the primates and (c) the expiry date of the licence; and if he will make a statement. [125302]

Ms Quin [holding answer 9 June 2000]: A list of the current import licences for cynomolgus monkeys (macaca fascicularis, otherwise known as crab-eating macaques), with expiry dates, is as follows. The animals are intended for research purposes but this Department does not require the type of research to be specified on the licence application. There are no current import licences for the importation of baboons.

Agricultural Workers

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of agricultural/horticultural workers in Cheshire are in (a) part-time and (b) full-time employment; how many receive the national minimum wage; how many of the part-time employees are female; and if he will make a statement on the retention of the Agricultural Wages Board. [124785]

Ms Quin: The 1999 June Agricultural and Horticultural Census recorded 3,938 agricultural and horticultural workers in Cheshire (excluding farmers and managers). Of this total 23 per cent. were in part-time employment and 77 per cent. were in full-time employment. The agricultural work force in Cheshire included 868 regular part-time workers of which 408 were female. In addition 300 casual or seasonal workers were employed on a part-time basis. We have no information on the gender of these workers or any data on rates of pay on a county basis.

All agricultural workers should receive at least the Agricultural Minimum Wage set under the Agricultural Wages Order. All such rates are above the national minimum wage.

The review of the operation of the Agricultural Wages Board—one of the regular, standard reviews—is ongoing. The consultation period closed on 31 March and the responses which were received are being considered.

Frozen Beef Imports

Sir Michael Spicer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish an assessment of the animal health and safety welfare standards in countries from which the United Kingdom imports frozen beef. [124675]

Ms Quin [holding answer 5 June 2000]: All consignments of fresh or frozen beef meat imported into the UK, whether from other EU member states or third countries, must have been produced in accordance with the harmonised Community rules laid down in Council Directive 64/433/EEC. Ensuring that these rules are adhered to is the responsibility of the European Commission and reports of their veterinary inspection visits to a number of these countries are available on their website at the following address:

http://europa.eu.int/comm/dg24/health/vi/reports/index—en.html

On animal welfare, Article 8 of Council Directive 98/58/EC, which lays down minimum standards for the protection of animals kept for farming purposes, requires the European Commission to submit a report on the comparison between animal welfare provisions in the Community and in non-member countries which supply the Community. We await the findings of this report with interest.

EU Beef Labelling

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from the meat industry on the compulsory EU beef labelling scheme; and if he will make a statement. [123297]

Ms Quin: At its meeting in Luxembourg on 17 April the Agriculture Council reached a political agreement on the adoption of a common position on a Commission proposal for a Regulation laying down general rules for a compulsory beef labelling system in the EU. Since then we have received representations from a number of organisations involved in the beef supply chain expressing concerns about the compliance costs, the value of the proposed compulsory indications to consumers and the timescale for implementation.

Particular concern has been expressed about the requirement for beef to be labelled with the category of animal from which it is derived. We fully appreciate these concerns. The requirements may be amended following consideration of the proposed Regulation by the European Parliament.

Farmers

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farmers have left farming in each of the past 10 years. [123462]

Ms Quin [holding answer 23 May 2000]: Information in the form requested is not available. The overall number of main holdings in the agricultural census in the United Kingdom has declined from 256,700 at June 1989 to 239,600 at June 1999. These are net figures, which include holdings coming into, as well as leaving agriculture and will, in many cases, take no account of changes in ownership.

GM Maize (Chardon LL)

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in respect of the proposed decision to add the genetically-modified maize variety Chardon LL to the United Kingdom National List, how much money those making representations have in total paid him for so doing. [121514]

Ms Quin: To date £6,810 has been received in respect of written representations, and £40,280 for requests to be heard by a person appointed by Ministers.

Pig Industry

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce a scheme to compensate pig farmers for the disposal of specified material on the same basis as that which exists for beef farmers. [121769]

Ms Quin: There is no scheme in place which compensates beef farmers or slaughterers for the disposal of specified material. The additional veterinary inspection cost of overseeing the removal and destruction of specified risk material (SRM) from cattle is not presently passed on to cattle slaughterhouse operators but as there are no SRMs in pigs no additional veterinary inspection costs apply.

Sheep Dips

Mr. Curry: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information was provided to regional service centres in December 1999 to assist them in responding to inquiries about the withdrawal of organophosphate sheep dips; and on what date the advice was received by each centre. [120074]

Ms Quin: The withdrawal of organophosphorus sheep dips was announced to Parliament by written answer on 20 December 1999, when a MAFF News Release was also published and was made available on the MAFF website to which all Regional Service Centres have access. Regional Directors were informed of developments at their regular monthly meeting on 20 January and were subsequently provided with further briefing.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

General Affairs Council

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the outcome of the General Affairs Council held in Brussels on 22 and 23 May; and if he will make a statement. [123722]

Mr. Vaz: I wrote to the Chairman of the European Select Committee on 7 June to explain the outcome of the 22–23 May General Affairs Council held in Brussels. Copies of my letter have been deposited in the Libraries of both Houses.

Charities (Forms)

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123947]

Mr. Robin Cook: Although the FCO has contact with many charities and other voluntary organisation, no central record is kept of those contacts and the information sought could be collected only at disproportionate cost.

It is FCO policy, as far as possible, to minimise the administrative burdens it places on the charities and voluntary organisations with which it has dealings.

Ethiopia

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with (a) the Organisation for African Unity and (b) the United Nations, about the war between Ethiopia and Eritrea; and if he will make a statement. [124500]

Mr. Hain [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Our Permanent Representative to the United Nations in New York is in frequent contact with the United Nations Secretary-General and the Algerian OAU Presidency to discuss the war between Ethiopia and Eritrea.

Our Ambassadors in Algeria and Addis Ababa also hold frequent talks with the Algerian OAU Presidency. And our Ambassador in Addis Ababa is in contact with the OAU Secretariat.

Croatia

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to support Croatia's proposed accession to the (a) European Union and (b) World Trade Organisation; and if he will make a statement. [125377]

Mr. Vaz: Her Majesty's Government fully support the EU's Stabilisation and Association process, designed to build stability and prosperity in South East Europe. The 1999 Cologne European Council confirmed that Stabilisation and Association Agreements will offer > a prospect of European Union membership on the basis of the Amsterdam Treaty and fulfilment of the criteria defined at the Copenhagen European Council.

The Commission has produced a study on the feasibility of a Stabilisation and Association Agreement with Croatia recommending that the EU open up negotiations on an Agreement.

We welcome the Commission's effort to reach agreement on the terms of Croatia's WTO accession. Following recent developments, we understand that the key outstanding issues surrounding a market access package have been resolved. We hope that this should open the way to Croatia's accession to the WTO in the near future.

OECD

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total amount paid by Her Majesty's Government to the OECD in respect of membership fees in each of the last three financial years. [125532]

Mr. Hain: The total amount paid by Her Majesty's Government over the last three financial years is £14,151,086.69. The OECD membership fees per year for the last three years are: 1997—£4,845,082.79, 1998—£4,586,554.69, 1999—£4,719,449.21.

We believe that this represents good value for money. The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development provides expert analysis and facilitates policy discussion on a wide range of subjects, including macroeconomic policy, labour market reform, harmful taxation competition, E-commerce, and food safety.

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the countries with which he has discussed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty in the last 12 months. [125768]

Mr. Hain: We have discussed the Treaty on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons with a range of interlocutors as part of our normal bilateral dialogues. It has also been discussed at European Union and G8 summits and at meetings of the United Nations Security Council. The review conference of the treaty in May 2000 offered the opportunity for further bilateral and multilateral discussions. The conference was attended by 155 states parties.

In all appropriate forums, both bilateral and multilateral, we have made clear our commitment to the treaty and our determination that all those states which are not party to it should proceed towards accession as soon as possible.

Chechnya

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with his European and NATO colleagues concerning the protection of inhabitants of the Caucasus against Chechnyan forces. [125894]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 13 June 2000]: We have had regular discussions with international colleagues about the Chechnya conflict, including in the EU, NATO, the OSCE and other international fora. Such discussions have regularly included discussion of the impact of the crisis on regional stability.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Chechnyan rebel leaders concerning the jihad in the Caucasus. [125893]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 13 June 2000]: Neither I nor my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary have had meetings with Chechen warlords. Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials have from time to time met Chechen representatives. In such contacts we have condemned terrorism and made clear our concern about the level of violence and reported human rights abuses on both sides in the Chechen conflict.

European Social Charter

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will ratify the 1996 revised European Social Charter of the Council of Europe signed on 7 November 1997. [125795]

Mr. Vaz [holding answer 13 June 2000]: We are continuing to review ratification of the Revised European Social Charter and consultations will continue on the provisions that we might accept upon ratification.

UNMOVIC

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Government have taken to ensure that there is adequate Arab representation within the UNMOVIC inspection teams. [125142]

Mr. Hain: This is a matter for UNMOVIC's Executive Chairman, Dr. Hans Blix. The UK is in favour of UNMOVIC staff being drawn from the broadest possible geographical base, as called for under United Nations Security Council resolution 1284. We urge all UN members to respond positively to Dr. Blix's requests for staff.

Russian Federation

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to refer breaches of the European Convention on Human Rights by the Russian Federation in Chechnya to the European Court of Human Rights under Article 33 of the Convention; and if he will make a statement. [125990]

Mr. Vaz: We have considered with our EU partners the possibility of bringing an interstate action against Russia under Article 33 of the European Convention on Human Rights. We and other EU states have pursued other means of ensuring accountability for alleged human rights abuses in Chechnya, notably at the 56th Session of the Commission of Human Rights. An EU-drafted Resolution was passed, registering major concerns, including the need for an independent Commission of Inquiry meeting international standards. With EU partners, we have agreed that this type of international pressure, rather than an interstate complaint, was the clearest way of indicating our concern over the situation in Chechnya.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is the Government's policy to support the proposed suspension of the Russian Federation from the Council of Europe in accordance with Recommendation 1456 (2000) of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. [125991]

Mr. Vaz: We share the concerns expressed in Recommendation 1456 of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe (CoE) and have taken every opportunity, bilaterally and in company with our EU partners, to impress on Russia the need to comply with its human rights obligations. However, we share the EU position that it is preferable to continue to bring pressure to bear through engagement within the CoE rather than to isolate Russia by suspension.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Queen's Counsels

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what restrictions on the use of QCs have been introduced (a) by Government Departments and (b) through legal aid funding, indicating in each case what savings to public funds he estimates will be made as a result; and if he will make a statement. [125533]

The Solicitor-General: I have been asked to reply.

Dealing first with (a), whenever a Government Department in England and Wales wishes to brief a QC to appear in court on a civil matter, a legal adviser of a designated level of seniority must seek a nomination from the Law Officers of a particular Queen's Counsel with the appropriate expertise. Each such nomination has to be approved personally by the Attorney General or by me before instructions can be sent. This procedure has been in operation for some years. It means that QCs are the exception, not the rule. The two First Treasury Counsel are both junior counsel and they will advise and represent the Government without Queen's Counsel in many of its important civil cases. In addition there are four panels of junior Counsel whom Departments are expected to use for the majority of the Government's civil litigation.

With regard to legal aid funding, in civil matters, Queen's Counsel should not be instructed by a solicitor acting for a publicly funded party unless prior authority has been given by the Legal Services Commission either in the certificate or subsequently by the Area Director. The Legal Services Commission issues Guidance on the use of Queen's Counsel and on making an application for prior authority.

In criminal matters before the higher courts, judges have powers to allow a Queen's Counsel for the defence in the following cases: (a) on a charge of murder; (b) where it appears to the court making the order that the case is one of exceptional difficulty, gravity or complexity and that a Queen's Counsel is required in the interests of justice; or (c) where the prosecution is being brought by the Serious Fraud Office. The Lord Chancellor has been consulting on changes to this rule to control the use of QCs more strictly. The consultation is substantially concluded and he will shortly be laying regulations which will have the effect of restricting the use of QCs to cases where the prosecution have instructed a QC or Senior Treasury Counsel or the defence case is exceptional when judged against other offences of the same type and the defence case for that defendant involves substantial, novel or complex issues of law or fact which in the opinion of the court could properly be handled by a QC. Judges will be asked to endorse a written application stating how the criteria are met. This will allow the effect of the change to be monitored.

It is impossible to predict how many Government cases in the future will justify the appointment of a QC or, consequently, what cost savings are made by the operation of these procedures.

Legal Aid

Mr. Geraint Davies: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many legal firms deal with legal aid work; and what the number was in 1996. [125434]

Mr. Lock: The information is not readily available in the form requested, and can be provided only at disproportionate cost. The Legal Services Commission, which replaced the Legal Aid Board on 1 April 2000, records payments made to solicitors offices and not solicitors firms. One firm may have several offices, but the Commission's payment system cannot identify them as belonging to the same firm.

During the period April 1996 to 31 March 1997, 10,739 offices received legal aid payments. The most recent figure available is for the period 1 April 1998 to 31 March 1999, when the number was 10,751. The figure for 1999–2000 is not yet available but will appear in the Legal Aid Board's final annual report which will be laid before Parliament in July 2000.

Barristers

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what his policy is with regard to the exercise of his powers under the Access to Justice Act 1999 and the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990 on the formation of partnerships between barristers. [125432]

Mr. Lock: The Lord Chancellor has no statutory powers with regard to the formation of partnerships between barristers.

The Lord Chancellor's powers under Schedule 4 to the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, as amended by schedule 5 to the Access to Justice Act 1999, enable him only to strike down and replace a professional body's rules if they unreasonably restrict a right of audience or to conduct litigation, or the exercise of such a right.

The rules preventing barristers forming partnerships are entirely a matter for the Bar Council.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Alcohol (River Boats)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many alcohol-related incidents were reported to police on or relating to Thames river boats in (a) 1990–91, (b) 1992–93, (c) 1994–95, (d) 1996–97 and (e) 1998–99. [125446]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This information is not available.

Immigration

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many citizens of the European Community or European Economic Area, or members of their families, were (a) questioned, (b) searched and (c) detained in (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999; and how the powers in these respects are exercised and at what location, in respect of those travelling by rail through the channel tunnel. [125385]

Mrs. Roche: The information requested is not available. European Economic Area (EEA) nationals are normally admitted to the United Kingdom on production of a valid passport or identity card as evidence of nationality and identity, in accordance with Article 3(1) of the Immigration (European Economic Area) Order 1994 ("the EEA Order") and subject of Article 15(1) of the EEA Order. Under Article 3(3) of the EEA Order, an accompanying family member of an EEA national who is not himself an EEA national will normally be admitted to the United Kingdom, although he may, in addition, be required to hold an EEA family permit issued abroad.

Under Article 15(1) of the EEA Order, immigration officers on arrival may refuse to admit a person if his exclusion is justified on grounds of public policy, public security or public health. This applies when the person is travelling by rail through the channel tunnel or by any other means of transport.

Powers for immigration officers to question passengers arriving in the United Kingdom, whether they are citizens of the European Union or European Economic Area, or their accompanying (third country) relatives, are contained in paragraph 2 of Schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971. Schedule 2 applies to the examination of (EEA) nationals in accordance with Article 20(2)(e) of the EEA Order. Under paragraph 4(3) of Schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971, a person who is examined under paragraph 2 of Schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971 may be searched, and his belongings examined, and that person may be detained under paragraph 16 of Schedule 2 of the Immigration Act 1971.

These powers are normally exercised where the passenger first encounters the immigration officer or, in the case of a person examined on board a train, immediately on his arrival in the United Kingdom.

Child Abuse

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he takes to ensure that alleged cases of institutional child abuse are thoroughly investigated. [125750]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Although the conduct of criminal investigations is a matter for the chief officer of police, the police have a duty and responsibility to investigate all criminal offences. Investigations into allegations of criminal offences against children in particular, should be carried out sensitively, thoroughly and professionally.

The Home Office has worked with the Department of Health and the Department for Education and Employment to publish guidance—"Working Together to Safeguard Children"—which sets out how all agencies and professionals should work together to promote children's welfare and to protect them from abuse and neglect.

In addition, following the North Wales Child Abuse Report (the Waterhouse Report) "Lost in Care", the Government agreed there was a need for an inter-agency review of best practice in conducting complex abuse investigations and that a Review Group would be established to take forward this work, bringing together representatives from the Home Office, Department of Health, Local Government Association, Association of Directors of Social Services and the Association of Chief Police Officers.

Ronald Maddison

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people (a) have voluntarily contacted the police, (b) the police have contacted and (c) the police estimate they will wish to contact in connection with the Wiltshire Constabulary inquiry into the death of Ronald Maddison. [125989]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I understand from the Wiltshire Constabulary that no-one has contacted them on their own initiative in connection with the inquiry into the death of Ronald Maddison; that the force has so far been in contact with 12 people in this connection; and that it is not possible to estimate the final number who may be contacted. The inquiry into Mr. Maddison's death is just one aspect of a wider inquiry into events at Porton Down over many years.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will direct that the relevant local authorities and regional assemblies be given the opportunity to be involved in all discussions between the National Asylum Support Service and the private agencies and landlords in the allocation of asylum seekers to different localities. [125278]

Mrs. Roche: The National Asylum Support Service (NASS) is fully committed to consulting the regional consortiums as part of the negotiation process in dispersing asylum seekers. We recognise the importance of local knowledge and expertise and NASS has an established consultation process for the procurement of accommodation. It would not be practicable to give individual local authorities and regional assemblies the opportunity to be involved in all discussions with private agencies and landlords. NASS must strike the right balance between the need to consult and the need, for example, to secure accommodation within reasonable timescales.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department to what extent the size of the local Islamic community and the availability of support workers in the education and social services departments and voluntary agencies is taken into account by the National Asylum Support Service in the allocation of asylum seekers to local authorities. [125279]

Mrs. Roche: Wherever possible we disperse asylum seekers to areas where there is an established community of the same language. We also take into account any other local factors brought to our attention during the consultation process with the local regional consortium. The voluntary agencies are establishing "one stop shops" where asylum seekers can receive help and advice.

Resident and Community Groups

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much money has been made available for spending under the Government's policy for community involvement by residents' and community groups since May 1997; and if he will make a statement. [124261]

Mr. Boateng: The Home Office spent £170,000 in 1999–2000 under the Community Resource Fund, and is likely to spend a similar amount during this financial year. £325,000 was spent under the Community Development Learning Fund with £650,000 to be made available for 2000–01. Both these funds were established as a result of recommendations contained in the Policy Action Team 9 Report on Community Self-Help, and are aimed at enabling small and emerging community groups in deprived areas to access funds as easily and quickly as possible.

Other departments also resource this activity. The hon. Member may wish to seek further information from, in particular, my right. hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, and the Secretary of State for the Department for Education and Employment.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

No-smoking Policy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness of her Department's no-smoking policy and (b) the proportion of her Department's offices that do not allow smoking. [125161]

Mr. Foulkes: Our smoking policy, which allows smoking in designated areas only, has been very effective. We have two offices in London and East Kilbride where smoking is permitted only in five designated areas which account for between 1 per cent. and 2 per cent. of the total available space.

Croatia

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if Know How Fund aid to Croatia has been increased since the election of the new Government; and if she will make a statement. [125376]

Clare Short: Our bilateral allocation to Croatia is £1 million in the current financial year, increasing to £1.5 million in each of the two following years. Our share of the EU programme to Croatia in 2000 is just over £2 million.

Our aim is to complement the funding available through the EU and the international financial institutions to which we contribute. Since the election of the new Government we have discussed with the Croatian authorities several areas of possible support to their reform programme. Where our current funding allocations are insufficient to support good proposals put to us by the Croatian authorities, I shall consider transferring uncommitted funds from within the overall allocation for Central and South Eastern Europe.

Mangrove Swamps

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what aid is being given towards the preservation of mangrove swamps in (a) the West Indies and (b) the Indian Ocean. [123245]

Clare Short: My Department supports a number of programmes and activities related to the sustainable use and conservation of coastal ecosystems, including coral reefs and seagrass as well as mangrove swamps. Current programmes at least in part related to the preservation of mangrove swamps in the West Indies and the Indian Ocean include: the Turks and Caicos Islands Coastal Resource Management Project to develop institutional capacity; support to the Organisation of Eastern Caribbean States (OECS) for capacity building in coastal resource management; promotion of participatory natural resource management through the Caribbean Natural Resources Institute (CANARI); the State Forest Management project in Grenada; rehabilitation of coastal mangroves in Bangladesh as part of a project to increase fish and shrimp production; and development of community management of coastal ecosystems at Mafia Island in Tanzania.

Other on-going activities we support include the International Coral Reef Initiative (ICRI) and preparatory work for the African Partnership Conference on the Development and Protection of the Coastal and Marine Environment of Africa.

In addition, recently completed work includes support to the preparation of the South Africa White Paper on Sustainable Coastal Development containing provisions for the protection of degraded and threatened ecosystems, and research on the coastal lagoons of Sri Lanka. I will send my hon. Friend a copy of the findings and recommendations of this research project on participatory approaches to natural resource management.

This answer does not include any assistance which may be given by other Government Departments.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

SSA (Leeds)

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the standard spending assessment for education in Leeds in (a) 1998–99, (b) 1999–2000 and (c) 2000–01 and the actual spending and planned spending by the local authority on education in those years. [125425]

Ms Estelle Morris: The following table sets out, for Leeds Local Education Authority, the Education Standard Spending Assessment for (a) 1998–99 (b) 1999–2000 and (c) 2000–01; the planned spending by the local authority on education for each of these years; the actual spending on education for 1998–99, the latest year for which such information is available; and the total resources available per pupil (5–15) through SSA and special and specific grant for all three years.

	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01
Education SSA (£ million)	278.7	292.4	306.6
Budget (£ million)	297	306.6	315.2
Net revenue expenditure (£ million)	292.6	—	—
SSA + Special and Specific Grant per pupil (5–15) (£)	2,505	2,683	2,937

Note:
Budget figures are based on education budgeted net revenue expenditure taken from information reported by the authority on the RA and RA(SG) forms. The comparable outturn figure is based on information on the RO1, RS and RG Outturn forms. Net revenue expenditure figures include an estimate of education CERA made centrally, based on information in the forms.

Key Stage 2 (Marking)

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many end of Key Stage 2 (a) mathematics and (b) science test papers were returned for a review of marking in each of the past four years. [124894]

Ms Estelle Morris: Information on the number of end of Key Stage 2 mathematics and science test papers returned for a review of marking is available only for the past three years.

The number of tests papers returned for review of marking were:

	Mathematics	Science
1999	1,658	1,870
1998	1,283	3,967
1997	1,563	2,577

Allington School Site

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he will announce a decision about the sale of the Allington School site in Chippenham. [125716]

Jacqui Smith: The application from Wiltshire County Council to sell the former Allington School site has been put on hold, at the request of the County Council, pending further discussions between the County Council, North Wiltshire District Council and Chippenham Town Council over the provision of additional playing fields in Chippenham.

Early-years Education

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many additional free early years education places would be required to meet the Government's target of free places being available for 66 per cent. of three-year-olds by 2002 for (a) England and (b) each local education authority in London. [122710]

Ms Hodge [holding answer 19 May 2000]: 190,000 additional new free early years education places for three-year-olds will be made available over the next three years using the £390 million allocated by the Government. This will allow us to meet the national target of providing 66 per cent. of all three-year-olds in England with a free place.

We are seeking to target those children in most social need. To this end different targets have been set with different local authorities to reflect their position on the Government's Index of Local Deprivation.

The following table shows the estimated number of new places required in the local education authorities in London to contribute to taking the national figure to 66 per cent. It also shows our estimate of the percentage of three-year-olds in each area who will have a free place by April 2001.

Local education authority area	New places required to reach national target of 66%	% of children expected to have free places by April 2001

Pre-school Learning

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what financial support his Department has given to the Pre-school Learning Alliance in each year since April 1997. [123102]

Ms Hodge: The Department has provided the following Financial Support to the Pre-school Learning Alliance (PLA) since 1997:

	Marketing, quality and training infrastructure	Section 64 grant: core funding	Total
1997–98	1,578,000	420,000	1,998,000
1998–99	1,585,000	420,000	2,005,000
1999–2000	1,590,000	420,000	2,010,000
2000–01	1,600,000	450,000	2,050,000
Total	6,353,000	1,710,000	8,063,000

During the same period £640 million has been made available to fund places for three and four-year-olds—around 50 per cent. went to the voluntary sector. I am encouraged that over 80 per cent. of new free nursery places for three-year-olds created during 1999–2000 were in the voluntary and private sectors.

In March, I announced that, for the third year running, we are making available £500,000 for a further round of small grants for pre-schools and playgroups facing financial difficulties. This will give groups breathing space in which to consider their longer term plans.

In recognition of the challenges facing the sector we have announced the provision of £250,000 for specific projects to help pre-schools and playgroups develop and grow, as the early years sector expands.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

London Underground

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 12 May 2000, Official Report, column 483–84W, on London Underground, if he will list (a) train, (b) signal and (c) track failures in each financial year for each line of the London Underground. [125281]

Mr. Hill: This is an operational matter for London Underground Ltd. (LUL). The figures requested are not standard London Underground performance measures and data are not kept in this format. Therefore to provide the figures on a line by line basis would incur disproportionate cost.

Registered Social Landlords

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will list (a) those local authorities which have transferred some or all of their housing stock to registered social landlords, (b) the name of the registered social landlord to which the stock has been transferred, (c) the average rent increase or decrease determined by the registered social landlord in each financial year since the transfer and (d) the rent collected by the registered social landlord as a percentage of the total rent due in each financial year since the transfer; [124258]

(2) if he will list those registered social landlords to which local authority housing stock has been transferred which have failed to satisfy the performance indicators set by the Housing Corporation, for each financial year since the stock was transferred, and in each case give details of the specific performance indicators they failed. [124259]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 8 June 2000]: The information requested, that is readily available, has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

However, information about rent increases and decreases has been collected as part of the Housing Corporation's performance indicators only since 1995–96. Information on rent increases for transfer tenants and for new tenants is not collected separately. The rent differential between these two groups can be over 20 per cent. It would be misleading to provide an average figure combining rent increase and decrease figures for transfer tenants and new tenants.

The Housing Corporation has collected a range of performance indicators since 1993–94. Since April 1998, RSLs have been expected to achieve set levels of performance in certain key areas of housing management. In view of this, a list of RSLs to which local authority housing stock has been transferred which failed to satisfy the performance indicators set by the Housing Corporation is available only for the years 1997–98 and 1998–99.

Housing Investment Programme

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what were the (a) cash and (b) percentage changes to the Housing Investment Programme in the London boroughs of (i) Kensington and Chelsea and (ii) Westminster in each year since 1992. [125421]

Mr. Mullin: Kensington and Chelsea's and Westminster's Housing Investment Programme allocations for 1992–93 to 2000–01 were as set out in the table. The figures for 1997–98 to 1999–2000 include the allocations made through the Capital Receipts Initiative.

Thameslink

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures he will take to ensure that Railtrack minimises inconvenience to passengers travelling to London from stations on the northern section of the Thameslink line, during the construction of the Thameslink 2000 project; and if he will make a statement. [125591]

Mr. Hill: The shadow Strategic Rail Authority is already working closely with Railtrack to construct replacement timetables for services disrupted by the engineering works for Thameslink 2000. These discussions supplement the normal 30 week notice period Railtrack must give to Train Operating Companies in order to undertake long planned work, and the aim is to reduce disruptions to the minimum.

Rail Sleeper Services

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will take steps to encourage the reinstatement of discontinued sleeper services between the North of England and London. [125549]

Mr. Hill: These services were withdrawn some years ago by the British Railways Board as they were no longer financially viable. Since then journey times and opportunities on North of England services have been substantially improved both early in the morning and late into the evening. The Franchising Director has no plans to include North of England sleeper services in Passenger Service Requirements at present, since there is little perceived demand. These services could be provided by train operators in the future if there is an adequate commercial basis for their provision. Financial support could be sought through the making of an appropriate Rail Passenger Partnership bid.

Jubilee Line

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reasons Jubilee Line services to Charing Cross have been discontinued; what consultation took place before the withdrawal; and if he will make a statement. [125606]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 12 June 2000]: It was decided to extend the Jubilee Line from Green Park to Stratford via Westminster and Waterloo, omitting Charing Cross for engineering, cost and passenger benefit reasons. London Underground Limited did not undergo a consultation period before the withdrawal of the service since Part Five, Section 38 of the London Underground Act 1992 (giving construction powers) excluded them from any need to do so. However, throughout the time the Bill was going through Parliament London Underground made clear their intention to close the Charing Cross Jubilee platforms.

Connex South Central

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make it a requirement for the successful bidder for the Connex South Central franchise to include firm proposals to reopen the Lewes-Uckfield railway line. [125610]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 12 June 2000]: Negotiations for a replacement South Central franchise are at an advanced stage. The Deputy Prime Minister has asked the Franchising Director to evaluate the bids against the following criteria: commitment to secure better performance and customer services, the extent to which extra or earlier investment can be secured, the extent to which passengers will be given a greater voice in the level and standard of services, and value for money to the taxpayer. All the investment proposals contained in bids will be evaluated against these criteria.

Rail Passenger Committees

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what safeguards he proposes to put in place to secure the independence in respect of policy making of the rail passenger committees. [125608]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The recently renamed Rail Passengers Committees will continue to have the freedom to express their independent views under the sponsorship of the Strategic Rail Authority as they currently do under the sponsorship of the Office of the Rail Regulator. Although the SRA will sponsor the RPCs, the Secretary of State will continue to appoint the Chairmen of the RPCs and the Chairman of the national Rail Passengers' Council.

Bog Areas (Conservation)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to ensure that appropriate hydrological and management regimes are established by 2005 in all lowland raised bog areas which have been damaged but still retain nature conservation interest. [125773]

Mr. Mullin: The Biodiversity Habitat action plan for Lowland Raised Bogs, published in October 1999, and placed in the Library of the House, sets out the planned action for restoring this habitat to favourable conservation status in the UK.

English Nature is the Lead Agency for co-ordination of action and work plans by the organisations identified in the plan. The plan acknowledges that a list must first be drawn up to decide which bogs require action to be taken.

Some bogs are included in the list of Candidate Special Areas of Conservation under the EC Habitats Directive which is currently under review. The Government will ensure that activities on or around candidate SACs which may damage their hydrology and are subject to formal permissions or licences are reviewed, including planning consents and activities licensed by the statutory water regulators. This could lead to a number of different outcomes to remove the source of damage.

Dog Identification

Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how often the Working Party on Dog Identification has met; what items were on its agenda when it met; who has given evidence or provided reports or submissions to it; what means of dog identification are being considered by it; what methods of enforcement of dog identification are being considered by it; and if it will receive and consider submissions from members of the public. [125874]

Mr. Hill: The Dog Identification Working Group (DIG) was set up to consider the issues surrounding the permanent identification of dogs in England. The Group will produce a report to reflect a consensus view on all the available options for dog identification and this is expected in the Summer. No decisions will be taken until I have fully considered the report.

The Working Group has met on eight occasions, the first meeting was held on 17 May 1999 and chaired by the then Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale). The Agenda items of these meetings have been wide ranging to cover all the issues surrounding dog identification. Among the issues the Group has discussed are existing voluntary schemes, different methods of enforcement, a Dog Registration Consultation Paper from the Pet Advisory Committee, International Experience of dog identification schemes, a public education and marketing strategy and the use of databases. The Group has considered a wide range of evidence relevant to its terms of reference—copies of this will be contained in annexes to the Group's report. All forms of identification are being considered including possible future developments in technology. Enforcement is a matter which will be covered by the Group's report. When I have received the Group's report, I will consider the recommendations and whether any further consultation is required.

Gas Safety

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent representations he has received regarding the installation of excess gas flow valves in public sector housing. [124870]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The Health and Safety Executive (HSE), on behalf of the Health and Safety Commission, is undertaking a fundamental review of the current health and safety regime for the installation and use of gas to determine whether, or how far changes are needed to the existing system of control. As part of the consultation process, HSE has received three representations from a UK supplier of excess gas flow valves about the safety case for fitting these valves in domestic premises generally, including public sector housing. I am also aware of a similar representation made recently to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which local authorities have fitted excess gas flow valves to their housing stock; and how many have been fitted. [124872]

Mr. Mullin [holding answer 12 June 2000]: I have been advised by the Health and Safety Executive that it is aware of 21 local authorities and three housing associations that have specified and are fitting excess gas flow valves, as set out in the list. I have no information about the numbers that have been fitted.

Local authorities and housing associations known to be specifying and fitting excess gas flow valves

Local Authorities

- Birmingham city council
- Bristol city council

Two-wheeled Vehicles

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures the Government have pursued since 1 May 1997 (a) to promote the wider use of powered two-wheelers and (b) to improve their safety. [125453]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 12 June 2000]: "A New Deal for Transport: Better for Everyone" recognised that there are circumstances in which mopeds and motorcycles can have a role to play in integrated transport. We have thus:

- established an Advisory Group on Motorcycling;
- advised local authorities to take account of the contribution powered two wheelers are making in delivering integrated transport policies.

We have taken action to improve the safety of motorcyclists by:

- making changes to the theory and practical driving tests—resulting better driving standards will benefit all vulnerable road users;
- announcing a package of measures for improving training and testing for riders of mopeds and motorcycles;
- since June 1999, requiring, along with EU partners, the design and construction of newly designed models of motorcycles to be approved and verified to appropriate safety and environmental standards;
- committing, in "Tomorrow's Roads: Safer for Everyone", to further measures that will improve the safety of motorcyclists over the next 10 years.

The Highways Agency's new strategic plan for safety, "Making the Network Safer", includes actions to reduce risks to motorcyclists travelling on trunk roads and motorways.

Telecommunications Masts

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to declare a moratorium on further planning applications for new telecommunications masts pending the outcome of the announced review of planning policy; and when he expects to complete this review. [125889]

Ms Beverley Hughes [holding answer 13 June 2000]: The Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones, set up at the instigation of the Government and chaired by Sir William Stewart FRS FRSE, has considered the possible health effects of the use of mobile phones, base stations and transmitters. The Group published its report on 11 May.

The Group concluded that

- the balance of evidence indicates that there is no general risk to the health of people living near to base stations on the basis that exposures are expected to be small fractions of guidelines. However, there can be indirect adverse effects on their well-being in some cases.

The Group recommended that for all base stations, including those with masts under 15m, permitted development rights for their erection be revoked and that the siting of all new base stations should be subject to the normal planning process.

In its response to the report, also issued on 11 May and placed in the Libraries of both Houses, the Government said that they were minded to introduce a requirement for an application for full planning permission for all new telecommunications masts, but would need to consult widely before doing so, including on the principle and precise scope of any new arrangements. We aim to issue a consultation document in the summer, with a view to being able to introduce revised procedures and guidance by the end of the year.

The Group does not recommend a moratorium on further planning applications for new telecommunications masts pending the outcome of our review, or at all, and the Government have no plans to introduce such a moratorium.

Class 175 Trains

Mrs. Betty Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the new Class 175 trains will be brought into service on the North Wales Coast Route; and what the reasons are for the late delivery. [125796]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 13 June 2000]: The train operating company, First North Western, hopes to introduce the new trains into service late this year. Delay in their introduction is due to technical difficulties.

Neighbourhood Renewal

Mr. Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to monitor the effectiveness of cross-departmental initiatives aimed at neighbourhood renewal and urban regeneration. [124272]

Ms Armstrong: My Department commissions in-depth evaluations to assess the effectiveness of initiatives aimed at neighbourhood renewal and urban regeneration. These evaluations are concerned with effectiveness both in terms of process issues, such as delivery structures, and in terms of their impact on deprivation and exclusion. DETR is currently responsible for the following evaluations of cross-departmental initiatives:

New Deal for Communities

The monitoring and evaluation arrangements for the NDC programme comprise ongoing project and scheme monitoring, which is reported to Government at the mid-year and annual progress reviews, and individual project evaluation, and scheme evaluation at the three, six and end year stages of the schemes. The Government will also be undertaking a national evaluation of the programme, which will focus on the operation and achievements of the programme in its first three years.

Single Regeneration Budget

There is an on-going evaluation of rounds 1 and 2 of SRB and plans to commission an evaluation of more recent SRB activity this year.

In addition, we are supporting the evaluation of the Local Government Association's New Commitment to Regeneration and have commissioned an action research study to develop more co-ordinated working between regeneration initiatives at the local level. Emerging evidence from these studies has already been used to support wider reviews of policy such as the Spending Review 2000 cross-cutting review of Government Intervention in Deprived Areas, the Social Exclusion Unit's National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal and the work of the Performance and Innovation Unit.

NATS

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many organisations have expressed interest in being included on the list of interested parties to bid for the NATS public-private partnership. [125936]

Mr. Mullin: Nineteen companies have expressed an initial interest in the NATS PPP. These are not formal expressions of interest. In accordance with the Department's agreement with those companies their identities cannot be revealed. Furthermore, in order to maintain a competitive and level playing field, the Department does not intend to release the identities of bidding companies and consortia in future stages of the PPP process.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the cost of part-privatising NATS. [125935]

Mr. Mullin: DETR, NATS and the CAA expect to incur consultancy costs in the order of £20 million in connection with the NATS PPP. In addition, restructuring costs of around £15 million are expected to be incurred in order to achieve the separation of NATS from the CAA.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) of 18 January 2000, Official Report, column 358W, concerning NATS, if he has produced (a) the list of properties and (b) the valuation; and when he plans to publish this information. [125937]

Mr. Mullin: A list of properties, which are owned or leased by NATS, has been placed in the Library. Valuations for the key sites are in progress. However, we do not intend to publish these at this stage as they will form part of the confidential information released to pre-qualified bidders in the NATS PPP.

Government Initiatives

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress is being made on the co-ordination of Government initiatives at a regional and local level. [124274]

Ms Armstrong: We have established the core of the new Regional Coordination Unit. We will publish, in July, a timetabled action plan for implementing the conclusions of the Performance and Innovation Unit's Report on the role of central Government at regional and local level.

Regional Planning Guidance (South-east)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reasons copies of the draft regional planning guidance for the south-east were not available in public libraries until Thursday 18 May; if he will extend the deadline for replies to the consultation; and if he will make a statement. [125964]

Ms Beverley Hughes: Boxes of leaflets and documents were sent to all chief executives of local authorities in the south-east, requesting them to distribute the document and leaflet to their council offices and to their libraries. The documents were sent out on the first day of consultation, 27 March 2000. It is the Secretary of State's opinion that draft Regional Planning Guidance for the south-east has been made widely available and that there is no need to extend the consultation period.

Passenger Transport Authorities (Wales)

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will take steps to enable the National Assembly for Wales to establish passenger transport authorities under the terms of the Transport Bill. [125471]

Mr. Hill: We made our position clear in our response[1] to the 2nd Report of the Welsh Affairs Select Committee (HC287) "The Transport Bill and its impact on Wales". In particular we said that:

> The possibility of creating new Passenger Transport Authority areas was considered at the time of the Transport White Paper. We rejected it then, partly because no group of authorities seemed to have a very strong case for establishing a PTA and partly because, although PTAs have a good track record in co-ordinating and developing public transport, they have no roads responsibilities, and this can create problems in fully integrating transport in their areas.
> Local authorities outside the PTAs already work closely together in developing transport strategies for their areas, as the Local Transport Plans for England submitted to the DETR last summer have shown. A number have submitted joint plans for their combined areas, and we are confident that this co-operation will continue. We are not persuaded of the argument to bring forward primary legislation to enable the establishment of one or more PTAs in Wales.

[1] Response published as the 5th Special Report of the Welsh Affairs Select Committee (HC497) "The Transport Bill and its Impact on Wales".

BAe 146 Aircraft

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the airworthiness directives the Civil Aviation Authority has issued to British airlines relating to BAe 146 aircraft in their service about (a) engine icing and (b) the ingestion of fumes from the engines into the cabin. [125988]

Mr. Mullin: As a result of in service experience of engine icing on the BAe 146, the Civil Aviation Authority has issued a total of five Airworthiness Directives, two of which have been superseded. These Airworthiness Directives impose operating limitations and placarding requirements. In addition, the CAA has accepted as mandatory three Airworthiness Directives (two of which have been superseded) issued by US Federal Aviation Administration in relation to the Allied Signal ALF 502 engine used on the BAe 146. The CAA is entirely satisfied that all the necessary precautions have been taken to ensure that the aircraft meets both UK and international airworthiness standards. The current limitation published for aircraft have shown themselves to be both effective and practical for crews to apply.

The CAA has not issued any Airworthiness Directives relating to the ingestion of engine fumes into the cabin on BAe 146. This issue is currently the subject of investigations by both the Australian Senate and the Swedish aviation authorities. Should these investigations reveal problems the CAA will ensure that appropriate action is taken.

TREASURY

Convergence

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when current forecasts indicate convergence between the UK and Euroland economies under the convergence programme submitted to the EU. [125554]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 12 June 2000]: As set out in Articles 99 and 104 of the EC Treaty, the UK once a year submits a Convergence Programme as part of the Stability and Growth Pact. The Chancellor has said we will produce an assessment of the five tests early in the next Parliament.

Royal Collection

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 7 June 2000, Official Report, column 274W, on the Royal Collection, if the Royal Collection includes all the Queen's assets. [125901]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 13 June 2000]: The custody and care of the assets in the Royal Collection Trust are the responsibility of the trustees. I have asked the Director of the Trust to write to the hon. Member.

North Sea Tax Revenue

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what sterling/dollar exchange rate was assumed when forecasting the North Sea tax revenue as set out in the March Financial Statement and Budget report. [125639]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 13 June 2000]: I refer the hon. Member to page 165 of the March 2000 Financial Statement and Budget Report.

Marsham Street

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for how long the old Department of the Environment building in Marsham street has lain empty; and if he will make a statement. [124268]

Mr. Timms: The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions finally vacated 2 Marsham street at the end of April 1998.

Retail Inquiry

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to publish the next Inquiry into Retail; and to which years' statistics it will relate. [125571]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Dr. David Clark, dated 14 June 2000:

As the Director for the Office for National Statistics (ONS) I have been asked to reply to your recent question asking for the date and year of the next Inquiry into Retail (125571).

The Sector Review into Retailing (formerly Business Monitor SDA25) will be published in August 2000. The sector review will contain statistics on total turnover, sales by non-store activity, a detailed breakdown of commodity sales, stocks, purchases, capital expenditure, employment costs, taxes and levies for the most recently completed inquiry year 1998 on the new inquiry basis (Annual Business Inquiry). It will also contain statistics for the inquiry years 1997, 1996 and 1995 which have been adjusted by a series of factors to reflect the methodology improvements introduced for the 1998 inquiry year and remove the discontinuities with previous estimates.

WALES

No-smoking Policy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness of his Department's no-smoking policy and (b) the proportion of his Department's offices that do not allow smoking. [125169]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My Department operates the same policy on smoking as the National Assembly for Wales, which is designed to protect the great majority of staff, who do not smoke, from the effects of smoke, as required by health and safety legislation. Smoking is therefore not permitted in working areas, whether cellular or open plan, and sources of information and advice on stopping smoking are provided to those staff who wish to give up the habit.

My Department only has one building housing about 40 staff who have agreed between themselves that smoking should take place only in certain rooms.

Opinion Research

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 25 May 2000, Official Report, column 633W, on opinion research, what steps have been taken to ensure that his Department makes such results publicly available as required by paragraph 19 of the Cabinet Office May 1999 Guidelines on Research into Public Attitudes and Opinions. [125992]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Wales Office has not carried out any market or opinion research since it was established on 1 July 1999. In the event that my Department does undertake any market or opinion research, the Guidelines will be followed.

DEFENCE

Army Training and Recruiting Agency

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Army Training and Recruitment Agency for the financial year 2000–01. [125578]

Mr. Spellar: The Chief Executive of the Army Training and Recruiting Agency has been set the following Key Targets for 2000–01:

1. To meet the Adjutant General's requirement for 620 commissioned officers.
2. To meet the Adjutant General's requirement for 610 officers qualified for service in Field Force units following successful Special to Arm training.
3. To meet the Adjutant General's requirement for the professional development training of 6,714 officers.
4. To meet the Adjutant General's requirement for 10,831 regular soldiers qualified for service in Field Force units following successful Basic and Special to Arm training.
5. To meet the Adjutant General's requirement for professional development training for 52,458 soldiers.
6. To achieve a 3 per cent. annual aggregate improvement in ATRA efficiency measured on the ATRA Efficiency Index.

Depleted Uranium Shells

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many depleted uranium shells have been (a) fired and (b) recovered from the DERA establishment at Dundrennan in each of the last three years; [124697]

(2) if the test firing of depleted uranium shells at the DERA establishment at Dundrennan, Kirkcudbrightshire is continuing. [124718]

Mr. Spellar: The number of depleted uranium shells fired at the range in each of the last three years is as follows:

	Number
1997	749
1998	134
1999	111

During this period only one projectile has been recovered. This was in October 1997 when a fishing vessel trawled up one in the Solway Firth. Current planning proposes a programme of DU firings up to October 2001.

Identification Friend or Foe System

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what reasons underlay the length of time taken to procure the successor Identification Friend or Foe system for the Royal Air Force; what the original cost was; if the contract is to be signed at that original cost; and if he will make a statement. [124885]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Robert Walmsley to Mr. Mike Hancock, dated 14 June 2000:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about procurement of the Successor Identification Friend or Foe (SIFF) system for the Royal Air Force. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief of Defence Procurement and Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

The SIFF programme involves fitting new electronic equipment into some 40 different types of Sea, Land and Air platforms. Total equipment requirements are likely to number in the order of 1000 transponders and 600 interrogators: each has to be functionally and physically integrated with the host platform. SIFF is a complicated project.

The only contract placed to date for fitting SIFF has been to the Royal Air Force's Tornado F3 aircraft. This was placed with the then British Aerospace, the aircraft design authority in 1998. This contract was placed ahead of the main SIFF programme in order to achieve cost savings through alignment with the Tornado Capability Sustainment Programme. Separately, but also in 1998, the SIFF Integration Study and Planning Phase (ISPP) commenced with contracts being placed with individual platform type design authorities to investigate the fitting of a SIFF system to the platforms in the main SIFF programme. The overall value of the Tornado F3 and ISPP contracts together amounts to some £100M, and this is within the original budget provision.

Owing to the number and diversity of the platform types, it is not possible to adopt a single prime contractor approach to manage the main SIFF programme, which amounts to an estimated value of over £400M. Outputs from ISPP have included Demonstration and Manufacture tenders provided by two competing potential equipment suppliers, BAE SYSTEMS and Raytheon Systems Ltd, covering many of the platform types, and from individual platform design authorities for the remainder. Evaluation of these tenders is an extensive and intensive task, to ensure that the decision on the choice of equipment supplier and the phasing of the work to be undertaken by the individual platform design authorities is made on the best overall balance of operational and value for money grounds. We are currently considering the way ahead in the light of this and in the current competitive situation are unable to provide further information on costs or budgets. I hope that we will be in position to announce a decision on the programme, including the choice of equipment supplier, during the summer.

AMRAAM Missiles

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what obligations Raytheon has in respect of industrial participation and offsets in respect of the current order for AMRAAM missiles for the RAF; and if he will make a statement. [124991]

Mr. Hoon: The order placed in 1992 for AMRAAM missiles is now complete and was made through the Government to Government Foreign Military Sales process. Such purchases do not attract industrial participation.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what obligations he plans to place upon Raytheon in respect of industrial participation and offsets in respect of the additional AMRAAM order announced on 16 May; and if he will make a statement. [124990]

Mr. Hoon: The announcement on 16 May stated the intention to purchase a quantity of AMRAAM missiles to equip Eurofighter when it first enters service. Options for acquisition, whether by a Government to Government order or through a direct contract with Raytheon, are being examined. The potential for industrial participation opportunities will be taken into account.

Warrior Fighting Vehicles

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about structural and metallurgical defects on Warrior fighting vehicles in Kosovo. [125316]

Mr. Spellar: Despite its advantages there are also inherent problems in the use of aluminium armour on vehicles such as the Warrior. The Department has been aware of this for some time and appropriate repair schemes have been developed with the Design Authority. There have been no reports, however, of specific structural or metallurgical defects affecting any Warrior vehicles deployed to Kosovo.

UAVs

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what projects his Department is engaged with the US Department of Defense involving (a) unmanned aerial vehicles and (b) unmanned aerial combat vehicles; and if he will make a statement. [125706]

Mr. Spellar: None. However, we do have in place a number of Information Exchange Agreements with the US Department of Defense in support of unmanned aerial vehicle systems research for sea, land and air operations.

Front-line Equipment

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his Department's policy is on the use of PFI or PPP solutions for the procurement of front-line equipment. [125805]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 13 June 2000]: Public Private Partnerships comprise a range of close relationships between the public and private sectors including Private Finance Initiatives (PFI) and Smart Procurement. PFI solutions are being explored for a number of services in direct support of operations (e.g. Heavy Equipment Transporter, Future Strategic Tanker Aircraft) where we judge this may offer best value for money without detriment to operational effectiveness.

Personnel (Scotland)

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people were employed by his Department in Scotland in (a) 1979, (b) 1989, (c) 1994 and (d) 1999, broken down into (i) civilian and (ii) military personnel and including territorial forces. [125574]

Dr. Moonie: The table gives details of the number of people employed by the Ministry of Defence in Scotland in (a) 1979, (b) 1989, (c) 1994 and (d) 1999 broken down into (i) civilian and (ii) military personnel.

Year	(i) Regular Forces	(ii) MOD civilians
(a) 1979	19,016	n/a
(b) 1989	20,035	12,209
(c) 1994	18,030	11,238
(d) 1999	14,937	9,274

Notes:

1. The data cover UK Regular Forces and UK based civilian personnel counted in official Ministry of Defence civil service figures. They exclude UK based casual civilian personnel and permanent civilian personnel whose salaries are paid for or reimbursed by other non MOD organisations such as NATO and USAF.
2. Civilian figures are full-time equivalents where part-time staff are counted in proportion to hours worked. Since 1995 the method of counting part-time civilian staff has reflected actual hours worked (on average approximately 60 per cent. of full-time) rather than the notional 50 per cent. previously used.
3. The data for Royal Navy Regular Forces include personnel on board ships in their home waters who are included in the region of their ships home port. The method of allocating personnel to location was changed in 1995 from having a category for location on the record of Service to using the postcode of the unit to which personnel are attached.
4. Location data for territorial forces are only readily available for 1999 for the Royal Navy and RAF and are not readily available at all for the Army. Such incomplete data are of little use for comparative purpose of the PQ and have therefore not been included in the written answer.

It is not possible, without disproportionate cost, to obtain data for civilian personnel prior to 1980. Location data for the territorial forces of all three Services for the dates requested are not available without disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Serbia

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his letter of 2 June, what ways of funding the Serbian health system the Government have identified in the last 12 months and are considering for the next 12 months; and if he will give details of the initiative to which he refers to facilitate the return of Serb communities which have fled Kosovo. [125604]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 12 June 2000]: We have contributed £2.5 million each to the Balkans appeals of the ICRC and UNICEF. There are no specific allocations to Serbia, but UNICEF plans support to mother and child health services for Internally Displaced Persons (IDPs) and refugees. ICRC programmes include provision of essential medicines to IDPs, refugees and the socially vulnerable in Serbia. In addition, ECHO plans support to primary health care services in remote locations, including to IDPs and refugees.

We have provided £120,000 for roads and community schemes managed by British and Swedish troops of Multi National Brigade (Central) to encourage Serbs to return to villages in the Sliovo area, and Albanians to return from Pristina to their villages in the region.

Government Annual Report

Mr. Evans: To ask the Prime Minister when the Government's third annual report will be published. [125939]

The Prime Minister: By the end of July.

Criminal Assets

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Prime Minister when the Performance and Innovation Unit will publish its report on the pursuit and seizure of criminal assets; and if he will make a statement. [126158]

The Prime Minister: The Performance and Innovation Unit's report "Recovering the Proceeds of Crime" is being published today as agreed Government policy. Copies have been placed in the Vote Office and in the Libraries of the House. It is also available on the Cabinet Office website at www.cabinet-office.gov.uk/innovation.

The PIU report sets out the Government's new approach to tackling crime through its finances. In implementing the report, the Government are determined to show that crime will not pay in the UK. We aim to reduce crime and to increase confidence in the criminal justice system. The report sets out a plan of action covering the following areas:

(i) a more strategic approach to asset recovery, including a dedicated National Confiscation Agency and greater cross-Government co-operation;

(ii) more emphasis on financial investigation to help law enforcement uncover criminal assets as a routine part of their business;

(iii) a new legislative attack closing legal loopholes and calling all convicted offenders to account for their assets where they have clearly benefited from their crimes; and introducing civil forfeiture giving the courts power to recover unlawful gains currently beyond the reach of the law;

(iv) tightening the money laundering regime, simplifying and consolidating the money laundering laws;

(v) taxing unlawful gains by using tax powers more effectively to target criminal wealth; and

(vi) setting a higher international standard, working with our partners overseas to drive up standards and close boltholes.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, in collaboration with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, will take forward implementation of the conclusions of the report and introduce legislation as soon as possible. The report is being widely circulated so that views received by the Home Office by the end of August can be taken into account prior to introduction of legislation. Further information can be found on the Home Office website at www.homeoffice.gov.uk.

Performance and Innovation Unit

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Prime Minister what the annual cost is of the Performance and Innovation Unit; and what action the Government are taking to implement its reports. [124285]

The Prime Minister: For the financial year 1999–2000 the Performance and Innovation Unit (PIU) spent £2.3 million. For 2000–01 the unit has an allocation of £2.6 million.

Whenever PIU reports represent Government policy, implementation plans with lead responsibilities and timetables for action are included. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for South Cambridge (Mr. Lansley) on 3 May 2000, Official Report, columns 109–10W.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 14 June. [125403]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

New Millennium Experience Company

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport which accountants have been paid fees by the New Millennium Experience Company; and for what purpose. [124385]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) has paid fees to four firms of accountants.

Deloitte & Touche—tax advice.

Ernst & Young—external audit; accounting advice; provision of interim management of staff; and IT consultancy.

PriceWaterhouseCoopers—tax advice; IT consultancy; internal audit; and financial planning.

Arthur Anderson—internal audit.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the resignation of the Chairman of the New Millennium Experience Company. [124483]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 5 June 2000]: Robert Ayling decided to resign as Chairman of the New Millennium Experience Company on 23 May. His decision was made in the best interests of the Dome. He served the Dome as Chairman for three years and his decision to step down was in keeping with the fact that he has always put the good of the project first. I would like to pay tribute to Robert Ayling for his contribution to the Millennium Experience.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) if the (a) contingency draw down, (b) £60 million cash flow facility and (c) £29 million additional cash flow facility made available to the New Millennium Experience Company will be repaid; [125023]

(2) which Millennium Commission projects have received funding additional to their original grants; for what purposes; and to what value in each case. [125024]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 8 June 2000]: These are matters for the Millennium Commission. I will write to the hon. Member in my capacity as Chairman of the Commission, and place copies of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

Television Licences

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will estimate how many direct debits for paying licence fees currently set up with the BBC by visually-impaired customers will have to be cancelled because of the evidence requirements contained within the Wireless Telegraphy Act 1998; what guidance his Department has given the BBC to ensure that visually-impaired customers have equal access to this method of paying bills; and if he will make a statement. [125347]

Mr. Chris Smith: Under section 2(2) of the Wireless Telegraphy Act (as amended), the only evidence required to prove entitlement to the 50 per cent. reduction in the television licence fee for registered blind people, introduced by the Government on 1 April this year, is a certificate issued by a local authority. This requirement has no bearing on the method of payment. The Department for Culture, Media and Sport does not issue guidance to the BBC on the administration of the television licensing system, since this is a statutory responsibility of the Corporation.

No-smoking Policy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness of his Department's no-smoking policy and (b) the proportion of his Department's offices that do not allow smoking. [125157]

Mr. Chris Smith: I refer my hon. Friend to the replies I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby) on 24 January 2000, Official Report, column 89W, and to the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) on 16 December 1999, Official Report, columns 279–80W.

My Department's policy on smoking can be considered effective as it actively encourages a reduction in smoking by allowing smoking to take place only in the designated smoking rooms. Less than 1 per cent. of the Department's office space is given over to areas in which smoking is allowed.

Bowling Greens

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the number of bowling greens which have been closed and redeveloped in each of the last 10 years. [125870]

Kate Hoey: Neither my Department nor Sport England hold this information.

Analogue Televisions

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport which action his Department has taken to advise purchasers of analogue televisions that the televisions will cease to function as soon as the analogue signal is withdrawn. [125919]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Government are working with industry on a public information campaign to inform viewers about digital television. I expect this to deliver messages about the timescale and the conditions which have to be met for the switch-over from analogue to digital transmissions, and advice about how to get digital television and that analogue television sets can be converted to receive digital signals by the addition of a set top box. One of the conditions for switch-over is that 95 per cent. of consumers have access to digital receiving equipment.

National Lottery (Computer Failures)

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 5 June, Official Report, column 96W; if, when he was informed of the defect in the National Lottery computer, he was told when the defect was identified and by whom; if he was informed of estimates Camelot had made of how long the defect affected its operation before it was corrected; and if he has been informed as to when the National Lottery Commission will complete its investigations. [125673]

Kate Hoey: Due to an error in my original answer, the incorrect date was given for the date on which the National Lottery Commission became aware of the defect in the National Lottery computer system. The correct answer is as follows. I apologise for any inconvenience that this might have caused.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was informed when the defect was identified and by whom, and was also informed of how long the defect had affected operations.

The defect was first drawn to the National Lottery Commission's attention on 12 April 2000 in a letter from an ex-GTECH employee. The defect affected operations from the start of the Lottery until it was corrected on 27 July 1998.

The Commission intends to complete its investigations as soon as possible.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Vibration White Finger

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many men in South Wales were diagnosed by his Department and agencies as suffering from vibration white finger in (a) 1997, (b) 1998, (c) 1999 and (d) 2000 to date; [125742]

(2) how many former miners in South Wales applied for Disablement Benefit for vibration white finger in (a) 1997, (b) 1999 and (c) 2000 to date. [125741]

Mr. Bayley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Information on claims to industrial injuries disablement benefit for vibration white finger made in Wales

	Number of claims made for industrial injuries disablement benefit for vibration white finger in Wales[1]	Number of men who were first diagnosed as suffering from vibration white finger for industrial injuries disablement benefit
1997	2,300	300
1998	1,300	201
1999	1,300	108
First quarter 2000	400	16

[1] Estimate

Notes:

1. Claims data are based on a 10 per cent. sample.
2. Diagnoses data are based on a 100 per cent. count of first diagnosed assessments.
3. Diagnoses will be made after the claim has been made. Claims and any resultant diagnoses may not be made in the same period.

Employment Services

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the last two national surveys of employees in his Department; what action has been taken as a result of the most recent survey; and if he will make a statement. [125442]

Mr. Rooker: The last two national surveys of employees in the Department were the Child Support Agency's staff attitude survey carried out in May 1999 and an internal communications survey completed on 2 June 2000.

We do not expect to publish these surveys externally.

The recent survey of internal communications will be used to rationalise and improve internal communications processes. A summary of the results will be available for staff via internal staff media.

The Department is committed to the civil service reform agenda, which includes providing a better deal for staff. The results of national employee surveys will be used to deliver this aim and ultimately provide a better service for the public.

State Pension

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the date of October 2001 is to be maintained as the target for helping potential benefit customers understand (a) their future entitlement to retirement pension and (b) the importance of saving for their retirement; how this target will be achieved; how much it is expected to cost; and if he will make a statement. [125439]

Mr. Rooker: The first combined pension forecasts, which include details of both State and private pension rights, were issued to Prudential customers in April in one of a series of pilots we are conducting. Other pilot employers and pension providers will issue combined forecasts later this year. We are on course to meet or exceed our target to start the full-scale service from 2002.

Availability of the full service depends on putting in place a new computer system that can issue the much higher numbers of State Pension forecasts which will be needed, up to 15 million a year from 2005. Our target date for introducing this new service will be £14.5 million with ongoing running costs of £7.5 million a year once the service has bedded down.

Combined pension forecasts will, for the first time, provide individuals with a clear indication of what sort of retirement income to expect. This will enable them to make better-informed decisions on what savings they need to make.

Telephone Claims Service

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the estimated cost is of the national telephone claims service for pensioners which is planned to be introduced in October; what the continuing yearly cost to his Department of this service will be; and if he will make a statement. [125378]

Mr. Rooker: It is estimated that it will cost around £1 million to introduce the National Retirement Pension Tele-Claims Service from October 2000. The majority of this cost is associated with an upgrade of infrastructure that will provide a platform for further pensions modernisation in the future.

Introducing this service will:

Provide active assistance to customers at the point of claim by allowing them to speak to a member of staff who will complete an electronic claim form on their behalf;

Provide a simplified claim form tailored to customers individual requirements;

Reduce the need to ask customers for supporting documentary evidence by making use of data held.

The ongoing running cost to the Department is expected to be around £0.5 million per annum.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were involved in fraudulent benefit claims which resulted in the overpayment of £135 million for 1999–2000; how many such benefit claimants received no further benefit from his Department; and if he will make a statement. [125438]

Mr. Rooker: The "overpayment" figure (or value of losses) for 1999–2000 is currently being collated. It will appear in the Losses Statement of the Vote 1 Appropriation Account due to be signed by the Benefits Agency Chief Executive in August.

The 1998–99 Statement showed losses of £136 million. In addition to overpayments caused by fraudulent benefit claims, this amount includes losses due to other factors such as the writing off of old debts, the miscalculation of entitlement in disability benefits, the change in the payment of hospital in-patients and the duplication of payments of Jobseeker's Allowance by automated credit transfer.

The number of people involved in fraudulent benefit claims, which formed part of the total losses, is not available.

The number of benefit claimants who received no further benefit is not available, as the Benefits Agency does not match past fraudulent claims with new claims.

Means-tested Benefits

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to review the imputed rate of return on savings used in calculating entitlement to means-tested benefits. [124939]

Mr. Bayley: The system of tariff income in the income-related benefits is not based on any imputed rate of return. The system provides a straightforward method of calculating the weekly contribution which people with capital in excess of the lower limit are expected to make from those resources to help meet their normal living expenses. Because no tariff applies to savings below the lower limit, the rule is most generous to people with relatively low savings; for example, in cases where the lower limit is £3,000 the annual tariff income for a person with savings between £3,000 and £3,250 would equate to just 1.6 per cent. of their savings.

The capital rules are kept under regular review.

"Listening to Older People"

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations he has received on his document, "Listening to Older People". [124281]

Mr. Rooker: During 1999 the Government led a programme of listening to older people events across the UK. The events were put on by a partnership between the Inter-Ministerial Group for Older People, the UK Secretariat for the International Year of Older Persons and mainly voluntary sector organisations working with older people.

On 17 May the Government published three documents relating to this programme of listening events. "Life begins at 50: the 1999 Listening Events"; a newsletter style account of last year's regional programme of events. "Building a Better Society for Older People: Report on the Listening Events to the Inter-Ministerial Group for Older People"; a research report on the regional events by Annette Boaz and Carol Hayden, Warwick Business School, the University of Warwick. "Life begins at 50—A Better Society for Older People"; a report setting out the key points raised by older people during the 1999 listening events, the action we have already taken to address them, and the action we will take in the future.

No representations have been received on these documents.

Pensions Entitlement

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many people who have reached pensionable age within the last two years have not yet been paid their full entitlement of additional pension; [125915]

(2) how many people are currently employed in carrying out manual calculations of the entitlements to additional pension of those who have already retired; [125917]

(3) how many manual calculations of entitlements to additional pension were carried out in each of the last three months. [125918]

Mr. Rooker: It is estimated that in the last two years the National Insurance Recording System (NIRS) computer will not have carried out a calculation of the additional pension in some 120,000 cases. The number of these who have not yet been paid their full entitlement to additional pension is not known, but because the facility for Benefit Agency offices to apply for a clerical calculation has been available, the number will be in the minority.

There is a team of 10.5 people in the Benefits Agency responsible for clerical calculations of additional pension.

The number of clerical calculations carried out in March was 5,789; in April it was 588; and in May it was 442. The significant reduction in April and May was planned. The processes that had prevented the NIRS2 computer calculating additional pension had become available and it was part of a strategy to accommodate the transition from clerical to computer calculations.

Minimum Income Guarantee

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners are being targeted as possible qualifiers for the minimum income guarantee in each of the age groups (a) 60 to 65, (b) 65 to 70, (c) 70 to 75, (d) 75 to 80, (e) 80 to 85, (f) 85 to 90 and (g) over 90 years old. [118007]

Mr. Rooker [pursuant to his reply, 12 April 2000, c. 167W]: The information requested is in the table.

Pensioners in the following age bands are being targeted as possible qualifiers for the minimum income guarantee

Age band	Total count	Male	Female
60–64	156,542	0	156,542
65–69	245,887	108,088	137,799
70–74	298,589	117,065	181,524
75–79	436,627	146,415	290,212
80–84	509,017	206,772	302,245
85–89	360,645	136,119	224,526
90+	159,881	45,505	114,376
Total	2,167,188	759,964	1,407,224

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Assisted Area Status

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he intends to submit a new proposal for assisted area status for North Staffordshire. [125353]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 9 June 2000]: Details of the revised assisted area proposals, which included North Staffordshire were published on 10 April 2000.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from the Office of Commissioner Monti in respect of assisted area status for North Staffordshire. [125350]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 9 June 2000]: None.

Textile Task Force

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies in the North East have benefited from the Textile Taskforce; how much money has been allocated from the Task Force Fund; and what financial resources are available to it. [125383]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The most recent information available shows that 48 companies have contacted the North East Textiles Taskforce, resulting in 29 initial visits being made. The range of support already provided has included help towards a sports/leisurewear event, trade shows, marketing, technical training and developing business system and process analysis.

When the Taskforce was set up it was allocated funding totalling £773,000. Total spend by the Taskforce up to the end of May 2000 was £140,000.

Limited Liability Partnerships Bill

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has for the registering of partnership agreements and the publication of partnership accounts under the provisions of the Limited Liability Partnerships Bill [Lords]; and what role he plans for Companies House in respect of these new entities. [125428]

Dr. Howells: There will be no requirement for limited liability partnerships to register an agreement between members. The Government concluded, after wide consultation and taking account of the views of the Trade and Industry Committee, that to impose a requirement on LLPs to register a member's agreement would be of little value unless regulations determined exactly what should be contained in the agreement, and that would be almost impossible to define. Moreover, it would be impracticable for Companies House to take a view on every individual agreement to ensure agreements met the statutory criteria before allowing an LLP to register.

More detail of the Government's decision on this matter is set out in the Government Observations on the Fourth Report from the Trade and Industry Committee (Session 1998–99) on the draft Limited Liability Partnership Act (HC 529).

The LLP regulations will apply the accounts and audit provisions of the Companies Act 1985 with appropriate modifications to reflect the different capital structure of LLPs. They will require LLPs to disclose similar financial information to that required of companies in their annual accounts, those accounts being filed with Companies House where they will be open for inspection.

Companies House will be responsible for the registration and striking-off of LLPs, the registration of documents which must be filed under the LLP regulations and for enforcing compliance in line with requirements of the regulations. They will also provide information on LLPs to the public as they do for companies.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whom his Department is consulting on the provisions of the Limited Liability Partnerships Bill [Lords]; and what replies he has received to date. [125702]

Dr. Howells: There has been extensive consultation on the basis of three detailed consultation documents published in February 1997, September 1998 and July 1999. For each consultation copies were sent to some 1,800 consultees, including business, trade associations, academics, potential clients and regulators and meetings were held by officials with interested representatives from each of these groups. Telephone and written requests for documents resulted in around 3,000–5,000 extra copies of each document being sent out. The documents were also made available to visitors to the LLP website at www.dti.gov.uk/cld/llpbill/index.htm from September 1998. Over 300 responses were received in total. The names of those who responded can be found in the Libraries of each House and the responses are publicly available. A further short consultation paper was published in February 2000 on a more limited circulation, but was also available on the LLP website.

Dagenham Ford Plant

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has held with the Greater London Authority with regard to the future of the Ford Dagenham plant; and what plans he has for future discussions. [125611]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 12 June 2000]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry discussed the future of the Dagenham plant directly with the mayor both before and after Ford's announcement on 12 May. A representative of the Greater London Authority also attends the fortnightly meetings on the regeneration of Dagenham and the Thames Gateway organised by my Department and involving other Government Departments, local councils and regeneration bodies, TUC and Ford. My right hon. Friend and I intend to remain in close contact with the mayor, the Greater London Authority and the London development agency.

Insolvency (Creditors)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about the priority given to creditors of companies in administration under the Insolvency Act 1986; and if he will make a statement. [125770]

Dr. Howells: Under the Insolvency Act 1986 certain debts (principally for employee claims and taxes collected but not paid over) have preferential status up to defined limits.

Representations are received about this from time to time and many representations received since the failure of UNO plc and World of Leather plc urged that preferential status should be reduced or abolished or that the categories of eligible claims should be extended. Last year the Department published a consultation document entitled, "A Review of Company Rescue and Business Reconstruction Mechanism", which invited views on, among others, the question of whether Crown preference in insolvency should be abolished. A report of the review group will be published in due course.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from creditors of World of Leather plc and UNO; and if he will make a statement. [125769]

Dr. Howells: Many representations have been received from or on behalf of customers of both UNO plc and World of Leather concerning payments made for furniture ordered but not supplied. The issues raised are set out in the record of the debate held in the House on 24 May 2000, Official Report, columns 247–55WH. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade subsequently also wrote to hon. Members who had participated in the debate and a copy of this letter has been placed in the Library of the House.

Sub-post Offices (Transfer)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will investigate the financial transactions which take place between Post Office Counters Ltd. and prospective sub-postmasters at the time of a transfer of a post office business to new ownership; and if he will assess the effect of these transactions on the long-term future of the Post Office network. [125461]

Mr. Alan Johnson [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The contractual and financial arrangements relating to the transfer of a post office business to new ownership are matters for the Post Office and the prospective sub-postmaster. I am not aware that the financial terms relating to licence and relocation fees are having any significant implications for the long-term future of the network and I understand that the Post Office offers some flexibility where particular circumstances merit it.

Chronic Bronchitic Emphysema

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many claims from widows have been settled in respect of mineworkers who died of chronic bronchitic emphysema in the last two years. [125880]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 13 June 2000]: We have made interim payments of bereavement awards to 2,577 widows seeking compensation for chronic bronchitis and emphysema, totalling £22.5 million. At present 262 claims from widows have been assessed through the medical process. We expect these claims to be settled shortly.

My Department has also received estate claims in respect of some 7,400 miners who died between 1992 and May 1997.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many claims his Department has received from mineworkers claiming compensation for chronic bronchitic emphysema; and, since May 1997, how many such claims have been settled. [125882]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 13 June 2000]: After years of neglect by British Coal and a blind eye from the previous Administration, this Government have reached an agreement which gives former miners fair compensation for their suffering resulting from these diseases.

The Department's claims handlers have registered nearly 107,000 claims for chronic bronchitis and emphysema from former miners and their families. To date, we have made 21,500 payments in full and final, and part settlements, totalling £60.5 million.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he appointed respiratory consultants to examine and report on claims from mineworkers for chronic bronchitic emphysema; how many have been appointed in (a) England, (b) Wales and (c) Scotland; and when he expects the reports to be complete. [125881]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 13 June 2000]: Healthcall commenced recruitment on 1 November 1999. To date 170 respiratory consultants have been recruited including 77 who are not allocated to a specific location. Reports are to be completed as soon as possible.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many mineworkers requesting domiciliary visits for tests in respect of claims for chronic bronchitic emphysema died prior to the test being carried out. [125883]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 13 June 2000]: After years of neglect by British Coal and inaction by the previous Administration, this Government have reached an agreement which gives former miners fair compensation for their suffering resulting from these diseases.

My Department has received estates claims in respect of some 7,400 miners who died between 1992 and May 1997. Many of these could have received compensation during their lifetime if British Coal and the previous Administration had not continued to deny responsibility.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he intends to make bereavement awards to the relatives of deceased widows of mineworkers who would have qualified for payments due under death certificates relating to chronic bronchitic emphysema. [125885]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 13 June 2000]: After inaction under the previous Government, this Government have reached an agreement which should give former miners fair compensation for their suffering resulting from these diseases.

The Department has agreed that the sons and daughters of those widows who died in the period between the date of the High Court judgment and the signing of the Handling Agreement may receive an ex-gratia payment.

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received concerning lung function tests carried out on behalf of the Government by Healthcall in respect of compensation claims from mineworkers suffering from chronic bronchitic emphysema. [125884]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 13 June 2000]: I am informed that no such representations have been received.

Young People (Protection at Work)

Mr. White: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of the UK opt-outs under the EU Directive on the protection of young people at work. [126395]

Mr. Alan Johnson: The Directive on the Protection of Young People at Work (94/33/EC) provides a time-limited opt-out for the UK from certain of its provisions. The opt-out expires on 22 June 2000 and the UK will not be pursuing an extension. The Government will be undertaking a full consultation of all interested parties on proposals for the necessary amendments to the Working Time Regulations, in order to give effect to the previously excluded provisions in UK law. We will seek views on the most appropriate use of the derogations which are available in the Directive, in order to balance the proper protection of young people from being required to work long hours against the need to avoid unnecessary burdens on business and to respond to practical problems in particular areas and sectors.

Postal Services

Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what duty the Postal Services Commission will have to ensure that any infringement of the reserved area is remedied. [126396]

Mr. Byers: The provisions in the Postal Services Bill provide for the enforcement of the reserved area by the Postal Services Commission. That it has a duty to do so is implicit in the Bill. The reserved area (in which it is an offence to operate without a licence) is there to protect the provision of the universal postal service. The primary duty of the Commission (as set out in clause 3) is to exercise its functions in the manner which it considers best calculated to ensure the provision of the universal postal service.

Since, under the European postal services directive, the reserved area can be only such as is necessary to ensure the provision of the universal service, infringement (unlicensed activity) of the reserved area (which is illegal) must be considered a potential threat to the provision of the universal service. This applies as much to relatively small infringements (which could cumulatively undermine the universal postal service) as it does to large infringements which have a significant effect in their own right. It follows, therefore, that there is an implied duty for the Commission to enforce the reserved area to protect the licensing regime and by doing so to protect the provision of a universal postal service.

The Bill makes it clear that, if the Commission considers that the scope of clause 7 of the Bill, and thus the activities requiring a licence, should be changed the mechanism for doing so is to recommend to the Secretary of State that he makes an Order modifying clause 7. It is clear, therefore, that the Commission should not allow de facto reductions in the scope of the reserved area simply by allowing repeated infringements of it.

Both the intention and effect of the Bill is that the Commission will take whatever enforcement action it considers necessary to protect the reserved area by deterring, detecting and prosecuting or otherwise remedying unlicensed activity. Not to do so (without good reason) would be a breach of its duties.

In line with precedents in the utilities legislation (where it is also a criminal offence to operate without a licence) and the application of the criminal law in general, by not creating an express duty to take enforcement action in all circumstances, the Bill recognises that there should be an element of discretion in enforcement. So, while the presumption is that the Commission will usually take action to protect the licensed area where it knows or has good reason to believe an offence is being committed under clause 6 of the Bill, there may be circumstances where formal enforcement procedures, by prosecution or otherwise, are not in the public interest.

Enterprise Culture

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action his Department is taking to achieve its key priority for 2000–01 of promoting a culture of enterprise in the European Union. [125912]

Mr. Caborn: The Department's actions include:

pressing for the early adoption of a European Charter for Small Firms setting out key principles for promoting enterprise and pledging the Commission and Member States to action;

working closely with the Commission in drawing up a Multiannual Programme for Enterprise and Entrepreneurship for 2001–05 which seeks to develop a programme of actions to make Europe more entrepreneurial and innovative; and giving support to the Spirit of Enterprise, a European Union-wide awards scheme whose aim is to promote entrepreneurship among young people.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the National Campaign for Enterprise. [125914]

Mr. Byers: The national campaign for enterprise—called Enterprise Insight—was launched by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 11 May. The campaign, supported by my Department, is informing young people about the challenges and rewards of starting their own business, developing entrepreneurial skills and encouraging the establishment and growth of successful businesses. Existing entrepreneurs and business people have a key part to play in the campaign. Already, 200 have signed up to participate in a range of activities to encourage enterprise in their communities.

Public Service Targets

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the criteria are for evaluating his Department's performance against its public service agreement target for 2002 of making the United Kingdom the best place in the world to trade electronically. [125924]

Mr. Caborn: The PIU report, 'e-commerce@its.best.uk', set out a number of possible criteria for evaluating progress against the target of being the best place in the world to trade electronically by 2002. The Office of the e-Envoy is working to establish more rigorously what these criteria should be and the results of this will be published in the autumn. In the meantime, the DTI continues to work towards a number of measurable targets related to trading online, namely that:

1.5 million small and medium sized enterprises (SMEs) connected;

1 million SMEs actually trading online; and the use of ICTs by micro and small businesses up with the best in the world.

Progress against these targets is measured in the DTI's annual International Benchmarking Study. The year 2000 study will be published shortly.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the criteria are for evaluating his Department's performance against its public service agreement target for 2002 of improving the overall international ranking of the science and engineering base in terms of quality relevance and cost-effectiveness. [125920]

Mr. Byers: The criteria for relevance and cost effectiveness are, respectively; the ranking of the UK against G7 and other countries in terms of HEI funding from non-Government sources;

the ranking of the UK against G7 and other countries in terms of papers published per £1 million investment.

Business Start-ups

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many successful high growth business start-ups there were in each of the last four years. [125922]

Mr. Byers: In 1999, the latest year for which figures are available, there were 12,800 successful higher growth start-up enterprises. In 1998 there were 12,600 enterprises. Estimates for earlier years cannot be made. Higher growth means enterprises achieving annual sales of £1 million or more, or employing 10 or more people, by their fourth year of trading.

Spin-out Companies

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies have been spun out by universities in each of the past four years. [125910]

Dr. Howells: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minster for Small Business and E-Commerce to my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mrs. Curtis-Thomas) on 23 May 2000, Official Report, column 474W.

Export Licences

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the criteria which are being used to judge the achievement of his Department's key priority for 2000–01 to operate efficient and effective systems for export licensing. [125913]

Dr. Howells: The criteria used to judge achievement of this priority are set out in the Government's Annual Reports on Strategic Export Controls, together with details of performance. Copies are available in the Library of the House.

CABINET OFFICE

Criminals (Confiscation of Assets)

8. Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on the Government's policy towards the seizure of criminal assets. [124270]

Mr. Ian McCartney: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has announced, we have today published the performance and innovation unit report, "Recovering the Proceeds of Crime".

Copies of the report have been placed in the Vote Office and Libraries of the House.

The report sets out a package of rigorous measures to recover from criminals their unlawful gains and to ensure that crime does not pay. We will:

strongly encourage prosecutors and courts to make confiscation the norm after convictions where there have been proceeds from crime; enable courts to keep restrained assets to help meet confiscation orders; and simplify and enhance money laundering legislation to make it easier to bring cases and help focus efforts on criminal money flows.

9. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what meetings she has had with the performance and innovation unit to discuss proposals to confiscate the assets of criminals. [124271]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I have been Sponsor Minister for the performance and innovation unit project on recovering the proceeds of crime.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has announced earlier, we have today published the performance and innovation unit report, "Recovering the Proceeds of Crime". Copies of the report have been placed in the Vote Office and Libraries of the House.

The report sets out a package of rigorous measures to recover from criminals their unlawful gains and to ensure that crime does not pay.

19. Mr. Michael: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what specific measures she intends to bring forward to ensure that criminals are deprived of the profits they make from drug dealing and other criminal activity. [124284]

Mr. Ian McCartney: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has announced, we have today published the performance and innovation unit report, "Recovering the Proceeds of Crime".

Copies of the report have been placed in the Vote Office and Libraries of the House.

The report sets out a package of rigorous measures to recover from criminals their unlawful gains and to ensure that crime does not pay.

Genetic Modification

10. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what recent discussion she has had with the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food regarding presentation of Government policy on GMOs. [124273]

Marjorie Mowlam: I have held recent discussions with various colleagues, including my right. hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, given my role as co-ordinator of biotechnology policy across Government.

Special Advisers

11. Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many special advisers there are and how many have authority over civil servants. [124275]

Mr. Stringer: There are 79 special advisers in post of which two in the Prime Minister's office have executive powers.

Knowledge Network Computer System

12. Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if certain information held on the Knowledge Network computer system will be restricted to Ministers and special advisers. [124276]

Mr. Stringer: From the beginning of the project, it has been envisaged that as much information as possible which is eventually held on the Knowledge Network will be made publicly available over the Internet.

Access to the full Knowledge Network will be restricted to Ministers and civil servants (including special advisers). There will be no new types of material produced by, or held on, the Knowledge Network which has not previously been circulated within Government through existing paper methods.

Drug Abuse

13. Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when she last met the UK Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator to discuss progress in meeting the Government's targets on reducing drug abuse. [124277]

Marjorie Mowlam: I hold regular meetings with the UK Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator to discuss progress in meeting all aspects of the Government's anti-drug strategy.

Civil Service Recruitment Policy

14. Helen Jackson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what steps she is taking to ensure equal opportunity recruitment policies in the Civil Service. [124278]

Mr. Stringer: The Government are committed to a diverse Civil Service which reflects the society it serves, and has set targets of 35 per cent., 3.2 per cent., and 3 per cent. for the representation of women, ethnic minorities and people with disabilities in the Senior Civil Service by 2004–05. Departments have also set targets for these groups outside the Senior Civil Service.

Recruitment to the Civil Service is on merit, through fair and open competition. We want the best people for the work, whatever their background.

Magistrates

15. Mr. Pike: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what progress has been made since May 1997 in making magistrate appointments in the county palatine more representative of the communities they serve. [124279]

Marjorie Mowlam: In my Directions for Advisory Committees in the Duchy of Lancaster there is a requirement that each Bench should broadly reflect the community it serves. We have been consulting on whether this result is best achieved by retaining the separateness of Duchy appointments or linking the system with the rest of England and Wales by transferring the power to appoint to the Lord Chancellor. As a result of this consultation, I have decided to see how we can more closely align with the system run by the Lord Chancellor on the principles of openness and transparency, while still retaining the local link through the Duchy, which many in the Duchy area value highly. I have asked a Committee involving representatives of the Duchy and the Lord Chancellor's Department to examine this question and report to me.

Drugs Policy

16. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what proposals she has for further co-ordination of the Government's drugs policy. [124280]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Government's drugs policy is set out and co-ordinated through our ten year Strategy, "Tackling Drugs to Build a Better Britain". The Anti Drugs Co-ordinator, Keith Hellawell, was appointed to co-ordinate and drive forward the strategy. The strategy contains challenging aims and targets across the whole of our policy. These are annually monitored and reported in the co-ordinator's national plan and report.

The current spending review is considering further ways to enhance co-ordination of the strategy. Results of our consideration will be published when the review is concluded.

Drug Prevention Programmes

18. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if it is her policy to introduce independent assessment of the effectiveness of drug prevention programmes (a) in schools and (b) elsewhere. [124283]

Mr. Ian McCartney: As part of the Government's ten-year strategy "Tackling Drugs to Build a Better Britain" we are committed to identifying what works. This includes education and prevention initiatives. To support this objective the Drug Prevention Advisory Service (DPAS), is currently discussing with the Office for Standards in Education (Ofsted) ways in which the school inspections system can monitor schools drug policies and activities.

DPAS also has a key role in assessing all Drug Action Teams prevention programmes. These cover a wide range of activities, including those, which take place in schools. The Anti Drug Co-ordinator, with the support of DPAS is currently reviewing DAT action plans for the year ahead.

Small Business

20. Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what recent representations she has had on administrative burdens on small business. [124286]

Mr. Stringer: My ministerial colleagues and I have sought and received representations from a wide range of business organisations about the specific problems facing small businesses. We have most recently received correspondence from the Federation of Small Business. I will be meeting the Federation shortly to discuss their ideas for simplifying and reducing regulatory burdens.

Civil Service Code

21. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what procedures she uses to remove conflicts of interest which are contrary to the Civil Service Code. [124287]

Mr. Stringer: The Civil Service Code is part of the terms and conditions of employment of all civil servants. The code informs civil servants of the standards they are expected to uphold, and the appeal mechanisms available to them. Ministers are under a duty, set out in the ministerial code, not to ask civil servants to act in any way which would conflict with the Civil Service Code.

Crop Contamination

22. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on co-ordination between Government Departments in formulating policy and providing public information on contamination by GM seed of conventional crops. [124288]

Marjorie Mowlam: I have met various colleagues to discuss contamination of GM seed. In addition to a parliamentary statement made by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 18 May 2000, public information has been provided on the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food website and placed in the House Library.

Annual Report

23. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will arrange for the Government's annual report to be prepared by the National Audit Office following previously published guidelines. [124289]

Marjorie Mowlam: The Government have no such plans at this time.

Drug Deaths

24. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what new proposals she has to reduce drug deaths. [124290]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Government's ten-year anti-drugs strategy aims to reduce the number of deaths from the misuse of illegal drugs. The Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs (ACMD) has been considering how best we can report, monitor and reduce the number of deaths arising from the use of illegal drugs and they will be reporting to Ministers in the near future.

The anti-drugs strategy includes a target to have in place an action plan to reduce the number of drug-related deaths and this will be drawn up and implemented in response to the recommendations contained within the ACMD's report.

Computer Viruses

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what steps have been taken across Government Departments to prevent disruption of communications by computer viruses similar to that known as the Love Bug. [124282]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Further to the hon. Member's question, dated 10 May 2000, Official Report, column 830W, we have published an assessment of computer viruses such as the Love Bug and its implications, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when copies of the report on the impact of the love letter computer virus on Government IT systems will be placed in the Library. [126066]

Mr. Stringer: I have today placed copies of the report in the Libraries of the House.

Staff Secondments

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office, pursuant to her answer of 11 January 2000, Official Report, column 134W, concerning secondments, which of the secondees listed were appointed for a period of 12 months or less. [124816]

Mr. Stringer: There were 10 secondees into the Cabinet Office for a period of 12 months or less from May 1997.

All 10 of those secondees were in the return from May 1999. They were seconded in from Anderson Consulting, Barclays Bank plc, BT, Hay Management Consultants, KPMG, Marks & Spencer plc, McKinsey & Co., Microsoft Corporation, Wragge & Co. Solicitors, and Zurich Financial Services.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 15 June 2000

DEFENCE

Laser Range-finders

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the total cost to his Department was of the supply of 226 LH-40C hand-held laser range-finders to the Army; how many units have been purchased; which companies bid for this contract; if the bid by the Eloptro Division of Denel company was the lowest; and if he will make a statement. [124883]

Dr. Moonie: The total cost to the Department, including three years support, is in the region of £2 million, but the details are a matter of commercial confidentiality. Bids were received from four companies in November 1999: Eloptro, a division of Denel; Leica Geosystems Ltd.; Litton Laser Systems; and Simrad Optronics Ltd.

Following a detailed technical evaluation including extensive trials of all candidate equipment only Eloptro provided a compliant tender and this, therefore, was the lowest acceptable bid. A contract for the supply and support of the 226 systems was awarded to Eloptro on 23 March 2000. The unsuccessful companies have been given the opportunity for a formal debrief and, while all have indicated that they wish to take up this offer, only Leica have done so to date.

Type 45 Destroyers

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the planned in-service dates for follow-on Type 45 destroyers; and if he will make a statement. [124993]

Dr. Moonie: On current plans, we expect that the first Type 45 destroyer will enter service with the Royal Navy in 2007 and that the last will enter service in 2014, with progressive deliveries between these dates. The delivery programmes for the ships have yet to be negotiated.

US Defence Trade Security Initiative

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the benefits of the United Kingdom being granted special status under the US International Traffic in Arms Regulations; and if he will make a statement. [125380]

Mr. Hoon: We welcome the announcement of the Defence Trade Security Initiative made by the US Government on 24 May 2000. The proposed reforms to US defence export control arrangements should reduce munitions licensing process times in general and simplify many licensing procedures, particularly for NATO countries, Japan and Australia. They represent a significant step towards enhancing alliance interoperability and preventing the widening of the technology gap.

The initiative includes a proposal for an International Traffic in Arms Regulations exemption for the UK and other close allies. This would enhance the ability of UK firms to compete in the US market; to benefit from US Research and Development expenditure; and give access to some of the most advanced defence technologies in the world. US defence companies are, of course, free to compete in the UK market.

We expect early discussions with the US to take this forward as part of the implementation of the UK/US Declaration of Principles.

Maritime Mining System

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what role DERA played in securing the contract by BAe Systems to be the supplier to the Australian Defence Force of the Stone Fish MKIII Maritime Mining System; and if he will make a statement. [125435]

Dr. Moonie: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Mike Hancock, dated 15 June 2000:

I am replying to your parliamentary question about a contract secured by BAE Systems.

I can confirm that DERA has had no role or involvement in the securing of a contract by BAE Systems to be the supplier to the Australian Defence Force of the Stone Fish MKIII Maritime Mining System.

I hope this is helpful.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Market Research

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much his Department spent on opinion research in the financial year 1999–2000. [123049]

Mr. Mandelson: The Government are committed to consulting and involving the public to help inform policy formulation and the delivery of better quality public services. Both are an important part of the Modernising Government initiative.

The Government only commission market or opinion research when it is justified by the needs of the policy or programme and is the most economical, efficient and effective way to achieve the purpose.

During the financial year 1999–2000, the amount spent on opinion research was £658,521. This information is broken down as follows:

Department of Agriculture and Rural Development	20,536
Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure	13,000
Department of Education	5,975
Department of Environment	16,590
Department for Regional Development	15,050
Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment	39,695
Department of Finance and Personnel	23,000
Department of Health, Social Services and PS	20,000
Department of Higher and Further Education, TE	346,375

Department for Social Development	56,315
Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister	11,000
Northern Ireland Office	90,985

Responsibility in respect of research carried out by the Northern Ireland Departments has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list opinion research projects undertaken on behalf of the Department in the financial year 1999–2000 itemising (a) focus group research, (b) quantitative surveys and (c) other market research surveys, indicating in each case (i) when and (ii) where the results were published. [123050]

Mr. Mandelson: The information for the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments has been placed in the Library.

Responsibility in respect of research carried out by the Northern Ireland Departments has been devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly and is no longer a matter for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Demilitarisation

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the demilitarisation measures taken in the past year; and if he will make a statement. [123506]

Mr. Ingram: Listed are normalisation measures taken during 1999.

24 to 26 January 1999—Vacation of Patrol Bases at Mullan Bridge, Roscor Bridge, Wattle Bridge, Clonratty Bridge, Gortmullan Bridge, Killyvilly and Annaghmartin.

3 February 1999—Demolition of Aughnacloy Permanent Vehicle Check Point.

8 February 1999—Demolition of V3 Permanent Vehicle Check Point (Hump).

12 February 1999—Demolition of V4 Permanent Vehicle Check Point (Muff).

26 February 1999—Demolition of V1 Permanent Vehicle Check Point (Letterkenny Road).

21 May 1999—Demolition of Fort Whiterock completed.

9 July 1999—Requisitioned land in Crossmaglen returned to the GAA.

3 August 1999—Demolition of Gortmullan Patrol Base completed.

5 September 1999—Vacation of Carrickfergus Base.

31 December 1999—Closure of Castlereagh Holding Centre.

In April 2000, the Belfast Roulement Battalion was withdrawn.

The Royal Ulster Constabulary is also making increased use of soft-skinned and high profile liveried vehicles and beat patrols. Police officers increasingly wear fluorescent jackets and now patrol without military support in most parts of the Province.

In light of the lowering of the overall threat following the recent statement by the IRA the Chief Constable announced on 9 May further steps which will be taken within weeks to normalise security.

A further review of possible normalisation steps will be conducted in three months time taking account of the level of threat prevailing at the time and the circumstances on the ground.

Laptops

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many laptop computers used by Ministers, officials and special advisers in his Department have been (a) lost and (b) stolen since May 1997. [123742]

Mr. Mandelson: The information requested is as follows:

(a) None

(b) Seven

Forms

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the net change in each year since May 1997 in the number of forms issued by his Department which (a) charities and (b) other voluntary organisations are required to complete. [123944]

Mr. Ingram: The answer to this question could be provided only at a disproportionate cost.

HEALTH

Paramedics

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of places on training courses for paramedics; and what plans he has to increase the number of places available. [122581]

Ms Stuart: There has been no central estimate of the number of places on training courses for paramedics as this training is managed directly by the 32 National Health Service ambulance service trusts around the country. We have made £21 million extra available per annum to support the ambulance services in meeting the national target of responding to 75 per cent. of all life threatening 999 calls within eight minutes. £18.5 million of this allocation is to provide additional staff, in particular paramedics, thereby increasing significantly the number of training places.

Buprenorphine

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when Subutex (buprenorphine) will be added to the list of drugs that can be dispensed using forms FP10(HP)(ad) and FP10(MDA). [122899]

Ms Stuart: Ministers have agreed in principle to allow the prescription of buprenorphine (of which Subutex is a brand) on an instalment basis. We are currently consulting a range of organisations which could be affected by the proposal on how best to introduce it.

Health Policies

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the relative priorities accorded to mental and physical health in the Government's health policies. [125371]

Mr. Hutton: We have set out our priorities in "Modernising Health and Social Services: National Priorities Guidance 2000/01–2002/03" which include physical and mental health problems as priorities for the National Health Service and Social Services.

NHS Consultation Process

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many responses to his consultation on the future of the NHS made reference to mental health or to mental illness; [125369]

(2) how many responses he received (a) in time and (b) out of time to his recent consultation on the future of the National Health Service; [125368]

(3) when and in what way he expects to announce a summary of the responses to the recent questionnaire on the NHS; [125374]

(4) how many responses to his consultation on the future of the NHS made reference to the medical needs and extra costs of patients aged over 85 years; [125370]

(5) what way NHS mental health patients were included in the consultation on the future of the NHS; [125372]

(6) if he will issue questionnaires to 12 million people relating to his top three priorities for mental health reform. [125367]

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff consultation papers, "Have Your Say on a Better NHS", were distributed to the consultees by 4 June; and how many were received back by the closing date of 5 June. [125771]

Mr. Denham: The consultation process included written consultation with key national organisations; telephone consultation and two seminars with patient groups; use of NHS Direct; and issues emerging from the regional consultation process.

As part of the overall consultation strategy, in the week leading up to National Health Census day on 31 May 2000, 12 million consultation leaflets were made available at supermarkets, high street chemists and other NHS facilities. There were one million staff leaflets and 11 million public leaflets. It was also published on the worldwide web.

For those who may have had difficulty reading the text or completing the form in these formats, the leaflet was also made available on tape with the facility to either record responses on the tape or by dictating over the telephone. There have been eight requests for the tape, none of which have used the telephone facility.

The total cost of the design, printing and distribution of the leaflet was £475,487.

200,960 leaflets have been received so far. In addition, 7,385 e-mails have been received. 1,663 letters have been received. NHS Direct has received 654 responses. In total, responses received so far are 210,662.

Of the responses received and analysed to date, 1,975 made reference to mental health or mental illness. 3,707 made reference to care of the elderly. A review of a sample of early responses showed that suggestions related to the elderly did not mention specific threshold ages.

We plan to make public a summary of responses when we have worked through the analysis in more detail. We do not have plans to issue a further questionnaire to 12 million on mental health priorities.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many survey forms were issued to NHS staff and patients; and how many were returned (a) by the initial closing date and (b) to date. [125797]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 13 June 2000]: Of the 12 million leaflets made available to staff and the public, 200,960 have been returned so far.

The results of these submissions will be reported to the meeting of the modernisation action teams working on the national plan. All responses will be incorporated into developing the national plan.

Advertising

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent by his Department on advertising in each year since May 1997. [125688]

Ms Stuart [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The figures for the annual spend on advertising for the Department for the financial years 1997–98 to 1999–2000 are shown in the table.

Financial year	Advertising expenditure (£ million)
1997–98	2.27
1998–99	8.63
1999–2000	14.83

The principal increases since 1997–98 are in the following areas:

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000
Blood donation	0.60	1.70	[1]0.22
Nurse recruitment	0.30	4.90	4.21
NHS Direct	0.12	0.78	1.20
Smoking[2]	0.00	0.00	6.18
Winter campaign	0.00	0.00	1.07

[1] The Department's spend on blood donation advertising reduced in 1999–2000 because most of this activity was funded direct by the National Blood Authority

[2] Prior to 1999–2000 advertising on smoking was undertaken by the Health Education Authority

Digital Hearing Aids

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when digital hearing aids will be available through the NHS; and if he will make a statement. [125774]

Mr. Hutton: I refer my hon. Friend to the oral answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) on 6 June 2000, Official Report, columns 143–44.

Diabetes

Mr. Singh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to ensure early identification of people with diabetes. [125957]

Mr. Denham: We recognise the importance of detecting diabetes as early as possible. Ministers have asked the United Kingdom National Screening Committee, which advises us on all aspects of screening policy, to consider whether there is a case for the introduction of a targeted screening programme for Type 2 diabetes and, if so, how this could most effectively be achieved. The conclusions of the Committee will inform the work of the Expert Reference Group for the National Service Framework (NSF) for diabetes in England which we announced last year.

CJD

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish the eighth annual report of the National Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease Surveillance Unit. [126745]

Yvette Cooper: The National Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease Surveillance Unit's eighth annual report has been published today. Copies have been placed in the Library. The report documents the Unit's findings in relation to sporadic, familial, iatrogenic Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, and also variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, up to 31 December 1999.

Intermediate Care

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if intermediate care services will be provided by (a) the NHS and (b) the private sector; and if he will make a statement. [126225]

Mr. Hutton: We remain committed to the modernisation of the National Health Service which will continue to provide a universal service, free at the point of use and available to all on the basis of clinical need. Development of intermediate care is a key part of the Government's programme to improve services for older people, including the National Service Framework. It can be achieved in a number of ways—by investing more in NHS hospitals, including giving new life to community hospitals, and by entering into new arrangements with the private sector.

The whole system approach, which typifies intermediate care and is essential to its development, should recognise the contribution made by all partners in the health and social care system, including the independent sector. The same standards of clinical quality and effectiveness will apply to both NHS and non-NHS providers, and services should provide value for money.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish details of the proposed new intermediate care arrangements and their impact on local authority services; and if he will make a statement. [126224]

Mr. Hutton: We shall announce detailed proposals on the introduction of new intermediate care services later this summer. Intermediate care involves a variety of different services in preventing inappropriate admissions to hospitals or long-term care and in providing active rehabilitation and support on discharge from hospital. Local authority services will have an important part to play in intermediate care. Our proposals will be influenced by the work of the modernisation action team on partnership, charged with ensuring that all parts of the health and social care, including local authority services, work together more efficiently.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his definition is of intermediate care. [126227]

Mr. Hutton: Intermediate care is a whole system approach to a range of multi-disciplinary, multi-agency services designed to promote independence by reducing avoidable hospital admission; facilitating timely discharge from hospital and promoting effective rehabilitation; and minimising premature or avoidable dependence on long-term care in institutional settings.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice and guidance he has issued to (a) the NHS and (b) local authority social services regarding intermediate care since 1999. [126226]

Mr. Hutton: The Health Service Circular of 23 May issued jointly to local health and social care communities made it clear that the development of intermediate care was an integral part of winter planning. More detailed planning guidance is to be issued to health and social care communities in the summer.

Diamorphine

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what projects have been carried out to evaluate the efficacy of prescribing diamorphine to heroin addicts; and if he will make a statement. [125998]

Ms Stuart: The Department has not carried out any projects on the efficacy of prescribing diamorphine to heroin addicts, which is subject to the Misuse of Drugs Act (Supply to Addicts) Regulations 1997. The Department is funding a £2.4 million research initiative on drug misuse. Over the next four years this will deliver evidence to underpin our 10 year anti-drugs strategy. A major aim of this initiative is to improve knowledge on the effectiveness and cost-effectiveness of treatment and care procedures. The initiative includes a trial comparing the efficacy of substitute prescribing of injectable and liquid methadone.

Vaccine Damage

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements exist to consider cases before vaccine damage tribunals of simultaneous administration of multiple vaccines which have led to vaccine damage to recipients. [125873]

Mr. Bayley: I have been asked to reply.

The Appeals Service tribunals hear appeals in relation to vaccine damage. These tribunals are constituted of an independent legally qualified panel member and one or two independent specialist medically qualified panel members, all appointed by the Lord Chancellor. These arrangements apply to all cases involving the administration of one or more vaccinations against diseases specified in the Vaccine Damage Payment Act 1979.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to reply to the questions tabled by the hon. Member for North Shropshire on 9 May. [125813]

Ms Stuart: I replied to 23 of the hon. Member's 29 questions on 12 and 13 June.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

GM Crops

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the GM crop test sites that are not on his Department's website by (a) type of crop and (b) county. [123916]

Mr. Meacher: The Department's website is updated regularly to include a list of all the sites which have been notified by consent holders for Part B research and development releases (www.environment.detr.gov.uk/acre/trials.htm).

There is no requirement to notify the Department of releases of a GM crop which has a Europe wide Part C marketing consent for cultivation. However, the industry body SCIMAC has agreed to provide location details for the GM maize being grown in the Farm Scale Evaluations under a Part C consent. All Farm Scale Evaluations sites are listed at www.environment.detr.gov.uk/fse/location/index.htm.

We have no information on any other small scale test sites for such crops with Part C consent as they do not have to be notified to the Department. Growing for any purpose other than small scale trials is precluded by the terms of the agreement with SCIMAC on the growing of GM crops finalised last November.

Estate Action Programmes (Westminster)

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the total expenditure by his Department on each estate action programme in the borough of Westminster since 1993; and what this was as a percentage of the total cost of each programme. [125423]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The total expenditure for each of the estate action projects in Westminster since 1993 is as follows:

	Mozart Estate	Lisson Green
1993–94	179,000	—
1994–95	1,500,000	1,136,000
1995–96	1,384,000	945,000
1996–97	2,180,000	1,955,000
1997–98	3,000,600	6,000,000
1998–99	3,200,000	2,660,000
1999–2000	600,000	1,701,400
Total	12,043,600	14,397,400

The total expenditure detailed above as a percentage of the total cost of programme is:

	Total cost of programme	Percentage of grant expenditure against total cost
Mozart Estate	37,636,000	32
Lisson Green	63,031,000	22.8

Low Bridges

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many accidents arising from strikes on bridges recorded in the last two years have been (a) fatal, (b) minor and (c) serious; and what has been the cost in the last two years of road strikes on low bridges. [125587]

Mr. Hill: The number of injury accidents in Great Britain which involved a road vehicle striking the side or roof of any bridge are given in the following table for the two most recent years for which figures are available.

	Fatal	Serious	Slight
1997	9	69	264
1998	14	67	282

Railtrack estimate that the annual cost of road strikes on low railway bridges is of the order of £10 million. This includes both the repair and delay costs, including those in damage-only accidents.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action the Government are taking in conjunction with (a) railway companies and (b) highway authorities to minimise damage to bridges caused by road vehicles striking low bridges. [125590]

Mr. Hill: Guidance has already been published on a range of measures to prevent bridge strikes, and regulations now require the height of the motor vehicle to be displayed in the cab, if the overall travelling height is in excess of three metres. The Department continues to chair the Bridge Strike Prevention Group which meets twice a year to discuss issues related to bridge strikes with the road transport industry, local authorities and bridge owners, to review trends and to encourage the adoption (and where appropriate the development) of new cost-effective measures to reduce the number and severity of bridge strikes.

A436

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what additional information he requires to enable him to approve funding to upgrade the A436 in Gloucestershire; [125540]

(2) what factors he took into account in deciding not to fund Gloucestershire County Council's priority request to upgrade the A436 between Shipton Solers and Crickley Hill. [125539]

Mr. Hill: The Government Office for the South West wrote to Gloucestershire County Council on 16 December 1999 explaining why my Department was unable to accept the A436 Shipton Solers to Air Balloon scheme for support in the 2000–01 Local Transport Capital Settlement. The County Council has been advised to consider alternative solutions including looking at the feasibility of dealing with the safety issues by a combination of smaller scale schemes.

Central London Journey Times

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the average speed of a journey through central London in daylight by (a) car, (b) bus and (c) bicycle. [124861]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 9 June 2000]: The average speeds recorded in the 1999 DETR door-to-door journey times survey in central London were:

	Miles per hour
(a) Car	3.4
(b) Bus	2.5
(c) Bicycle	5.4

These are door-to-door journey times and so include an element of walking to and from bus stops, car parks etc. All journeys are made within the hours of 7am and 7pm.

The full results of the survey are published in the DETR Transport Statistics Bulletin SB (00) 14, "Journey Times Survey, Inner and Central London: 1999", available in the House of Commons Library.

Railways (Expenditure)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the increase in capacity on the railways that would result from additional expenditure of (a) £500 million per year and (b) £1 billion per year. [125548]

Mr. Hill: The effect of expenditure on capacity would obviously depend on the nature of the expenditure. I cannot anticipate the conclusions on railway capacity and expenditure which will be reflected in the 10-year Plan for Transport which my right hon. Friend will be publishing next month.

Bus Accidents

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what statistics he collects about bus accidents involving loose wheels. [125737]

Mr. Hill: Currently, all Vehicle Examiners who receive a request from the police to inspect vehicles that have been involved in a road traffic accident are required to complete a comprehensive report to help determine whether defects on the vehicle caused or contributed to the reason for the accident or to the severity of any injuries. Most of the requests are for examinations of heavy vehicles. A copy of the report goes to the police while another is sent to the VI Vehicle Safety Branch in Bristol. The information in the report is entered into the Inspectorate's "accidents" database which contains details of any faults or defects found on the vehicles examined, for example, wheel loss or brake failure.

Vehicle Safety Branch are currently responsible for managing the database, on behalf of DETR's Vehicle Standards and Engineering Division. Since 1991, when the database was last revised, there have been 122 reported incidents of wheel loss on public service or large passenger vehicles above 16 passenger seats capacity, and four reported incidents on mini-buses with between nine and 16 passenger seats.

Mobile Phone Masts

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received calling for change in planning regulations that govern the erection of mobile phone masts. [125877]

Ms Beverley Hughes: In the past year, we have received around 175 letters calling for changes in planning regulations that govern the erection of mobile phone masts.

In addition, the report of the Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones, published on 11 May, recommended that for all base stations, permitted development rights for their erection should be revoked and that the siting of all new base stations should be subject to the normal planning process.

In its response to the report, issued on the same day and placed in the Libraries of both Houses, the Government said that they were minded to introduce a requirement for an application for full planning permission for all new telecommunications masts, but would need to consult widely before doing so, including on the principle and precise scope of any new arrangements.

Road Maintenance

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of transport spending was on national road maintenance and highways maintenance in England in each of the last five years. [125811]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 12 June 2000]: The percentage of transport spending in England on national road maintenance and local road maintenance for the five years up to 1998–99 is given in the tale. Figures for 1999–2000 are not yet available.

Percentage

	National road maintenance	Local road maintenance
1994–95[1]	8.3	20.4
1995–96[1]	6.5	21.1
1996–97[1]	6.7	23.3
1997–98[1]	7.6	24.4
1998–99[1]	9.3	27.9

Road Deaths

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment his Department has made of the correlation between (a) speed, (b) alcohol consumption and (c) road conditions, and road deaths. [125812]

Mr. Hill [holding answer 13 June 2000]: The Department estimate that excess or inappropriate speed is a contributory factor in one in three road deaths.

In 1998 one in seven fatalities occurred in an accident in which at least one driver or rider was over the blood alcohol limit.

A study in 1978–81 estimated that road conditions contributed to one in 17 of all accidents. No separate figure is available for deaths.

The Department will shortly begin a sample on the spot accident investigation which will provide further information on contributory factors. Some information will also emerge from a pilot scheme to collect information from police accident records.

Playing Fields

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to issue a new Planning Policy Guidance notice concerning playing fields. [125926]

Ms Beverley Hughes: I hope to publish a draft revision of Planning Policy Guidance note 17 (PPG17) on sport and recreation for consultation shortly. This will update the existing guidance on playing fields.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the total number of valid applications he has received for the sale of playing fields in each month since October 1998. [125927]

Ms Beverley Hughes: The Secretary of State's consent to the disposal of land by local authorities under their general powers is required only where they wish to do so at less than the best reasonably obtainable consideration, which is normally open market value. Six applications for consent for the sale of playing fields have been received since October 1998.

Home Ownership Schemes

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) how many interest-free equity loans have been granted to date under the Homebuy Scheme to residents in (a) Christchurch, (b) East Dorset, (c) Bournemouth, (d) Poole and (e) the New Forest since the inception of the scheme; [125970]

(2) how many households have been housed in England in each of the last five years under the Do-It-Yourself-Shared-Ownership Scheme; [125972]

(3) how many interest-free equity loans have been granted to date under the Homebuy Scheme in England; and how many he expects to be granted in 2000–01; [125971]

(4) how many residents in (a) Christchurch, (b) East Dorset, (c) Bournemouth, (d) Poole and (e) the New Forest have purchased homes under the Do-It-Yourself-Shared-Ownership Scheme in each of the last five years. [125973]

Mr. Mullin: The Homebuy scheme started in April 1999. Homebuy replaced the Do-It-Yourself-Shared-Ownership (DIYSO) scheme following the rationalisation of the low cost home ownership programme offered by registered social landlords and funded by the Housing Corporation. However, local authorities continue to have the option to fund DIYSO until March 2001 when the position will be reviewed.

The total number of Homebuy loans granted in England to the end of May 2000 is 1,083. 1,334 such loans are planned for the year 2000–01. The table shows the number of Homebuy loans granted to residents in the local authority areas named.

Number of Homebuy loans by local authority area

Local authority	1999–2000	2000–01[1]	Total
New Forest	8	1	9
Bournemouth	7	0	7
Christchurch	2	0	2
Poole	4	1	5
East Dorset	3	0	3
Total	24	2	26

Grand total	4,900	2,665	2,238	1,664	417	11,884

The following table shows the number of residents who have purchased homes under the DIYSO scheme in each of the last five years in the local authority areas shown.

Byker Heat Station

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 6 June 2000, Official Report, columns 195–96W, if (a) the Model allotments, (b) Moorside allotment and (c) Nun's Moor allotment have been subjected to unauthorised excavation for bottles and metal material since toxic ash from Byker Heat Station was deposited. [126007]

Mr. Meacher: Newcastle city council advise that they are not aware of any unauthorised excavations at the Model allotments or Moorside allotments. Nun's Moor allotment has experienced some small-scale unauthorised excavations, however these were not in the area of the ash paths.

The Fenham Allotments, as opposed to the Fenham Model allotments, have experienced severe damage from unauthorised excavations for bottles. This site, however, has not received ash from the Byker Heat Station.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 6 June 2000, Official Report, columns 195–96W, what prima facie failures of statutory duty of care under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 have occurred in the distribution of toxic ash from the Byker Heat Station to bridleways and allotments. [126008]

Mr. Meacher: The Environment Agency investigation, referred to by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State in his answer of 6 June 2000, Official Report, columns 197–98W, into the deposit of ash at allotments and other sites in the Newcastle area, is continuing.

The Agency investigation will establish whether the waste management controls under Part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 have been contravened, including any breaches of the statutory duty of care imposed under section 34 of the 1990 Act. If there is evidence of contravention, action will be taken in accordance with the Agency's published Enforcement policy.

Flooding (Newcastle)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 6 June 2000, Official Report, columns 197–98W, if he will list the flooding incidents at Jesmond Dene and Ouseburn that have occurred from 1 May to date; how many properties were so affected; and what assessment he has made of the impact the proposed sustainable urban drainage system from Newcastle Great Park would have had on flooding incidents. [126009]

Mr. Meacher: The Environment Agency's records indicate that since 1 May 2000 one domestic garage has flooded from the Ouseburn. The Environment Agency is aware of further surface water flooding within the Red House Farm estate and within Brunton Park, Gosforth. This flooding was caused by the drainage systems within these estates being unable to discharge into the Ouseburn when in flood. Although precise numbers are not available, the Environment Agency believes around eight properties on the Red House Farm estate were affected, along with a similar number on the Brunton Park estate.

The Environment Agency believes, based on detailed modelling studies, that the development of the Newcastle Great Park will have no adverse impact in terms of flooding within the Ouseburn catchment. The use of Sustainable Urban Drainage techniques, in the form of large balancing ponds, will maintain water and discharge flow into the Ouseburn at a rate equivalent to the undeveloped site. The design criteria utilised will reduce flows from the development site in extreme rainfall events. The development will also benefit from a sewerage system in which foul sewage and surface water will be dealt with separately.

Transport Strategies (Lancaster)

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the potential impact of the Government's transport strategies and the development of industrial land on the local economy in Lancaster. [124599]

Mr. Hill: Such assessments should be included in the District Local Plan and Local Transport Plan, which are the responsibility of Lancaster city council and Lancaster county council respectively.

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Pond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on Government policy relating to combined heat and power projects. [124593]

Mr. Meacher: Combined heat and power is vital to helping us meet our Kyoto commitments. The Government are actively working towards a target of at least 10,000 megawatts by 2010, and will issue and consult on a new CHP Strategy for achieving the target. The Government have already announced that Good Quality CHP will be eligible for Climate Change Levy exemption, Enhanced Capital Allowances, and de-rating of electricity generating plant and machinery, from April next year. I announced the basis on which "Good Quality" would be assessed, following consultation, on 17 May.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, in his statement to the House on energy policy on 17 April 2000, Official Report, columns 697–99, reaffirmed the Government's strong support for CHP, and indicated that it would continue to expect developers to explore opportunities to use CHP, in considering notifications and applications under the Electricity and Energy Acts.

The Government actively work to increase the use of CHP in their own property, other public organisations, industry and commerce. On 17 May I also launched the CHP Club, strengthening the information and advice provided by Government to existing, new and potential CHP users.

Park Homes

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to bring the purchasing of park homes within the scope of the existing laws covering the purchase of houses and land; and if he will make a statement. [126093]

Mr. Mullin: My Department will publish the recommendations of the Park Homes Working Party in July, and we will announce our conclusions on them in due course. The report's recommendations include changes to the arrangements for the sale of park homes, but do not propose that park homes be brought within the scope of existing housing legislation.

Construction Industry Advisory Group

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what payment and expenses the Chairman of the construction industry advisory group, Movement for Innovation, receives; [126169]

(2) what the term of office is of the Chairman of the construction industry advisory group, Movement for Innovation; [126170]

(3) if he will review the appointment of the present Chairman of the construction industry advisory group, Movement for Innovation, taking account of his resignation as managing director of a building company. [126171]

Mr. Raynsford: The appointment and term of office of the Chairman of the Movement for Innovation Board are matters for the Board. He has never received any payment or expenses for his work as Chairman. The Movement for Innovation Board and their Chairman have played an important role in promoting radical change in the construction industry and have had a major impact in little more than 18 months. I applaud the very considerable contribution they have made.

Second Homes (Norfolk)

Dr. George Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will estimate for councils in Norfolk the reduction in revenue from council tax which arises from the 50 per cent. dispensation for second homes; [125109]

(2) if he will estimate the reduction in revenue to the Norfolk Police Authority which arises from the 50 per cent. dispensation in council tax for second homes. [125108]

Ms Beverley Hughes: There should be no loss of revenue to Norfolk councils. If a local authority has a reduced tax base because it has dwellings subject to a discount or exemption (this includes second homes discounts), it will receive more grant from the Government.

Water Industry (Consumer Representation)

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the future of consumer representation in the water industry. [124585]

Mr. Mullin: There are currently 10 Customer Service Committees operating in the interests of consumers in England and Wales as part of the Office of Water Services (OFWAT). The OWFAT National Consumer Council consists of the chairmen of each regional Customer Service Committee and speaks for water consumers at the national level.

The Government have reviewed their policy on consumer representation in the regulated utilities. They published two consultation papers: "A Fair Deal for Consumers: Modernising the Framework for Utility Regulation" (March 1998); and the subsequent "Consumer Councils" (September 1998). The Government's policy was set out in the responses to these consultations published respectively in July 1998 and April 1999.

The proposals on consumer representation in the water industry, including the establishment of an independent Consumer Council for Water will require legislation. The Government will be consulting on specific policies in the forthcoming draft Water Bill.

Energy Efficiency

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to publish proposals for changes to Part L of the Building Regulations, which deals with energy efficiency; and if he will make a statement. [126584]

Mr. Raynsford: A consultation on proposals for substantial changes to the energy conservation requirements in Part L of the Building Regulations has been published today. The consultation period will end on 29 September 2000. The Government have made clear their aim to do all they can to address the global problem of adverse climate change. This cannot be achieved by any one policy, and the contribution made by each separate initiative will be crucial to achieving our overall aim.

Buildings produce about half of the total national CO_2 emissions, and average building performance is poor by comparison with current best practice. If implemented, the proposals would yield significant improvements in the energy efficiency of new buildings and also in existing buildings when they are renovated. This would contribute directly to our vision of more sustainable construction set out in "Building a better quality of life". The draft proposals aim to contribute to the Government's climate change programme while keeping the Regulations technically sound, cost-effective and proportionate. Other improvements would also accrue for those who occupy buildings in terms of the opportunities for increased comfort and reduced energy costs.

This consultation has been anticipated by all sectors of the construction industry and by others who have a desire to see standards of energy efficiency raised. We anticipate receiving comments on the proposals from all interested parties, and all such comments will be considered when drafting our final proposals for amendments. Participation by all interested parties will ensure that the eventual amendments reflect the broadest views of what can reasonably be achieved by the Building Regulations.

Otterburn Training Area

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he received the report of the inspector with the revised plans for the Otterburn training area; and when he will make a decision on the proposals. [124578]

Mr. Raynsford: The Inspector's report on the re-opened public inquiry into the MOD proposals for Otterburn Training Area reached Government Office officials on 21 October 1999.

The right hon. Member will be aware of the complex issues involved and the substantial amount of evidence to be considered. I am unable at this stage to give any indication as to when a decision is likely. However, the Secretary of State does appreciate the concern of those who feel that delays are creating uncertainty.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to her answer of 30 March 2000, Official Report, column 249W, concerning contracts, if she will list the companies concerned; and whether these contracts were subject to a competitive tendering process. [124815]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 7 June 2000]: Pursuant to my answer of 30 March 2000, Official Report, column 249W, the information required is as follows.

The specific companies with the associated contract values are:

Companies awarded contracts on a competitive basis

BAe	84,300
Douglas Clarke Projects	5,000
HEDRA Ltd.	7,357
KPMG	5,000
Rayfield Mills	24,000

Companies awarded contracts on a non-competitive basis

K. Bates	43,489
DERA	44,308
HVR Consultancy Services	5,000
PCMS	124,011
J. Watson Associates	700

Fishing Vessels (Satellite Monitoring Equipment)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many UK vessels are obliged under EU regulations to carry operational satellite monitoring equipment; and how many UK vessels comply; [125133]

(2) how many UK vessels have satellite monitoring equipment on board which is not operational; and in which fleet segment these vessels are concentrated. [125134]

Mr. Morley: Some 430 UK fishing vessels over 24 metres overall length are required to carry satellite monitoring equipment. Our records, and those of the devolved administrations, show that all vessels are equipped. The vast majority of vessels are complying with the requirement to provide position reports at the required frequency. Those which are not submitting reports are mostly in the demersal segment. Some vessels have not submitted reports because they have recently been inactive due to lack of fishing opportunities and the number not complying is declining. Appropriate action is being taken against active vessels which are not yet fully compliant.

Water Level Management Plans

Mr. Brake: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much grant in aid his Department has provided for the implementation of water level management plans in (a) 1999–2000 and (b) 2000–01. [125779]

Mr. Morley: MAFF provides grant towards the cost of approved capital works undertaken by the Environment Agency, local authorities and Internal Drainage Boards, inter alia, to implement water level management plans. The amounts of grant paid in 1999–2000 and so far in 2000–01 are £47,000 and £1,000 respectively.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many water level management plans have been adopted by the operating authority and agreed by English Nature. [125776]

Mr. Morley: There are 61 Special Protection Areas and Special Areas of Conservation with water level management plans (WLMPs) that have been fully agreed by English Nature, and a further 26 that have been agreed in principle. This means that there may need to be some modification to the plans prior to implementation.

For those SSIs that are not SPAs or SACs, there are 130 WLMPs that have been fully agreed by English Nature, and a further 31 that have been agreed in principle.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many water level management plans (a) have been completed and (b) are outstanding for (i) Special Protection Areas and Special Areas of Conservation and (ii) sites of special scientific interest; and if he will list their locations in each case. [125778]

Mr. Morley: A Water Level Management Plan has been completed, at least in draft, for 112 sites that are designated or proposed Special Protection Areas, or candidate Special Areas of Conservation. These include a number of larger sites where more than one plan has been prepared to cover separate areas.

There are a further 25 Special Protection Areas and Special Areas of Conservation where a Water Level Management Plan is required, but where English Nature has not yet received a draft plan, and are therefore considered to be outstanding.

For those sites that are Sites of Special Scientific Interest but are not SPAs or SACs, there are 194 that are completed at least in draft.

A further 123 SSSIs require a WLMP but have no plan prepared to date. The deadline for completing these plans is December 2000.

Lists of all the above sites have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Brake: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what targets his Department has set for the completion of water level management plans for sites of special scientific interest which are also special protection areas or special areas of conservation. [125777]

Mr. Morley: The Government's High Level Targets for Flood and Coastal Defence document produced in November 1999 set, in partnership with English Nature, a target date of 30 March 2000 for completion of water level management plans for sites of special interest which are also special protection areas of conservation.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Rape Statistics

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Solicitor-General how many cases of alleged rape were passed to the Crown Prosecution Service by the Police which were not proceeded with, together with the reasons for not proceeding, in each of the last five years for which statistics are available. [125787]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service holds no central records on the outcome of particular offences. The information is held on individual case files, and could be recovered only by examining every relevant file in each CPS office. The costs of such an exercise would be prohibitive.

TREASURY

Census

Mr. Colman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what decision has been made about whether to include a question about religious identity in the 2001 Census. [125875]

Miss Melanie Johnson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to Mr. Tony Colman, dated 15 June 2000:

As the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS) I have been asked to reply to recent question asking if a decision has been made to include a religious identity question in the 2001 Census.

A Bill to amend the Census Act 1920 to provide for particulars with respect to religion to be asked for in a census in England and Wales was approved in the House of Lords on 28 March. In the course of its passage through the Lords, the Bill was amended to make any question on religion voluntary.

After its passage through the Lords the Bill has hitherto failed to get an unopposed Second Reading in the House of Commons.

The Government recognises the strength of the case for information on religion to be collected in the Census. The question will enhance data obtained from the ethnic group question and contribute to the Census providing data to help address the concerns and needs of all sections of the community.

In the light of this, the Government has agreed to provide time within its own legislative programme to progress the Bill through its remaining stages. It will do all that it can so that the Census Act may be amended in time to allow the proposed religious question to be included in the 2001 Census in England and Wales.

Subject to the Bill obtaining Royal Assent, the Government proposes to lay before both Houses of Parliament the necessary amendment to the Census Order providing for the question on religion to be asked in the 2001 Census in England and Wales.

The Scottish Parliament has already approved legislation to amend the Act in Scotland where the Census is a devolved matter. Legislation in Northern Ireland already allows for a question in respect of religion to be asked in the Census.

Fuel Duty

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the revenue from fuel duty was raised in each country and region of the UK in each of the last five years. [125792]

Mr. Timms: Duty on hydrocarbon oil products is collected centrally and there is no direct information available to provide a geographical breakdown of the revenue raised.

Figures for inland deliveries of fuel and oil by country are published in the Department of Trade and Industry's "Digest of UK Energy Statistics".

Knowledge Economy

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which organisations and individuals he has consulted while undertaking the cross-departmental review of the Knowledge Economy; in what form he has consulted them; on how many occasions he has met them; and if he will make a statement. [126005]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Informal consultations were held in confidence with a range of external organisations and individuals during the course of the review. The outcome of the review will be announced as part of the Government's new spending plans for 2001–02 to 2003–04.

Spending Review

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Treasury will require Departments to include environmental appraisals in their submissions to the Treasury on the spending review. [125977]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The guidance issued to Departments for the conduct of the Spending Review makes clear that evaluation of policy options should be carried out in accordance with the Treasury document "Appraisal and Evaluation in Central Government" (revised 1997) and by DETR's publication "Policy Appraisal and the Environment: Policy Guidance" (1998). Both of these stress the importance of environmental costs and benefits being considered in appraisals, even when these cannot be easily quantified.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what training has been undertaken to assist staff of Government Departments to assess the implications of spending reviews for the Government's sustainable development objectives. [125978]

Mr. Andrew Smith: It is a matter for individual Departments to ensure the relevant staff are adequately trained in policy appraisal. Within the Treasury, economic appraisal is included in microeconomics training for staff. The Spending Review guidance issued to Departments included references to sources of guidance on policy appraisal. It also reminded Departments that advice on sustainable development, or sources of expertise on environmental considerations can be obtained from DETR's Sustainable Development Unit.

In addition, the First Annual Report of the Green Ministers Committee included a commitment that all Departments would put in place strategies to raise awareness on sustainable development and general environmental issues.

Community Banking

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultations he has had on the expansion of community banking; and with whom. [124588]

Miss Melanie Johnson: On 16 November 1999 the Government published a report by Police Action Team 14 on ways to improve individual access to financial services, and by the Credit Unions Taskforce on ways in which banks and building societies could help credit unions to grow. Last month I met members of the All Party Group on Community Banking Services and will soon be meeting with the Association of British Credit Unions.

Barnett Formula

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what the expenditure per head was in (a) Scotland, (b) Wales, (c) England and (d) each Government Office region in England in each year since 1990 on (i) health and social services and (ii) education services covered by the Barnett formula; [126002]

(2) what proportion of public expenditure in (a) England, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales was of the type covered by the Barnett formula in each year since 1990; and what expenditure per head in each country for that share of spending resulted; [126010]

(3) what categories of expenditure in (a) England, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales were covered by the Barnett formula in each year since 1979; and what changes in those categories he has under review in the current spending review; [126003]

(4) if he will publish the population-based spending allocation formula share for each year since 1979 for (a) England, (b) Wales and (c) Scotland; and what population share he proposes to adopt as the basis for spending allocations in the 2000 expenditure review. [126004]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Information on the coverage of the Barnett Formula since 1979 was published in 1997 in Annexe 1 of the Treasury Committee report on the Barnett formula. The current coverage was published last year by the Treasury in the Statement of Funding Policy. No decisions have been made yet on the outcome of the current spending review.

The population-based spending allocation formula was set out in Annexe B of the Statement of Funding Policy and was also referred to in the above Treasury Committee report.

Information which is available on public expenditure trends by country and region including expenditure per head is published in the analysis of identifiable total managed expenditure by country and region in Chapter 8 of Public Expenditure Statistical Analyses (Cm 4601).

Dormant Accounts

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will introduce legislation to compel banks and other institutions to search for claimants to accounts which have remained dormant for more than five years; [126174]

(2) if he will introduce legislation to ensure that money in dormant accounts is not held by banks or other institutions for longer than 10 years. [126173]

Miss Melanie Johnson: We have no plans to do so.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Trade Barriers

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans the Government have to encourage other developed nations to lift trade barriers and quotas to help developing countries compete in the export market. [115921]

Clare Short: The Government have pressed the EU—which represents all member states in WTO negotiations—to seek, in the next Round of multilateral trade negotiations in the WTO, reduction of the barriers to agricultural and non-agricultural trade. We are also strongly committed to provide duty free access for essentially all products from the Least Developed Countries by 2005. We are pressing the Commission to bring forward proposals to fulfil this commitment and to exempt as few products as possible. Thereafter, we will press for all remaining barriers on imports from the Least Developed Countries to be removed as pledged by the Prime Minister in his speech at Mansion House on 22 November. We are urging other developed countries to match this commitment.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Careers Service

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answer of 5 May 2000, Official Report, column 218W, on the Careers Service, if he will produce a revised list of the Careers Service contractors holding (a) a Charter Mark, (b) an Investors in People award and (c) an International Standards Organisation registration. [126517]

Mr. Wicks: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 5 June 2000, Official Report, columns 144–47W.

PE Teachers

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what action he is taking to celebrate excellence among PE teachers; and if he will make a statement. [124681]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 5 June 2000]: The Sports Strategy, which was published in April this year, explicitly recognises the contribution of inspirational PE teachers in enabling young people to develop physical skills, in promoting personal and social development and in laying foundations for sport and healthy exercise to become a lifelong habit. The Sport England awards, Sportsmark and Activemark, recognise good practice nationally in primary and secondary schools and celebrate the teachers responsible for attaining these very high standards, and I attended the recent Sportsmark national presentation. We have also introduced Advanced Skills Teachers, a grade which offers experienced, excellent classroom teachers, including specialists in physical education, an enhanced pay scale, encouraging them to stay as front-line teachers rather than moving into management. We have also introduced this year new arrangements which give all good qualified teachers the opportunity to cross the threshold onto a new upper pay range.

National Curriculum (International Dimension)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the contents of the international dimension to the revised National Curriculum, with particular reference to (a) values and (b) issues covered. [124747]

Jacqui Smith: The Government's approach to the international dimension in the National Curriculum is spelt out in the "Values, aims and purposes" section of the National Curriculum handbook:

> Education influences and reflects the values of society, and the kind of society we want to be. It is important, therefore, to recognise a broad set of common values and purposes that underpin the school curriculum and the work of schools.
> Foremost is a belief in education, at home and at school, as a route to the spiritual, moral, social, cultural, physical and mental development, and thus the well-being of the individual. Education is also a route to equality of opportunity for all, a healthy and just democracy, a productive economy, and sustainable development. Education should reflect the enduring values that contribute to these ends. These include valuing ourselves, our families and other relationships, the wider groups to which we belong, the diversity of our society and the environment in which we live. Education should also reaffirm our commitment to the virtues of truth, justice, honesty, trust and a sense of duty.
> At the same time, education must enable us to respond positively to the opportunities and challenges of the rapidly changing world in which we live and work. In particular, we need to be prepared to engage as individuals, parents, workers and citizens with economic, social and cultural change, including the continued globalisation of the economy and society, with new work and leisure patterns and with the rapid expansion of communication technologies.

The Programmes of Study outline the issues, including those relating to the international dimension, covered in each subject area.

Youth Parliament

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what part the Youth Parliament will play in the Government's citizenship programme; [125641]

(2) what support his Department has given to the Youth Parliament in the form of (a) finance and (b) staff. [125640]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 13 June 2000]: The Government welcome the setting up of a UK Youth Parliament (UKYP). The development of a UKYP fits with the Government's commitment to involve young people in all aspects of Government and to develop citizenship skills among young people—an essential element of education is citizenship and the teaching of democracy in schools. As the Department with the lead responsibility for the Connexions strategy and the development of citizenship through the National Curriculum, DfEE has a particular interest in supporting the work of the UKYP. For example, we recently agreed to a full-time member of staff from the Department being seconded to the UKYP for 12 months. In addition, the Department has funded consultancy support for the group of young people and other representatives who make up the UKYP steering group, taking forward the development of the UKYP. And the training process for prospective young Members of the Youth Parliament, currently being developed, will include sessions on citizenship—the UKYP is in discussion with DfEE on the help that we will be able to provide for those sessions, which are scheduled to take place in late October. While DfEE and other Government Departments are helping in its development, the UKYP is independent of Government and political parties and will belong to the young people themselves. It is the young people who will ultimately decide how the UKYP will be run, what issues they want to debate and the part they wish to play in future citizenship developments.

New Deal

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how many people have joined the subsidised employment option of the New Deal since implementation, by unit of delivery; how many and what percentage of these (a) completed their programme before leaving the New Deal, (b) left their programme before completing it and (c) left at any stage for unknown destinations; [113555]

(4) how many people have joined the full-time education and training option of the New Deal for 18 to 24-year-olds since implementation, by unit of delivery; how many and what percentage of these (a) completed their courses before leaving the New Deal, (b) left their courses before completing it and (c) left at any stage for unknown destinations; [113557]

(5) pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam of 27 March 2000, Official Report, column 40W, on the new deal for 18 to 24-year-olds, how many (a) 18 to 24-year-olds have left the New Deal for young people to jobs lasting less than 13 weeks and (b) 18 to 24-year-olds have left the full-time education and training option of the New Deal for young people to jobs lasting less than 13 weeks, broken down by unit of delivery; [117246]

(6) if he will list by unit of delivery how many people joined the voluntary sector option of the New Deal for 18 to 24-year-olds between January 1998 and the end of July 1999; and how many of these (a) completed their course before leaving the New Deal and (b) left their course before completing the New Deal; [118220]

(7) if he will list by unit of delivery how many people left the voluntary sector option of the New Deal for 18 to 24-year-olds between January 1998 and July 1999 for (a) destination unknown, (b) other known destination, (c) sustained unsubsidised employment, (d) jobs lasting less than 13 weeks and (e) other benefits; [118221]

(8) how many people left the employment option of the New Deal for 18 to 24-year-olds, by unit of delivery, between January 1998 and July 1999 for (a) destination unknown, (b) another known destination, (c) sustained unsubsidised employment, (d) jobs lasting less than 13 weeks and (e) other benefits; [118493]

(9) how many people joined the Employment option of the New Deal for 18 to 24-year-olds, by unit of delivery, between January 1998 and the end of July 1999; and how many of these (a) completed and (b) left their course before completing the New Deal; [118494]

(10) how many people, by unit of delivery, left the Environmental Task Force option of the New Deal for young people aged 18 to 24 years for (a) unknown destination, (b) other known destination, (c) sustained unsubsidised employment, (d) jobs lasting less than 13 weeks and (e) other benefits; [118701]

(11) how many people, by unit of delivery, joined the Environmental Task Force option of the New Deal for 18 to 24-year-olds between January 1998 and the end of July 1999; how many of these (a) completed their course before leaving the New Deal and (b) left their course before completing the New Deal; [118705]

(12) when the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam will receive replies to his questions of 6 April, 7 April and 10 April. [123282]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 3 April 2000]: The information showing, by Unit of Delivery, cumulative data from the start of the New Deal to the end of March 2000, the latest date for which information is available, is contained in a number of tables, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries.

The tables show:

the number of starts to each of the four options

the number of New Deal leavers who have taken part in each of the four options—and their destinations on leaving the New Deal.

At a national level, this information is shown in the monthly Government Statistical Service New Deal Statistical First Release. Destinations on leaving New Deal are categorised as:

sustained unsubsidised employment

transfers to other benefits

leavers to other known destinations

JSA leavers to unknown destinations

Young people who move on from the New Deal for jobs that last less than 13 weeks rejoin the programme immediately when they renew their claims for Jobseeker's Allowance. They cannot therefore be described as having left the New Deal.

Of those who have left the New Deal for known destinations, having taken part in options, including leavers from the Follow Through stage of New Deal, 46 per cent. found work. We do not know the destination on leaving New Deal for 28 per cent. of those who have participated in options. People leaving the New Deal are not required to tell us where they are going if they cease to claim benefits. In order to know as much as possible about the destinations of people leaving the New Deal the Government are conducting further surveys of those who leave the New Deal for unknown destinations. The results will be available later this year. So far surveys have shown that the pattern of actual destinations for those recorded as leaving the New Deal for unknown destinations is in line with the pattern among those whose destinations were known.

Comprehensive information on whether young people left their options having completed them or before having done so is not collected in that form. The New Deal aims to help unemployed people to move as quickly as possible from welfare into employment. Many young people will leave their New Deal options before completing them because they have found jobs in the regular labour market and are no longer unemployed. Young people do not therefore need to complete their New Deal options in order to succeed in the programme.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Broadcasting Industry (North-West)

13. Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the role of the broadcasting industry in the economy of the north-west. [124597]

Dr. Howells: The broadcasting industry makes an important contribution to the economy of the north-west. The creative and media industries have been identified as priority sectors by the north-west Development Agency.

Manufacturing (East Midlands)

14. Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the performance of manufacturing industry in the east midlands region. [124598]

Mr. Caborn: Some sectors of manufacturing in the east midlands have continued to suffer, particularly in clothing and textiles and more traditional engineering. Other sectors, including those in higher technology, are faring much better. Overall manufacturing confidence remains significantly higher than for the same period last year.

Directors' Pay

15. Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he plans to introduce to increase shareholders' power in respect of setting directors' pay. [124600]

Dr. Howells: The Department of Trade and Industry published a consultation paper on directors' remuneration last year which put forward a number of proposals for improving disclosure of directors' remuneration and the board's accountability to shareholders. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will make an announcement shortly on the Government's response to the consultation.

Steel Industry

16. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next intends to meet the directors of Corus to discuss rail production in Workington. [124601]

Mr. Caborn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has met senior executives from Corus on several occasions to discuss a range of matters of interest to the steel industry. My Department maintains a regular dialogue with Corus and other companies as well as with other key organisations in the steel industry.

21. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received on steel-making in the United Kingdom. [124608]

Mr. Caborn: My right hon. Friend regularly receives representations on steel-making in the United Kingdom from a variety of sources. He has also held discussions recently with senior executives from the Corus Group plc and representatives from the Steel and Metals Union (ISTC) to discuss a range of issues relating to steel-making.

Energy Policy

17. Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his policy is on electricity generation. [124603]

22. Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the Government's energy policy. [124609]

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his energy policy. [124606]

Mrs. Liddell: Our policy is to ensure secure, diverse and sustainable supplies of energy at competitive prices.

Ford

18. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with Ford motor company concerning its future investment in the United Kingdom. [124604]

Mr. Byers: I have had frequent discussions with Ford over their recent review of European operations and its implications for the United Kingdom, particularly at Dagenham.

We shall maintain this close contact as their future investment plans for the United Kingdom develop.

Rover

20. Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with the west midlands regional development agency regarding the future of the Rover Longbridge plant. [124607]

Mr. Byers: The Rover Longbridge plant is in private ownership. I have had no recent discussions with the West Midlands Regional Development Agency about the future of the Longbridge plant.

Regional Venture Capital Funds

25. Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements he has made for managing and distributing the funds for regional venture capital and innovation. [124612]

Mr. Byers: Arrangements are currently being put in place for the creation of Regional Venture Capital Funds with Government support based on bidding guidance published in December 1999. Lessons learned from this exercise will inform how the new money announced in the Budget will be managed in the English Regions.

National Minimum Wage

26. Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action has been taken against employers who pay below the national minimum wage. [124613]

Dr. Howells: The National Minimum Wage (NMW) Act 1998 contains a number of provisions relating to enforcement, both civil and criminal. To date, 155 enforcement notices have been issued which require employers to start paying the NMW and make good any past failure to pay the NMW. Two notices have so far required follow up action with a penalty notice fining the employer for each day of non-compliance with the enforcement notice.

It is also a criminal offence to refuse or wilfully neglect to pay the NMW. So far it has not been necessary to take a criminal prosecution, though enforcement officers will do so in appropriate circumstances.

British Trade International

27. Ms Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the merger between the Invest in Britain Bureau and British Trade International. [124614]

Mr. Caborn: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement I gave to the House on 24 May 2000, Official Report, columns 522–23W.

Miners' Compensation

28. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the number of compensation claims from retired miners that have been settled to date. [124615]

Mrs. Liddell: To date the Department has made payments in full or part settlement of claims totalling some £60.5 million to 21,500 respiratory disease claimants, and some £120 million to 25,300 Vibration White Finger claimants.

Manufacturing

29. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the performance of manufacturing industry in the Yorkshire region in the past 12 months. [124616]

Mr. Caborn: The performance of manufacturing industry in the Yorkshire and the Humber Region is regularly assessed by a number of organisations. Most recently a joint initiative has been launched by the regional development agency, Yorkshire Forward, and the CBI to gauge business activity in the region.

The Government Office for Yorkshire and the Humber is in regular contact with local and regional partners about business matters in the region.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will undertake an assessment of the performance of manufacturing industry in Lancashire and the North West region. [124611]

Mr. Byers: Manufacturing industry is important to Lancashire and the North West. It accounts for 129,000 or 26 per cent. of jobs in Lancashire. All business performance is being continually assessed by markets operating in conditions of free and fair competition. This Government's first priority is to create and maintain the conditions of economic stability, which allow companies to plan ahead with confidence.

Research and Development

30. Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to promote research and development among UK companies. [124617]

Mr. Caborn: The Government are taking a number of significant steps to promote research and development among UK companies. Working closely with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we have recently introduced an R&D tax credit for small and medium-sized companies which gives them 150 per cent. relief for the cost of staff and consumables used in R&D. The R&D tax credit will be supported by new Guidelines on R&D which will help companies of all sizes to benefit from Research and Development Allowances. We are also increasing the DTI Innovation Budget by some 20 per cent. over three years to nearly £230 million by 2001–02. This budget will fund a number of new and enlarged initiatives designed to drive forward a fundamental change in innovation performance in the UK. This includes for example the Smart scheme which supports R&D activities in private small and medium-sized companies and is being expanded and extended over the period 1999–2002, and the technology transfer scheme known as TCS, for which DTI is doubling its expenditure. Our aim is to improve the overall climate for investment in R&D and innovation. But the level of R&D investment by companies is for companies themselves to determine. DTI helps companies make an informed decision by providing a valuable source of information on UK and international R&D investment through the annual R&D Scoreboard.

Unsolicited Faxes

31. Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the arrangements for preventing unsolicited fax messages. [124618]

Dr. Howells: The arrangements for avoiding unsolicited direct marketing faxes are contained in the Telecommunications (Data Protection and Privacy) Regulations 1999. These ban the sending of unsolicited direct marketing faxes to individual subscribers, and introduce an "opt-out" scheme—the Fax Preference Service—for corporate subscribers.

There is good evidence that the arrangements are delivering effective protection to subscribers from unwanted faxes. The number of complaints to Oftel about these faxes has fallen sharply since the Regulations came into force. Over the same period of time, the number of subscribers registered with the Fax Preference Service has risen from less than 15,000 to over 280,000.

The Data Protection Commissioner's Office are responsible for enforcing the Regulations and will take action against those that they feel have wilfully or negligently breached the Regulations. The Data Protection Commissioner has recently issued enforcement notices to two companies in relation to the sending of direct marketing faxes, and is considering enforcement actions against a number of others.

Regional ITV Companies

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the economic impact of regional ITV companies on their region. [124584]

Dr. Howells: As high technology companies employing people with valuable skills, ITV companies are likely to have a significant impact on the economies of the regions they are in.

Pringle's Knitwear Factory

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the Berwick Task Force following the closure of the Pringle's knitwear factory. [124610]

Mr. Caborn: The Task Force, set up after the announcement of the closure of the Pringles knitwear factory in Berwick, has met on a number of occasions since July 1998, the latest meeting being held this week. A consultancy firm has been engaged to work with the Task Force and the local authority to help establish a comprehensive regeneration strategy for the town, and a bid for further Single Regeneration Budget funding is likely.

Rats

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy to collect figures on expenditure by (a) catering establishments, (b) farms and agricultural holdings, (c) water and sewerage companies, (d) other business and (e) local authorities of (i) treating rat infestations and (ii) remedying damage caused by rats. [113047]

Ms Hewitt: I have no plans to do so.

Correspondence

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South will receive a reply to his letters of 16 December and 7 March, concerning Mr. James Murdoch, of Kilwinning. [125387]

Mr. Alan Johnson: I have replied to my hon. Friend today.

Animal Testing

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans the Government have to require cosmetic products imported into the United Kingdom which have been tested on animals to be labelled with this information; and if he will make a statement. [125952]

Dr. Howells: Under the current Cosmetic Products (Safety) Regulations 1996, any reference to testing on animals in the labelling of a cosmetic product must state clearly whether the tests carried out involved the cosmetic product itself or its ingredients. (However, if manufacturers market their products without any reference to animal testing, the regulations do not require them to alter that practice).

The European Commission has proposed a 7th Amendment to the Cosmetics Directive, which aims to ban animal testing in the EU. One aspect of the proposed amendment will be that the Commission, in collaboration with member states, will produce guidelines to ensure that common criteria are applied to any claims relating to animal testing, and that such claims do not mislead the consumer.

Inward Investment

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the current UK share is of internationally mobile projects with growth potential; and by how much he aims to increase this in 2000–01. [125968]

Mr. Caborn: The UK's share of inward investment stock reached a record figure of £244.1 billion at the end of 1999, an increase of 26 per cent. over the previous year. This is a larger share than for any other EU member state.

The Government are fully committed to ensuring that the UK remains the No. 1 location in Europe for inward investment, including for projects with growth potential. We will continue to pursue economic policies which enhance the UK's attractions including: developing a skills base, provide flexible labour markets and a stable economy.

Broadband Fixed Wireless Access

Maria Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements he intends to make for the licensing of broadband fixed wireless access at 28 GHz. [126773]

Ms Hewitt: Following extensive consultation with interested parties, I intend to award by auction later this year licences for the provision of broadband fixed wireless access at 28 GHz. There will be three licences available in each of 11 English licence areas and in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. Each licence will have forward and return channels of 112 MHz. A successful bidder will be able to hold just one licence in each licence area, but will be able to hold a licence in any number of licence areas. Licences will be for a term of 15 years.

I will shortly be publishing draft Regulations to be made under section 3 of the Wireless Telegraphy Act 1998 to provide for this auction. The period for comments to be received concludes on 17 July. I hope to lay the Regulations before Parliament by the end of July. With the draft Regulations I am also publishing for comment a draft of the Notice that I intend to issue under the Regulations. The Notice sets out the detailed arrangements for the auction and will include the date on which applications should be made. I am placing copies of the draft Regulations and the draft Notice in the Libraries of the House.

Gas-fired Power Station, Avonmouth

Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce his decision on Northern Electric plc's proposal to build a gas-fired power station at Sevelco works, Avonmouth. [126774]

Mrs. Liddell: The proposal to build a new 180 MW gas-fired combined heat and power station at the Sevelco works, Avonmouth, has several potential benefits particularly those to the local area in terms of atmospheric pollution and the requirements of the Environment Agency for a pollution control arrangement. The Station being combined heat and power, albeit not fully meeting the criteria given in the Energy White Paper, the benefits are such that I have decided not to use my powers, under section 14(3) of the Energy Act 1976, to defer or halt this project. However, local planning and other clearances are still required under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989.

I have placed copies of this Press Notice and the decision letter in the Library of the House.

Merchant Vessels

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total gross registered tonnage of merchant vessels constructed in United Kingdom shipyards in (a) 1990, (b) 1995 and (c) 1999. [124605]

Mr. Caborn: The information for merchant vessels completed in the United Kingdom is in the table.

Textiles Industry

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the prospects for future employment in the UK textiles industry. [124582]

Mr. Byers: I refer my hon. Friend to the oral answer given today to my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber), Official Report, column 1097.

World Trade Organisation

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress of World Trade Organisation negotiations since the Seattle meeting. [124590]

Mr. Caborn: Since Seattle, the mandated negotiations on agriculture and on services have been launched. Consultations have also been conducted by the Director-General and the Chair of the General Council. The General Council meeting on 3–8 May included discussion on the progress of two areas of consultation. The first involved a package of confidence-building measures aimed at helping developing countries, including establishing an implementation review mechanism. Discussions on the second, on improving consultative and decision-making procedures, are continuing in Geneva.

PRIME MINISTER

Strategic Communications Unit

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister what controls there are on the Downing Street Strategic Communications Unit to prevent it furthering party purposes. [125728]

The Prime Minister: Staff in the Strategic Communications Unit are subject to the requirements of the "Civil Service Code" and "Guidance on the Work of the Government Information Service", which make clear that public resources must not be used for party political purposes. Ministers are also under a duty, set out in the "Ministerial Code", to uphold the political impartiality of the civil service, and not to ask civil servants to act in any way which would conflict with the "Civil Service Code".

Government Annual Report

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Prime Minister when he expects to publish the Government's third annual report. [126217]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to his hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) on 14 June 2000, Official Report, column 647W.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Regulations and Directives

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many regulations and directives were printed in the Official Journal of the European Communities, having effect for (a) 1970 to 1972, (b) 1973 to 1982, (c) 1983 to 1992 and (d) 1993 to 1999; and how many pages of the Journal were devoted to such publication in each of these periods. [125253]

Mr. Vaz: All regulations and directives are published in the Official Journal of the European Communities. Statistics on legislative instruments for a given year are available on the Celex database.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the US Administration in respect of their claim against the UN for the cost of their airlift operation in Sierra Leone. [125436]

Mr. Hain: We have been informed by the United Nations Secretariat that they have not received a claim from the United States for the cost of their airlift operation in Sierra Leone.

Turkey

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received of human rights abuses against the Christian population in Turkey. [125760]

Mr. Vaz: We have received reports of alleged human rights abuses against Christians in Turkey. In December 1999, we received reports of police raids on Christian churches in Istanbul and Izmir, and, recently, of two Turkish Christians arrested in Izmir for distributing Christian literature. Officials from the British Embassy in Ankara have raised both these cases with the Turkish authorities. The trial of the two Christians arrested in Izmir was attended by a representative from our Consulate in Izmir and we were pleased to see both were acquitted in May and permission granted for the return of their material.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations (a) he and (b) his European counterparts have made to the Turkish authorities concerning the harassment of Christians in Turkey. [125740]

Mr. Vaz: We have a long standing concern about the position of the Greek and Syrian Orthodox communities in Turkey. We continue to monitor closely the situation of minorities in Turkey and, where appropriate, to raise with Turkish authorities cases of human rights abuses against minorities. In December 1999, we received reports of police raids on Christian churches in Istanbul and Izmir, and, recently, of two Turkish Christians arrested in Izmir for distributing Christian literature. The trial of the two Christians arrested was attended by a representative from our Consulate in Izmir and we were pleased to see that both were acquitted in May.

We know that other EU partners are also concerned about these issues and we understand that they, too, have raised their concerns with the Turkish authorities.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to assist in the training of the Turkish police in human rights matters. [125761]

Mr. Vaz: There is currently a comprehensive police training project under way in Turkey. We have allocated £107,000 to this project which builds on police training workshops held last year. The objective is to increase dialogue on issues of interest to both the British and Turkish police by holding seminars on public order, anti-terrorism, custody and detention. The project focuses on policing methods that protect human rights and are in line with international human rights law. As part of this project, a group of Turkish policemen visited Britain in May to study British policing methods. Further training projects are planned with the Turkish police which are likely to focus on transparency and accountability.

Study Visas

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to make it easier for foreign students to obtain visas to study in the UK. [125963]

Mr. Vaz: All our entry clearance posts abroad have been fully briefed on my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's initiative to attract more overseas students to the United Kingdom, and reminded of the importance of ensuring that the entry clearance process is as straightforward and user-friendly as possible. With this in mind, we and the British Council have updated our guidance material for students. We are also working with the British Council in a number of key markets to help students who are qualified to come here to submit properly completed and fully documented visa applications. This makes processing their applications easier and in many cases does away with the need for the applicant to be interviewed.

Interahamwe

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received regarding the identity of those responsible for training Interahamwe troops. [125961]

Mr. Hain: We have seen various reports alleging that the DRC government, and others in the region, have been training the Interahamwe. We have raised this issue with the countries concerned.

International Criminal Court

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he proposes to introduce legislation to ratify the Treaty signed in Rome on the International Criminal Court. [126220]

Mr. Hain: I refer the hon. and learned Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) on 3 May 2000, Official Report, column 122W.

Mercenaries

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his policy is regarding private military companies operating from the United Kingdom and dependent territories which are involved in the supply of mercenaries and related military services. [125280]

Mr. Hain: We condemn the recruitment, use, financing and training of mercenaries. We are committed to issuing a Green Paper on mercenary activity by November 2000. This will be a consultative document which will look at the options for further Government action in this area.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his policy is regarding the International Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries; and if he will make a statement. [125310]

Mr. Hain: Her Majesty's Government have no plans to sign the 1989 International Convention on Mercenaries. We do not consider that it would be enforceable in the UK courts. Although the Convention was adopted more than ten years ago, it has not yet attracted sufficient ratifications to enter into force.

Sri Lanka

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with his Commonwealth counterparts concerning a negotiated settlement to the conflict in Sri Lanka. [125814]

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and I have spoken to our Indian counterparts about the need for a political settlement in Sri Lanka. We told them that we recognised the importance of India's role in the search for peace. We have not yet held discussions with other Commonwealth partners.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with (a) his EU counterparts and (b) his UN counterparts concerning the implementation of an arms embargo on Sri Lanka. [125815]

Mr. Hain: None.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with his UN counterparts concerning the sending of a human rights monitor to Sri Lanka. [125816]

Mr. Hain: The human rights situation in Sri Lanka was discussed at this year's UN Commission on Human Rights in Geneva. We monitor the situation carefully and maintain close and regular contact with international partners, including the UN and NGOs.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last discussed the issue of access by non-governmental organisations to facilitate aid distribution with the Government of Sri Lanka. [125817]

Mr. Hain: Our High Commission in Colombo last discussed these concerns, and the humanitarian situation in the Jaffna peninsula as a whole, on 30 May.

United Nations

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with his US counterparts concerning the payment of dues owed to the UN; and if he will make a statement. [125818]

Mr. Hain: There have been no discussions recently but, at ministerial level, the UK has long pressed for a resolution to the problem of US arrears to the UN. Though we have welcomed US agreement under the Helms-Biden legislation to pay a substantial portion of their arrears, the US will need to convince the UN membership of the case for accepting the conditions attached to the legislation. At the EU General Affairs Council on 20 March, Foreign Ministers reaffirmed their commitment to securing a comprehensive reform of UN finances to put them on a sound, sustainable and equitable basis, and emphasised that the EU could only consider a reordering of UN contributions which protected EU member states' financial interests.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with his UN counterparts concerning the establishment of a constitutional conference to discuss reform of the UN. [125819]

Mr. Hain: There have been no recent ministerial discussions on the question of a conference to discuss reform of the United Nations. However, the Government are committed to supporting the UN Secretary-General's efforts to modernise the UN, based on his 1997 package of reform recommendations. We look forward to a discussion on strengthening the UN at the Millennium Summit in September.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans the UK Government have to discuss UN reform at the UN Millennium Summit. [125820]

Mr. Hain: We look forward to a wide-ranging discussion of the role of the United Nations in the 21st century at the Millennium Summit in September. We agree with comments made by the UN Secretary-General in his Millennium Report that, among other things, the Summit should consider the need to make the organisation more effective, efficient and accessible to the world's peoples.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with his UN counterparts regarding (a) the World Bank, (b) the IMF and (c) the WTO and their relationship with the Economic and Social Council of the UN. [125821]

Mr. Hain: Although this had not been discussed at ministerial level, the Government consider good relations between the United Nations, the international financial institutions and the WTO to be a high priority. We encourage and support the efforts of the Economic and Social Council and the World Bank and the IMF to strengthen their ties. The WTO is also involved in the UN's Financing for Development process in which the UK is playing an active role with our EU partners.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Millennium Bug

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Council if she will list examples of serious problems that have been reported in the UK, including those which arose as a result of problems abroad, arising from the Millennium Bug. [123293]

Mrs. Beckett: I have received no reports of serious problems in the UK caused by the century date change computer problem subsequent to my statement of 20 April 2000.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

English Heritage

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 24 May 2000, Official Report, column 560W, on English Heritage, (1) if he will place in the Library the information requested, covering the period from 1990 to 1996, as soon as the information is readily collatable; [124404]

(2) if he will place in the Library similar information to that requested in the original question relating to the English Heritage's advisory committees and panels for each year from 1990. [124457]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 14 June 2000]: English Heritage is unable to provide details of grants made to advisory panel members as they have no part in the formal grant decision making process, and are therefore not required to make a declaration of their interests. The other details requested will be made available for placing in the Library as soon as English Heritage is able to collate the necessary information.

Millennium Visitor Attractions

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment his Department has made of the impact on (a) employment at, (b) profitability of and (c) other aspects of other individual tourist attractions in the United Kingdom, of the Millennium Experience exhibition at the Millennium Dome. [124947]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 8 June 2000]: It is too early to make a detailed assessment of the impact of the many new lottery-assisted visitor attractions opening all around the UK to mark the millennium. However, the Millennium Commission is undertaking a large-scale Economic Impact Study of these projects. The British Tourist Authority (BTA) will also be analysing the impact of their international Millennium marketing Campaign "Britain—now is the time".

Millennium Bridge

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what fees have been paid to safety consultants in relation to the Millennium Bridge (a) prior to its official opening and (b) subsequently; [126243]

(2) if he will publish the contracts between the Millennium Bridge Trust and (a) the architects and (b) the builders of the Millennium Bridge; [126236]

(3) what estimates he has made of the cost of work to ensure the safety of the Millennium Bridge; and if public funds will be made available; [126241]

(4) if he will make a statement on the closure of the Millennium Bridge; [126240]

(5) what studies were made of safety issues at the Millennium Bridge by the Health and Safety Executive prior to its opening; and what fees were paid by the Millennium Bridge Trust for this work; [126242]

(6) what guarantees or indemnities were provided by (a) the architects and (b) the builders of the Millennium Bridge in relation to safety issues; [126237]

(7) what estimate he has made of the level of resources the Millennium Commission has available; [126239]

(8) when he expects the Millennium Bridge to re-open to the public. [126238]

Mr. Chris Smith: These are matters for the Millennium Commission. I will write to the hon. Member in my capacity as Chairman of the Commission, and place copies of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Time Exchange Scheme

Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if participation in a Time Exchange Scheme would affect entitlement to benefits. [126848]

Angela Eagle: Our legal advice is that time credits derived from participation in a Time Exchange Scheme, such as Fair Shares, do not constitute earnings for income-related benefit purposes and therefore participation does not constitute remunerative work. Entitlement to those benefits would therefore be unaffected. Guidance to local decision-makers will be issued shortly.

Pension (Mr. Ridler)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security on what date Mr. Ridler of Ferndown in the Christchurch constituency will be paid the additional pension to which he has been entitled since his retirement; and what additional interest and compensation will be payable. [125916]

Mr. Rooker: This is a matter for Alexis Cleveland, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Christopher Chope, dated 14 June 2000:

The Secretary Of State has asked me to respond to your recent Parliamentary Question asking on what date Mr Ridler of Ferndown in the Christchurch constituency will be paid the additional pension to which he has been entitled since his retirement; and what additional interest and compensation will be payable.

As you will appreciate, individual customers' cases are confidential. I will therefore, write to you privately on this matter.

Service Delivery

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what ways his Department and its executive agencies deliver services to meet the needs of the public as consumers, with particular reference to families. [124643]

Angela Eagle: We are modernising the way the Department's services are delivered to provide a comprehensive, dedicated service, focused on the needs of our key client groups: pensioners, working age people and children. We have appointed a senior member of the Departmental Board as the consumer champion, responsible for giving consumers a voice at the heart of the Department.

We are restructuring the Department to focus on our client groups: through a new pensions organisation focused on the needs of pensioners we will develop a modern and integrated service easily accessible from one point. We are bringing together the responsibilities of the Employment Service and part of the Benefits Agency to create a dedicated agency for people of working age. And we are working with the Inland Revenue to introduce the Integrated Child Credit from 2003 to bring together help for children provided through the tax and benefits system.

We are also reforming the Child Support system to provide a simple, straightforward child maintenance system that is fair and which people can understand. In the meantime we are already taking action to improve the more commonly used forms of our service delivery, including:

gathering client's views through consultation and evaluation, such as the Better Government for Older People Programme, to help design and improve the quality of our services to the public; making it easier for people to understand and resolve questions about benefit entitlement through the new decision making and appeals procedure;

re-designing our benefit leaflets and departmental website to allow people to find the information they need more easily and to do more business with us electronically;

providing a direct tele-claims service to pensioners so that we can take claims from Retirement Pension and deal with queries over the phone; offering one-to-one personal help under the New Deals and the ONE service to enable people to take up jobs and training opportunities open to them, already 306,476 people have found work through the New Deals—including nearly 51,000 lone parents through the New Deal for Lone Parents; extending opening hours of the Child Support Agency so that the public can contact us when it is convenient for them, increasing the use of the telephone to gather information and making more staff available to offer a face to face interview.

Income Support

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the savings from extending the waiting period for income support mortgage interest payments from nine to 14 months. [125297]

Mr. Bayley: If the waiting period for mortgage interest payments was extended from 9 to 14 months, the estimated annual savings would be around £25 million per year, based on 1999 levels of mortgage interest payments. This estimate takes account of pensioners but not other special groups who do not have to serve the current waiting period.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the effect of the nine months income support mortgage interest payments waiting period on the level of arrears and repossessions. [125299]

Mr. Bayley: No information is collected by the Department about the accrual of arrears or repossession activity in mortgages taken out by Income Support and income based Jobseeker's Allowance recipients. Benefit help for homeowners with housing costs is intended to provide reasonable protection to help secure the home. The mortgage lenders have agreed, under the Mortgage Code, to consider all cases of financial difficulty and mortgage arrears sympathetically and positively.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of single pensioners receiving income support who have income resources being taken into account of £73.45 or more per week. [125793]

Mr. Bayley: As at February 2000, there were 344,000 single pensioners receiving the Minimum Income Guarantee paid through Income Support who had income resources of £73.45 or more per week being taken into account.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of pensioner couples receiving Income Support who have income resources being taken into account of £114.95 or more per week. [125794]

Mr. Bayley: As at February 2000, there were 69,500 pensioner couples receiving the Minimum Income Guarantee paid through Income Support who had income resources of £114.95 or more per week being taken into account.

Notes:

1. Pensioners are defined as where the claimant is aged over 60 or over.

ONE Service

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when, following the assessment of the first four ONE service pilots, changes will be made in the way that benefits are claimed. [125878]

Angela Eagle: The ONE pilots are planned to run until March 2002 and will be fully evaluated. No decision has yet been taken as to when the changes to the claiming process, being trialled within those pilots, may be more widely applied or the possibility of extending these arrangements beyond the pilot areas.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the assessments that have been made of the first four pilot schemes for the ONE service; and if he will make a statement. [125444]

Angela Eagle: The ONE pilots are planned to run until March 2002 and are the subject of thorough evaluation. When robust and reliable research findings are available they will be published.

Appeals

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many awards of each type of benefit were made or increased as a result of appeals in the year 1999–2000; what the cost to his Department will be of the making or increasing of those awards; how much the appeal process cost his Department in that year; and if he will make a statement. [125879]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Such information as is available is as follows.

In the year ending September 1999 (the latest date available), of 262,971 appeals heard by the Appeals Service, 92,776 were found in the appellants favour.

Notes:

1. As figures for September 1999 are not due to be published until 22 June, the figures quoted are provisional and may be subject to revision.

2. Appeals found in the appellants favour includes References revised in favour of the appellant.

Estimated cost of processing appeals within the Department for the year 1999–2000

£ million

	Estimated cost
Appeals Services	[1]56.917
Benefits Agency	[2]24.260
Child Support Agency	4.000

[1] This figure excludes the cost of the launch of the Appeals Service agency and the introduction of the Decision Making and Appeals changes.

[2] This figure reflects appeals processing within the district network and Disability and Carers Benefit Directorate only. Appeals costs for the Child Benefit Directorate and Pensions Overseas Directorate cannot be separately identified.

A new system to streamline and modernise the appeals system has been introduced. This will lead to a faster and more efficient service. The Appeals Service has already made significant improvements to clear backlogs and reduce waiting times. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has set challenging targets to improve the service still further.

Client Surveys

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what changes have been made by his Department as a result of representative surveys of its clients carried out in 1998–99 and 1999–2000; and what the (a) costs and (b) savings from such changes will be in each of the next five years. [125876]

Mr. Rooker: Representative surveys of clients are only one of many sources of information and evidence the Department uses to develop, monitor and evaluate policies and their delivery. Survey findings do not contribute to the policy process in isolation but are used alongside other information such as management and administrative data. It is not possible, therefore, to say what changes have been made directly as a result of representative surveys of clients and to determine costs and savings arising.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will make a statement on the role of the National Intelligence Unit in tackling benefit fraud in Dorset; [125724]

(2) what recent discussions he has had with the Benefits Agency about tackling benefit fraud in Dorset. [125730]

Mr. Rooker: The purpose of the National Intelligence Unit (NIU) is to provide "information for action" or anti-fraud intelligence that facilitates better informed decision making at managerial and operational levels. The NIU is located over five sites and consists primarily of data collection sections and teams of analysts. Once analysed, all intelligence which can be used to help combat benefit fraud is referred to relevant sections of the Benefits Agency. No information is available on the role of the NIU in tackling benefit fraud in specific towns, cities or counties as the unit operates on a national level.

Although we have held no recent discussions with the Benefits Agency about tackling benefit fraud specifically in Dorset, national policy on combating fraud applies throughout Great Britain. We set out the strategy for tackling fraud in the White Paper "Safeguarding Social Security" presented to Parliament in March 1999.

The four key principles are; getting it right—benefit payments should be correct from day one; keeping it right—ensuring payments are adjusted as circumstances change; putting it right—detecting when payments go wrong and taking prompt action to correct them with appropriate penalties to prevent a recurrence; and making sure our strategy works—by monitoring progress, evaluating the strength of our defences and adjusting them in the light of experience.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the value of additional detected fraud and overpayments if the National Fraud Initiative scheme was extended to all councils in the UK. [125283]

Mr. Rooker: The estimates requested are not available. However, we welcome the recently published National Fraud Initiative report which, like this Departments' Housing Benefit Matching Service, is a good example of what can be achieved by well targeted data matching.

Child Support

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in how many cases since 1 April the Benefits Agency has decided that a lone parent has good cause not to co-operate with the Child Support Agency in obtaining maintenance; what estimate he has made of the financial benefits which have accrued to (a) his Department, (b) claimants and (c) children affected; and if he will make a statement. [125440]

Angela Eagle: During April this year, the latest date for which information is available, it was accepted that 501 parents with care had good cause for not co-operating with the Child Support Agency. This compares with some 11,000 parents with care claiming Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance over the same period.

The underlying purpose of the requirement to co-operate with the Child Support Agency where these benefits are in payment is to ensure that, wherever possible, parents and not the taxpayer take responsibility for supporting their children. The receipt of regular maintenance can also play an important part in helping to lift children out of poverty.

Earnings Disregard

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the (a) gross and (b) net costs of increasing the Housing Benefit/Council Tax Benefit earnings disregard by (i) £5, (ii) £10, (iii) £15 and (iv) £20 per week; and how many households would (1) benefit and (2) be taken off Housing Benefit/Council Tax Benefit as a result. [125575]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

No cases would be lifted out of Housing Benefit/Council Tax Benefit (CTB) as a result of these measures. In fact extra cases will become entitled to the benefits.

Estimates of the costs of increasing earnings disregards in HB/CTB and the numbers gaining

	Cost in 2000–01 (£ million)	Number of cases benefiting
		HB (thousand)	CTB (thousand)
£5	75	390	350
£10	175	400	360
£15	250	420	380
£20	350	450	400

Notes:

1. The gross and net costs of increasing the Housing Benefit/Council Tax Benefit earnings disregard will be identical, since Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit are not taken into account in the calculation of other benefits.
2. Estimates based on the 1997–98 Family Resources Survey and Housing Benefit Administrative data for May 1998.
3. Costs are rounded to the nearest £5 million, gainers are rounded to the nearest 10,000 cases.
4. The numbers benefiting are expressed in terms of benefit units rather than households. It is not possible to calculate the total number of households benefiting from the measures by summing the Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit gainers since some cases will gain in both benefits.
5. The number of cases benefiting includes cases who float on to the benefits as a result of these measures.

Tax Credits

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many households have been taken off (a) Housing Benefit and (b) Council Tax Benefit as a consequence of Working Families Tax Credit and Disabled Persons Tax Credit in (i) the UK and (ii) each region. [125415]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested as the most recent available data for Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit relate to August 1999, which is prior to the introduction of the Working Families Tax Credit.

However, we estimate that the introduction of Working Families Tax Credit will move about 90,000 claimants off Housing Benefit in Great Britain in 2000–01, with similar numbers moving off Council Tax Benefit.

Estimates for the effects of the Working Families Tax Credit are based on the Family Resources Survey. This does not have an adequate sample size to produce corresponding estimates for Disabled Persons Tax Credit, since only a small number of Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit recipients also received Disability Working Allowance. The reduction in the number of recipients of Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit as a result of the introduction of the Disabled Persons Tax Credit is, however, likely to be small.

Regional estimates of the effect of Working Families Tax Credit are not available owing to the small sample sizes in the Family Resources Survey when analysed at a regional level.

Housing Benefit (Chelmsford)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the national guidelines are for the time a local authority should take to process a Housing Benefit application; and what is the average time it is taking in the Chelmsford local authority area. [126022]

Angela Eagle: Under regulation 76 of the Housing Benefit (General) Regulations 1987, where a local authority has received sufficient information to determine a claim, it must make the determination within 14 days of receipt of that information or as soon as reasonably practicable thereafter.

Under the Best Value regime introduced from April 2000, local authorities are required to submit data on the average length of time taken to determine claims. Previously, information was collected on the percentage of claims determined within 14 days. Between 1 April 1998 and 31 March 1999, the latest period for which data are available, Chelmsford Borough Council determined 48 per cent. of all Housing Benefit claims within 14 days.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Metropolitan Police

Mrs. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to publish full-year data for the performance of the Metropolitan police in relation to its policing plan for 1999–2000. [126743]

Mr. Straw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis included performance data for the first 11 months of the last financial year, and projected performance in its final month, in his Policing and Performance Plan for 2000–01 which he published on 31 March, on the Metropolitan police website http://www.met.police.uk.

The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that he expects to publish a hard-copy version of the Plan on 21 June. This will include full-year performance data for 1999–2000. These data confirm, I understand, the provisional out-turns included in the version of the Plan published on 31 March.

It may benefit right hon. and hon. Members, in particular those preparing to take part in the debate on the policing of London which, subject to the demands of business, we hope the House will be able to hold before the end of this month, to have early sight of the hard-copy version of the Plan. I am, therefore, today placing proof copies of the Plan in the Vote Office, and in the Library.

Robbery

Ms McCafferty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what additional support he intends to provide to the police service for reducing robbery. [126776]

Mr. Straw: I am announcing today the allocation of £20 million additional resources for tackling robbery in the five metropolitan areas in which 70 per cent. of all robberies take place, and for which challenging targets have been set for the police forces concerned by their respective police authorities. The £20 million forms part of the £91 million which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer allocated in the Budget for additional measures to support the delivery of crime reduction.

The specific amounts being made available are:

	£ million
Metropolitan police	9.1
West Midlands	3.3
Greater Manchester	3.2
West Yorkshire	2.6
Merseyside	1.8

The five forces will now be drawing up plans to achieve early reductions in robbery levels.

Rural Policing

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what additional support he intends to provide to the police service for addressing rural crime. [126777]

Mr. Straw: I am announcing today that £15 million of the £91 million for police modernisation will be used to meet the special needs of rural policing. We are discussing with the police service how this money is to be allocated to improve performance. In particular, we will be discussing a national standard response time for emergency calls in rural areas. Additional funding for future years will be considered as part of the Spending Review 2000 process.

Hunting With Hounds

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the additional police numbers that will be needed in rural areas to enforce legislation banning hunting with dogs. [126091]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We will be consulting with the police on the implications to them of the legislative options contained in the proposed Bill on hunting with dogs.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the cost of compensation (a) per person on average and (b) in total for loss of livelihood if hunting with dogs is made illegal. [126092]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The consequences of the provisions of the proposed Bill on hunting with dogs will be considered as legislative options are drawn up.

Police Pensions

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many certificates to forfeit police pensions have been issued in the last 10 years. [125994]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Secretary of State for the Home Department has issued 24 certificates to forfeit police pensions in the last 10 years.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what specific offences have led to the issue of certificates to forfeit police pensions on the basis that the offence in question was determined to be liable to lead to serious loss of confidence in the public service during the last five years. [125993]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The following offences have led to the issue of certificates to forfeit police pensions on the basis that the offence in question was determined to be liable to lead to serious loss of confidence in the public service during the last five years:

Attempting to pervert the course of justice
Blackmail
Conspiracy to commit misconduct in a public office
Conspiracy to defraud a building society
Conspiracy to pervert the course of justice
Conspiracy to, and/or, supply of a controlled drug, Class B cannabis resin Corruption Deception Dishonesty
Indecent assault
Importation of controlled drugs
Murder
Perverting the course of justice/dangerous driving
Theft
Theft by deception
Using a false instrument

Drug Testing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the drugs that he proposes to include in the mandatory drug testing for offenders under the provisions of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill. [125996]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Initially it is proposed to test specifically for heroin and crack/cocaine, which research has shown to have a particularly strong connection with acquisitive crime. The Bill provides for the Secretary of State to specify, by order, the Class A drugs applicable. Consideration will be given to including other Class A drugs in the testing programme if research evidence demonstrates a similar link to the commissioning of crime.

Drugs Misuse

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Advisory Council for the Misuse of Drugs is expected to report on the Police Foundation's inquiry into the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. [125995]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Further to the reply I gave my hon. Friend on 8 May 2000, Official Report, column 298W, I understand that the Advisory Council had a short discussion on the Police Foundation's Report at its meeting on 25 May. The Council noted that the Government had made it clear that they were not persuaded that the classification or overall legal framework for LSD, ecstasy or cannabis should be changed, but would be giving careful consideration to the other recommendations arising from the Police Foundation's Inquiry.

The Council also noted that the United Kingdom Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator, Keith Hellawell, is to chair an inter-departmental working group to consider the other recommendations of the Police Foundation Inquiry's Report. I understand that the working group plans to provide a progress report to Ministers later this summer. It is not possible to speculate at this stage whether the consideration by the inter-departmental working group will lead the Government to seek the views of the Advisory Council on any of the recommendations being considered. However, under provisions in the misuse of drugs legislation, the Advisory Council would need to be consulted on any proposed amendments to the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971.

No-smoking Policy

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on (a) the effectiveness of his Department's no-smoking policy and (b) the proportion of his Department's offices that do not allow smoking. [125152]

Mr. Straw: I am satisfied that my Department's policy, under which smoking in its main buildings in London, Croydon and Merseyside is only permitted in designated smoking rooms, is working satisfactorily. 99 per cent. of these offices do not allow smoking.

Rape Statistics

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the conviction rates were for rape (a) nationally and (b) in each Crown Prosecution Service area in England and Wales in each of the last five years for which statistics are available. [125789]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Rape is an indictable only offence. The available information, on defendants tried in the Crown court, is by Police Force Area and is given in the table.

Cross-examination (Sexual History)

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications have been made under section 41 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 to cross-examine a complainant as to previous sexual history; and how many such applications were successful. [125788]

Mr. Charles Clarke: These provisions are not yet in force. Rules of court are being prepared for the implementation of section 41, which have been the subject of recent consultation. The Government intend to implement these provisions as soon as these Rules are in place.

Wrongful Convictions

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much financial compensation was paid in each of the last three years to people freed by courts in England and Wales for wrongful conviction for a criminal offence; and if he will make a statement. [125985]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The total amounts paid in compensation to people who have been wrongly convicted, or charged, for each of the last three financial years are as follows:

Year	Million
1997–98	6.652
1998–99	5.302
1999–2000	5.647

In all cases, the Secretary of State decides whether in principle an applicant qualifies for compensation, but the amount of the award is determined by the independent assessor he has appointed.

Child Contact Centres

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the annual expenditure is on child contact centres through probation partnerships. [125953]

Mr. Boateng: In 1998–99, the probation service spent a total of £1,106,299 on partnership projects relating to Family Court Welfare Work, £153,862 of which was devoted specifically to child contact centres.

Internet Monitoring

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what institutions he plans will be involved in the monitoring of internet and e-mail communications; and if he will make a statement. [125668]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Regulation of Investigatory Powers Bill does not provide for routine monitoring of any communications. Clause 24 of the Bill allows for the acquisition of communications data, which would include the addressing data but not the content of the communication, by:

a police force;

the National Criminal Intelligence Service;

the National Crime Squad;

the Commissioners of Customs and Excise and their departments; and any of the intelligence services (taken to mean the Security Service, the Secret Intelligence Service and Government Communications Headquarters).

The Bill provides for this list to be added to by Order.

We have included a number of oversight procedures to cover the collection of communications data. No authorising officer may authorise a notice unless obtaining the communications data is both necessary for certain specified purposes, and proportionate.

In addition, the Bill places oversight of the use of this power under the remit of the Interception Commissioner. We intend for an audit team from the Commissioner's office to undertake periodic inspections of each body to ensure that the power is being used responsibly.

Alcohol Licences (River Boats)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Thames river boats operate open-ticket party events where alcohol is served; and how many open-ticket party events were held on Thames river boats in (a) 1999, (b) 1995 and (c) 1990. [125445]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: This information is not collected, and is not readily available.

Fire Service

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he will end the consultation period on the document entitled, "The Future of Fire Service Control Rooms and Communication"; [125721]

(2) if he will list the consultees in relation to the document entitled, "The Future of Fire Service Control Rooms and Communication". [125720]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The management summary of the Fire Service Communications and Control Rooms Study was circulated to the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Council immediately prior to its meeting on 16 May 2000. The summary and the full report will be discussed at its meeting on 19 July. The Council is the statutory body appointed under section 29 of the Fire Services Act 1947 to advise the Secretary of State, on fire service matters. Current membership includes the following fire service representative bodies; the Local Government Association, the Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers' Association, the Fire Brigades Union and the Retained Firefighters' Union.

Best Value authorities are required to carry out reviews of all their functions over a period of five years from April 2000. To help fire authorities make the most of opportunities for improved efficiency through greater collaboration, a common timetable has been set in the Local Government (Best Value) Performance Plans and Reviews Order 1999 (SI 1999 No. 3251) in respect of fire authorities for the review of particular functions, including communications and control in year one (2000–01). The aim of the above study is to provide advice for authorities on how best to meet their future mobile communications and control room requirements.

Fire authorities in England and Wales have been invited to consider the findings of the study and to take these into account in conducting the Best Value reviews of their control and communications functions in accordance with SI 1999 No. 3251. The relevant fire service circular (No 8/2000) was issued on 10 May to fire authorities and brigades and to other bodies with an interest in fire service matters. A copy of the circular is in the Library.

Gammahydroxybutyrate

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Metropolitan Police Service's programme of research into drug-assisted sexual assault, with particular reference to the classification of gammahydroxybutyrate. [126014]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This research is being carried out by the Metropolitan Police Service with funding from the Home Office under the Police Research Award Scheme.

I understand that the report has not yet been released and is due to be launched by the Metropolitan Police Service on 21 June 2000.

CABINET OFFICE

Anti-drugs Strategy

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what has been the total spending on anti-drugs strategies during each of the last 10 years; and what proportion in each of those years was spent on (a) drug enforcement measures and (b) rehabilitation. [125997]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The first UK drugs strategy "Tackling Drugs Together" was launched in May 1995 and allocated £8.8 million over three years to Drug Action Teams, £5.9 million on schools drug education for 1995–96, and £1 million in the same year for services for young people at an early stage of drug misuse. For the present strategy, "Tackling Drugs To Build A Better Britain", the 1998 Comprehensive Spending Review settlement provided an additional £217 million of resources for three years, of which £70.5 million (32.4 per cent.) was allocated for new treatment services in communities, and £60 million (27.6 per cent.) for treatment services in prisons. No extra resources were allocated for enforcement. The overall aim of the Government's present anti-drugs strategy is to shift the emphasis away from dealing with the consequences of the drugs problem towards positive investment in preventing and targeting it, and Government drug-related expenditure will reflect this over the length of the strategy.

Public Sector Ombudsman

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if she will make a statement on the review of the Public Sector Ombudsman in England. [126311]

Mr. Stringer: As part of our programme of modernisation, the Government have reviewed the organisation and operation of the Public Sector Ombudsmen in England. Underlying this review was a recognition of the need to ease public access and improve efficiency in dealing with complaints across different sectors. The review was published on 13 April 2000, Official Report, column 241W.

While the review was well received, it was always our intention to consult widely on the outcome of the review. We want to give as many people as possible the opportunity to comment on the review's recommendations which, if implemented in full, will radically reform the ombudsmen system in England. That is why we have today published a consultation paper inviting comments on the review and on any other aspect of the organisation or operation of the Public Sector Ombudsmen in England. Copies of the consultation paper have been placed in the Libraries of the House and in the Vote Office.

The Government recognise and value the contribution made by everyone involved in the work of the ombudsmen. We also recognise the significant contribution made by the ombudsmen themselves in helping public bodies maintain and improve the standards of service they offer. The challenge now is to consider how to strengthen that contribution and ensure that all public bodies provide a first class service to all citizens.

Better Government for Older People

Mrs. Lawrence: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when the report of the Better Government for Older People programme will be published. [126312]

Mr. Ian McCartney: "All Our Futures", the report of the Better Government for Older People programme, is being published today. Copies are being placed in the Libraries of the House.

The Government are committed to better policy making and more responsive public services as part of the "Modernising Government" agenda. The recommendations of the Better Government for Older People programme, a unique partnership between central and local government, the voluntary sector and the academic world, provide new evidence of how to combat age discrimination, better engage with older people, improve decision-making, better meet older people's needs and promote a strategic and joined-up approach to an ageing population. The Inter-Ministerial Group on Older People will now consider the recommendations carefully with a view to early action and a full response.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Judges

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if the Lord Chancellor has completed the review of the guidance which is given to judges on outside activities and interests. [126775]

Mr. Lock: Yes. Copies of the revised guidance to be used in future have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The Lord Chancellor is satisfied that the substance of the existing guidance, which is long standing, remains basically sound. It is necessarily of a general kind, for application in individual circumstances. The Lord Chancellor is satisfied that it strikes an appropriate balance in discouraging activities or interests which may be seen to undermine judicial impartiality, or conflict with judicial office, without being unduly restrictive. He has at the same time made a number of detailed changes in the text and added a statement of general principles. The new guidance will be kept under review in the light of experience. The general guidance on outside activities and interests is separate from any question of conflict of interest arising in individual cases on which the Court of Appeal recently gave further authoritative guidance in its judgment in the case of Lockbail (UK) Ltd. v. Bayfield Properties Ltd.

Child Contact Centres

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what arrangements will be made for the funding of child contact centres after the Family Court Welfare Service is replaced by the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service. [125954]

Jane Kennedy: As part of the arrangements for establishing CAFCASS, funds, including partnership funding for contact centres will transfer from the probation service. The Criminal Justice and Court Services Bill provides for CAFCASS to have grant making powers to continue such work.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 351

SESSION 1999–2000

5th June—15th June 2000

Printed indexes to Hansard

The volume index is one of three printed indexes to Commons Hansard produced from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Indexing Service (POLIS). It contains references to material in the bound volumes of Hansard. The other indexes produced are:

- The fortnightly index to Hansard. This covers the same date range as the volume index but references are to the column numbering in the daily parts and weekly edition of Hansard.
- The sessional index to Hansard. This contains references to material in the bound volumes for a whole session.

Indexes on the Parliamentary website

Fortnightly, volume and sessional indexes covering material from the beginning of the 1999/2000 session will also appear on the Parliamentary website at http://www.parliament.uk with links to the full text of Hansard.

SCOPE

The indexes include entries covering:

- The content of all material recorded in Hansard, including debates, procedural motions and questions.
- The names of all Members contributing to the Parliamentary business recorded in Hansard.
- The names of some types of Parliamentary business whenever they occur in Hansard. These are 'Ministerial statements', 'Business statements', 'Opposition days' and 'Estimates days'.

ARRANGEMENT

- All headings are in one word-by-word alphabetical sequence, with Members' contribution entries distinguished from other entries by italics.
- Where a Member contributes to Parliamentary business and is the subject of Parliamentary business there are separate contribution and subject entries, the subject entry coming first.
- Entries beginning 'Mac' and 'Mc' are sorted in one sequence as 'Mac'.
- 'St', when abbreviated for Saint, is filed as 'Saint'.
- Numbers are filed as if spelt out, e.g. '10 Downing Street' as if 'Ten Downing Street'.

HEADINGS

Choice of headings

- Specificity—Entries summarise the overall content of a debate or question as specifically as the various POLIS thesauruses allow. For example, Education, Higher education, Universities or the name of a particular university is used depending on the breadth of the item.
- Name headings—Specific entries are included for the names of people, places, institutions, organisations, committees, programmes, initiatives, publications and legislation when these constitute the overall subject of an item.
- Organisations and subjects—Organisation entries are preferred for material about the general performance, administration and staffing of an organisation (for example, United Kingdom Passports Agency, Standards). Subject entries are preferred for what organisations do as part of their duties (for example, Passports, Fees and charges).

Geographical coverage

- Subject headings—Subject headings are assumed to refer to the whole of England, Great Britain or the United Kingdom unless otherwise stated.
- Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales—Material relating to the whole of Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales is indexed under these headings.
- Places within the UK—Material about specific towns, areas and institutions is entered under the name of the specific town, area or institution.
- Foreign countries—Most material relating to foreign countries is collected under the name of that country. Some additional material may be found under the names of—groups of countries, areas within countries, geographical features, place names associated with particular issues, politicians and heads of state, international bodies, and institutions and companies operating in those countries.
- EC/EU material—General material about the European Communities and European institutions as bodies is entered under 'European Communities' and 'EC institutions'. Organisational material about specific communities and institutions is entered under the name of the body, for example 'European Coal and Steel Community' or 'European Parliament'. Material about what the Communities and institutions are doing or propose to do is entered under various subject headings beginning 'EC' such as 'EC environmental policy'.

Parliamentary material and business

- Material about Parliament—This is indexed under 'Parliament', the names of the two Houses, the 'Palace of Westminster' and parts of the Parliamentary estate (such as 'Portcullis House').
- Committees—Material about committees is indexed under 'Committees', types of committee (such as 'Select committees') and the names of individual committees (such as 'Home Affairs Select Committee').
- Parliamentary proceedings/procedures—Material discussing these is indexed under the specific type of proceeding (such as 'Parliamentary questions' or 'Oral questions'), procedure (such as 'Calling of Members') or issue (such as 'Unparliamentary expressions').
- Legislation—Entries for Parliamentary proceedings on bills and statutory instruments are entered under their titles. Where the lead word of the bill or statutory instrument does not provide a full or clear indication of the subject there are additional subject entries when the bill or instrument is debated. For example, debates on the 'Child Support Pensions and Social Security Bill' have entries under 'Pensions' and 'Social security benefits' as well as under the title of the Bill.
- Members' names—These are given in the form by which the Member prefers to be known.
- Speaker and Chair—Contributions by the Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker and deputies'. Contributions from the chair during Committees of the Whole House are brought together under 'Chairman of Committee of the Whole House'. Significant rulings and statements (as opposed to routine comments) are indicated by the sub-heading 'Rulings and statements' in both cases.

Guidance on headings

- Cross references—'See' references indicate all the material has been entered under another heading. 'See also' references indicate that additional information may be found under another heading.
- Concept thesaurus—A copy of the subject thesaurus to POLIS, listing the concept entries used in the index, is available on the Parliamentary website. A hard copy is available from the Head of the POLIS Unit, House of Commons Library, 1 Derby Gate, London, SW1A 2DG (020 7219 6456).

REFERENCES

- References in the indexes are to columns rather than pages.
- References to debates, but not questions, are accompanied by the date of the item.
- There are separate sequences in Hansard for the material taken on the floor of the House, Westminster Hall sittings and written questions:
  - References consisting of a number by itself indicate material taken on the floor of the House.
  - References ending in 'wh' indicate Westminster Hall sittings.
  - References ending in 'w' indicate written questions.
- References under all headings except the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in one numerical sequence irrespective of whether the material is taken on the floor of the House, is discussed at a Westminster Hall sitting or is a written question.
- References under the names of Members contributing to Parliamentary business and the titles of legislation are listed in numerical sequence under the following headings:
  - Debates etc. (which includes interventions and points of order as well as significant contributions to debates);
  - Sittings in Westminster Hall (covering all debates held as part of the Westminster Hall sittings); and
  - Questions (which includes written, oral and private notice questions).

ABBREVIATIONS

The following abbreviations are used in connection with the progress of bills:

- 1R=First reading
- 2R=Second reading
- Com=Committee stage
- Rep=Report stage
- 3R=Third reading
- res=resolution
- amendt(s)=amendment(s)
- *=matter taken formally without debate or division.

Parliamentary background

- The Parliamentary website at http://www.parliament.uk contains a range of information about Parliament and the full text of some Parliamentary papers and proceedings including Hansard.
- Information on current Parliamentary business is provided in the House of Commons Information Office Weekly Information Bulletin, available on the website and from The Stationery Office (020 7873 8499).
- Further information on Parliamentary proceedings and procedures is available from the House of Commons Information Office (020 7219 4272).
